There never was any person ungrateful who was not also proud; nor, convertibly, any one proud, who was not equally ungrateful. South, Serm.

CO'NVERTITE. n. s. [converti, French.] A convert; one converted from another opinion. Not now in use.

Since you are a gentle convertite,
My tongue shall hush again this storm of war. Shaksp. K. John.

Nor would I be a convertite so cold,
As not to tell it. Donne, Poems, p. 188.

CO'NVEX. adj. [convexus, Lat.] Rising in a circular form; opposite to concave.

It is the duty of a painter, even in this also, to imitate the convex mirrour, and to place nothing which glares at the border of his picture. Dryden, Duf.

An orb or ball round its own axis whirl;
Will not the motion to a distance hurl
Whatever dust or sand you on it place,
And drops of water, from its convex face. Blackmore, Creat.

CO'NVEX.† n. s. [Formerly with the accent on the last syllable.] A convex body; a body swelling externally into a circular form.

Our prison strong, this huge convéx of fire
Outrageous to devour. Milton, P. L. ii. 434.

In circuit to the uttermost convéx
Of this great round. Ibid. vii. 266.

A comet draws a long extended blaze;
From East to West burns through th'etherial frame,
And half heaven's convex glitters with the flame. Tickel.

CONVE'XED. part. adj. [from convex.] Formed convex; protuberant in a circular form.

Dolphins are straight; nor have they their spine convexed, or more considerably embowed than either sharks, porpoises, whales, or other cetaceous animals. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CONVE'XEDLY. adv. [from convexed.] In a convex form.

They be drawn convexedly crooked in one piece; yet the dolphin that carrieth Arion, is concavously inverted, and hath its spine depressed. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CONVE'XITY. n. s. [from convex.] Protuberance in a circular form.

Convex glasses supply the defect of plumpness in the eye, and, by increasing the refraction, make the rays converge sooner, so as to convene distinctly at the bottom of the eye, if the glass have a due degree of convexity. Newton, Opt.

If the eye were so piercing as to descry even opake and little objects a hundred leagues off, it would do us little service; it would be terminated by neighbouring hills and woods, or in the largest and evenest plain, by the very convexity of the earth. Bentley.

CO'NVEXLY. adv. [from convex.] In a convex form.

Almost all, both blunt and sharp, are convexly conical, they are all along convex, not only per ambitum, but between both ends. Grew, Museum.

CO'NVEXNESS. n. s. [from convex.] Spheroidical protuberance; convexity.

CO'NVEXO-CONCAVE. adj. Having the hollow on the inside, corresponding to the external protuberance.

These are the phenomena of thick convexo-concave plates of glass, which are every where of the same thickness. Newton.

To CONVE'Y. v. a. [conveho, Latin.]

1. To carry; to transport from one place to another.

Let letters be given me to the governours beyond the river, that they may convey me over till I come into Judea. Neh. ii. 7.

I will convey them by sea in floats, unto the place thou shalt appoint me. 1 Kings, v. 9.

2. To hand from one to another.

A divine natural right could not be conveyed down, without any plain, natural, or divine rule concerning it. Locke.

3. To remove secretly.

There was one conveyed out of my house yesterday in this basket. Shaksp. M. W. of Winds.

4. To bring any thing, as an instrument of transmission; to transmit.

Since there appears not to be any ideas in the mind, before the senses have conveyed any in, I conceive that ideas in the understanding are coeval with sensation. Locke.

5. To transfer; to deliver to another.

The earl of Desmond, before his breaking forth into rebellion, conveyed secretly all his lands to feoffees in trust. Spenser on Ireland.

Adam's property or private dominion could not convey any sovereignty or rule to his heir, who, not having a right to inherit all his father's possessions, could not thereby come to have any sovereignty over his brethren. Locke.

6. To impart by means of something.

Men fill one another's heads with noise and sounds, but convey not thereby their thoughts. Locke.

That which uses to produce the idea, though conveyed in by the usual organ, not being taken notice of, there follows no sensation. Locke.

Some single imperceptible bodies must come from them to the eyes, and thereby convey to the brain some motion which produces those ideas. Locke.

They give energy to our expressions, and convey our thoughts in more ardent and intense phrases than any in our own tongue. Addison, Spect. No. 405.

7. To impart; to introduce.

What obscured light the heavens did grant,
Did but convey unto our fearful minds
A doubtful warrant of immediate death. Shakspeare, Com. of Err.

Others convey themselves into the mind by more senses than one. Locke.

8. To manage with privacy.

I will convey the business as I shall find means, and acquaint you withal. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

Hugh Capet also who usurp'd the crown,
To fine his title with some shews of truth
Convey'd himself as heir to the Lady Lengare. Shakspeare.

To CONVE'Y.* v. n. To play the thief; to have the habit of thieving. From this old and cant acceptation of the word comes the modern conveyance for artifice. See the 8th sense of CONVEYANCE, and the 3d of CONVEYER.

Syr, the horesones coulde not convaye clene. Old Morality of Hycke-Scorner.

Nym. The good humour is to steal at a minute's rest.

Pist. Convey, the wise it call: steal? foh, a fico for the phrase. Shaksp. M. W. of Windsor.

CONVE'YANCE. n. s. [from convey.]

1. The act of removing any thing.

Tell her thou mad'st away her uncle Clarence,
Her uncle Rivers; ay, and for her sake,

2. Way for carriage or transportation.

Following the river downward, there is conveyance unto the countries named in the text. Raleigh, Hist. of the World.

Iron works ought to be confined to places where there is no conveyance for timber to places of vent, so as to quit the cost of the carriage. Temple.

3. The method of removing secretly from one place to another.

Your husband's here at hand; bethink you of some conveyance; in the house you cannot hide him. Shakspeare.

4. The means or instrument by which any thing is conveyed.

We pout upon the morning, are unapt
To give or to forgive; but when we've

Stuff'd these pipes, and these conveyances of blood, With wine and feeding, we have suppler souls.
Shaksp. Coriol.

How such a variety of motions should be regularly conducted in such a wilderness of passages and distinct avenues by mere impellents and material conveyances, I have not the least conjecture.
Glanville, San. Dog.

5. Transmission; delivery from one to another.

Our author has provided for the descending and conveyance down of Adam's monarchical power, or paternal dominion, to posterity. Locke.

6. Act of transferring property; grant.

Doth not the act of the parents, in any lawful grant or conveyance, bind their heirs for ever thereunto? Spenser on Ireland.

7. Writing by which property is transferred.

The very conveyances of his lands will hardly lie in this box; and must the inheritor himself have no more? Shaksp. Hamlet.

This begot a suit in the chancery before the lord Coventry, who found the conveyances in law to be so firm, that in justice he must decree the land to the earl. Clarendon.

8. Secret management; juggling artifice; private removal; secret substitution of one thing for another.

It cometh herein to pass with men, unadvisedly fallen into errour, as with them whose state hath no ground to uphold it, but only the help which, by subtile conveyance, they draw out of casual events, arising from day to day, till at length they be clean spent. Hooker, iii. § 4.

Close conveyance, and each practice ill
Of cosinage and knavery. Spens. Hubb. Tale.

I am this day come to survey the Tower;
Since Henry's death, I fear there is conveyance.
Shaksp. Hen. VI.

Can they not juggle, and with slight,
Conveyance play with wrong and right. Hudibras.

CONVE'YANCER.† n. s. [from conveyance.] A lawyer who draws writings by which property is transferred.

The Conquerour reduced all grants to writing, to signature, and to witnesses; which brought in cavils and actions grounded upon punctilious errours in writing, mistakes in expression, which in writing, must sometimes happen either by haste, weakness, or perhaps by fraud of conveyancers. Temple, Introd. Hist. of Eng.

CONVE'YER.† n. s. [from convey.]

1. One who carries or transmits any thing from one place or person to another.

The conveyers of waters of these times content themselves with one inch of fall in six hundred feet. Brerewood on Lang.

Those who stand before earthly princes, in the nearest degree of approach, who are the dispensers of their favours, and conveyers of their will to others, do, on that very account, challenge high honours to themselves. Atterbury.

2. That by which any thing is conveyed.

Melon seeds [are prescribed] with whey of goats' milk, which is the common conveyer.
Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 403.

Throughout the whole body it [the cavity of the spine] lieth lower, and deeper, and safer than the veins, or arteries, or any other common conveyers in the body of man.
Smith, Portraiture of Old Age, p. 209.

This would be highly injurious to the great Artificer and Maker of those bodies, that he should provide such storehouses of mischief, such irresistible conveyers of the seeds of sin into men's minds. South, Serm. viii. 92.

3. A juggler; an impostor; a thief.

Frequent your exercises, a horn on your thumb,
A quick eye, a sharp knife, at hand a receiver:
But then take heed, cosin, ye be a clenly convayor.
Preston, Trag. of Cambises, (about 1561.)

Bol. Go, some of you, convey him to the Tower.
K. Rich. O, good! convey? — Conveyers are you all,
That rise thus nimbly by a true king's fall.
Shaksp. Rich. II.

CONVICI'NITY.* n. s. [Lat. con and vicinus.] Nearness; neighbourhood.

The bishop having first stated the convicinity and contiguity of the two parishes.
Wotton, Hist. of Kiddington, p. 18.

To CONVI'CT.† v. a. [convinco, convictum, Lat.]

1. To prove guilty; to detect in guilt.

And they which heard it, being convicted by their own conscience, went out one by one.
John, viii. 9.

Things, that at the first shew seemed possible, by ripping up the performance of them, have been convicted of impossibility. Bacon, Holy War.

2. To confute; to discover to be false.

Although not only the reason of any head, but experience of every hand, may well convict it, yet will it not by divers be rejected.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

3. To shew by proof or evidence.

If there be no such thing apparent upon record, they do as if one should demand a legacy by virtue of some written testament, wherein there being no such thing specified, he pleadeth that there it must needs be, and bringeth arguments from the love which always the testator bore him, imagining that these proofs will convict a testament to have that in it which other men can no where by reading find. Hooker.

4. To destroy; to overpower; to surmount. Not now in use; but formerly employed for convince, as our old lexicography shews. V. Minsheu in V. CONVICT. In the following genuine passage of our great poet, Pope altered convicted to collected; and Dr. Johnson, not attending to this sense of the word, adopted the sophisticated reading in citing the passage for an illustration of armado, which I have removed.

So, by a roaring tempest on the flood,
A whole armado of convicted sail,
Is scatter'd and disjoin'd from fellowship.
Shaksp. K. John.

CONVI'CT. adj. [rather the participle of the verb.] Convicted; detected in guilt.

Before I be convict by course of law,
To threaten me with death is most unlawful.
Shaksp. Rich. III.

By the civil law, a person convict, or confessing his own crime, cannot appeal. Ayliffe's Parergon.

Convict a papist he, and I a poet.
Pope, Epist. of Hor.

CO'NVICT. n. s. [from the verb.] A person cast at the bar; one found guilty of the crime charged against him; a criminal detected at his trial.

On the score of humanity, the civil law allows a certain space of time both to the convict and to persons confessing, in order to satisfy the judgement. Ayliffe's Parergon.

CONVI'CTION. n. s. [from convict.]

1. Detection of guilt, which is, in law, either when a man is outlawed, or appears and confesses, or else is found guilty by the inquest. Cowel.

The third best absent is condemn'd,
Convict by flight, and rebel to all law,
Conviction to the serpent none belongs.
Milton, P. L.

2. The act of convincing; confutation; the act of forcing others, by argument, to allow a position.

When therefore the apostle requireth liability to convict hereticks, can we think he judgeth it a thing unlawful, and not rather needful, to use the principal instrument of their conviction, the light of reason. Hooker, iii. § 8.

The manner of his conviction was designed, not as a peculiar privilege to him, but as a standing miracle, a lasting argument, for the conviction of others, to the very end of the world. Atterbury.

3. State of being convinced.

Their wisdom is only of this world, to put false colours upon things, to call good evil, and evil good, against the conviction of their own consciences. Swift.

CONVI'CTIVE.† adj. [from convict.] Having the power of convincing.

In those convictive wonders, O Saviour, which thou wroughtest upon earth.
Bp. Hall, Gr. Myst. of Godliness, § 7.

They would then have been thought to assert it with clear and convictive evidence.
Glanville, Pre-exist. of Souls, p. 87.

It deserves an entire treatise apart by itself, and that girt up in the most close and convictive method that may be. More, Antid. ag. Idolatry, Pref.

CONVI'CTIVELY.* adv. [from convictive.] In a convincing manner.

The truth of the Gospel had clearly shined in the simplicity thereof, and so convictively against all the follies and impostures of the former ages.
More, Expos. Seven Ch. p. 141.

To CONVI'NCE.† v. a. [convinco, Latin.]

1. To force any one to acknowledge a contested position.

That which I have all this while been endeavouring to convince men of, and to persuade them to, is no other but what God himself doth particularly recommend to us, as proper for human consideration. Tillotson.

But having shifted every form to 'scape,
Convinc'd of conquest, he resum'd his shape.
Dryden, Virgil.

History is all the light we have in many cases, and we receive from it a great part of the useful truths we have, with a convincing evidence. Locke.

2. To convict; to prove guilty of.

To convince all that are ungodly among them, of all their ungodly deeds. Jude, 15.

The discovery of a truth, formerly unknown, doth rather convince man of ignorance, than nature of errour. Ralegh.

Should he forswear't, make all the affidavits
Against it, that he could, afore the bench
And twenty juries, he would be convinc'd.
B. Jonson, Staple of News.

O seek not to convince me of a crime,
Which I can ne'er repent, nor can you pardon.
Dryden.

3. To evince; to prove; to manifest; to vindicate. Not in use.

Your Italy contains none so accomplished a courtier, to convince the honour of my mistress.
Shakspeare, Cym.

This letter, instead of a confutation, only urgeth me to prove divers passages of my sermon, which M. Cheynel's part was to convince. Dr. Maine.

4. To overpower; to surmount. This sense is obsolete, Dr. Johnson says, citing only Shakspeare. Dryden, however, uses it.

There are a crew of wretched souls
That stay his cure; their malady convinces
The great essay of art. Shaksp. Macbeth.

Knaves be such abroad,
Who having, by their own importunate suit,
Or voluntary dotage of some mistress,
Convinc'd or supplied them, they cannot chuse
But they must blab. Shakspeare, Othello.

When Duncan is asleep, his two chamberlains
Will I, with wine and wassel, so convince,
That memory, the warder of the brain,
Shall be a fume. Shaksp. Macbeth.

But strait I convinc'd all his fear with a smile.
Dryden, Even. Love.

CONVI'NCEMENT.† n. s. [from convince.] Conviction.

They taught compulsion without convincement, which not long before they complained of as executed unchristianly against themselves.
Milton, Hist. of Eng. B. iii.

Others — love not to wade further into the fear of a convincement. Milton, Tetrachordon.

If that be not convincement enough, let him weigh the other also. Decay of Piety.

CONVI'NCER.* n. s. [from convince.] That which makes manifest.

The divine light now was only a convincer of his miscarriages, but administered nothing of the divine love and power, as it does to them that are obedient, and sincere followers of its precepts; and therefore Adam could no more endure the presence of it, than sore eyes the sun or candle-light. More, Conj. Cabb. (1653,) p. 232.

CONVI'NCIBLE. adj. [from convince.]

1. Capable of conviction.
2. Capable of being evidently disproved, or detected.

Upon what uncertainties, and also convincible falsities, they often erected such emblems we have delivered. Brown.

CONVI'NCINGLY.† adv. [from convince.] In such a manner as to leave no room for doubt or dispute; so as to produce conviction.

How convincingly, O Saviour, wert thou justified in the spirit by the dreadful and miraculous descent of the Holy Ghost in the cloven and fiery tongues, and that sudden variety of language for the spreading of the glory of thy name over all the nations of the earth.
Bp. Hall, Great Mystery of Godliness.

This he did so particularly and convincingly, that those of the parliament were in great confusion. Clarendon.

The third sort of providences, in which God often speaks convincingly, is by signal unexpected deliverances. South, Serm. ix. p. 52.

The resurrection is so convincingly attested by such persons with such circumstances, that they who consider and weigh the testimony, at what distance soever they are placed, cannot entertain any more doubt of the resurrection than the crucifixion of Jesus. Atterbury.

CONVI'NCINGNESS. n. s. [from convincing.] The power of convincing.

CONVI'TIOUS.* adj. [from the Lat. convitior, or convicior, to taunt.] Reproachful.

The Queenes majesty — commaundeth all maner her subjects to forbeare all vain and contentious disputations in matters of religion, and not to use in despite or rebuke of any person these convitious words, papist, or papistical, heretike, scismatike, or sacramentarie, or any such like words of reproche. Q. Eliz. Injunct. &c. 1559.

To CONVI'VE.† v. n. [convivo. Latin.] To entertain; to feast. A word, I believe, not elsewhere used, Dr. Johnson says. But Mr. Steevens asserts that it is used in the Hist. of Helyas, Knight of the Swanne. This verb, which Dr. Johnson has made active by inaccurately printing you for we, as Mr. Mason also has observed, is neuter.

First, all you peers of Greece, go to my tent,
There in the full convive we.
Shakspeare, Troil. and Cress.

CONVI'VAL.† } adj. [convivialis, Lat.] Re-
CONVI'VIAL. } lating to an entertainment; festal; social.

In their convivial garlands they had respect unto plants preventing drunkenness, or discussing the exhalations from wine.
Sir T. Brown, Misc. Tracts, p. 91.

It is an old inscription, "Amici, dum vivimus vivamus;" and in the convival wish, &c.
Pearson on the Creed, Art. xii.

I was the first who set up festivals;
Not with high taste our appetites did force,
But fill'd with conversation and discourse;
Which feasts, convivial meetings we did name.
Denham.

Your social and convivial spirit is such that it is a happiness to live and converse with you.
Dr. Newton.

CONU'NDRUM. n. s. A low jest; a quibble; a mean conceit: a cant word.

Mean time he smoaks, and laughs at merry tale,
Or pun ambiguous, or conundrum quaint. Philips.

To CO'NVOCATE.† v. a. [convoco, Lat.] To call together; to summon to an assembly.

Then both the consuls, at the utmost date
Of their expiring honour, convocate
To Epire the fled fathers. May's Lucan, B. 5.

Smyrna or Angora, where trade hath convocated great numbers of the Armenian nation.
Ricaut, Greek Church, p. 392.

CONVOCA'TION.† n. s. [convocatio, Lat.]

1. The act of calling to an assembly.

Diaphantus making a general convocation, spake to them in this manner. Sidney.

2. An assembly.

On the eighth day shall be an holy convocation unto you. Lev. xxiii. 20.

3. An assembly of the clergy for consultation upon matters ecclesiastical, in time of parliament; and as the parliament consists of two distinct houses, so does this; the one called the upper house, where the archbishops and bishops sit severally by themselves; the other the lower house, where all the rest of the clergy are represented by their deputies.
Cowel.

I have made an offer to his majesty,
Upon our spiritual convocation,
As touching France, to give a greater sum
Then ever at one time the clergy yet
Did to his predecessors part withal.
Shakspeare, Henry IV.

This is the declaration of our church about it, made by those who met in convocation. Stilling fl.

4. A distinct academical assembly, in which the general business of the university is transacted, sometimes called the great congregation, as consisting both of regents and non-regents; the congregation, so called, consisting only of the former. See CONGREGATION, and REGENT.

At the last time it [the reformation of the statutes of the university] was attempted, I was named in convocation one of the delegates myself.
Abp. Laud, Hist. of his Chanc. of Oxford, p. 7.

To CONVO'KE.† v. a. [convoco, Latin.] To call together; to summon to an assembly.

The queen of Italy, — having convoked all her princes, she exhorted them to leave all vain ostentations, and spungy vauntings unto the Spaniards.
Tr. of Boccalini, (1626,) p. 84.

Assemblies exercise their legislature at the times that their constitution, or their own adjournment appoints, if there be no other way prescribed to convoke them. Locke.

When next the morning warms the purple East,
Convoke the peerage. Pope, Odyssey.

The senate originally consisted all of nobles, the people being only convoked upon such occasions as fell into their cognizance. Swift.

To CONVO'LVE. v. a. [convolvo, Lat.] To roll together; to roll one part upon another.

He writh'd him to and fro convolv'd.
Milton, P. L.

It is a wonderful artifice how newly hatched maggots, not the parent animal, because she emits no web, nor hath any textrine art, can convolve the stubborn leaf, and bind it with the thread it weaves from its body. Derham.

Us'd to milder scents, the tender race
By thousands tumble from their honey'd domes,
Convolv'd and agonizing in the dust.
Thomson, Autumn.

CO'NVOLUTED. part. [of the verb I have found no example.] Twisted; rolled upon itself.

This differs from Muscovy-glass only in this, that the plates of that are flat and plain, whereas these are convoluted and inflected.
Woodward on Fossils.

CONVOLU'TION. n. s. [convolutio, Lat.]

1. The act of rolling any thing upon itself; the state of being rolled upon itself.

Observe the convolution of the said fibres in all other glands, in the same or some other manner.
Grew, Cosmol.

A thousand secret, subtle pipes bestow,
From which, by num'rous convolutions wound,
Wrap'd with th' attending nerve, and twisted round. Blackmore.

2. The state of rolling together in company.

And toss'd wide round,
O'er the calm sky in convolution swift,
The feather'd eddy floats. Thomson, Autumn.

To CONVO'Y.† v. a. [convoyer, Fr. from conviare, low Lat.] To accompany by land or sea for the sake of defence: as, he was convoyed by ships of war. Milton places the accent on the last syllable: but the word is now usually spoken with the accent on the first.

Forth rush'd with whirlwind sound
The chariot of Paternal Deity,
Flashing thick flames, wheel within wheel undrawn,
Itself instinct with Spirit, but convoy'd
By four Cherubick shapes. Milton, P. L. vi. 752.

I shall likewise assay those wily arbitresses who in most men have, as was heard, the sole ushering of truth and falsehood between the sense and the soul, with what loyalty they will use me in convoying this truth to my understanding.
Milton, Reason of Church Government, ii. 3.

CO'NVOY. n. s. [from the verb. Anciently the accent was on the last syllable; it is now on the first.]

1. Force attending on the road by way of defence.

Had not God set peculiar value upon his temple, he would not have made himself his people's convoy to secure them in their passage to it.
South, Sermons.

My soul grows hard, and cannot death endure,
Your convoy makes the dangerous way secure.
Dryden, Aureng.

Convoy ships accompany their merchants till they may prosecute the voyage without danger.
Dryden, Pref. Dufresnoy.

2. The act of attending as a defence.

Such fellows will learn you by rote where services were done; at such a breach, at such a convoy. Shakspeare, Hen. V.

Swift, as a sparkle of a glancing star,
I shoot from heav'n to give him safe convoy.
Milton, Comus.

3. Conveyance. Not now in use.

Sister, as the winds give benefit,
And convoy is assistant, do not sleep,
But let me hear from you. Shakspeare.

CONVO'LVULUS. n. s.* [Lat.] In botany, a genus of plants; bind-weed.

CO'NUSABLE.* adj. [from conusance.] Liable to be tried or judged.

He is a judge of one of those courts, where matrimonial causes are conusable.
Bp. Barlow, Rem. p. 365.

CO'NUSANCE. n. s. [conoisance, Fr.] Cognizance; notice; knowledge. A law term.

CO'NUSANT.* adj. [from conusance.] Knowing.

It is not reasonable to suppose, the officer should be conusant of the formalities of law
Hale, Hist. Pl. Cr. ch. 50.

To CONVU'LSE.† v. a. [convulsus, Lat.] To give an irregular and involuntary motion to the parts of any body.

A young man, who was strangely convulsed in his body, having sometimes one member and sometimes another, violently agitated.
Hallywell, Melampronoca, (1681,) p. 78.

Follows the loosen'd, aggravated roar,
Enlarging, deepening, mingling, peal on peal,
Crush'd horrible, convulsing heaven and earth.
Thomson.

CONVU'LSION. n. s. [convulsio, Lat.]

1. A convulsion is an involuntary contraction of the fibres and muscles, whereby the body and limbs are preternaturally distorted. Quincy.

If my hand be put into motion by a convulsion, the indifferency of that operative faculty is taken away. Locke.

2. Any irregular and violent motion; tumult; commotion; disturbance.

All have been subject to some concussions, and fallen under the same convulsions of state, by dissentions or invasions. Temple.

CONVU'LSIVE. adj. [convulsif, Fr.] That produces involuntary motion; that gives twitches or spasms.

They are irregular and convulsive motions, or strugglings of the spirits. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

Shew me the flying soul's convulsive strife,
And all the anguish of departing life.
Dryden, Aurengzebe.

Her colour chang'd, her face was not the same,
And hollow groans from her deep spirit came:
Her hair stood up; convulsive rage possess'd
Her trembling limbs, and heav'd her lab'ring breast. Dryden.

In silence weep,
And thy convulsive sorrows inward keep. Prior.

CONVU'LSIVELY.* adv. [from convulsive.] In an agitated or tumultuous manner.

CO'NY.† n. s. [kanin, Germ. cwning, Welsh; coinnus, coinus, old Fr. cuniculus, Latin.]

1. A rabbit; an animal that burrows in the ground.

With a short-legg'd hen,
Lemons and wine for sauce; to these a cony
Is not to be despair'd of, for our money.
B. Jonson, Epig.

The husbandman suffers by hares and conys, which eat the corn trees. Mortimer, Husbandry.

2. A simpleton. See To CONYCATCH.

It [a conny or rabbit] is of itself a very conny, a most simple animal; whence are derived our usual phrases of conny and conny-catching.
Diet's Dry Dinner, 1599.

CONY-BOROUGH.† n. s. A place where rabbits make their holes in the ground.

Birigh, or beorgh, now bergh, properly signifying to shroud or hide; which may also appear by our calling, in some parts of England, the places made for conies to hide and shroud themselves in conyberies, or cony-buries; and in other parts of England, cony-burrows.
Verstegan, Rest. of Dec. Intellig. ch. 7.

To CO'NYCATCH.† v. n. To catch a cony, is, in the old cant of thieves, to cheat; to bite; to trick; to deceive a foolish fellow. See the second sense of CONY.

I have matter in my head against you, and against your cony-catching rascals.
Shakspeare, M. W. of Windsor.

CO'NYCATCHER. n. s. A thief; a cheat; a sharper; a tricking fellow; a rascal. Now obsolete.

To COO. v. n. [from the sound.] To cry as a dove or pigeon.

The stock-dove only through the forest cooes,
Mournfully hoarse. Thomson, Summer.

CO'OING.* n. s. [from the verb.] Invitation, as the note of the dove.

Let not the cooings of the world allure thee:
Which of her lovers ever found her true?
Young, Night Th. 8.

COOK.† n. s. [old Fr. keux, from coquus, Latin.] One whose profession is to dress and prepare victuals for the table.

One mistress Quickly, is in the manner of his nurse, or his dry-nurse, or his cook, or his laundry, his washer, and his wringer.
Shakspeare, M. W. of Windsor.

The new-born babe, by nurses overlaid,
And the cook caught within the raging fire he made.
Dryden.

Their cooks could make artificial birds and fishes, in default of the real ones, and which exceeded them in the exquisiteness of the taste.
Arbuthnot on Coins.

COOK-MAID. n. s. [cook and maid.] A maid that dresses provisions.

A friend was complaining to me, that his wife had turned off one of the best cook-maids in England. Addison.

COOK-ROOM. n. s. [cook and room.] A room in which provisions are prepared for the ship's crew. The kitchen of a ship.

The commodity of this new cook-room, the merchants having found to be so great as that in all their ships the cook-rooms are built in their forecastles, contrary to that which had been anciently used. Ralegh, Essays.

To COOK. v. a. [coquo, Latin.]

1. To prepare victuals for the table.

Had either of the crimes been cooked to their palates, they might have changed messes.
Decay of Piety.

2. To prepare for any purpose.

Hanging is the word, Sir; if you be ready for that, you are well cookt. Shakspeare, Cymbeline.

To COOK, or COUK.* v. n. [from the sound.] To make the noise of the cuckoo. It is also found in the Scottish poem of The Cherrie and Slae: "The cuckow couks."

Let constant cuckows cook on every side.
The Silkwormes, 1599.

To COOK.* v. a. [perhaps from chuck.] To throw. Cook me that ball. Gloucestershire. Grose.

COO'KERY. n. s. [from cook.] The art of dressing victuals.

Some man's wit
Found th' art of cook'ry to delight his sense:
More bodies are consum'd and kill'd with it,
Than with the sword, famine, or pestilence. Davies.
Ev'ry one to cookery pretends. King's Cookery.

These are the ingredients of plants before they are prepared by cookery. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

COOL.† adj. [Sax. col; Dutch, koel; Germ. kuhl. See COLD.]

1. Somewhat cold; approaching to cold.

He set his leg in a pale-full, as hot as he could well endure it, renewing it as it grew cool. Temple.

2. Not zealous; not ardent; not angry; not fond; without passion: as, a cool friend; a cool deceiver.

A man of understanding is of an excellent spirit, [in the margin, of a cool spirit.] Prov. xvii. 27.

COOL. n. s. Freedom from heat; soft and refreshing coldness.

But see where Lucia, at her wonted hour,
Amid the cool of yon high marble arch,
Enjoys the noon day breeze. Addison, Cato.

Philander was enjoying the cool of the morning, among the dews that lay on every thing about him, and that gave the air a freshness.
Addison on Medals.

To COOL.† v. a. [koelen, Dutch; colan, Sax. colcb, cooled.]

1. To make cool; to allay heat.

Father Abraham, have mercy on me; and send Lazarus, that he may dip the tip of his finger in water, and cool my tongue; for I am tormented in this flame. St. Luke, xvi. 24.

Snow they use in Naples instead of ice, because, as they say, it cools or congeals any liquor sooner. Addison on Italy.

Jelly of currants, or the jelly of any ripe subacid fruit, is cooling, and very agreeable to the stomach. Arbuthnot on Diet.

2. To quiet passion; to calm anger; to moderate zeal.

My lord Northumberland will soon be cool'd.
Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

He will keep his jealousy to himself, and repine in private, because he will be apt to fear some ill effect it may produce in cooling your love to him.
Addison, Spect.

Had they thought they had been fighting only other people's quarrels, perhaps it might have cooled their zeal. Swift.

3. To COOL the heels; a vulgarism, denoting to keep in attendance; not yet disused.

I looked through the keyhole, and saw him knocking at the gate; and I had the conscience to let him cool his heels there. Dryden, Amphitryon.

To COOL.† v. n.

1. To grow less hot.

Come, who is next? our liquor here cools.
B. Jonson, Entert. at Highgate.

2. To grow less warm with regard to passion or inclination.

My humour shall not cool; I will incense Ford to deal with poison, I will possess him with yellowness. Shakspeare.

You never cool while you read Homer. Dryden.

I'm impatient till it be done; I will not give myself liberty to think, lest I should cool.
Congreve, Old Bachelor.

COOL-CUP.* A beverage, so called, usually composed of wine, water, lemon-peel, sugar and borage; and introduced at tables in warm weather.

COOL-HEADED.* adj. [from cool and head.] Without passion. See the second sense of COOL.

The old, coolheaded, general law, is as good as any deviation dictated by present heat.
Burke, Lett. to the Sher. of Bristol.

CO'OLER.† n. s. [from cool.]

1. That which has the power of cooling the body.

Coolers are of two sorts; first, those which produce an immediate sense of cold, which are such as have their parts in less motion than those of the organs of feeling; and secondly, such as, by particular viscidity, or grossness of parts, give greater consistence to the animal fluids than they had before, whereby they cannot move so fast, and therefore will have less of that intestine force on which their heat depends. The former are fruits, all acid liquors, and common water; and the latter are such as cucumbers, and all substances producing viscidity. Quincy.

In dogs or cats there appeared the same necessity for a cooler as in man.
Harvey on Consumptions.

Acid things were used only as coolers.
Arbuthnot on Aliments.

2. A vessel in which any thing is made cool. [This word is properly cowler, from cowele, a cowl or coule, that is, a tub. See COWLSTAFF.]

Your first wort being thus boiled, lade off into one or more coolers, or cool-backs, in which leave the sullage behind, and let it run off fine.
Mortimer's Husbandry.

CO'OLISH.* adj. [from cool.] Approaching to cold.

Looking as wise as possible, I observed, that the nights began to grow a little coolish at this time of the year. Goldsmith, Ess. IV.

CO'OLY. adv. [from cool.]

1. Without heat, or sharp cold.

She in the gelid caverns, woodbine wrought,
And fresh bedew'd with ever-spouting streams,
Sits cooly calm. Thomson, Summer.

2. Without passion.

Motives that address themselves coolly to our reason, are fittest to be employed upon reasonable creatures. Atterbury.

CO'OLNESS.† n. s. [Sax. coelner.]

1. Gentle cold; a soft or mild degree of cold.

This difference consisteth not in the heat or coolness of spirits; for cloves, and other spices, naptha and petroleum, have exceeding hot spirits, hotter a great deal than oil, wax, or tallow, but not inflamed. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

The toad loveth shade and coolness.
Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Yonder the harvest of cold months laid up,
Gives a fresh coolness to the royal cup;
There ice, like crystal, firm and never lost,
Tempers hot July with December's frost. Waller.

The sheep enjoy the coolness of the shade.
Dryden, Virg.

2. Want of affection; disinclination.

They parted with such coolness towards each other, as if they scarce hoped to meet again.
Clarendon.

3. Freedom from passion.

There is that coolness and curiousness in a verse, which speaks it greatly unsuitable to the vehemence and seriousness of the prophetick spirit.
Spenser, Vanity of Vulg. Prophecies, p. 53.

COOM. n. s. [ecume, French.]

1. Spot that gathers over an oven's mouth.
Phillips.

2. That matter that works out of the wheels of carriages. Bailey.

3. It is used in Scotland for the useless dust which falls from large coals.

COOMB, or COMB. n. s. [comble, Fr. cumulus, Lat. a heap, Skinner.] A measure of corn containing four bushels.
Bailey.

COOP.† n. s. [Icel. kuppa; Su. kopp; Dutch, kuype. Ray observes, that coop was a general expression for a vessel to enclose any thing.]

1. A barrel; a vessel for the preservation of liquids.

2. A cage; a pen for animals; as poultry or sheep.

Gracchus was slain, the day the chickens refused to eat out of the coop; and Claudius Pulcher underwent the like success, when he contemned the tripudiary augurations. Brown.

There were a great many crammed capons together in a coop. L'Estrange.

To COOP. v. a. [from the noun.] To shut up in a narrow compass; to confine; to cage; to imprison: when it is used absolutely, it has often, perhaps always, the intensive particle up.

That pale, that white-fac'd shore,
Whose foot spurns back the ocean's roaring tides,
And coops from other lands her islanders.
Shakspeare, K. John.

The Englishmen did coop up the lord Ravenstein, that he stirred not; and likewise held in strait siege the town. Bacon.

In the taking of a town the poor escape better than the rich; for the one is let go, and the other is plundered and cooped up. L'Estrange.

Twice c onque'd cowards, now your shame is shown,
Coop'd up a second time within your town!
Who dare not issue forth in open field.
Dryden, Æneid.

One world suffic'd not Alexander's mind;
Coop'd up, he seem'd in earth and seas confin'd.
Dryden, Juv.

Coop'd in a narrow isle, observing dreams
With flattering wizards. Dryden, Juv.

The Trojans, coop'd within their walls so long,
Unbar their gates, and issue in a throng.
Dryden, Æneid.

The contempt of all other knowledge, as if it were nothing in comparison of law or physick, of astrology or chymistry, coops the understanding up within narrow bounds, and hinders it from looking abroad into other provinces of the intellectual world. Locke.

They are cooped in close by the laws of their countries, and the strict guards of those whose interest it is to keep them ignorant. Locke.

What! coop whole armies in our walls again.
Pope.

COOPE'E. n. s. [coupé, French.] A motion in dancing.

CO'OPER. n. s. [from coop.] One that makes coops or barrels.

Societies of artificers and tradesmen, belonging to some towns corporate, such as weavers and coopers, by virtue of their charters, pretend to privilege and jurisdiction. Child.

CO'OPERAGE. n. s. [from cooper.] The price paid for cooper's work.

COO'PERANT.* adj. [from To cooperate.] Labouring together; working to the same end.

The donation of heavenly graces, provenient, subsequent, or co-operant.
Bp. Nicholson on the Church Catech. 1662, p. 60.

To COO'PERATE.† v. n. [old Fr. coöperer, from con and opera, Latin.]

1. To labour jointly with another to the same end: it has with before the agent, and to before the end.

It puzzleth and perplexeth the conceits of many, that perhaps would otherwise cooperate with him, and makes a man walk almost alone to his own ends. Bacon.

By giving man a free will, he allows man that highest satisfaction and privilege of cooperating to his own felicity. Boyle.

2. To concur in producing the same effect.

His mercy will not forgive offenders, or his benignity cooperate to their conversions.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

All these causes cooperating, must, at last, weaken their motion. Cheyne, Phil. Prin.

The special acts and impressions by which the Divine Spirit introduces this charge, and how far human liberty cooperates with it, are subjects beyond our comprehension. Rogers.

COOPERA'TION. n. s. [from cooperate.] The act of contributing or concurring to the same end.

We might work any effect without and against matter; and this not holpen by the cooperation of angels or spirits, but only by the unity and harmony of nature. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

COO'PERATIVE.† adj. [from cooperate.] Promoting the same end jointly.

For Age with Virtue is cooperative.
Davies, Wit's Pilg. T. 3. b.

COO'PERATOR. n. s. [from cooperate.] He that, by joint endeavours promotes the same end with others.

To COO'PTATE.* v. a. [Fr. co-opter, Lat. coopto. Dr. Johnson admits the substantive, though without example. The parent verb is as good a word.] To choose. Cockeram.

COOPTA'TION.† n. s. [coopto, Latin.] Adoption; assumption.

Dubitation is the beginning of all knowledge: I confess this is true in the first election and cooptation of a friend, to come into the true knowledge of him by queries and doubts.
Howell, Lett. i. v. 19.

COO'RDINATE.† adj. [con and ordinatus, Latin.] Holding the same rank; not being subordinate. Thus shell-fish may be divided into two co-ordinate kinds, crustaceous and testaceous; each of which is again divided into many species, subordinate to the kind, but co-ordinate to each other.

Other bishops — might either appoint two presbyters, either co-ordinate or subaltern, to serve one church; or one presbyter to serve two churches.
H. Wharton, Def. of Pluralities, (1692,) p. 53.

A co-ordinate power was given by the bishop to them both. Ibid. p. 54.

The word Analysis signifies the general and particular heads of a discourse, with their mutual connexions, both coordinate and subordinate, drawn out into one or more tables. Watts.

COO'RDINATELY. adv. [from coordinate.] In the same rank; in the same relation; without subordination.

COO'RDINATENESS. n. s. [from coordinate.] The state of being coordinate.

COORDINA'TION. n. s. [from coordinate.] The state of holding the same rank; of standing in the same relation to something higher; collateralness.

In this high court of parliament there is a rare coordination of power, a wholesome mixture betwixt monarchy, optimacy, and democracy.
Howell, Pre-eminence of Parliament.

When these petty intrigues of a play are so ill ordered, that they have no coherence with the other, I must grant that Lysideius has reason to tax that want of due connexion; for coordination in a play is as dangerous and unnatural as in a state. Dryden on Dramatick Poesy.

COOT.† n. s. [maer-koet, Dut. cotee, French.]

A small black water-fowl, seen often in fens and marshes.

Unfledge 'em of their tires,
Their wires, their partlets, pins, and perriwigs,
And they appear like bald coots in the nest.
Beaum. and Fl. Knight of Malta.

A lake, the haunt
Of coots, and of the fishing cormorant.
Dryden, Fables.

COP.† n. s. [kop, Dut. cop, Sax.] The head; the top of any thing; any thing rising to a head. As a cop, vulgarly cock of hay; a cob-castle; properly cop-castle, a small castle or house on a hill. A cob of cherrystones for cop, a pile of stones one laid upon another; a tuft on the head of birds.

Upon the cop right of his nose he had
A wart, and thereon stode a tuft of hairs.
Chauc. C. T. Prol.

They droven him out withouten the cytee, and ledden him to the coppe of the hil.
Wickliffe, St. Luke, iv.

Few of them have cops or crested tufts upon their heads. Holland, Tr. of Plin. Nat. Hist. b. xi.

CO'PAL. n. s. The Mexican term for a gum.

COPA'RCENARY. n. s. [from coparcener.] Joint succession to any inheritance.

In descent to all the daughters in coparcenary, for want of sons, the chief house is allotted to the eldest daughter. Hale, Hist. of Common Law.

COPA'RCENER. n. s. [from con and particeps, Lat.] Coparceners are otherwise called parceners; and in common law, are such as have equal portion in the inheritance of the ancestor. Cowel.

This great lordship was broken and divided, and partition made between the five daughters: in every of these portions, the coparceners severally exercised the same jurisdiction royal, which the earl marshal and his sons had used, in the whole province. Davies on Ireland.

COPA'RCENY. n. s. An equal share of coparceners. Phillips, World of Words.

COPA'RTMENT.* n. s. Compartment; which see.

In a copartment, towards the head, and under the semicircle, of the letter, are his initials.
Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, iii. 391.

COPA'RTNER.† n. s. [co and partner.] One that has a share in some common stock or affair; one equally concerned; a sharer; a partaker; a partner. Milton has used it both with of and in.

So should I have copartners in my pain:
And fellowship in woe doth woe assuage.
Shakspeare, Rape of Lucrece.

Our faithful friends,
The associates and copartners of our loss.
Milton, P. L.

Shall I to him make known
As yet my change, and give him to partake
Full happiness with me? Or rather not;
But keep the odds of knowledge in my power,
Without copartner. Milton, P. L.

Rather by them
I gain'd what I have gain'd, and with them dwell
Copartner in these regions of the world.
Milton, P. R.

Love gives us a real possession and enjoyment of God; it makes us copartners with Him in Himself. Scott, Chr. Life, i. iii.

COPA'RTNERSHIP.† n. s. [from copartner.] The state of bearing an equal part, or possessing an equal share.

In case the father left only daughters, the daughters equally succeeded to their father as in copartnership. Hale.

At Amsterdam the one vessel took in ballast only; the other laden with herrings, in copartnership with one Peter Heinbergh, sailed away for Stettin in Pomerania. Milton, Letters of State.

CO'PATAIN. adj. [from cop.] High raised; pointed. Hanmer.

Oh, fine villain! a silken doublet, a velvet hose, a scarlet cloke, and a copatain hat.
Shakspeare, Tam. of the Shrew.

COPA'YVA. n. s. [It is sometimes written capivi, copivi, capayva, copayva, cupayva, cupayba. A gum which distils from a tree in Brasil. It is much used in disorders of the urinary passages.

COPE.† n. s. [Sax. cæppe. And see COP.]

1. Any thing with which the head is covered.
2. A sacerdotal cloak, or vestment worn in sacred ministration.

The principal minister using a decent cope.
Const. and Can. Ecc. 24.

The cope answers to the colobium used by the Latin, and the σάκκος used by the Greek church. It was at first a common habit, being a coat without sleeves, but afterwards used as a church-vestment, only made very rich by embroidery and the like. Wheatly, on the Comm. Prayer.

3. Any thing which is spread over the head; as the concave of the skies; any archwork over a door.

All these things that are contained
Within this goodly cope, both most and least,
Their being have, and daily are increast. Spenser.

Over head the dismal hiss
Of fiery darts in flaming volleys flew;
And, flying, vaulted either host with fire;
So, under fiery cope, together rush'd
Both battles main. Milton, P. L.

The scholar believes there is no man under the cope of heaven, who is so knowing as his master.
Dryden.

To COPE.† v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To cover, as with a cope.

A very large bridge, that is all made of wood, and coped over head. Addison on Italy.

2. To contend with; to oppose. Dr. Johnson introduces, as the sole example, a passage from Shakspeare's Lear; where, however, the verb is neuter; the word withal, which is connected with cope, being omitted by him. But the active sense of cope is not uncommon.

I love to cope him in these sullen fits,
Shakspeare, As you like it.

We must not stint
Our necessary actions, in the fear
To cope malicious censurers. Shaks. K. Hen. VIII.

3. To reward; to give in return. This is our old verb to cope, or cowp, i. e. to chap, or buy; Dutch, koopen. See COPE-MAN.

I and my friend
Have, by your wisdom, been this day acquitted
Of grievous penalties; in lieu whereof,
Three thousand ducats, due unto the Jew,
We freely cope your courteous pains withal. Shaks.

To COPE.† v. n.

1. To contend; to struggle; to strive. It has with before the thing or person opposed. [In this sense it is a word of doubtful etymology. The conjecture of Junius derives it from koopen, to buy, or some other word of the same import; so that to cope with, signifies to interchange blows, or any thing else with another. It may, with as much propriety, be referred to cop, the head; and so imply, to make head against, like the French expression, "faire tête à quelqu'un."

Let our trains
March by us, that we may peruse the men
We should have cop'd withal. Shaksp. Hen. IV.

It is likely thou wilt undertake
A thing, like death, to chide away this shame,
That copes with death itself, to 'scape from it.
Shakspeare.

But Eve was Eve
This far his over-match, who, self-deceiv'd
And rash, before hand had no better weigh'd
The strength he was to cope with, or his own.
Milton, P. R.

They perfectly understood both the hares and the enemy they were to cope withal. L'Estrange.

On every plain,
Host cop'd with host, dire was the din of war.
Philips.

Their generals have not been able to cope with the troops of Athens, which I have conducted.
Addison, Whig Examiner.

If the mind apply itself first to easier subjects, and things near akin to what is already known: and then advance to the more remote and knotty parts of knowledge by slow degrees, it will be able, in this manner, to cope with great difficulties, and prevail over them with amazing and happy success. Watts on the Mind.

2. To encounter; to interchange kindness or sentiments.

Thou fresh piece
Of excellent witchcraft, who of force must know
The royal food thou cop'st with. Shaks. Wint. Tale.

Thou art e'en as just a man
As e'er my conversation cop'd withal. Shaks. Ham.

To COPE. v. a. To embrace. Not in use.

I will make him tell the tale anew:
Where, how, how oft, how long ago, and when
He hath, and is again to cope your wife.
Shakspeare, Othello.

CO'PEMAN.* n. s. [from the old verb cope, to exchange; and Dutch, koopman, a buyer.] A chapman.

For ceapman we now say chapman, which is as much as to say — A merchant or cope-man.
Verstegan, Rest. of Dec. Intell. ch. 7.

Assure thee, Celia, he that would sell thee,
Only for hope of gain, and that uncertain,
He would have sold his part of paradise
For ready money, had he met a copeman.
B. Jonson, Fox.

COPE'RNICAN.* adj. Relating to the system of Copernicus; in which the sun is supposed at rest in the centre, and the planets with the earth to move in ellipses round him.

The Cartesian philosophy begins now to be almost universally rejected, while the Copernican system continues to be universally received.
A. Smith, Hist. of Astronomy, § 4.

It is not necessary, that he who looks with pleasure on the colour of a flower should study the principles of vegetation, or that the Ptolemaick and Copernican system should be compared before the light of the sun can gladden, or its warmth invigorate. Johnson, Rambler, No. 135.

CO'PESMATE.† n. s. [perhaps for cupsmate, a companion in drinking, or one that dwells under the same cope, for house, Dr. Johnson says. It is rather from cope in the sense of exchange, I think; one who interchanges kindness with another.] Companion; friend. An old word, Dr. Johnson observes, citing only Spenser. But it is a common word, and among our best authors.

Ne ever staid in place, ne spake to wight,
'Till then the fox his copesmate he hath found.
Spenser, Hubb. Tale.
Mis-shapen Time, copesmate of ugly Night.
Shakspeare, Rape of Lucrece.
O, this is the female copesmate of my son.
B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour.
If the gagger or his copesmates had dealt thus with me, I would have cast in their teeth forgery and false play. Mountagu, App. to Cæsar, p. 24.
This ponderous confuter, elected by his ghostly patrons to be my copesmate. Milton, Colasterion.

Co'PIER. n. s. [from copy.]

1. One that copies; a transcriber.
A coin is in no danger of having its characters altered by copiers and transcribers.
Addison on Coins.
2. One that imitates; a plagiary; an imitator.
Without invention a painter is but a copier, and a poet but a plagiary of others. Dryden, Dufres.
Let the faint copier, on old Tiber's shore,
Nor mean the task, each breathing bust explore;
Line after line with painful patience trace,
This Roman grandeur, that Athenian grace.
Tickel.

Co'PING.† n. s. [from cope; called also copping, from cop.] The upper tire of masonry which covers the wall.
All these were of costly stones, even from the foundation unto the coping. 1 Kings, vii. 9.
The coping, the modillions, or dentils, make a noble shew by their graceful projections.
Addison, Freeholder.

CO'PIOUS.† adj. [old Fr. copieux, copieus; from the Lat. copia.]

1. Plentiful; abundant; exuberant in great quantities.
Rose, as in dance, the stately trees, and spread
Their branches hung with copious fruit.
Milton, P. L.
Full measure only bounds
Excess, before the all-bounteous king, who showr'd
With copious hand, rejoicing in their joy.
Milton, P. L.
This alcaline acrimony indicates the copious use of vinegar and acid fruits. Arbuthnot on Aliments.
The tender heart is peace,
And kindly pours its copious treasures forth
In various converse. Thomson, Spring.
2. Abounding in words or images; not barren; not confined; not concise.
Hail, Son of God, Saviour of men; thy name
Shall be the copious matter of my song
Henceforth; and never shall my harp thy praise
Forget, nor from thy Father's praise disjoin.
Milton, P. L.

Co'PIOUSLY.† adv. [from copious.]

1. Plentifully; abundantly; in great quantities. Sherwood.
The boy being made to drink copiously of tar-water, this prevented or lessened the fever.
Bp. Berkeley, F. Th. on Tar-Water.
2. At large; without brevity or conciseness; diffusely.
These several remains have been so copiously described by abundance of travellers, and other writers, that it is very difficult to make any new discoveries on so beaten a subject. Addison.

Co'PIOUSNESS.† n. s. [from copious.]

1. Plenty; abundance; great quantity; exuberance.
The copiousness and pleasure of the argument hath carried me a little further than I made account. Howell, Instruct. For. Trav. p. 158.
2. Diffusion; exuberance of stile.
The Roman orator endeavoured to imitate the copiousness of Homer, and the Latin poet made it his business to reach the conciseness of Demosthenes. Dryden.

Co'PIST.† n. s. [old Fr. copiste.] A copyer; a transcriber; an imitator.
As for the ancients and elders they are become penitentiaries, proctors in the court ecclesiastical, dataries, bullists, copists, &c.
Harmar, Tr. of Beza's Serm. (1587,) p. 134.

Co'PLAND. n. s. A piece of ground in which the land terminates with an acute angle. Dict.

To COPLA'NT.* v. a. [from con and plant.] To plant together, at the same time.
France being a passable, and plain pervious continent, the Romans quickly diffused and rooted themselves in every part thereof, and so co-planted their language, which in a short revolution of time came to be called Romand. Howell, Lett. iv. 19.

COPO'RTION.* n. s. [from con and portion.] Equal share.
Myselfe will beare a part, coportion of your packe. Spenser, F. Q. vi. ii. 47.

Co'PPED.† adj. [from cop.] Rising to a top or head.
The blind mole casts
Copp'd hills towards heaven. Shakspeare, Pericles.
It was broad in its basis, and rose copped like a sugar-loaf. Wiseman, Surg.
A galeated eschinus being copped and somewhat conick. Woodward.

Co'PPEL. n. s. [This word is variously spelt; as copel, cupel, cuple, and cuppel; but I cannot find its etymology.] An instrument used in chymistry in the form of a dish, made of ashes, well washed, to cleanse them from all their salt; or of bones thoroughly calcined. Its use is to try and purify gold and silver, which is done by mingling lead with the metal, and exposing it in the coppel to a violent fire a long while. The impurities of the metal will then be carried off in dross, which is called the litharge of gold and silver. The refiners call the coppel a test. Harris.

CO'PPER. n. s. [koper, Dutch, cuprum, Lat.] One of the six primitive metals.
Copper is the most ductile and malleable metal, after gold and silver. Of a mixture of copper and lapis calaminaris is formed brass; a composition of copper and tin makes bell-metal; and copper and brass, melted in equal quantities, produces what the French call bronze, used for figures and statues. Chambers.
Copper is heavier than iron or tin; but lighter than silver, lead, and gold.
Hill on Fossils.
Two vessels of fine copper, precious as gold.
Ezra, viii. 27.

Co'PPER. n. s. A vessel made of copper; commonly used for a boiler larger than a moveable pot.
They boiled it in a copper to the half; then they poured it into earthen vessels. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

COPPER-NOSE.† n. s. [copper and nose, Dr. Johnson says. But it is probably a corruption of the French couperose, "an extreme redness of the face, accompanied with many pimples and rubies, especially about the nose." Cotgrave. And Sherwood translates "coper-nosed" by couperosé; which adjective is rendered also in Cotgrave crimson-faced and copper-nosed.] A red nose.
He having colour enough, and the other higher, is too flaming a praise for a good complexion: I had as lieve Helen's golden tongue had commended Troilus for a copper-nose. Shakspeare.
Gutta rosacea ariseth in little hard tubercles, affecting the face all over with great itching, which, being scratched, looks red, and rise in great welks, rendering the visage fiery; and makes copper-noses, as we generally express them. Wiseman.

COPPER-PLATE. n. s. A plate on which pictures are engraven for the neater impression: distinguished from a wooden cut.

COPPER-WORK. n. s. [copper and work.] A place where copper is worked or manufactured.
This is like those wrought at copper-works.
Woodward.

Co'PPERAS. n. s. [kopperoose, Dut. couperouse, Fr. supposed to be found in copper mines only.] A name given to three sorts of vitriol; the green, the bluish green, and the white, which are produced in the mines of Germany, Hungary, and other countries. But what is commonly sold here for copperas, is an artificial vitriol, made of a kind of stones found on the sea-shore in Essex, Hampshire, and so westward, ordinarily called gold stones from their colour. They abound with iron, and are exposed to the weather in beds above ground, and receive the rains and dews, which in time breaks and dissolves the stones: the liquor that runs off is pumped into boilers, in which is first put old iron, which, in boiling, dissolves. This factitious copperas, in many respects, agrees with the native green vitriol.
Chambers, and Hill.
It may be questioned, whether, in this operation, the iron or copperas be transmuted, from the cognation of copperas with copper, and the iron remaining after conversion. Brown.

Co'PPERISH.* adj. [from copper.] Containing copper.
In this fell there is a large vein of copperish sulphur. Robinson, Nat. Hist. of Cumb. and Westm. 1709.

Co'PPERSMITH. n. s. [copper and smith.] One that manufactures copper.
Salmoneus, as the Grecian tale is,
Was a mad coppersmith of Elis;
Up at his forge by morning-peep. Swift.

Co'PPERWORM. n. s. [teredo, in Latin.]

1. A little worm in ships.
2. A moth that fretteth garments.
3. A worm breeding in one's hand.
Ainsworth.

Co'PPERY. adj. [from copper.] Containing copper; made of copper.
Some springs of Hungary, highly impregnated with vitriolick salts, dissolve the body of iron, put into the spring, and deposite, in lieu of the irony particles carried off, coppery particles brought with the water out of the neighbouring copper-mines.
Woodward on Fossils.

CO'PPICE.† n. s. [coupeaux, Fr. from couper, to cut or lop. It is often written copse. Dr. Johnson.—Coupeau in French is never used for a coppice: it signifies the top or summit of any thing; or a chip of wood, when it is written also copeau de bois, and coupe de bois. Bois de coupe is also wood between ten and thirty years growth. See Cotgrave in V. COUPE. So that our word may indeed be traced to the Fr. couper, or rather perhaps to the Norman copper, to cut off.] Low woods cut at stated times for fuel; a place over-run with brushwood.

A land, each side whereof was bounded both with high timber trees, and copses of far more humble growth. Sidney.

Upon the edge of yonder coppice,
A stand, where you may have the fairest shoot.
Shakspeare.

In coppice woods, if you leave staddles too thick, they run to bushes and briars, and have little clean underwood. Bacon.

The willows and the hazel copses green,
Shall now no more be seen,
Fanning their joyous leaves to thy soft lays.
Milton, Lycidas.

Raise trees in your seminaries and nurseries, and you may transplant them for coppice ground, walks, or hedges. Mortimer, Husbandry.

The rate of coppice lands will fall upon the discovery of coal-mines. Locke.

COPPING.* See COPING.

CO'PPLE-DUST. n. s. [probably for coppel, or cupel dust.] Powder used in purifying metals, or the gross parts separated by the cupel.

It may be also tried by incorporating powder of steel, or copple-dust, by pouncing into the quicksilver. Bacon.

COPPLE-STONES are lumps and fragments of stone or marble, broke from the adjacent cliffs, rounded by being bowled and tumbled to and again by the action of the water. Woodward.

CO'PPLED. adj. [from cop.] Rising in a conick form; rising to a point.

There is some difference in this shape, some being flatter on the top, others more coppled.
Woodward on Fossils.

COPSE. n. s. [abbreviated from coppice.] Low wood cut at a certain growth for fuel; a place overgrown with short wood.

The east quarters of the shire are not destitute of copse woods. Carew, Surv. of Cornwall.

Oaks and brambles, if the copse be burn'd,
Confounded lie, to the same ashes turn'd. Waller.

But in what quarter of the copse it lay,
His eye by certain level could survey. Dryd. Fab.

To COPSE.† v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To preserve underwoods.

The neglect of copsing wood cut down, hath been of very evil consequence.
Swift, Address to Parliament.

2. To enclose as a copse.

Nature itself hath copsed and bound us in from flying out, and hath designed to every man his proper business, that he may not stray nor wander abroad. Farindon's Serm. 1657, p. 439.

I speak this — to stir up and kindle in you the spirit of industry, to enlarge your conceits, and not suffer your labours to be copst and mued up within the poverty of some pretended method.
Hales of Eton, Rem. 2d. ed. p. 11.

CO'PSY.* adj. [from copse.] Having copses.

The flood,
And trading bark with low contracted sail,
Linger among the reeds and copsy banks
To listen; and to view the joyous scene.
Dyer's Fleece.

CO'PULA. n. s. [Latin.] The word which unites the subject and predicate of a proposition; as, books are dear.

The copula is the form of a proposition; it represents the act of the mind, affirming or denying.
Watts, Logick.

To CO'PULATE. v. a. [copulo, Lat.] To unite; to conjoin; to link together.

To CO'PULATE. v. n. To come together as different sexes.

Not only the persons so copulating are infected, but also their children. Wiseman, Surgery.

CO'PULATE.* adj. [from the verb.] Joined.

If the force of custom, simple and separate, be great, the force of custom copulate, and conjoined, and collegiate, is far greater. Bacon.

COPULA'TION.† n. s. [old Fr. copulation.]

1. The congress or embrace of the two sexes.

Sundry kinds, even of conjugal copulation, are prohibited as unhonest. Hooker, iv. § 11.

2. Any conjunction. Though Dr. Johnson has omitted this ancient and present meaning, he furnishes, as usual, a good example of the word.

His copulation of monosyllables supplying the quantity of a trisyllable to his intent.
Puttenham, Art of Eng. Poesie.

These virtues are so conjoined together among themselves, with a certain mutual copulation.
Sir M. Sandys, Ess. (1634,) p. 9.

Wit, you know, is the unexpected copulation of ideas, the discovery of some occult relation between images in appearance remote from each other.
Johnson, Idler, No. 194.

CO'PULATIVE. adj. [copulativus, Latin.] A term of grammar.

Copulative propositions are those which have more subjects or predicates connected by affirmative or negative conjunctions; as riches and honours are temptations to pride: Cæsar conquered the Gauls and the Britons: neither gold nor jewels will purchase immortality. Watts, Logick.

CO'PULATIVE.* n. s.

1. A conjunction, in grammar.

Here the copulative "And" must be expounded "Or." Bp. Patrick on Genesis, xix. 12.

The conjunctions, which conjoin both sentences and their meanings, are either copulatives or continuatives. The principal copulative in English is AND. Harris, Hermes, ii. 2.

2. Connection; conjunction, by marriage.

They understand polygamy to be a conjunction of divers copulatives in number, which is not understood till a person proceeds unto a fourth wife, which makes more than one copulative in the rule of marrirge. Ricaut, State of the Greek Ch. p. 307.

CO'PY.† n. s. [copie, Fr. copia, low Lat. Quod cuipiam facta est copia exscribendi. Junius inclines, after his manner, to derive it from κόπος, labour; because, says he, to copy another's writing is very painful and laborious.]

1. A transcript from the archetype or original.

If virtue's self were lost, we might
From your fair mind new copies write. Waller.

I have not the vanity to think my copy equal to the original. Denham.

He stept forth, not only the copy of God's hands, but also the copy of his perfections, a kind of image or representation of the Deity in small.
South, Serm.

The Romans having sent to Athens, and the Greek cities of Italy, for the copies of the best laws, chose ten legislators to put them into form.
Swift.

2. An individual book; one of many books: as, a good or fair copy.

The very having of the books of God was a matter of no small charge, as they could not be had otherwise than in written copies. Hooker, v. § 22.

3. The autograph; the original; the archetype; that from which any thing is copied.

It was the copy of our conference;
In bed he slept not, for my urging it;
At board he fed not, for my urging it.
Shakspeare, Com. of Err.

Let him first learn to write, after a copy, all the letters in the vulgar alphabet.
Holder, Elem. of Speech.

The first of them I have forgotten, and cannot easily retrieve, because the copy is at the press.
Dryden.

4. An instrument by which any conveyance is made in law.

Thou know'st that Banquo and his Fleance lives;
But in them nature's copy's not eternal.
Shakspeare, Macbeth.

5. A picture drawn from another picture.

Originals and copies much the same,
The picture's value is the painter's name.
Bramston.

6. Abundance; plenty. [old Fr. copie, abondance; Lat. copia. This meaning of our own word, though unnoticed by Dr. Johnson, is also in our old lexicography.]

That copy or store that he hath given us.
Translators of the Bible to the Reader.

Ple. Which would you choose now, mistress?
Pla. 'Cannot tell:
The copy does confound one.
B. Jonson, Magn. Lady.

CO'PY-BOOK.† n. s. [copy and book.] A book in which copies are written for learners to imitate.

Fair as a text B in a copy-book.
Shakspeare, Love's Lab. Lost.

CO'PY-HOLD. n. s. [copy and hold.] A tenure, for which the tenant hath nothing to shew but the copy of the rolls made by the steward of his lord's court: for the steward, as he enrolls other things done in the lord's court, so he registers such tenants as are admitted in the court, to any parcel of land or tenement belonging to the manor; and the transcript of this is called the court roll, the copy of which the tenant takes from him, and keeps as his only evidence. This is called a base tenure, because it holds at the will of the lord; yet not simply, but according to the custom of the manor: so that if a copyholder break not the custom of the manor, and thereby forfeit his tenure, he cannot be turned out of the lord's pleasure. These customs of manors vary in one point or other, almost in every manor. Some copy-holds are finable, and some certain: that which is finable, the lord rates at what fine or income he pleases, when the tenant is admitted into it: that which is certain is a kind of inheritance, and called in many places customary; because the tenant dying, and the hold being void, the next of blood paying the customary fine, as two shillings for an acre, or so, cannot be denied his admission. Some copy-holders have, by custom, the wood growing upon their own land, which by law they could not have. Some hold by the verge in ancient demesne; and though they hold by copy, yet are they, in account, a kind of freeholder: for, if such a one commit felony, the king hath annum, diem, and vastum, as in case of freehold. Some others hold by common tenure, called mere copy-hold; and they committing felony, their land escheats to the lord of the manor. Cowel.

If a customary tenant die, the widow shall have what the law calls her free bench in all his copy-hold lands. Addison.

COPY-HOLDER.† n. s. [from copyhold.] One that is possessed of land in copy-hold.

But now thou art mine
For one-and-twenty years, or for three lives:
Choose which thou wilt, I'll make thee a copy-holder. B. Jonson, Staple of News.

By an enumeration of real circumstances, he gives us the following lively draught of the miserable tenement, yet ample services, of a poor copy-holder. Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, iv. 44.

COPY-RIGHT.* n. s. The property which an author, or his assignee, has in a literary work.

Much may be collected from the several legislative recognitions of copy-rights. Blackstone.

Notwithstanding that the statute secures only fourteen years of exclusive right, it has always been understood by the trade, that he, who buys the copy-right of a book from the author, obtains a perpetual property; and upon that belief, numberless bargains are made to transfer that property after the expiration of the statutory term. Johnson, Boswell's Life of Johnson.

To CO'PY.† v. a. [from the noun; and old Fr. copier.]

1. To transcribe; to write after an original: it has sometimes out, a kind of pleonasm.

These are also proverbs of Solomon, which the men of Hezekiah king of Judah copied out. Prov. xxv. 1.

He who hurts a harmless neighbour's peace,
Who loves a lie, lame slander helps about,
Who writes a libel, or who copies out. Pope, Epist.

2. To imitate; to propose to imitation; to endeavour to resemble.

He that borrows other men's experience, with this design of copying it out, possesses himself of one of the greatest advantages. Decay of Piety.

Set the examples, and their souls inflame,
To copy out their great forefathers' fame. Dryden, K. Arthur.

To copy her few nymphs aspir'd,
Her virtues fewer swains admir'd. Swift.

To CO'PY. v. n.

1. To do any thing in imitation of something else.

Some imagine, that whatsoever they find in the picture of a master, who has acquired reputation, must of necessity be excellent; and never fail, when they copy, to follow the bad as well as the good things. Dryden, Dufresnoy.

2. It has sometimes from before the thing imitated,

When a painter copies from the life, he has no privilege to alter features and lineaments, under pretence that his picture will look better. Dryden.

3. Sometimes after.

Several of our countrymen, and Mr. Dryden in particular, seem very often to have copied after it in their dramatick writings, and in their poems upon love. Addison, Spect.

CO'PYER.* n. s. A copier. See COPIER. The word copyist is now more common.

What copyer would have stifled those passages in them both? Bentley, Phil. Lips. § xxxiii.

CO'PYIST.* n. s. [from copy, formerly copist, which see.]

1. A transcriber.

The first may be ascribed to the copyist's haste, negligence, or ignorance. Blackwall's Sacr. Class. ii. 217.

The line on which copyists wrote, may be one cause of errors in transcribing. Abp. Newcome, Ess. on Tr. of the Bible, p. 376.

2. An imitator.

No original writer ever remained so unrivalled by succeeding copyists, as this Sicilian master, [Theocritus.] Dr. Warton, Essay on Pope, i. 9.

COQUELICO'T. n. s. [Fr.] The red corn-rose, Cotgrave; a colour nearly red so called, in modern times, from it.

To COQUE'T. v. a. [from the noun.] To entertain with compliments and amorous tattle; to treat with an appearance of amorous tenderness.

You are coquetting a maid of honour, my lord looking on to see how the gamesters play, and I railing at you both. Swift.

To COQUE'T. v. n. To act the lover, to entice by blandishments.

Phyllis, who but a month ago
Was marry'd to the Tunbridge beau,
I saw coquetting t'other night,
In publick, with that odious knight. Swift.

CO'QUETRY. n. s. [coquetterie, Fr.] Affectation of amorous advances; desire of attracting notice.

I was often in company with a couple of charming women, who had all the wit and beauty one could desire in female companions, without a dash of coquetry, that from time to time gave me a great many agreeable torments. Addison, Spect.

COQUE'TTE.† n. s. [coquette, Fr. from coquart, a prattler, Dr. Johnson says; which may be from caqueter, to tattle. The old French is cokatt for coquart. V. Lacombe. One might suppose Cotgrave to have been jilted by some coquette, and that, in revenge, he heaped upon the name the following choice terms: "COQUETTE, a prattling or proud gossip; a fisking or flipperous minx; a cocket or tatling housewife; a titisill; a flebergebit!" Among these appellations we see cocket; which was the English word at that time, and which is perhaps the meaning of Ben Jonson's "simper-the-cockets" in one of his Masques. Our old adjective cocket is pert, brisk, gay, &c. and was also at the beginning of the last century written coquet. "A gentleman, a friend of her's, is always very coquet to her in his drink, and never so at other times: because folly is the effect of drunkenness." British Apollo, 1718. vol. i. p. 703.] A gay, airy girl; a woman who endeavours to attract notice.

If you would see the humour of a coquette pushed to the last excess, you may find an instance of it in the following story. — A young coquette widow in France having been followed by a Gascon of quality, &c. Tatler, No. 126.

The light coquettes and sylphs alert repair,
And sport and flutter in the fields of air. Pope.

A coquette and a tinder-box are spark-led. Arbuthnot and Pope.

Not less vain of her person than her politicks, this stately coquet, the guardian of the protestant faith, the terror of the sea, the mediatrix of the factions of France, and the scourge of Spain, was infinitely mortified, if an embassador, at the first audience, did not tell her she was the finest woman in Europe. Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, iii. 493.

COQUE'TTISH.* adj. [from coquette.] Affecting the manner of a coquette.

Their hair falls in long plaits down their backs, and a veil or handkerchief, twisted round in a coquettish manner, serves them for a very becoming head dress. Swinburne, Trav. through Spain, L. 44.

COR.* n. s. [Lat. corus.] This word is in our old lexicography for the "measure of a pottle." Cockeram. Properly, it is an Hebrew measure.

How muche owist thou to my lord? whiche, answerde, an hundrid coris of wheat. Wicliffe, St. Lvke, xvi.

Likewise also of wheat even to an hundred cors. 1 Esdr. viii. 20. Present Translation.

Ye shall offer the tenth part of a bath out of the cor, which is an homer of ten baths. Ezek. xlv. 14.

The tenth part of a bath of oil is the hundredth part of a cor, which amounts to about six pints of our measure, according to bishop Cumberland. Lowth on Ezekiel.

CO'RACLE.† n. s. [cwrwgle, Welsh. In Davies's Welsh Dict. curwl is a boat; and in Shaw's Gaelic Dict. curach is translated by coracle, or little boat.] A boat used in Wales by fishers; made by drawing leather or oiled cloth upon a frame of wicker work.

Herodotus assures us, that the boats on the Euphrates were made of willows covered over with hides, and which appear by his description to be much the same with what are used at this time on the river Severn, and known by the name of coracles. Costard on the Book of Job, exp. 1747, p. 8.

I have been informed, that boats made of wicker, and covered with a skin, resembling the upper shell of a tortoise, are frequently used for passing rivers in different parts of India. — Boats of a similar structure are to be found in Wales, called coracles. Hole on the Arab. Night's Entert. p. 95.

CO'RAL. n. s. [coralliam, Lat.]

1. Red coral is a plant of as great hardness and stony nature, while growing in the water, as it has after long exposure to the air. The vulgar opinion, that coral is soft, while in the sea, proceeds from a soft and thin coat, of a crustaceous matter, covering it while it is growing, and which is taken off before it is packed up for use. The whole coral plant grows to a foot or more in height, and is variously ramified. It is thickest at the stem, and its branches grow gradually smaller. It grows to stones, without a root, or without any way penetrating them, but as it is found to grow, and take in its nourishment in the manner of plants, and to produce flowers and seeds, or at least a matter analogous to seeds, it properly belongs to the vegetable kingdom. Hill's Materia Medica.

In the sea, upon the south-west of Sicily, much coral is found. It is a submarine plant: it hath no leaves: it brancheth only when it is under water. It is soft, and green of colour; but being brought into the air, it becometh hard and shining red, as we see. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

This gentleman, desirous to find the nature of coral, caused a man to go down a hundred fathom into the sea, with express orders to take notice whether it were hard or soft in the place where it groweth. Brown, Vulg. Err.

He hears the crackling sound of coral woods,
And sees the secret source of subterranean floods. Dryden, Virg.

A turret was inclos'd
Within the wall, of alabaster white,
And crimson coral, for the queen of night
Who takes in Sylvan sports her chaste delight. Dryden.

Or where's the sense, direct or moral,
That teeth are pearl, or lips are coral? Prior.

2. The piece of coral which children have about their necks, imagined to assist them in breeding teeth.

Her infant grandame's coral next it grew;
The bells she gingled, and the whistle blew. Pope.

CORAL-TREE. n. s. [corallodendron, Lat.] It is a native of America, and produces very beautiful scarlet flowers; but never any seeds in the European gardens. Miller.

CO'RALLINE. adj. [corallinus, Lat.] Consisting of coral; approaching to coral.

At such time as the sea is agitated, it takes up into itself terrestrial matter of all kinds, and in particular the coralline matter, letting it fall again as it becomes calm. Woodward.

CO'RALLINE. n. s. [from the adjective.] Coralline is a sea-plant used in medicine; but much inferior to the coral in hardness, sometimes greenish, sometimes yellowish, often reddish, and frequently white. Hill.

In Falmouth there is a sort of sand, or rather coralline, that lies under the owse.
Mortimer, Husbandry.

CO'RALLOID. } adv. [κοραλλοειδης.] Re-
CO'RALLOIDAL. } sembling coral.

Now that plants and ligneous bodies may indurate under water, without approachment of air, we have experiment in coralline, with many coralloidal concretions. Brown.

The pentadrous, columnar, coralloid bodies, that are composed of plates set lengthways of the body, and passing from the surface to the axis of it.
Woodward on Fossils.

CO'RANT.† n s. [courant, Fr.]

1. A lofty sprightly dance.

It is harder to dance a corant well than a jigg; so in conversation, even, easy, and agreeable, more than points of wit. Temple.

I would as soon believe a widow in great grief for her husband, because I saw her dance a corant about his coffin. Walsh.

2. A paper of news. See COURANT.

All the lords
Have him in that esteem for his relations,
Corants, avises, correspondences
With this ambassador, and that agent!
B. Jonson, Magn. Lady.

CORA'NTO.* n. s. See COURANTO. An air, or dance.

After this, they danced galliards and corantos.
B. Jonson, Masques at Court.

CORB.* n. s. [Fr. corbeau. A diminutive of corbel, which see.] An ornament in building.

It was a bridge ybuilt in goodly wize
With curious corbes and pendants graven faire.
Spenser, F. Q. iv. x. 6.

CO'RBAN. n. s. [קרבן] An alms-basket; a receptacle of charity; a gift; an alms.

They think to satisfy all obligations to duty by their corban of religion. King Charles.

Corban stands for an offering or gift made to God, or his temple. The Jews sometimes swore by corban, or the gifts offered unto God. If a man made all his fortune corban, or devoted it to God, he was forbidden to use it. If all that he was to give his wife, or his father and mother, was declared corban, he was no longer permitted to allow them necessary subsistence. Even debtors were permitted to defraud their creditors, by consecrating their debt to God. Our Savsour reproaches the Jews, in the Gospel, with these uncharitable and irreligious vows. By this word such persons were likewise meant as devoted themselves to the service of God and his temple. Corban signifies also the treasury of the temple, where the offerings, which were made in money were deposited. Calmet.

CORBE. adj. [courbe, Fr.] Crooked.

Or siker thy head very tottie is,
So on thy corbe shoulder it leans amiss.
Spenser, Shep. Cal. Feb.

CO'RBEILS.† n. s. [Fr. corbeille, a wicker-basket. Cotgrave.] Little baskets used in fortification, filled with earth, and set upon the parapet, to shelter the men in firing upon the besiegers.

CO'RBEL. n. s. [In architecture.] The representation of a basket, sometimes placed on the heads of the caryatides.

CO'RBEL. }
CO'RBIL. } n. s.

1. A short piece of timber sticking out six or eight inches from a wall, sometimes placed for strength under the semi-girders of a platform.

2. A niche or hollow left in walls for figures or statues. Chambers.

CO'RBY.* n. s. [Fr. corbeau.] A raven, still so called in the north of England, and in the heraldick vocabulary.

CORD.† n. s. [cort, Welsh; chorda, Latin; corde, French.]

1. A rope; a string composed of several strands or twists.

She let them down by a cord through the window. Jos. ii. 5.

Form'd of the finest complicated thread,
Those num'rous cords are through the body spread.
Blackmore.

2. The cords extended in setting up tents, furnish several metaphors in scripture.

Thine eyes shall see Jerusalem a quiet habitation, a tabernacle that shall not be taken down; none of the stakes thereof shall ever be removed, neither shall any of the cords thereof be broken.
Isaiah, xxxiii. 20.

3. A quantity of wood for fuel, supposed to be measured with a cord; a pile eight feet long, four high, and four broad. [corde de bois, Cotgrave.]

An oak growing lately in a copse of my lord Craven's yielded — twenty-three cord of firewood. Evelyn, iii. 3. § 18.

CORD-MAKER. n. s. [cord and make.] One whose trade is to make ropes; a rope-maker.

CORD-WOOD. n. s. [cord and wood.] Wood piled up for fuel, to be sold by the cord.

To CORD.† v. a. [from the noun.] To bind with ropes; to fasten with cords: to close by a bandage. Corded; twisted as a cord; bound with a cord.
Cotgrave, in V. Cordé.

CO'RDAGE. n. s. [from cord.] A quantity of cords; the ropes of a ship.

Our cordage from her store, and cables should be made,
Of any in that kind most fit for marine trade.
Drayton.

They fastened their ships, and rid at anchor with cables of iron chains, having neither canvas nor cordage. Ralegh.

Spain furnished a sort of rush called spartum, useful for cordage and other parts of shipping.
Arbuthnot on Coins.

CO'RDED. adj. [from cord.] Made of ropes.

This night he meaneth, with a corded ladder,
To climb celestial Silvia's chamber-window.
Shakspeare.

And who to assist but a grave cordelier. Prior.

CO'RDIAL.† n. s. [old Fr. cordial, from cor, the heart, Latin.]

1. A medicine that increases the force of the heart, or quickens the circulation.

2. Any medicine that increases strength.

A cordial, properly speaking, is not always what increaseth the force of the heart; for, by increasing that, the animal may be weakened, as in inflammatory diseases. Whatever increaseth the natural or animal strength, the force of moving the fluids and muscles, is a cordial: these are such substances as bring the serum of the blood into the properest condition for circulation and nutrition; as broths made of animal substances, milk, ripe fruits, and whatever is endued with a wholesome but not pungent taste.
Arbuthnot on Aliments.

3. Any thing that comforts, gladdens, and exhilarates.

Then with some cordials seek for to appease
The inward languor of my wounded heart,
And then my body shall have shortly ease;
But such sweet cordials pass physicians art.
Spenser.

Cordials of pity give me now,
For I too weak for purges grow. Cowley.

Your warrior offspring that upheld the crown,
The scarlet honour of your peaceful gown,
Are the most pleasing objects I can find,
Charms to my sight, and cordials to my mind.
Dryden.

CO'RDIAL. adj.

1. Reviving; invigorating; restorative.

It is a thing I make; which hath the king
Five times redeem'd from death: I do not know
What is more cordial. Shakspeare, Cymbeline.

He only took cordial waters, in which we infused sometimes purgatives. Wiseman, Surgery.

2. Sincere; hearty; proceeding from the heart; without hypocrisy.

Doctrines are infused among Christians, which are apt to obstruct or intercept the cordial superstructing of Christian life of renovation, where the foundation is duly laid. Hammond.

He with looks of cordial love,

CORDIA'LITY.† n. s. [old Fr. cordialité.]

1. Relation to the heart.

That the antients had any such respects of cordiality, or reference unto the heart, will much be doubted. Brown.

2. Sincerity; freedom from hypocrisy.

CO'RDIALLY.† adv. [from cordial.] Sincerely; heartily; without hypocrisy.

Against which church Christ exhibits no complaint at all, but loves her, and likes her entirely, even as he is cordially loved of her.
More, Expos. of the Seven Churches, p. 131.

Where a strong inveterate love of sin has made any doctrine or proposition, wholly unsuitable to the heart, no argument or demonstration, no nor miracle whatsoever, shall be able to bring the heart cordially to close with and receive it.
South, Serm.

We should really, cordially, and sincerely love God. Scott, Disc. xxi.

CO'RDIALNESS.* n. s. [from cordial.] Heartiness. Cotgrave, and Sherwood.

CO'RDINER. n. s. [cordonnier, Fr.] A shoemaker. It is so used in divers statutes.

CO'RDON. n. s. [Fr.] In fortification, a row of stones jutting out before the rampart and the basis of the parapet. Chambers.

Co'RDON.* n. s. [Fr.] A band; a wreath.

Which pardon is since enlarged, by Sixtus the fourth and fifth, to all lay brethren and sisters that did weare St. Francis's cordon.
Sir E. Sandys, State of Religion.

CORDOVA'N.* n. s. [old Fr. cordouan, cordowan. See CORDWAIN.] Spanish leather.

Whilst every shepherd's boy
Puts on his lusty green, with gaudy hook,
And hanging scrip of finest cordovan.
Fletcher, Faithful Shepherdess.

No Roman perfumes, buffs or cordovans.
Howell, Lett. Poem to the King, 1641.

CO'RDWAIN.† n. s. [old Fr. cordowan; old Eng. cordewane. Chaucer's Sir Topas has "shoon of cordewane." This word was formerly used for a dry hide. Its origin is from Cordova in Spain; the leather there prepared being called Cordovan leather; and all leather since, prepared in a similar manner, has obtained the same name.] Spanish leather.

Her straight legs most bravely were embay'd
In golden buskins of costly cordwain.
Spenser, F. Q.

Buskins he wore of costly cordwayne.
Spenser, F. Q. vi. ii. 6.

Co'RDWAINER.† n. s. [Uncertain whether from Cordovan, Spanish leather, or from cord, of which shoes were formerly made, and are now used in the Spanish West Indies. Trevoux. The old French has cordowenier; so that Mr. Pegge's remark, in his Anecdotes of the English Language, that "cordwainer, usually supposed to have taken the name from Cordovan leather, of which the finest shoes were made perhaps in France, where the operator probably obtained the name of cordovanier, [is] easily corrupted into our cordwainer;" — is of little value.] A shoemaker.

If the shoe be too big for the foot, it is but troublesome and useless; and how poor an answer would it be of the cordwainer to say, that he had leather good store! Bp. Hall, Balm of Gilead.

CORE.† n. s. [cœur, Fr. cor, Lat.]

1. The heart.

Give me that man
That is not passion's slave, and I will wear him
In my heart's core; ay, in my heart of heart.
Shakspeare, Hamlet.

2. The inner part of any thing.

In the core of the square she raised a tower of a furlong high. Ralegh, Hist. of the World.

Dig out the cores below the surface.
Mortimer, Husbandry.

They wasteful eat,
Through buds and bark, into the blacken'd core.
Thomson.

3. The inner part of a fruit which contains the kernels.

It is reported that trees, watered perpetually with water, will make a fruit with little or no core or stone. Bacon.

4. The matter contained in a boil or sore.

Launce the sore,
And cut the head; for, 'till the core be found,
The secret vice is fed, and gathers ground.
Dryden, Virgil.

5. It is used by Bacon for a body or collection [from corps, French; pronounced core.]

He was more doubtful of the raising of forces to resist the rebels, than of the resistance itself; for that he was in a core of people whose affections he suspected. Bacon, Hen. VII.

6. A disorder incident to sheep, occasioned by worms in their livers. Chambers.

CORE'GENT.* n. s. [from con and regent.] A joint regent or governour.

Joseph was emperor of Germany, as well as co-regent of Hungary and Bohemia.
Wraxall's Berlin, ii. 435.

CORE'LATIVE.* adj. [from con and relative. See CORRELATIVE.] Having a reciprocal relation.

Prepositions are the words which express relation considered, in the same manner, in concrete with the co-relative object.
A. Smith, on the Format. of Languages.

CORIA'CEOUS. adj. [coriaceus, Latin.]

1. Consisting of leather.

2. Of a substance resembling leather.

A stronger projectile motion of the blood must occasion greater secretions and loss of liquid parts, and from thence perhaps spissitude and coriaceous concretions. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

CORIA'NDER. n. s. [coriandrum, Latin.] A plant.

The species are, 1. Greater coriander. 2. Smaller testiculated coriander. The first is cultivated for the seeds, which are used in medicine: the second sort is seldom found. Miller.

Israel called the name thereof manna; and it was, like coriander seed, white. Exod. xiii. 31.

CO'RINTH. n. s. [from the city of that name in Greece.] A small fruit commonly called currant.

Now will the corinths, now the rasps supply
Delicious draughts. Philips.

The chief riches of Zant consist in corinths, which the inhabitants have in great quantities.
Broome.

CORI'NTHIAN Order, is generally reckoned the fourth, but by some the fifth, of the five orders of architecture; and is the most noble, rich and delicate of them all. Vitruvius ascribes it to Callimachus, a Corinthian sculptor, who is said to have taken the hint by passing by the tomb of a young lady, over which a basket with some of her playthings had been placed by her nurse, and covered with a tile; the whole having been placed over a root of acanthus. As it sprung up, the branches encompassed the basket; but arriving at the tile, bent downwards under the corners of it, forming a kind of a volute. Hence Callimachus imitated the basket by the vase of his capital, the tile in the abacus, and the leaves in the volute. Villalpandus imagines the Corinthian capital to have taken its original from an order in the temple of Solomon, whose leaves were those of the palm-tree. The capital is adorned with two rows of leaves, between which little stalks arise, of which the sixteen volutes are formed, which support the abacus. Harris.

Behind these figures are large columns of the Corinthian Order, adorned with fruit and flowers.
Dryden.

CORI'NTHIAN.* adj. Relating to the licentious manners of Corinth. See the substantive.

On searching for me at the bordelloes, where, it may be, he has lost himself, and raps up, without pity, the sage and rheumatick old prelatess, with all her young Corinthian laity, to enquire for such an one. Milton, Apol. for Smectymn.

CORI'NTHIAN.* n. s. In allusion to the notorious licentiousness of Corinth, "to play the Corinthian" was in elder times an expression denoting a profligate person; and in the same sense passed into our vulgar language.

I am no proud Jack, like Falstaff; but a Corinthian; a lad of mettle. Shaks. K. Hen. IV. P. I.

To act the Corinthian, is, to commit fornication, according to Hesychius.
Potter, Antiq. of Greece, ii. 12.

CORI'VAL.* n. s. [from con and rival. See CORRIVAL.] A rival.

The Pope of Rome is, according to his last challenge and pretences, become a competitor and corival with the king for the hearts and alienations of the people.
Bacon, Charge at the Sess. for the Verge.

To CORI'VAL.* v. a. [from the noun.] To affect to equal.

Where's then the saucy boat,
Whose weak untimber'd sides but even now
Corivall'd greatness? Shakspeare, Tr. and Cress.

CORK. n. s. [cortex, Lat. korck, Dutch.

Hic dies, anno redeunte, festus
Corticem astrictum pice dimovebit
Amphoræ fumum bibere institutæ
Consule Tullo. Hor.]

1. A glandiferous tree, in all respects like the ilex, excepting the bark, which, in the cork tree, is thick, spongy, and soft. Miller.

The cork tree grows near the Pyrenæan hills, and in several parts of Italy, and the North of New England. Mortimer.

2. The bark of the cork tree used for stopples, or burnt into Spanish black. It is taken off without injury to the tree.

3. A piece of cork cut for the stopple of a bottle or barrel.

I pr'ythee take the cork out of thy mouth, that I may drink thy tidings. Shakspeare, As you like it.

Be sure, nay very sure, thy cork be good;
Then future ages shall of Peggy tell,
That nymph that brew'd and bottled ale so well.
King.

Nor stop, for one bad cork his butler's pay.
Pope.

To CORK.* v. a. [from the noun.] To stop or raise with corks. Sherwood.

He that weareth a corked shoe or slipper. Huloet.

And tread on corked stilts a prisoner's pace.
Bp. Hall, Sat. iv. 6.

Co'RKING-PIN.† n. s. A pin of the largest size. This is also called a CALKIN-PIN.

When you put a clean pillow-case on your lady's pillow, be sure to fasten it well with three corking-pins, that it may not fall off in the night.
Swift, Direct. to the Chambermaid.

Co'RKY.† adj. [from cork.] Consisting of cork; resembling cork.

Bind fast his corky arms. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

[He] hath fully valued the weight of his general guilts, each of which hath lead enough to sink the most corky, vain, fluctuating, proud, stubborn heart in the world. Hammond's Works, iv. 644.

Co'RMORANT.† n. s. [cormoran, Fr. from corvus marinus, Latin, Dr. Johnson says. Others, from corvus vorans. But corman being the old French name of this bird, which is termed the greedy fowl, and after which a glutton is called a cormorant, the etymology may belong perhaps to gourmand, whence gourman, gorman, corman.]

1. A bird that preys upon fish. It is nearly of the bigness of a capon, with a wry bill and broad feet, black on his body, but greenish about his wings. He is eminently greedy and rapacious.

Let fame, that all hunt after in their lives,
Live register'd upon our brazen tombs;
When, spite of cormorant devouring time,
Th' endeavour of this present breath may buy
That honour which shall 'bate his scythe's keen edge. Shakspeare.

Those called birds of prey, as the eagle, hawk, puttock, and cormorant. Peacham on Drawing.

Thence up he flew, and on the tree of life
Sat like a cormorant. Milton, P. L.

Not far from thence is seen a lake, the haunt
Of coots, and of the fishing cormorant.
Dryden, Fab.

2. A glutton.

CORN.† n. s. [kaurno, Goth. copn, Sax. korn, Germ. It is found in all the Teutonick dialects; as, in an old Runick rhyme,

Hagul er kaldastur corna.
Hail is the coldest grain.]

1. The seeds which grow in ears, not in pods; such as are made into bread.

Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground, and die, it abideth alone. John, xii. 25.

The people cry you mock'd them; and, of late,
When corn was given them gratis, you repin'd.
Shakspeare.

2. Grain yet unreaped, standing in the field upon its stalk.

All the idle weeds that grow
In our sustaining corn. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

Landing his men, he burnt the corn all thereabouts, which was now almost ripe.
Knolles, Hist. of the Turks.

Still a murmur runs
Along the soft inclining fields of corn.
Thomson, Autumn.

3. Grain in the ear, yet unthreshed.

Thou shalt come to thy grave in a full age, like as a shock of corn cometh in his season. Job, v. 26.

4. Any minute particle.

That art which hath reckoned how many corns of sand would make up a world.
Bp. Hall, Contempl. B. 4.

When I was cut in shreds thus,
And not a corn of powder left to bless us.
Beaum. and Fl. Knight of Malta.

5. An excrescence on the feet, hard and painful; probably so called from its form, though by some supposed to be denominated from its corneous or horny substance.

Ladies, that have your feet
Unplagu'd with corns, we'll have a bout with you.
Shakspeare.

The man that makes his toe,
What he his heart should make,
Shall of a corn cry woe,
And turn his sleep to wake. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

Even in men, aches and hurts and corns do engrieve either towards rain or towards frost.
Bacon, Nat. Hist.

The hardest part of the corn is usually in the middle, thrusting itself in a nail; whence it has the Latin appellation of clavis. Wiseman's Surgery.

He first that useful secret did explain,
That pricking corns foretold the gath'ring rain.
Gay, Past.

It looks as there were regular accumulations and gatherings of humours growing perhaps in some people as corns. Arbuthnot.

Thus Lamb, renown'd for cutting corns,
An offer'd fee from Radcliff scorns. Swift.

To CORN.† v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To salt; to sprinkle with salt. The word is so used, as Skinner observes, by the old Saxons.

2. To granulate.

A runner, when the sieve is moved, by its weight and motion, forces the powder through the upper sieve; and that corns it.
Hist. of Gunpowder, Sprat's Hist. R. S. p. 281.

Our careful Monarch stands in person by,
His new-cast cannon's firmness to explore;
The strength of big-corn'd powder loves to try,
And ball and cartridge sorts for every bore.
Dryden, Annus Mirabilis.

CORN-BIND.* n. s. Climbing buck-wheat; also corn-convolvulus. North. Grose.

CORN-CRAIK.* n. s. [corn, and creak; Welsh crech, a shriek.] The land-rail, so called in the north of England; probably from its constant note, craik, craik.

CORN-FIELD. n. s. A field where corn is growing.

It was a lover and his lass,
That o'er the green corn-field did pass.
Shakspeare, As you like it.

You may soon enjoy the gallant sights of armies, encampments, and standards waving over your brother's cornfields. Pope.

CORN-FLAG. n. s. [corn and flag.] A plant. Miller enumerates eleven species of this plant, some with red flowers, and some with white.

CORN-FLOOR. n. s. The floor where corn is stored.

Thou hast loved a reward upon every corn-floor.
Hos. ix. 1.

CORN-FLOWER. n. s. [from corn and flower.] There be certain corn-flowers, which come seldom or never in other places, unless they be set, but only amongst corn; as the blue-bottle, a kind of yellow marygold, wild poppy, and furmitory.
Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Corn-flowers are of many sorts: some of them flower in June and July, and others in August. The seeds should be sown in March: they require a good soil. Mortimer.

CORN-HEAP.* n. s. Store of corn.

What if in his chaff he find but one untruth, whiles I in my corn-heap can find more?
Bp. Hall, Hon. of the Marr. Clergy, p. 195.

CORN-LAND. n. s. [corn and land.] Land appropriated to the production of grain.

Pastures and meadows are of such advantage to husbandry, that many prefer them to corn-lands.
Mortimer, Husbandry.

CORN-MASTER. n. s. [corn and master.] One that cultivates corn for sale. Not in use.

I knew a nobleman in England, that had the greatest audits of any man in my time; a great grasier, a great sheep-master, a great timberman, a great collier, a great corn-master, and a great leadman. Bacon.

CORN-LOFT.* n. s. Granary. [Fr. grenier.]
Sherwood.

CORN-MARIGOLD. n. s. [from corn and marigold.] A flower.

CORN-METER.* n. s. One who superintends the measure of corn.

CORN-MILL. n. s. [corn and mill.] A mill to grind corn into meal.

Save the more laborious work of beating of hemp, by making the axle-tree of the corn-mills longer than ordinary, and placing pins in it to raise large hammers. Mortimer.

CORN-PIPE. n. s. [from corn and pipe.] A pipe made by slitting the joint of a green stalk of corn.

Now the shrill corn-pipes, echoing loud to arms,
To rank and file reduce the straggling swarms.
Tickel.

CORN-ROCKET. n. s. [from corn and rocket.] A plant.

CORN-ROSE.† n. s. A species of poppy. See COQUELICOT.

CORN-SALLAD. n. s. [from corn and sallad.] Corn-sallad is an herb, whose top-leaves are a sallet of themselves. Mortimer, Husbandry.

CORN-VI'OLET.* n. s. A species of campanula.

CO'RNAGE.† n. s. [old Fr. cornage, from cornu, Lat.] A tenure which obliges the landholder to give notice of an invasion by blowing a horn.

The barony of Burgh on the sands in Com. Cumbriæ, with divers other mannors and lands in that county, were anciently held by the service of cornage, i. e. to blow a horn when any invasion of the Scots was perceived. Blount, Anc. Tenures.

CO'RNAMUTE.* n. s. [probably the same as cornemuse, which see.] A wind instrument.

The hoboy, sagbut deepe, recorder, and the flute:
Even from the shrillest shawme unto the cornamute.
Drayton, Polyolb. S. 4.

The musicke was composed of treble violins, with all the inward parts, a base viol, base lute, sagbut, cornamute, and a tabor and pipe.
Browne, Inn. Temple Masque.

CO'RNCHANDLER.† n. s. [corn and chandler, Dr. Johnson says; but this is an awkward combination, chandler or candle-seller having no connection with corn. The word may be a corruption of chaland, a customer unto a merchant; chalandise, trading unto one ship. Cotgrave.] One that retails corn.

CO'RNCUTTER. n. s. [from corn and cut.] A man whose profession is to extirpate corns from the foot.

The nail was not loose, nor did seem to press into the flesh; for there had been a corncutter, who had cleared it. Wiseman.

I have known a corncutter, who, with a right education, would have been an excellent physician.
Spectator, No. 307.

CO'RNEA,* n. s. [Lat.] The horny coat of the eye.

We are not so made as to see objects always in their true place, nor so as to see them precisely in the direction of the rays, when they fall upon the cornea. Reid's Inquiry.

CO'RNEL.† } n. s. [old Fr. cornille,
CORNE'LIAN-TREE.} cornie; modern, cornouiller, from cornus, Lat. The Italians call the fruit of this tree corniola.]

The cornel-tree beareth the fruit commonly called the cornel or cornelian cherry, as well from the name of the tree as the cornelian stone, the colour whereof it somewhat represents. The wood is very durable, and useful for wheelwork. Mortimer.

Take a service-tree, or a cornelian-tree, or an elder-tree, which we know have fruits of harsh and binding juice, and set them near a vine or fig-tree, and see whether the grapes or figs will not be the sweeter. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

A huntress issuing from the wood,
Reclining on her cornel spear she stood. Dryden.

Mean time the goddess, in disdain bestows
The mast and acorn, brutal food! and strows
The fruits of cornel, as they feast around.
Pope, Odyssey.

On wildings and on strawberries they fed;
Cornels and brambleberries gave the rest,
And falling acorns furnish'd out a feast.
Dryden, Ovid.

CORNE'LIAN STONE. See CARNELIAN.

CO'RNEMUSE.† n. s. [French.] A kind of rustick flute, Dr. Johnson says. It is the bag-pipe, as used by Chaucer; but according to French authors is a shawm.

CO'RNEOUS. adj. [corneus, Lat.] Horny; of a substance resembling horn.

Such as have corneous or horny eyes, as lobsters, and crustaceous animals, are generally dimsighted. Brown.

The various submarine shrubs are of a corneous or ligneous constitution, consisting chiefly of a fibrous matter. Woodward.

CO'RNER.† n. s. [cornel, Welsh; cornier, French, Dr. Johnson says. Perhaps from the Lat. cornu, which is a corner as well as a horn; like the Goth. haurn. But the Syr. karnah also is a corner.]

1. An angle; a place inclosed by two walls or lines, which would intersect each other, if drawn beyond the point where they meet.

2. A secret or remote place.

There's nothing I have done yet, o' my conscience,
Deserves a corner. Shakspeare, Hen. VIII.

It is better to dwell in a corner of a house top, than with a brawling woman and in a wide house. Proverbs, xxv. 24.

I am persuaded that none of these things are hidden from him; for this thing was not done in a corner. Acts, xxvi. 26.

All the inhabitants, in every corner of the island, have been absolutely reduced under his immediate subjection. Davies.

Those vices that lurk in the secret corners of the soul. Addison.

3. The extremities; the utmost limit: thus every corner is the whole or every part.

Might I but through my prison, once a day,
Behold this maid, all corners else o'the earth
Let liberty make use of. Shakspeare, Tempest.

I turn'd, and try'd each corner of my bed,
To find if sleep were there, but sleep was lost.
Dryden.

CORNER-STONE. n. s. [corner and stone.] The stone that unites the two walls at the corner; the principal stone.

See you yond' coin o'th' capitol, yond' corner-stone? Shakspeare.

A mason was fitting a corner-stone.
Howell, Voc. For.

CORNER-TEETH of a Horse are the four teeth between the middling teeth and the tushes; two above and two below, on each side of the jaw, which shoot when the horse is four years and a half old. Farrier's Dict.

CO'RNERED.* adj. [from corner.] Having angles or corners.

For as a corner'd christal spot,
My heart diaphanous was not,
But solid stuffe. Lovelace, Luc. P. p. 29.

Whether this building were square like a castle, or corner'd like a triangle, or round like a tower. Austin, Hæc Homo, p. 75.

CO'RNERWISE.† adv. [corner and wise.] Diagonally; with the corner in front.
Huloet, and Sherwood.

CO'RNET.† n. s. [cornette, French.]

1. A musical instrument blown with the mouth: used anciently in war, probably in the cavalry.

Israel played before the Lord on psalteries and on timbrels, and on cornets. 2 Sam. vi. 5.

Other wind instruments require a forcible breath; as trumpets, cornets, and hunters horns. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Cornets and trumpets cannot reach his ear,
Under an actor's nose, he's never near.
Dryden, Juv.

2. A company or troop of horse; perhaps as many as had a cornet belonging to them. This sense is now disused.

These noblemen were appointed with some cornets of horse and bands of foot, to put themselves beyond the hill where the rebels were encamped. Bacon.

Seventy great horses lay dead in the field, and one cornet was taken. Hayward.

They discerned a body of five cornets of horse very full, standing in very good order to receive them. Clarendon.

3. The officer that bears the standard of a troop; derived by some from coronet, which, it is said, such officers formerly wore; by others, with greater probability, from the flag or standard which this officer carries: and which is named in our old poetry; by others from cornu, the wing of an army. See the next sense.

Non-commissioned officers are all those below ensigns and cornets. Ld. Chesterfield.

4. A standard or flag; "the ensign of a horse company," cornette. Cotgrave.

In his white cornet Verdon doth display
A fret of gules. Drayton, Barons' Wars, ii. 24.

CO'RNETCY.* n. s. [from cornet.] The commission of a cornet.

The army was his original destination; and a cornetcy of horse his first and only commission in it. Ld. Chesterfield.

CO'RNETER. n. s. [from cornet.] A blower of the cornet.

So great was the rabble of trumpeters, cornet-ers, and other musicians, that even Claudius himself might have heard them.
Hakewill, on Providence.

CO'RNICE.† n. s. [corniche, Fr. κορωνὶς, Gr. the summit. This word is often pronounced cornish, and indeed is so written in our old lexicography.] The highest projection of a wall or column.

The cornice of the Palazzo Farnese, which makes so beautiful an effect below, when viewed more nearly, will be found not to have its just measures. Dryden, Dufresnoy.

The walls were massy brass, the cornice high,
Blue metals crown'd, in colours of the sky.
Pope, Odyssey.

CO'RNICE Ring. [In gunnery.] The next ring from the muzzle backwards.
Chambers.

CO'RNICLE. n. s. [from cornu, Latin.] A little horn.

There will be found on either side two black filaments, or membranous strings, which extend unto the long and shorter cornicle, upon protrusion. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CORNI'CULATE.† adj. [from cornu, Latin.]

1. A term in botany.

Corniculate plants are such as produce many distinct and horned pods; and corniculate flowers are such hollow flowers as have on their upper part a kind of spur or little horn. Chambers.

2. Horned.

Venus, moon-like, grows corniculate,
What time her face with flusher light is blown.
More, Song of the Soul, iii. ii. 62.

CORNI'FICK. adj. [from cornu and facio, Latin.] Productive of horns; making horns. Dict.

CORNI'GEROUS. adj. [corniger, Latin.] Horned; having horns.

Nature, in other cornigerous animals, hath placed the horns higher, and reclining; as in bucks. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CO'RNING-HOUSE.* n. s. The place where gunpowder is granulated. See to CORN.

From the mill the powder is brought to the corning-house. Hist. of Gunpowder, Sprat's Hist. R. S. p. 281.

CO'RNISH.* n. s. The people of Cornwall.

The Cornish here in Britain, have now, it seems, entirely lost the original language of their country; and must, if they desire to know the significations of the names of families, places, &c. come over to Wales to learn them.
Richards, Welsh Dict. Pref.

We find the Welsh and Cornish, as one people, often uniting themselves as in a national cause against the Saxons.
Warton, Hist. E. P. i. Diss. 1.

CO'NISH.* adj. Relating to the language or manners of the Cornish. Some remains of this language were met with in Cornwall, so lately as in the year 1768, notwithstanding what is said by Richards in 1753. See Archæolog. iii.

From the Archæologia I took the Cornish, Irish, and many of the Armorick words.
Richards, Welsh Dict. Pref.

A Cornish hug is a term used in wrestling, when one has an adversary on his breast, and holds him there. Chambers.

CORNUCO'PIÆ.† n. s. [Lat.] The horn of plenty; a horn topped with fruits and flowers in the hands of a goddess.

Not questioning but this horn will prove a cornucopiæ to you. Addison, Guard. No. 124.

To CORNU'TE.† v. a. [cornutus, Latin.] To bestow horns; to cuckold.

A lawyer's wife in Aristænetus threatened to cornute him. Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 605.

CORNU'TED.† adj. [cornutus, Latin.] Grafted with horns; horned; cuckolded.

I do not stand upon the matter of being a cuckold; for there's many a brave fellow lives in Cuckold's-Row. But why does he not name others as well as me; as if the horn grew upon nobody's head but mine: I am sure, there are others that better deserve it; I hope he cannot say that ever I gored any of my superiors, or that my being cornuted has raised the price of post-horns, lanthorns, or pocket-inkhorns!
L'Estrange, Tr. of Quevedo's Visions.

CORNU'TO. n. s. [from cornutus, Lat.] A man horned; a cuckold.

The peaking cornuto her husband, dwelling in a continual larum of jealousy.
Shakspeare, M. W. of Winds.

CORNU'TOR.* n. s. [from cornute.] He who makes a cuckold.
He that thinks every man is his wife's suitor,
Defiles his bed, and proves his own cornutor.
Jordan, Poems, 2. b.

CO'RNY.† adj. [from cornu, horn, Latin.]
1. Strong or hard like horn; horny.
[The rain] downward gan to rave,
And drown'd the corny ranks.
Lisle, Tr. of Du Bart, (1625,) p.14.
Up stood the corny reed
2. [from corn.] Producing grain or corn.
Tell me why the ant,
Midst summer's plenty thinks of winter's want,
By constant journeys, careful to prepare
Her stores; and bringing home the corny ear.
Prior.
3. Containing corn; this is a very old sense of the word, to which may be added, what has escaped Dr. Johnson, but what most Englishmen will approve, Chaucer's "draught of corny ale," Pardoner's Tale; i. e. containing plenty of corn or malt.
They lodge in habitations not their own,
By their high crops and corny gizzards known.
Dryden.

CO'RNWAIN.* n. s. [corn and wain.] A a wagon loaded with corn.
I will press your place, as a loaded cornwain presseth its sheaves.
Bp. Horsley's Biblical Criticism, vol. 4. p. 320.

CO'ROLLARY. n. s. [corollarium, Lat. from corolla; finis coronat opus; corollaire, Fr.]
1. The conclusion: A corollary seems to be a conclusion; whether following from the premises necessarily or not.
Now since we have considered the malignity of this sin of detraction, it is but a natural corollary, that we enforce our vigilance against it.
Gov. of the Tongue.
As a corollary to this preface, in which I have done justice to others, I owe somewhat to myself.
Dryden, Fab. Pref.
2. Surplus.
Bring a corollary,
Rather than want. Shakspeare, Tempest.

CORO'NA. n. s. [Latin.] A large flat member of the cornice, so called because it crowns the entablature and the whole order. It is called by workmen the drip. Chambers.
In a cornice the gola or cymatium of the corona, the coping, the modillions or dentelli, make a noble shew by their graceful projections.
Spectator.

CO'RONAL.† n. s. [old Fr. coronal, a coronet, from corona, Lat.] A crown; a garland.
Crown ye God Bacchus with a coronal,
And Hymen also crown with wreaths of vine.
Spenser.
Now no more shall these smooth brows be begirt,
With youthful coronals, and lead the dance.
Fletcher, Faithful Shepherdess.

CO'RONAL.† adj. [coronal, Fr. "commissure coronale, the coronal suture, or seam, which compasses the forehead, &c." Cotgrave.] Belonging to the top of the head.
A man of about forty-five years of age came to me, with a round tubercle between the saggittal and coronal suture. Wiseman.

CO'RONARY.† adj. [coronarius, Latin.]
1. Relating to a crown; seated on the top of the head like a crown.
The basilisk of older times was a proper kind of serpent, not above three palms long, as some account; and differenced from other serpents by advancing his head, and some white marks, or coronary spots upon the crown. Brown.
The coronary thorns did not only express the scorn of the imposers, by that figure into which they were contrived; but did pierce his tender and sacred temples to a multiplicity of pains, by their numerous acuminations.
Pearson on the Creed, Art. iv.
The catalogue of coronary plants is not large in Theophrastus, Pliny, &c.
Sir T. Brown, Misc. Tr. p.93.
2. It is applied in anatomy to arteries, which are fancied to encompass the heart in the manner of a garland.
The substance of the heart itself is most certainly made and nourished by the blood, which is conveyed to it by the coronary arteries.
Bentley, Serm.

CORONA'TION. n. s. [from corona, Lat.]
1. The act or solemnity of crowning a king.
Fortune smiling at her work therein, that a scaffold of execution should grow a scaffold of coronation. Sidney.
Willingly I came to Denmark,
To shew my duty in your coronation.
Shaksp. Hamlet.
A cough, sir, which I caught with ringing in the king's affairs upon his coronation day.
Shakspeare, Hen. IV.
Now empress fame had publish'd the renown
Of Shadwell's coronation through the town.
Dryden, Macflecknoe.
2. The pomp or assembly present at a coronation.
In pensive thought recal the fancied scene,
See coronations rise on every green. Pope.

CO'RONEL.* n. s. [Spanish. See COLONEL.] A colonel.
Their coronel, named Don Sebastian, came forth to entreat that they might part with their arms like soldiers. Spenser on Ireland.

CO'RONER. n. s. [from corona.] An officer whose duty is to enquire, on the part of the king, how any violent death was occasioned; for which purpose a jury is impannelled.
Go thou and seek the coroner, and let him sit o' my uncle; for he's in the third degree of drink; he's drowned. Shakspeare.

CO'RONET. n. s. [coronetta, Ital. the diminutive of corona, a crown.]
1. An inferiour crown worn by the nobility. The coronet of a duke is adorned with strawberry leaves; that of a marquis has leaves with pearls interposed; that of an earl raises the pearls above the leaves; that of a viscount is surrounded with only pearls; that of a baron has only four pearls.
In his livery
Walk'd crowns and coronets, realms and islands were
As plates dropt from his pocket.
Shaksp. Ant. and Cleopatra.
All the rest are countesses,
Their coronets say so. Shaksp. Hen. VIII.
Nor could our nobles hope their bold attempt,
Who ruin'd crowns, would coronets exempt.
Dryden.
Peers and dukes, and all their sweeping train,
And garters, stars, and coronets appear. Pope.
2. An ornamental head-dress, in poetical language.
The rest was drawn into a coronet of gold, richly set with pearl. Sidney.
Under a coronet his flowing hair,
In curls, on either cheek play'd. Milton, P. L.

CO'RPORAL. n. s. corrupted from caporal, French.] The lowest officer of the infantry, whose office is to place and remove the sentinels.
The cruel corporal whisper'd in my ear,
Five pounds, if rightly tipt, would set me clear.
Gay.

CO'RPORAL of a Ship. An officer that hath the charge of setting the watches and sentries, and relieving them; who sees that all the soldiers and sailors keep their arms neat and clean, and teaches them how to use them. He has a mate under him. Harris.

CO'RPORAL.* n. s. [Fr. corporail; low Lat. corporale.] "The corporal; the fine linen, wherein the sacrament is put." Cotgrave. See CORPORAS.
When all have communicated, the minister is directed to return to the Lord's table, and reverently place upon it what remaineth of the consecrated elements, covering the same with a fair linen cloth; which by the ancient writers and the Scotch liturgy is called the corporal, from its being spread over the body or consecrated bread.
Wheatly on the Common Prayer.

CO'RPORAL.† adj. [corporel, Fr. corpus, Latin.]
1. Relating to the body; belonging to the body.
To relief of lazars and weak age,
Of indigent, faint souls, past corporal toil,
A hundred alm-houses, right well supplied.
Shakspeare, Hen. V.
Render to me some corporal sign about her,
More evident than this. Shakspeare, Cymbeline.
That God hath been otherwise seen, with corporal eyes, exceedeth the small proportion of my understanding. Ralegh.
Beasts enjoy greater sensual pleasures, and feel fewer corporal pains, and are utter strangers to all those anxious and tormenting thoughts, which perpetually haunt and disquiet mankind. Atterbury.
2. Material; not spiritual. In the present language, when body is used philosophically in opposition to spirit, the word corporeal is used, as a corporeal being; but otherwise corporal. Corporeal is having a body; corporal relating to the body. This distinction seems not ancient. Corporeous was formerly used for corporeal.
Whither are they vanish'd?
Into the air: and what seem'd corporal
Melted, as breath, into the wind. Shaks. Macbeth.
And from these corporal nutriments, perhaps,
Your bodies may at last turn all to spirit.
Milton, P. L.
3. Relating to an oath so called.
The phrase Corporal oath, is supposed to have been derived — not from the touching the New Testament, or the bodily act of kissing it, but from the antient use of touching the corporale, or cloth which covered the consecrated elements.
Brand, Pop. Antiq.

CORPORA'LITY.† n. s. [from corporal.]
1. The quality of being embodied.
If this light be not spiritual, yet it approacheth nearest unto spirituality; and if it have any corporality, then, of all other, the most subtile and pure. Ralegh's Hist.

The corporality of the soul, you know, was taught only by one or two men.
Clarke, Letter to Dodwell, p. 77.

2. Corporation; confraternity.

Processes to be served by a corporality of griffonlike promoters and apparatus.
Milton, of Ref. in Eng. B. 1.

Co'RPORALLY.† adv. [from corporal.] Bodily.

They [the Papists] say, that the very natural fleshe and bloud of Christ, which suffered for us upon the crosse and sitteth at the right hand of the Father in heaven, is also really, substancially, corporally, and naturally, in or under the accidentes of the sacramental bread and wyne, which they call the formes of bread and wyne.
Abp. Cranmer, Def. fol. 16.

The sun is corporally conjoined with basiliscus.
Brown.

Sons in six things are bound to their parents, whether they be alive or dead: First, they are bound to serve them corporally, to wit, with their own body. Sir M. Sandys, Ess. (1634,) p. 154.

CO'RPORATE. adj. [from corpus, Latin.]

1. United in a body or community; enabled to act in legal processes as an individual.

Breaking forth like a sudden tempest, he overrun all Munster and Connaught, defacing and utterly subverting all corporate towns that were not strongly walled. Spenser on Ireland.

The nobles of Athens being not at this time a corporate assembly, therefore the resentment of the commons was usually turned against particular persons. Swift.

2. General; united.

They answer in a joint and corporate voice,
That now they are at fall. Shakspeare, Timon.

Co'RPORAS.* n. s. The old name of the corporal, or communion cloth. See CORPORAL.

Her manyfolde kyndes of ornaments; as, her copes, corporasses, chesibles, &c.
Bale on the Revel. k. 6. b.

They [the subdeacons] must provide water against mass, wash the palls and corporas-cloths.
Dering on the Hebrews, ch. 5.

To Co'RPORATE.* v. n. [from the adj.] To unite.

Though she [the soul] corporate
With no world yet, by a just Nemesis
Kept off from all; yet she, thus separate,
May oft be struck with potent rays transmiss
From divers worlds.
More, Song of the Soul, iii. ii. 19.

Co'RPORATELY.* adv. [from corporate.] In a corporate capacity; unitedly.

Co'RPORATENESS. n. s. [from corporate.] The state of a body corporate; a community. Dict.

CORPORA'TION. n. s. [from corpus, Latin.] A corporation is a body politick, authorised by the king's charter to have a common seal, one head officer or more, and members, able, by their common consent, to grant or receive in law, any thing within the compass of their charter: even as one man may do by law all things, that by law he is not forbidden; and bindeth his successors, as a single man binds his executor or heir. Cowel.

Of angels we are not to consider only what they are, and do, in regard of their own being; but that also which concerneth them, as they are linked into a kind of corporation amongst themselves, and of society with men. Hooker, i. § 4.

Of this we find some foot-steps in our law,
Which doth her root from God and nature take;
Ten thousand men she doth together draw,
And of them all one corporation make. Davies.

Co'RPORATURE.† n. s. [from corpus, Lat.] The state of being embodied.

That antiquate, secure,
And easy, dull conceit of corporature,
Of matter, quantity, &c.
More, Song of the Soul, App.

CORPO'REAL. adj. [corporeus, Latin.]

1. Having a body, not immaterial; not spiritual. See CORPORAL.

The swiftness of those circles attribute,
Though numberless, to his omnipotence,
That to corporeal substances could add
Speed almost spiritual. Milton, P.L.

Having surveyed the image of God in the soul, we are not to omit those characters that God imprinted upon the body, as much as a spiritual substance could be pictured upon a corporeal.
South, Serm.

God being supposed to be a pure spirit, cannot be the object of any corporeal sense. Tillotson.

The course is finish'd which thy fates decreed,
And thou from thy corporeal prison freed.
Dryden, Fab.

Fix thy corporeal and internal eye
On the young gnat, or new engender'd fly. Prior.

2. It is used by Swift inaccurately for corporal.

I am not in a condition to make a true step even on Aimsbury Downs; and I declare, that a corporeal false step is worse than a political one. Swift.

CORPO'REALIST.* n. s. [from corporeal.] One who denies spiritual substances.

If the matters of fact be too notorious to be gainsaid, then these corporealists will not stick to affirm with a late author, that they believe there are many thousands of spirits, made of an incorporeal matter, too fine to be perceived by the senses of men. Hallywell, Melampet, (1681,) p. 3.

I believe it will puzzle the wisest corporealists to tell us how that, which is immaterial, can either be produced out of matter, or lodged in matter as its subject. Sherlock, Immort. of the Soul, i. § 2.

Some corporealists and mechanics vainly pretended to make a world without a God.
Bp. Berkeley, Siris, § 259.

CORPO'REALLY.* adv. [from corporeal.] In a material or bodily manner.

This and other phrases, are to be understood not corporeally, but spiritually.
Bp. Richardson on the Old Test. (1655,) p. 251.

CORPORE'ITY. n. s. [from corporeus, Lat.] Materiality; the quality of being embodied; the state of having a body; bodiliness.

Since philosophy affirmeth, that we are middle substances between the soul and the body, they must admit of some corporeity which supposeth weight or gravity. Brown.

It is the saying of divine Plato, that man is nature's horizon, dividing betwixt the upper hemisphere of immaterial intellects and this lower of corporeity. Glanville's Scepsis.

The one attributed corporeity to God, and the other shape and figure. Stillingfleet.

CORPO'REOUS.* adj. [Lat. corporeus.] Bodily; having a body.

Worshipped in so many corporeous shapes.
Hammond, of Conscience.

A second hindrance was the grossness and earthiness of their fancy, which was not able to conceive God to be any thing but a corporeous substance.
Hammond's Works, iv. 641.

CORPORIFICA'TION. n. s. [from corporify.] The act of giving body or palpability.

To CORPO'RIFY. v. a. [from corpus, Latin.] To embody; to inspissate into body. Not used.

A certain spirituous substance, extracted out of it, is mistaken for the spirit of the world corporified. Boyle.

Co'RPOSANT, or Co'RPUSANSE.* [corrupted from the Spanish cuerpo santo, i. e. holy body.] A word used by mariners to denote those luminous bodies, which sometimes skip about the masts and yards of ships; an ignis fatuus; and what the ancients called Castor and Pollux. See Shaw's Travels, 4to. p. 334.

CORPS.† } n. s. [corps, Fr. corpus, Latin.]
CORPSE. }

1. A body.

That lewd ribauld
Laid first his filthy hands on virgin cleene,
To spoil her dainty corse, so fair and sheene,
Of chastity and honour virginal. Spenser.

2. A body, in contempt.

Though plenteous, all too little seems
To stuff this maw, this vast unhide-bound corps.
Milton, P.L.

He looks as man was made, with face erect,
That scorns his brittle corps, and seems asham'd
He's not all spirit. Dryden, Don Sebast.

3. A carcass; a dead body; a corse.

Not a friend greet
My poor corps, where my bones shall be thrown.
Shakspeare.

There was the murder'd corps in covert laid,
And violent death in thousand shapes display'd.
Dryden, Fab.

See where the corps of thy dead son approaches.
Addison.

The corpse was laid out upon the floor by the emperor's command: he then bid every one light his flambeau, and stand about the dead body.
Addison, Guardian.

4. The body, in opposition to the soul.

Cold numbness streight bereaves
Her corpse of sense, and the air her soul receives.
Denham.

5. A body of forces.

6. The land with which a prebend, or other ecclesiastical office, is endowed.

The prebendaries, over and above their reserved rents, have a corps, and receive fines upon renewals. Bacon, Liber Regis, p. 133.

CORPS DE GARDE. n. s. [Fr.] A guard-room. See COURT OF GUARD.

False pastors, whom a man shall find rather in their beds, or at table, or in the stews, or any where else than in their corps de gard.
Harmar, Tr. of Beza's Serm. (1587,) p. 334.

To save ourselves, we were fain to take shelter in the corps de guard, till a lodging was provided for us. Brown's Travels, (1685,) p. 49.

Co'RPULENCE. } n. s. [corpulentia, Lat.]
Co'RPULENCY. }

1. Bulkiness of body; fleshiness; fulness of flesh.

To what a cumbersome unwieldiness,
And burdenous corpulence my love had grown.
Donne.

It is but one species of corpulency; for there may be bulk without fat, from the great quantity of muscular flesh, the case of robust people.
Arbuthnot on Aliments.

2. Spissitude; grossness of matter.

The musculous flesh serves for the vibration of the tail, the heaviness and corpulency of the water requiring a great force to divide it.
Ray on the Creation.

Co'RPULENT. adj. [corpulentus, Latin.] Fleshy; bulky; having great bodily bulk.

We say it is a fleshy stile, when there is much periphrases, and circuit of words; and when with more than enough, it grows fat and corpulent.
B. Jonson, Discoveries.

Excess of nourishment is hurtful; for it maketh the child corpulent, and growing in breadth rather than in height. Bacon.

CO'RPUSCLE. n. s. [corpusculum, Lat.] A small body; a particle of matter; an atom; a little fragment.

It will add much to our satisfaction, if those corpuscles can be discovered with microscopes. Newton, Opt.

Who knows what are the figures of the little corpuscles that compose and distinguish different bodies? Watts, Logick.

CORPU'SCULAR. } adj. [from corpuscu-
CORPUSCULA'RIAN. } lum, Lat.] Relating to bodies; comprising bodies. It is the distinguishing epithet of that philosophy which attempts the rational solution of all physical appearances by the action of one body upon another.

As to natural philosophy I do not expect to see any principles proposed, more comprehensive and intelligible than the corpuscularian or mechanical. Boyle.

The mechanical or corpuscular philosophy, though peradventure the oldest, as well as the best in the world, had lain buried for many ages in contempt and oblivion. Bentley, Serm. iv.

CORPUSCULA'RIAN.* n. s. [from the adj.] A corpuscularian philosopher.

This may be said, that the modern corpuscularians talk, in most things, more intelligibly than the peripateticks. Bentley.

He [Newton] seems to have made a greater progress, than all the sects of corpuscularians together had done before him. Bp. Berkeley, Siris, § 245.

CO'RRACLE.† See CORRICLE, Dr. Johnson says. But no such word is in his dictionary. It is perhaps intended for coracle, which was formerly written with the double r. "Corracle, a little round skiff of oziers, covered with raw hides." Sherwood. See CORACLE.

To CORRA'DE.† v. a. [corrado, Latin. This verb, though given by Dr. Johnson without any authority, and wearing the appearance of his own coinage, is of ancient date in our language, being in the vocabulary of Cockeram, and there defined "to rake, shave, or scrape."] To rub off; to wear away by frequent rubbing; to scrape together.

The covetous man's wealth, corraded by corruption, oppression, &c. gives it him content? Dr. R. Clarke's Serm. 1637, p. 480.

CORRADIA'TION.† n. s. [con and radius, Lat.] A conjunction of rays in one point.

The impression of colour worketh not but by a cone of direct beams, or right lines, whereof the basis is in the object, and the vertical point in the eye; so as there is a corradiation, and conjunction of beams. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

The conjunction and corradiation, in that place of heaven, of the sun with the four stars of the first magnitude. Bacon on the Union of England and Scotland.

To CORRE'CT. v. a. [corrigo, correctum, Latin.]

1. To punish; to chastise; to discipline.

Sad accidents, and a state of affliction, is a school of virtue; it corrects levity, and interrupts the confidence of sinning. Bp. Taylor.

After he has once been corrected for a lie, you must be sure never after to pardon it in him. Locke on Education.

Children being to be restrained by the parents only in vicious things, a look or nod only ought to correct them, when they do amiss. Locke on Education.

2. To amend; to take away faults, in writings, life, or things.

This is a defect in the first make of some men's minds, which can scarce ever be corrected afterwards, either by learning or age. Burnet, Theory, Pref.

Correcting Nature, from what actually she is in individuals, to what she ought to be, and what she was created. Dryden.

I writ, because it amused me; I corrected, because it was as pleasant to me to correct as to write. Pope, Pref.

The mind may cool, and be at leisure to attend to its domestick concern: to consider what habit wants to be corrected, and what inclination to be subdued. Rogers.

3. To obviate the qualities of one ingredient by another, or by any method of preparation.

O happy mixture wherein things contrary do so qualify and correct the one the danger of the other's excess, that neither boldness can make us presume as long as we are kept under with the sense of our own wretchedness, nor while we trust in the mercy of God through Christ Jesus, fear be able to tyrannize over us. Hooker.

As in habitual gout or stone,
The only thing that can be done,
Is to correct your drink and diet,
And keep the inward foe in quiet. Prior.

In cases of acidity, water is the proper drink: its quality of relaxing may be corrected by boiling it with some animal substances; as ivory or hartshorn. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

4. To remark faults.

CORRE'CT. adj. [correctus, Latin.] Revised or finished with exactness; free from faults.

What verse can do, he has perform'd in this,
Which he presumes the most correct of his. Dryden, Aur. Prol.

Always use the most correct editions: various readings will be only troublesome where the sense is complete. Felton.

CORRE'CTION. n. s. [from correct.]

1. Punishment; discipline; chastisement; penalty.

Wilt thou, pupil like,
Take thy correction mildly, kiss the rod? Shakspeare, Rich. II.

An offensive wife,
That hath enrag'd him on to offer strokes,
As he is striking, holds his infant up,
And hangs resolv'd correction in the arm
That was uprear'd to execution. Shaksp. Hen. IV.

We are all but children here under the great master of the family; and he is pleased, by hopes and fears, by mercies and corrections, to instruct us in virtue. Watts.

One fault was too great lenity to her servants, to whom she gave good counsel, but too gentle correction. Arbuthnot.

2. Alteration to a better state; the act of taking away faults; amendment.

Another poet in another age, may take the same liberty with my writings; if, at least, they live long enough to deserve correction. Dryden, Fab. Pref.

3. That which is substituted in the place of any thing wrong.

Corrections or improvements should be adjoined, by way of note or commentary, in their proper places. Watts.

4. Reprehension; animadversion.

They proceed with judgement and ingenuity, establishing their assertions not only with great solidity, but submitting them also unto the correction of future discovery. Brown.

5. Abatement of noxious qualities, by the addition of something contrary.

To make ambitious, wholesome, do not take
A dram of country's dulness; do not add
Corrections, but as chymists purge the bad. Donne.

CORRE'CTIONER. n. s. [from correction.] One that has been in the house of correction; a jail-bird. This seems to be the meaning in Shakspeare.

I will have you soundly swinged for this, you blue-bottle rogue! you filthy famished correctioner. Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

CORRE'CTIVE.† adj. [from correct.] Having the power to alter or obviate any bad qualities.

The law of nations alloweth, and ever hath done, masters over their servants not only a directive but a corrective and coactive power. Brerewood on the Sab. p. 14.

Have any of these — any corrective power of any one member of the house? Bp. Morton, Episc. Asserted, p. 137.

Mulberries are pectoral, corrective of bilious alcali. Arbuthnot.

2. Having the power to limit.

To prevent this folly, the Psalmist interposeth a caution in this corrective particle, "Yea, happy:" It hath the force of a revocation, whereby he seems to retract what went before, not simply and absolutely, but in a certain degree, lest worldly men should wrest it to a misinterpretation. Dr. Holdsworth's Serm. at Cambridge, 1642, p. 27.

CORRE'CTIVE. n. s.

1. That which has the power of altering or obviating any thing amiss.

The hair, wool, feathers, and scales, which all animals of prey do swallow, are a seasonable and necessary corrective to prevent their greediness from filling themselves with too succulent a food. Ray on the Creation.

Humanly speaking, and according to the method of the world, and the little correctives supplied by art and discipline, it seldom fails but an ill principle has its course, and nature makes good its blow. South, Sermons.

2. Limitation: restriction.

There seems to be such an instance in the regiment, which the human soul exerciseth in relation to the body, that with certain correctives and exceptions, may give some kind of explication or adumbration thereof. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

CORRE'CTLY. adv. [from correct.] Accurately; exactly; without faults.

There are ladies, without knowing what tenses and participles, adverbs and prepositions are, speak as properly and as correctly as most gentlemen who have have been bred up in the ordinary methods of grammar schools. Locke, on Education.

Such lays as neither ebb nor flow,
Correctly cold, and regularly low. Pope, Ess. on Criticism.

CORRE'CTNESS. n. s. [from correct.] Accuracy; exactness; freedom from faults.

Too much labour often takes away the spirit, by adding to the polishing; so that there remains nothing but a dull correctness, a piece without any considerable faults, but with few beauties. Dryden, Dufresnoy.

The softness of the flesh, the delicacy of the shape, air and posture, and the correctness of design in this statue, are inexpressible. Addison on Italy.

Late, very late, correctness grew our care,
When the tir'd nation breath'd from civil war. Pope.

Those pieces have never before been printed from the true copies, or with any tolerable degree of correctness. Swift.

CORRE'CTOR.† n. s. [from correct; and old Fr. correcteur. Our word is sometimes written corrector.]

1. One that amends, or alters, by punishment or animadversion.

Wherefore, said he to the corrector, until he utterly do cease of his presumption and obstinacy, look that thou still beat him.
Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 189. b.

How many does zeal urge rather to do justice on some sins, than to forbear all sin? How many rather to be correctors than practisers of religion.
Sprat, Sermons.

With all his faults he sets up to be an universal reformer and corrector of abuses, and a remover of grievances. Swift.

2. One that revises any thing to free it from faults; as the corrector of the press, that amends the errours committed in printing.

He is by country, an Englishman; by birth, a gentleman; by education, a scholar; afterwards, a corrector of the common law print, with M. Tottle the printer.
Proceedings against Garnet, 1606, sign. T. i. b.

I had been at Louvain and Antwerp to take some depositions for the discovering of the authours and correctors of that most pernicious libel, Corona Regia.
Trumbal to the Sec. of State, 1619, Cabal, p. 151.

Friar Manrique commandeth all that passage to be blotted out: But the Roman correctors clap this note upon the margin for an antidote.
Abp. Usher, Ans. to the Jesuit Malone, p. 77.

The compositors and correctors, of negligence, or set purpose, have altered many sentences, words, and letters, without reason or authority.
James on the Corruption of Scripture, &c. 1688, p. 523.

I remember a person, who, by his style and literature, seems to have been the corrector of a hedge press in Little Britain, proceeding gradually to an author. Swift.

3. In medicine.

Such an ingredient in a composition, as guards against or abates the force of another; as the lixivial salts prevent the grievous vellications of resinous purges, by dividing their particles, and preventing their adhesion to the intestinal membranes, and as spices and carminative seeds assist the operation of some catharticks, by dissipating wind. In making a medicine, such a thing is called a corrector which destroys or diminishes a quality that could not otherwise be dispensed with: thus turpentines are correctors of quicksilver, by destroying its fluxility, and making it capable of mixture. Quincy.

*CORRE'GIDOR. n. s. [Spanish; low Lat. corrigedarius, from corrigo.] A Spanish magistrate.

This noise was occasioned by the arrival of the corregidor, followed by two alguazils and a guard, who, without any ceremony, entered the room where we were. Smollett, Gil Blas.

To CO'RRELATE. v. n. [from con and relatus, Latin.] To have a reciprocal relation, as father and son.

CO'RRELATE. n. s. One that stands in the opposite relation.

It is one thing for a father to cease to be a father, by casting off his son; and another for him to cease to be so, by the death of his son: in this the relation is at an end, for want of a correlate.
South.

CORRE'LATIVE. adj. [con and relativus, Latin.] Having a reciprocal relation, so that the existence of one in a particular state depends upon the existence of another.

Father and son, husband and wife, and such other correlative terms, seem nearly to belong one to another. South.

Giving is a relative action, and so requires a correlative to answer it: giving, on one part, transfers no property, unless there be an accepting on the other. South.

CORRE'LATIVE.* n. s. [from the adj.] That which has a reciprocal relation.

By what ever method one man gains an estate, by that same method, or its correlative, another has lost it. Blackstone.

CORRE'LATIVENESS. n. s. [from correlative.] The state of being correlative.

CORRE'PTION.† n. s. [correptio, Latin.] Objurgation; chiding; reprehension; reproof.

That I use all mildness or mansuetude in admonishing; the angry passionate correption being rather apt to provoke, than to amend.
Hammond, of Fraternal Admon. or Corrept. § 15.

His charity of fraternal correption having only this caution or restraint, the hearer's interest.
Fell, Life of Hammond, § 2.

If we must be talking of other people's faults, let it not be to defame, but to amend them, by converting our detraction into admonition and fraternal correption. Gov. of the Tongue.

To CORRESPO'ND.† v. n. [Fr. correspondre, from con and respondeo, Latin.]

1. To suit; to answer; to be proportionate; to be adequate to; to be adapted to; to fit.

The days, if one be compared with another successively throughout the year, are found not to be equal, and will not justly correspond with any artificial or mechanical equal measures of time. Holder on Time.

Words being but empty sounds, any farther than they are signs of our ideas, we cannot but assent to them, as they correspond to those ideas we have, but no farther than that. Locke.

2. To keep up commerce with another by alternate letters.

CORRESPO'NDENCE.† } n. s. [old Fr. cor-
CORRESPO'NDENCY. } respondance.]

1. Relation; reciprocal adaptation of one thing to another.

Between the law of their heavenly operations, and the actions of men in this our state of mortality, such correspondence there is as maketh it expedient to know in some sort the one, for the others more perfect direction. Hooker, b. i.

Whatever we fancy, things keep their course; and their habitudes, correspondencies, and relations keep the same to one another. Locke.

2. Intercourse; reciprocal intelligence.

I had discovered those unlawful correspondencies they had used, and engagements they had made to embroil my kingdoms. K. Charles.

Sure the villains hold a correspondence
With the enemy, and thus they would betray us.
Denham.

It happens very oddly, that the pope and I should have the same thought much about the same time: my enemies will be apt to say, that we hold a correspondence together, and act by concert in this matter. Addison, Guard. No. 116.

3. Friendship; interchange of offices or civilities.

Let such military persons be assured, and well reputed of, rather than factious and popular; holding also good correspondence with the other great men in the state. Bacon, Ess. 17.

CORRESPO'NDENT.† adj. [Fr. correspondant.] Suitable; adapted; agreeable; answerable.

What good or evil is there under the sun, what action correspondent or repugnant unto the law which God hath imposed upon his creatures, but in or upon it God doth work, according to the law which himself hath eternally purposed to keep.
Hooker.

And as five zones th' etherial regions bind,
Five correspondent are to earth assign'd.
Dryden, Ovid.

CORRESPO'NDENT. n. s. One with whom intelligence or commerce is kept up by mutual messages or letters.

He was pleased to command me to send to him, and receive from him all his letters from and to all his correspondents at home and abroad.
Denham, Dedication.

CORRESPO'NDENTLY.* adv. [from correspondent.] In an according manner.

He terms the episcopal power of excommunication, the apostolical rod; and correspondently he calls Damasus, a bishop, his shepherd; and himself, a presbyter, his sheep.
Bp. Morton, Episc. Asserted, p. 28.

CORRESPO'NSIVE. adj. [from correspond.] Answerable; adapted to any thing.

Priam's six gates i' the city, with massy staples,
And corresponsive and fulfilling bolts,
Sperre up the sons of Troy. Shaks. Troil. and Cr.

CO'RRIDOR. n. s. [French.]

1. [In fortification.] The covert way lying round the whole compass of the fortifications of a place.

2. [In architecture.] A gallery or long isle round about a building, leading to several chambers at a distance from each other. Harris.

There is something very noble in the amphitheatre, though the high wall and corridors that went round it are almost intirely ruined.
Addison on Italy.

CO'RRIGIBLE.† adj. [Fr. corrigible, from corrigo, Latin.]

1. Capable of being altered or amended.

A satire should expose nothing but what is corrigible. Addison, Spect. No. 209.

2. Deserving of punishment; punishable.

He was taken up very short, and adjudged corrigible for such presumptous language.
Howell, Vocal Forest.

3. Corrective; having the power to correct. Not proper, nor used, Dr. Johnson says, citing only Shakspeare. It may not be proper, but it is certainly used.

Our bodies are our gardens, to the which our wills are gardeners: so that, if we will either have it steril with idleness, or manured with industry, the power and corrigible authority of this lies in our will. Shakspeare, Othello.

Do I not bear a reasonable corrigible hand over him, Crispinus? B. Jonson, Poetaster.

CORRI'VAL.† n. s. [con and rival.] Rival; competitor.

They had governours commonly out of the two families of the Geraldines and Butlers, both adversaries and corrivals one against the other.
Spenser on Ireland.

He that doth redeem her thence, might wear
Without corrival all her dignities. Shak. Hen. IV.

Others both just and wise, and Solomon among the rest, if they may not hate and forsake as Moses enjoins, and the gospel imports, will find it impossible not to love otherwise than will sort with the love of God, whose jealousy brooks no corrival.
Milton, Doctrines and Discipline of Divorce.

CORRI'VAL.* adj. Contending.

Not thinking, perhaps, that this would be to erect a power equal and corrival with that of God.
Bp. Fleetwood, Ess. on Miracles.

To CORRI'VAL.* v. n. [from the noun.] To vie with.

A Starre which to the night no service lends,
Nor on the ever-changing Moone attends:
But with the Sunne corrivalling in light,
Shines more by day than other stars by night.
Fitz-geffry, Blessed Birthday, p. 46.

CORRIVA'LITY.* n.s. [from corrival.] Competition; corrivalry.

That very Roman government, which they honoured in a corrivalty and opposition to Christ, shall revenge the quarrel of Christ in the utter subversion of these unthankful rebels.
Bp. Hall, Christ and Cæsar.

CORRI'VALRY.† n.s. [from corrival.] Competition; opposition.

To reproach the Roman church for this idolatrous corrivalry, or rather prelation, of the Virgin in religious worship before Christ.
More, Expos. of the Seven Churches, (1669,) Pref.

CORRI'VALSHIP.* n.s. [from corrival.] Opposition; rivalry.

By the corrivalship of Shagad his false friend, Rustan was destroyed. Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 149.

Corrivations of waters to moisten and refresh barren grounds. Burton, Anat. of Mel. To the Read.

All common highways, bridges, banks, corrivations of waters, aqueducts. Ibid.

CORRO'BORANT. adj. [from corroborate.] Having the power to give strength.

There be divers sorts of bracelets fit to comfort the spirits, and they be of three intentions, refrigerant, corroborant, and aperient.
Bacon, Nat. Hist.

To CORRO'BORATE. v.a. [corroboro, Latin.]

1. To confirm; to establish.

Machiavel well noteth, though in an ill-favoured instance, there is no trusting to the force of nature, nor to the bravery of words, except it be corroborate by custom. Bacon.

2. To strengthen; to make strong.

To fortify imagination there be three ways; the authority whence the belief is derived, means to quicken and corroborate the imagination, and means to repeat it and refresh it. Bacon.

It was said that the prince himself had, by the sight of foreign courts, and observations on the different natures of people, and rules of government, much excited and awaked his spirits, and corroborated his judgement. Wotton.

As any limb well and duly exercised grows stronger, the nerves of the body are corroborated thereby. Watts.

CORRO'BORATE.* adj. [Lat. corroboratus.] Strengthened; confirmed; established.

There is no trusting to the force of nature, nor to the bravery of words; except it be corroborate by custom. Bacon, Ess. 39.

Wheresoever kingdoms and states have been united, and that union corroborate by the bond of mutual naturalization, you shall never observe them afterwards — to break and sever again.
Bacon, Speech on the Nat. of the Scot. Nation.

CORROBORA'TION.† n.s. [from corroborate.] The act of strengthening or confirming; confirmation by some additional security; addition of strength.

The most renowned doctors of Christ's religion, in the corroboration of their arguments and sentences, do allege the same histories.
Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 205. b.

The lady herself procured a bull, for the better corroboration of the marriage. Bacon, Hen. VII.

Something also the bishop of Durham noted, out of the Gospel of St. Matthew, for the imposition of hands upon children. The conclusion was, for the fuller explanation, (that we make it not a sacrament, or a corroboration to a former sacrament,) that it should be considered of by their lordships, whether it might not, without alteration, (whereof his Majestie was still very wary,) be intituled an Examination with a Confirmation.
Hampton Court Conference, (1603,) p. 11.

CORRO'BORATIVE.† n.s. [from corroborate.] That increases strength.

Like an apothecary's shop, wherein are remedies — alteratives, corroboratives, lenitives, &c.
Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 279.

In the cure of an ulcer, with a moist intemperies, as the heart is weakened by too much humidity, you are to mix corroboratives of an astringent faculty; and the ulcer also requireth to be dried.
Wiseman, Surgery.

CORRO'BORATIVE.* adj. Having the power of confirming or establishing.

If you think there be any thing explanatory or corroborative of what I say in the beginning of my book, be so good to transcribe those passages for me. Warburton to Hurd, L. 17.

To CORRO'DE. v.a. [corrodo, Lat.] To eat away by degrees, as a menstruum; to prey upon; to consume; to wear away gradually.

Statesmen purge vice with vice, and may corrode
The bad with bad, a spider with a toad;
For so ill thralls not them, but they tame ill,
And make her do much good against her will.
Donne.

We know that aqua-fortis corroding copper, which is it that gives the colour to verdigreas, is wont to reduce it to a green blue solution.
Boyle on Colours.

The nature of mankind, left to itself, would soon have fallen into dissolution, without the incessant and corroding invasions of so long time.
Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

Hannibal the Pyreneans past,
And steepy Alps, the mounds that nature cast,
And with corroding juices as he went,
A passage through the living rock he rent.
Dryden, Juv.

Fishes, which neither chew their meat nor grind it in their stomachs, do, by a dissolvent liquor there provided, corrode and reduce it into a chylus.
Ray on the Creation.

The blood turning acrimonious, corrodes the vessels, producing almost all the diseases of the inflammatory kind. Arbuthnot.

Should jealousy its venom once diffuse,
Corroding every thought, and blasting all
Love's paradise. Thomson, Spring.

CORRO'DENT. adj. [from corrode.] Having the power of corroding or wasting any thing away.

CORRO'DENT.* n.s. That which eats away, or preys upon.

The physick of that good Samaritan in the Gospel, wherein there was a corrodent and a lenient, compunction and consolation.
Bp. of London's Vine Palatine, (1614,) p. 17.

To CORRO'DIATE.* v.a. [from corrode.] To eat away by degrees, as a menstruum.

Styx is a fountain of Arcadia, whose waters are so deadly, that they presently kill whatsoever drinks thereof; so corrodiating that they can only be contained in the hoof of a mule.
Sandys, Christ's Pass. Notes, p. 95.

CORRODIBI'LITY. n.s. [from corrodible.] The quality of being corrosible; possibility to be consumed by a menstruum.

CORRO'DIBLE. adj. [from corrode.] Possible to be consumed or corroded.

Metals, although corrodible by waters, yet will not suffer a liquation from the powerfullest heat communicable unto that element. Brown, Vulg. Er.

CO'RRODY. n.s. [from corrodo, Lat.] A defalcation from an allowance or salary for some other than the original purpose.

Besides these floating burgesses of the ocean, there are certain flying citizens of the air, which prescribe for a corrody therein. Carew.

In those days even noble persons, and other meaner men, ordered corrodies and pensions to their chaplains and servants out of churches.
Ayliffe, Parergon.

CORRO'SIBLE. adj. [from corrode.] Possible to be consumed by a menstruum. This ought to be corrodible.

CORRO'SIBLENESS. n.s. [from corrosible.] Susceptibility of corrosion, rather corrodibility. Dict.

CORRO'SION.† n.s. [corrosion, Fr.] The power of eating or wearing away by degrees.

Corrosion is a particular species of dissolution of bodies, either by an acid, or a saline menstruum. It is almost wholly designed for the resolution of bodies most strongly compacted, as bones and metals; so that the menstruums here employed, have a considerable moment or force. These liquors, whether acid or urinous, are nothing but salts dissolved in a little phlegm; therefore these being solid, and consequently containing a considerable quantity of matter, do both attract one another more, and are also more attracted by the particles of the body to be dissolved; so when the more solid bodies are put into saline menstruums, the attraction is stronger than in other solutions; and the motion, which is always proportional to the attraction, is more violent: so that we may easily conceive, when the motion is in such a manner increased, it should drive the salts into the pores of the bodies, and open and loosen their cohesion, though ever so firm. Quincy.

A kind of poison worketh either by corrosion, or by a secret malignity and enmity to nature.
Bacon, Nat. Hist.

That corrosion and dissolution of bodies, even the most solid and durable, which is vulgarly ascribed to the air, is caused merely by the action of water upon them; the air being so far from injuring and preying upon the bodies it environs, that it contributes to their security and preservation. Woodward.

CORRO'SIVE.† adj. [old Fr. corrosif, from corrodo, Lat. It was anciently pronounced with the accent on the first syllable, now indifferently.]

1. Having the power of consuming or wearing away.

The soft delicious air,
To heal the scar of these corrosive fires,
Shall breathe her balm. Milton, P.L. ii. 401.

Gold, after it has been divided by corrosive liquors into invisible parts, yet may presently be precipitated, so as to appear again in its own form.
Grew, Cosmol. Sacra.

The sacred sons of vengeance, on whose course
Corrosive famine waits, and kills the year.
Thomson, Spring.

2. Having the quality to fret or vex.

CORRO'SIVE.† n.s. [This substantive was sometimes written corsive; probably from the circumstance of the accent being then on the first syllable, which thus easily abbreviated the word.]

1. That which has the quality of wasting any thing away, as the flesh of an ulcer.

He meant his corrosives to apply,
And with strict diet tame his stubborn malady.
Spenser, F. Q.

2. That which has the power of fretting, or of giving pain.

And that same bitter cor'sive, which did eat
His tender heart. Spenser, F. Q. iv. ix. 14.

It was a wonderful corsive to her noble heart.
Tr. of Boccace's Fiametta, 1587.

Such speeches savour not of God in him that useth them, and unto virtuously disposed minds they are grievous corrosives. Hooker.

Away; though parting be a fretful corrosive,
It is applied to a deathful wound. Shaksp. Hen. VI.

Care is no cure, but rather corrosive,
For things that are not to be remedied.
Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

To CO'RROSIVE.* v. a. To eat away, like a corrosive; used also figuratively.

The peril that arises to the heart from passion is the fixedness of it, when, like a corrosiving plaister, it eats into the sore. Bp. Hall, Contempl. B. 4.

We'll — bawle our parts,
Till yerksome noise have cloy'd your cares,
And corrosiv'd your hearts. Webster, D. of Malfy.

Let us take off the proud flesh with the corrosiving denunciations of vengeance to the impenitent sinners. Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 79.

CORRO'SIVELY. adv. [from corrosive.]

1. Like a corrosive.

At first it tasted somewhat corrosively.
Boyle on Saltpetre.

2. With the power of corrosion.

CORRO'SIVENESS. n. s. [from corrosive.] The quality of corroding or eating away; acrimony.

We do infuse, to what he meant for meat,
Corrosiveness, or intense cold or heat.
Donne, Poems, p. 158.

Saltpetre betrays upon the tongue no heat nor corrosiveness at all, but coldness, mixt with a somewhat languid relish retaining to bitterness. Boyle.

CO'RRUGANT. adj. [from corrugate.] Having the power of contracting into wrinkles.

To CO'RRUGATE.† v. a. [corrugo, Lat.] To wrinkle or purse up; as the skin is drawn into wrinkles by cold, or any other cause. Quincy.

The cramp cometh of contraction of sinews: it cometh either by cold or dryness; for cold and dryness do both of them contract and corrugate.
Bacon, Nat. Hist.

The tenuous bone that makes the palate, is an arched roof, covered over with a nervous skin, corrugated with several asperities, for the better retaining and rebounding the air in the voice.
Smith's Portraiture of Old Age, p. 138.

CO'RRUGATE.* adj. [from the verb.] Contracted.

Extended views a narrow mind extend;
Push out its corrugate, expansive make.
Young, Night Th. 9.

CORRUGA'TION. n. s. [from corrugate.] Contraction into wrinkles.

The pain of the solid parts is the corrugation or violent agitation of fibres, when the spirits are irritated by sharp humours.
Floyer on the Humours.

CORRU'GENT *Muscle. A muscle of the eye called also corrugator supercilii. Chambers. It may be curious to add, that the verb corruge, to wrinkle, is in the old vocabulary of Cockeram.

To CORRU'PT.† v. a. [corrupter, violer, deflorer, old Fr. corrumpo, corruptus, Lat.]

1. To turn from a sound to a putrescent state; to infect.

2. To deprave; to destroy integrity; to vitiate; to bribe.

I fear lest by any means, as the serpent beguiled Eve through his subtilty, so your minds should be corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ. 2 Cor. xi. 3.

Evil communications corrupt good manners.
1 Cor. xv. 33.

All that have miscarried
By underhand, corrupted, foul injustice.
Shakspeare, Rich. III.

I have heard it said, the fittest time to corrupt a man's wife, is when she's fallen out with her husband. Shakspeare, Coriol.

But stay, I smell a man of middle earth:
With trial fire touch me his finger-end;
If he be chaste, the flame will back descend,
And turn him to no pain; but if he start,
It is the flesh of a corrupted heart.
Shaksp. M. W. of Wind.

Language being the conduit whereby men convey their knowledge, he that makes an ill use of it, though he does not corrupt the fountains of knowledge, which are in things, yet he stops the pipes. Locke.

Hear the black trumpet through the world proclaim,
That not to be corrupted is the shame. Pope.

3. To spoil; to do mischief.

To CORRU'PT. v. n. To become putrid; to grow rotten; to putrefy; to lose purity.

The aptness or propension of air or water to corrupt or putrefy, no doubt, is to be found before it break forth into manifest effects of diseases, blasting, or the like. Bacon.

CORRU'PT. adj. [from corrupt.]

1. Spoiled; tainted; vitiated in its qualities.

Coarse hoary moulded bread the soldiers thrust upon the points of their spears, railing against Ferdinand, who with such corrupt and pestilent bread would feed them. Knolles.

2. Unsound; putrid.

As superfluous flesh did rot,
Amendment ready still at hand did wait,
To pluck it out with pincers fiery hot,
That soon in him was left no corrupt jot. Spenser.

3. Vitious; tainted with wickedness; without integrity.

Let no corrupt communication proceed out of your mouth, but that which is good to the use of edifying. Eph. iv. 29.

Corrupt, corrupt, and tainted in desire. Shaksp.

These kind of knaves I know, which in this plainness
Harbour more craft, and more corrupter ends,
Than twenty silky ducking observants.
Shaksp. K. Lear.

Some, who have been corrupt in their morals, have yet been infinitely solicitous to have their children piously brought up. South, Serm.

CORRU'PTER. n. s. [from corrupt.] One that taints or vitiates; one that lessens purity or integrity.

Away, away, corrupters of my faith. Shaksp.

From the vanity of the Greeks, the corrupters of all truth, who, without all ground of certainty, vaunt their antiquity, came the errour first of all.
Ralegh, Hist. of the World.

Those great corrupters of Christianity, and indeed of natural religion, the Jesuits. Addison.

CORRU'PTFUL.* adj. [from corrupt and full.] Some editions read, without authority, and contrary to the sense, in the passage which I cite from Spenser, corrupted.] Corrupting.

For she by force is still fro me detayned,
And with corruptfull brybes is to untruth mistrayned. Spenser, F. Q. v. xi. 54.

CORRUPTIBI'LITY.† n. s. [from corruptible.] Possibility to be corrupted.

That the frequency of elections proposed by this bill has a tendency to increase the power and consideration of the electors, not to lessen corruptibility, that I do most readily allow.
Burke, on the Duration of Parliaments.

CORRU'PTIBLE.† adj. [old Fr. corruptible.]

1. Susceptible of destruction by natural decay, or without violence.

Our corruptible bodies could never live the life they shall live, were it not that they are joined with his body, which is incorruptible, and that his is in ours as a cause of immortality. Hooker.

It is a devouring corruption of the essential mixture, which consisting chiefly of an oily moisture, is corruptible through dissipation.
Harvey on Consump.

The several parts of which the world consists, being in their nature corruptible, it is more than probable, that, in an infinite duration, this frame of things would long since have been dissolved.
Tillotson.

2. Susceptible of external depravation; possible to be tainted or vitiated.

CORRU'PTIBLENESS. n. s. [from corruptible.] Susceptibility of corruption.

CORRU'PTIBLY. adv. [from corruptible.] In such a manner as to be corrupted, or vitiated.

It is too late; the life of all his blood
Is touch'd corruptibly. Shaksp. K. Lear.

CORRU'PTING.* n. s. [from corrupt.] The act of vitiating, or destroying integrity.

Besides their innumerable corruptings of the Fathers' writings, their thrusting in that which was spurious, and, like Pharaoh, killing the legitimate sons of Israel.
Bp. Taylor, Diss. from Popery, ch. 1.

CORRU'PTION. n. s. [corruptio, Lat.]

1. The principle by which bodies tend to the separation of their parts.

2. Wickedness; perversion of principles; loss of integrity.

Precepts of morality, besides the natural corruption of our tempers, which makes us averse to them, are so abstracted from ideas of sense, that they seldom get an opportunity for descriptions and images. Addison on the Georgicks.

Amidst corruption, luxury and rage,
Still leave some ancient virtues to our age. Pope.

3. Putrescence.

The wise contriver, on his end intent,
Careful this fatal errour to prevent,
And keep the waters from corruption free,
Mix'd them with salt, and season'd all the sea.
Blackmore.

4. Matter or pus in a sore.

5. The tendency to a worse state.

After my death I wish no other herald,
No other speaker of my living actions,
To keep mine honour from corruption,
But such an honest chronicler as Griffith.
Shakspeare, Hen. VIII.

6. Cause, or means of depravation.

The region hath by conquest, and corruption of other languages, received new and different names. Ralegh, Hist.

All those four kinds of corruption are very common in their language; for which reasons the Greek tongue is become much altered.
Brerewood on Languages.

7. [In law.] An infection growing to a man attainted of felony, or treason, and to his issue: for as he loseth all to the prince, or other lord of the fee, so his issue cannot be heir to him, or to any other ancestor, of whom they might have claimed by him; and if he were noble, or a gentleman, he and his children are made ignoble and ungentle, in respect of the father. Cowel.

CORRU'PTIVE. adj. [from corrupt.] Having the quality of tainting or vitiating.

Carrying a settled habitude unto the corruptive originals. Brown, Vulg. Err.

It should be endued with an acid ferment, or some corruptive quality, for so speedy a dissolution of the meat and preparation of the chyle. Ray on the Creation.

CORRU'PTLESS. adj. [from corrupt.] Insusceptible of corruption; undecaying.

All around
The borders, with corruptless myrrh are crown'd. Dryden.

CORRU'PTLY. adv. [from corrupt.]

1. With corruption; with taint; with vice; without integrity.

O, that estates, degrees, and offices,
Were not deriv'd corruptly, that clear honour
Were purchas'd by the merit of the wearer. Shakspeare.

We have dealt very corruptly against thee, and have not kept the commandments. Nehemiah, i. 7.

2. Vitiously; improperly; contrary to purity.

We have corruptly contracted most names, both of men and places. Camden, Rem.

CORRU'PTNESS. n. s. [from corrupt.] The quality of corruption; putrescence; vice.

CORRU'PTNESS.* n. s. [old Fr. corruptrice.] She that misleads or corrupts others. Cotgrave, and Sherwood.

Peace, thou rude bawd!
Thou studied old corruptress, tye thy tongue up. Beaum. and Fl. Wife for a Month.

CO'RSAIR.† n. s. [French, from the Ital. corsare, of corso or à cursibus, by reason of their excursions.]

1. A pirate; one who professes to scour the sea, and seize merchants.

They are much infested by corsaires, or free-booters, under the colours of Leghorn, Malta, &c. Ricaut, State of the Greek Ch. p. 356.

2. The vessel of a corsair; as, a Barbary corsair; an Algerine corsair.

CORSE.† n. s. [old Fr. cors, corse, a body.]

1. A body. Not in use.

For he was strong, and of so mighty corse,
As ever wielded spear in warlike hand. Spenser, F. Q.

2. A dead body; a carcass; a poetical word.

That from her body, full of filthy sin,
He reft her hateful head, without remorse;
A stream of coal-black-blood forth gushed from her corse. Spenser, F. Q.

Set down the corse; or, by saint Paul,
I'll make a corse of him that disobeys. Shaksp. Rich. III.

What may this mean?
That thou, dead corse, again, in complete steel,
Revisit'st thus the glympses of the moon,
Making night hideous. Shaksp. Hamlet.

Here lay him down, my friends,
Full in my sight, that I may view at leisure
The bloody corse, and count those glorious wounds. Addison.

CORSE-PRESENT.* n. s. A funeral present; a mortuary.

It was anciently usual in this kingdom to bring the mortuary to church along with the corpse, when it came to be buried; and thence it is sometimes called a corse-present. Blackstone.

CO'RSELET. n. s. [corselet, Fr.] A light armour for the forepart of the body.

Some shirts of maile, some coats of plate put on,
Some don'd a cuirace, some a corslet bright. Fairfax.

They lash, they foin, they pass, they strive to bore
Their corslets, and their thinnest parts explore. Dryden.

But heroes, who o'ercome or die,
Have their hearts hung extremely high;
The strings of which, in battle's heat,
Against their very cors'lets beat. Prior.

To CO'RSELET, or CO'RSLET.* v. a. [from the noun.] To encircle, as with a corslet.

Her arms,
Able to lock Jove from a synod, shall
By warranting moon-light corslet thee. Beaum. and Fl. Two Noble Kinsmen.

*CORSE'T. [Fr.] n. s. [A pair of boddice for a woman. The word is still in use. Cotgrave.

*CORTE'GE. n. s. [French; perhaps from cortice, the ablative of cortex.] A train of attendants as, "a cortege of coaches." Wiquefort's Ambass. p. 180.

*CO'RTES. n. s. [Spanish.] The states assembled in Madrid.

The following accounts, though short and imperfect, yet are sufficient to satisfy any person of the ancient Spanish cortes having been the same with the English parliament, and with the assembly of the states in France. Geddes, View of the Cortes, Tracts, (1730,) i. 318.

CO'RTEX.* n. s. [Lat.] Bark; cover.

Which seeds by the help of microscopes are all found to be real and perfect plants, with leaves and trunk curiously folded up and enclosed in the cortex. Bentley, Serm. IV.

CO'RTICAL. adj. [cortex, bark, Lat.] Barky; belonging to the outer part; belonging to the rind; outward.

Their last extremities form a little gland, (all these little glands together make the cortical part of the brain) terminating in two little vessels. Cheyn. Phil. Prin.

CO'RTICATED. adj. [from corticatus, Lat.] Resembling the bark of a tree.

This animal is a kind of lizard, a quadruped corticated and depilous; that is, without wool, fur, or hair. Brown.

CO'RTICOSE. adj. [from corticosus, Lat.] Full of bark. Dict.

CORVE'TTE.* n. s. [French.] An advice-boat; a packet-boat.

He desired me to write concerning a corvette, as he called it, of Calais, which hath been taken by the English. Sidney, State-Papers, Lett. dat. 1636, vol. ii. 436.

CORVE'TTO. n. s. The curvet.

You must draw the horse in his career with his manage, and turn, doing the corvetto and leaping. Peacham on Drawing.

CORU'SCANT.† adj. [corusco, Lat.] Glittering by flashes; flashing.

Let others glory in their triumphs and trophies, in their obnubilation of bodies coruscant, &c. Waterhouse's Apol. for Learn. 1653, p. 175.

His praises are like those coruscant beams,
Which Phœbus on high rocks of crystal streams. Howell, Lett. iv. 49.

To CORU'SCATE.* v. n. [Lat. coruſco.] To glitter.

As flaming fire was more coruscating and enlightening than any other matter, they invented lamps to hang in the sepulchres of the rich, which would burn perpetually. Greenhill, Art of Embalming, p. 331.

CORU'SCATION. n. s. [coruscatio, Latin.] Flash; quick vibration of light.

We see that lightnings and coruscations, which are near at hand, yield no sound. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

We may learn that sulphureous steams abound in the bowels of the earth, and ferment with minerals, and sometimes take fire with a sudden coruscation and explosion. Newton, Opt.

How heat and moisture mingle in a mass,
Or belch in thunder, or in lightning blaze;
Why nimble coruscations strike the eye,
And bold tornadoes bluster in the sky. Garth, Dispens.

CORYBA'NTICK.* adj. [from Corybantes, the frantick priests of Cybele. The Greeks have adopted κορυβαντειν, and the French Corybanter, to denote the action of a mad enthusiast.] Madly agitated or inflamed.

True divine zeal is no corybantick fury, but a calm and regular heat, guided and managed by light and prudence. Cudworth, Serm. p. 92.

When the evil spirit moves them to resist and overthrow, how full are they of the highest corybantick fury! Puller, Moderat. of the Ch. of Eng. p. 7.

CORY'MBIATED. adj. [corymbus, Lat.] Garnished with branches of berries. Dict.

CORYMBI'FEROUS. adj. [corymbus and fero, Lat.] Bearing fruit or berries in bunches.

Corymbiferous plants are distinguished into such as have a radiate flower, as the sun-flower; and such as have a naked flower, as the hemp-agrimony, and mugwort: to which are added those a-kin hereunto, such as scabious, teasel, thistle, and the like. Quincy.

CORY'MBUS. n. s. [Latin.]

Among the ancient botanists it was used to express the bunches or clusters of berries of ivy: amongst modern botanists it is used for a compounded discous flower, whose seeds are not pappous, or do not fly away in down; such are the flowers of daisies, and common marygold. Quincy.

CORYPHE'US.* n. s. [Lat. from the Gr. κορυφη, the top of the head. Fr. coryphée.] The principal of those who composed the chorus in the ancient tragedy; and the speaker for them. Hence the word has passed, in several languages, into a general name for a chief or principal of any company; and accordingly our language, nearly two centuries since, had "corypheus, or prime man." See Sherwood's Fr. and Eng. Dict. 1632. It is now sometimes applied to the leader or director of a band of musick.

That noted corypheus (Dr. John Owen) of the Independent faction. South, Serm. v. 49.

COSCI'NOMANCY. n. s. [from κοσκινον, a sieve, and μαντεια, divination.] The art of divination by means of a sieve. A very ancient practice mentioned by Theocritus, and still used in some parts of England, to find out persons unknown.

Chambers.

COSE'CANT. n. s. [In geometry.] The secant of an arch, which is the complement of another to ninety degrees.
Harris.

To CO'SEN.* See To COZEN.

CO'SHERING. n. s. [Irish.]
Cosherings were visitations and progresses made by the lord and his followers among his tenants; wherein he did eat them (as the English proverb is) out of house and home. Davies.

CO'SIER.† n. s. [cousu, old Fr. from coudre, to sew.] A botcher; a tailor; or, according to Minsheu, a cobler.
Do you make an alehouse of my lady's house, that ye squeak out your cosiers' catches, without any mitigation or remorse of voice?
Shakspeare, Twelfth Night.

COSIGNI'FICATIVE.* adj. [con and significative.] Having the same signification.
Cockeram.

CO'SINE. n. s. [In geometry.] The right sine of an arch, which is the complement of another to ninety degrees. Harris.

COSME'TICK.* n. s. [Fr. cosmetique, Gr. κοσμητικὸς, from κοσμέω, to adorn. The word is of no great age either in our own or the Fr. language. In the Fop's Dictionary of 1690, Cosmeticks are explained, as if the word was then not generally intelligible.] A preparation for improving beauty.
No better cosmeticks than a severe temperance and purity, modesty and humility, a gracious temper and calmness of spirit; no true beauty without the signatures of these graces in the very countenance. Ray on the Creation.
Next, rose-cheek'd majesty, beyond compare
The best cosmetick of the virgin's face.
Edwards, Can. of Crit. Sonn. 36.

COSME'TICK.† adj. Having the power of improving beauty; beautifying.
First, rob'd in white, the nymph intent adores,
With head uncover'd the cosmetick powers. Pope.
He [Plot] seems to be most happily employed, when he is learnedly debating on tautological echoes, fanciful petrifactions, subterraneous snails, undescribed thunderbolts, cosmetick clay, the altitude of giants, uncommonly prolifick cases of Oxfordshire women and cows, pregnancies of extraordinary duration, children crying in the womb yet portending no misfortune, prophetick dreams, knockings before death, capricious devils, amulets against witchcraft, stags without antlers, and rams with six horns. Warton, Hist. of Killington, Pref.

CO'SMICAL. adj. [κόσμος.]
1. Relating to the world.
2. Rising or setting with the sun; not acronychal.
The cosmical ascension of a star we term that, when it ariseth together with the sun, or in the same degree of the ecliptick wherein the sun abideth. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CO'SMICALLY. adv. [from cosmical.] With the sun; not acronychally.
From the rising of this star, not cosmically, that is, with the sun, but heliacally; that is, its emersion from the rays of the sun, the ancients computed their canicular days. Brown.

COSMO'GONIST.* n. s. [from cosmogony.] He who describes the creation of the world.
The relation seems in some measure to have been approved by the sacred cosmogonist himself; who in entering upon the important transaction of creation, or a universe rising into being at the efficacious fiat of its Maker, gives us his first general picture of it, under the two comprehensive distinctions of heaven and earth.
Coventry, Phil. to Hyd. Conv. 3.

COSMO'GONY.† n. s. [κόσμος and γόνη.] The rise or birth of the world; the creation.
There are some bad books in that language [the Greek] relating to cosmogonies, and amongst them a little piece of Ocellus Lucanus.
The Student, ii. 380.
The world is in its dotage, and yet the cosmogony or creation of the world has puzzled philosophers of all ages. Goldsmith, Vicar of Wakefield, ch. 14.

COSMO'GRAPHER. n. s. [κόσμος and γράφω.] One who writes a description of the world; distinct from geographer, who describes the situation of particular countries.
The ancient cosmographers do place the division of the East and Western hemisphere; that is, the first term of longitude in the Canary or Fortunate Islands, conceiving these parts the extremest habitations westward. Brown, Vulg. Err.

COSMOGRA'PHICAL.† adj. [from cosmography.] Relating to the general description of the world.
An old cosmographical poet.
Selden, on Drayton's Polyolb. Pref.

COSMOGRA'PHICALLY. adv. [from cosmographical.] In a manner relating to the science by which the structure of the world is discovered and described.
The terrella, or spherical magnet, cosmographically set out with circles of the globe.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

COSMO'GRAPHY.† n. s. [κόσμος and γράφω.] The science of the general system or affections of the world, distinct from geography, which delivers the situation and boundaries of particular countries.
I never travelled but in map or card, in which mine unconfined thoughts have freely expatiated, as having ever been especially delighted with the study of cosmography.
Burton, Anat. of Mel. To the Reader.
Here it might see the world without travel; it being a lesser scheme of the creation, nature contracted, a little cosmography, or map of the universe. South.

COSMOPLA'STICK.* adj. [κόσμος, the world, and πλαστικὸς, plastick.] Respecting the formation of the world.
The opinion of Seneca signifies little in this case, he being no better than a cosmoplastick athiest, i. e. he made a certain plastick or spermatick nature, devoid of all animality or conscious intellectuality, to be the highest principle in the universe.
Hallywell, Melampr. (1681,) p. 84.

COSMOPO'LITAN.† } n. s. [κόσμος and πολίτης,
COSMO'POLITE. } Fr. cosmopolitain.] A citizen of the world; one who is at home in every place.
I came tumbling out into the world a pure cadet, a true cosmopolite; not born to land, lease, house, or office. Howell, Lett. i. vi. 60.
Thus God and Nature taught their rude cosmopolite. More, Song of the Soul, i. i. 122.

CO'SSACKS.* n. s. [the etymology of the word has given rise to various opinions. Some consider it as derived from the Polish kosa, or cosa, a goat; these persons imitating the agility as well as the wandering life of the animal. Others refer it to the Tartar language. "C'est à la langue Tartare qu'appartient le mot kosaque. Il signifie un guerrier armé à la legere." Hist. de la Russie par M. L'Eveque, tom. iv. p. 403. Others, to Chazakia, or the land of the chazaks, which formed a part of what is now Circassia, properly so called. Peysonnel, Observ. sur les Peup. Barb. p. 125.] A people now inhabiting the Ukraine; and in military history, a body of soldiers serving under the Russian government, to which they belong; who have indeed often distinguished themselves, but never with so much valour and success as in contributing to the late overthrow of the most gigantick tyranny that ever trampled upon society, and disgraced human nature.
This upstart, strengthened with many Poles and Cossacks, appears in arms to claim his right out of the hands of Boris. Milton, Hist. of Moscovia.

CO'SSET.† n. s. [Ital. cassiccio, from casa, the house.] A lamb brought up without the dam. The term is applied to a calf, or colt. It is yet used in Norfolk and Suffolk.
And, if thou wilt bewayle my wofull teene,
I shall give thee yond cosset for thy payne.
Spenser, Shep. Cal. Sept.
Much greater gifts for guerdon thou shalt gain
Than kid or cosset. Spenser, Shep. Cal. Nov.

CO'SSICK.* adj. [cossa, Lat. "Algebra so called." Cambridge Dict. 1693.] Relating to algebra. Not now in use. "Cossike numbers," Recorde's Whetstone of Witte, 1557. Bp. Hall also uses the word, Rem. p. 367.

COST.† n. s. [kost, Dutch. As this word is found in the remotest Teutonick dialects, even in the Icelandick, it is not probably derived to us from the Latin cousto; though it is not unlikely that the French couster comes from the Latin.]
1. The price of any thing. [Sax. cỹꝛc, Manning's Suppl. to Lye.]
2. Sumptuousness; luxury.
The city woman bears
The cost of princes on unworthy shoulders. Shaks.
Let foreign princes vainly boast
The rude effects of pride and cost
Of vaster fabricks, to which they Contribute nothing but the pay. Waller.
3. Charge; expence.
While he found his daughter maintained without his cost, he was content to be deaf to any noise of infamy. Sidney.
I shall never hold that man my friend,
Whose tongue shall ask me for one penny cost,
To ransom home revolted Mortimer.
Shakspeare, Hen. IV.
Have we eaten at all of the king's cost? or hath he given us any gift? 2 Sam. xix. 42.
And wilt thou, O cruel boast!
Put poor nature to such cost?
O! 'twill undo our common mother,
To be at charge of such another. Crashaw.
It is strange to see any ecclesiastical pile, not by ecclesiastical cost and influence, rising above ground; especially in an age in which men's mouths are open against the church, but their hands shut towards it. South, Serm.
He whose tale is best, and pleases most,
Should win his supper at our common cost.
Dryden, Fab.
Fourteen thousand pounds are paid by Wood for the purchase of his patent: what were his other visible costs I know not; what his latent, is variously conjectured. Swift.

4. Loss; fine; detriment.

I am what I am, and they that prove me shall find me to their cost: do you mark me neighbour, to their cost I say.

Beaum. and Fl. Cupid's Revenge.

What they had fondly wished, proved afterwards to their costs over true.

Knolles, Hist. of the Turks.

COST.* n. s. [Fr. coste, Lat. costa. See COAST.] A rib, or side.

Betwixt the costs of a ship.

B. Jonson, Staple of News.

To COST. v. n. pret. cost; particip. cost. [couster, Fr.] To be bought for; to be had at a price.

The dagger and poison are always in readiness; but to bring the action to extremity, and then recover all, will require the art of a writer, and cost him many a pang. Dryden.

CO'STAL.† adj. [Fr. costal, from the Lat. costa. See COST.] Belonging to the ribs.

Hereby are excluded all cetaceous and cartilaginous fishes, many pectinal, whose ribs are rectilineal; and many costal, which have their ribs embowed. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CO'STARD.† n. s. [from coster, a head, Dr. Johnson says; which is certainly found in composition with monger, meaning an apple-monger, or costard-monger; but neither in this or any other sense has he noticed coster; which Skinner, however, says, is an old word for the head.]

1. A head.

Take him over the costard with the hilt of thy sword. Shakspeare, Rich. III.

2. An apple round and bulky like the head.

The wilding, costard, then the well-known pomwater. Drayton, Polyolb. S. 18.

CO'STARD-MONGER.* n. s. [from costard and monger.] A dealer in apples; a fruiterer.

Many country vicars are driven to shifts; and, if our greedy patrons hold us to such conditions, they will make us turn costard-mongers, grasiers, or sell ale. Burton on Melanch.

Half-famished Tantalus is fallen to his fruit, with that appetite, as it threatens to undo the whole company of costard-mongers, and has a river afore him running excellent wine.

B. Jonson, Masques.

CO'STER-MONGER.* n. s. The same as costard-monger.

Poets had their Muses; orators, their Mercury; physicians, their Esculapius; gardeners, their Flora; costermongers, their Pomona.

Fotherby, Atheom. p. 38.

He'll rail like a rude coster-monger.

Beaum. and Fl. Scornful Lady.

CO'STIVE.† adj. [constipatus, Lat. constipé, Fr.]

1. Bound in the body; having the excretions obstructed.

When the passage of the gall becomes obstructed, the body grows costive, and the excrements of the belly white. Brown.

While faster than his costive brain indites,
Philo's quick hand in flowing letters writes;
His case appears to me like honest Teague's,
When he was run away with by his legs. Prior.

2. Close; unpermeable.

Clay in dry seasons is costive, hardening with the sun and wind, till unlocked by industry, so as to admit of the air and heavenly influences.

Mortimer, Husbandry.

3. Cold; formal.

The costive liberality of a purseproud man insults the distresses it sometimes relieves.

Ld. Chesterfield.

You must be frank, but without indiscretion; and close, but without being costive.

Ld. Chesterfield.

CO'STIVENESS.† n. s. [from costive.]

1. The state of the body in which excretion is obstructed.

Costiveness disperses malign putrid fumes out of the guts and mesentery into all parts of the body, occasioning headachs, fevers, loss of appetite, and disturbance of concoction. Harvey.

Costiveness has ill effects, and is hard to be dealt with by physick; purging medicines rather increasing than removing the evil. Locke on Educat.

2. Coldness; stiffness.

In the literary and philosophical society at Manchester was once a reverend disputant of the same costiveness in publick elocution with myself.

Wakefield, Mem. p. 216.

CO'STLESS* adj. [cost and less.] Costing nothing; without expence.

I have known many, saith St. Basil, who have fasted, and prayed, and groaned, and expressed all sorts of costless piety; who yet would not part with a doit to the afflicted. Barrow, i. Serm. 31.

CO'STLINESS.† n. s. [from costly. Rarely used in the plural: but an example is given.] Sumptuousness; expensiveness.

Though not with curious costliness, yet with cleanly sufficiency it entertained me. Sidney.

To decry those costlinesses, delicacies, and softnesses, bestowed on clothes, or houses, or bodies.

Bp. Taylor, Artif. Handsom. p. 114.

Nor have the frugaller sons of fortune any reason to object the costliness; since they frequently pay dearer for less advantageous pleasures.

Glanville's Scepsis.

CO'STLY. adj. [from cost.] Sumptuous; expensive; of a high price.

Costly thy habit as thy purse can buy,
But not exprest in fancy; rich, not gaudy;
For the apparel oft proclaims the man.

Shakspeare, Hamlet.

Leave for a while thy costly country seat;
And to be great indeed, forget
The nauseous pleasures of the great. Dryden.

The chapel of St. Laurence will be perhaps the most costly piece of work on the earth, when completed. Addison.

He is here speaking of Paradise, which he represents as a most charming and delightful place; abounding with things not only useful and convenient, but even the most rare and valuable, the most costly and desirable. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

CO'STMARY.† n. s. [costus, Lat.] An herb.

The scentful camomile, the verdurous costmary.

Drayton, Polyolb. S. 15.

CO'STREL. n. s. [supposed to be derived from coster.] A bottle. Skinner.

COSTU'ME. n. s. [Ital. costume; old Fr. costume; les coutumes, mœurs, usages, V. Roquefort. Low Lat. custuma, old Eng. custume.] In painting, the strict observance of proper character as to persons and things. It is now generally applied in the sense of custom or manners.

The cruzado was not current, as it should seem, at Venice, though it certainly was in England in the time of Shakspeare, who has here indulged his usual practice of departing from national costume.

Douce, Illustr. of Shaksp. ii. 270.

COSU'FFERER.* n. s. [con and sufferer.] A fellow-sufferer.

Should no cosufferers commiserate.

COT. } At the end of the names of COTE. } places, come generally from COAT. } the Saxon cot, a cottage.

Gibson.

COT.† n. s. [Goth. kot, a little house; Welsh, cwt; Sax. cot and cote. Our own word is often written cote. The first example of cot which is in Dr. Johnson's dictionary, means a very different thing from a cottage. It is a boat. Cot, in our language has also another meaning, which has likewise escaped Dr. Johnson's notice. See COT, a boat; and COT, a bed.] A small house; a cottage; a hut; a mean habitation.

Besides, his cot, his flocks, and bounds of feed,
Are now on sale; and at our sheepcote now,
By reason of his absence, there is nothing
That you will feed on. Shaksp. As you like it.

A stately temple shoots within the skies:
The crotchets of their cot in columns rise;
The pavement, polish'd marble they behold;
The gates with sculpture grac'd, the spires and tiles of gold. Dryden, Baucis and Phil.

As Jove vouchsaf'd on Ida's top, 'tis said,
At poor Philemon's cot to take a bed. Fenton.

COT, or COTT.* n. s. [old Fr. coete, coite; Gr. κοίτη, a bed.] A small bed; a cradle, as it is yet called in the north of England; and a hammock, as the sailors still call it.

Their beds are cots of two feet height, or four low posts strengthened with girth-web.

Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 314.

Lying upon a slight and low bedstead they [the Turks] call a cot, bottomed with broad girt-web made of cotton wool.

Terry, Voy. to the E. Ind. (1655,) p. 198.

COT, or COTT.* n. s. [low Lat. cota, a kind of ship. The passage from Spenser has been cited by Dr. Johnson as an illustration of cot for cottage.] A little boat.

Cymochles of her questioned
Both what she was, and what that usage ment,
Which in her cott she daily practized: —
Vaine man, said she: —
My little boat can safely pass this perilous bourne.

Spenser, F. Q. ii. vi. 9.

They call, in Ireland, cots, things like boats, but very unshapely, being nothing but square pieces of timber made hollow.

G. Boate's Nat. Hist. of Ireland, p. 64.

COT.† n. s.

1. An abridgement of cotquean. Any man who interferes with female domestick employment, and particularly in the kitchen, is called a cot. See Wilbraham's Cheshire Gloss. and the Craven Dialect.

Some may think it below our hero to stoop to such a mean employment, as the poet has here enjoined him, of holding the candle; and that it looks too much like a citizen, or a cot, as the women call it.

Wagstaffe's Miscell. Works, 1726, p. 17.

2. A cade-lamb. Grose.

To COTA'BULATE.* v. a. [See To CONTABULATE. This word has the authority of our old lexicography.] To plank; to floor with boards. Cockeram.

COTA'NGENT. n. s. [In geometry.] The tangent of an arch which is the complement of another to ninety degrees. Harris.

COTE.* n. s. [Sax. See COT.]

1. A cottage. The old orthography. Sherwood.

No sooner sat he foote within the late deformed cote,
But that the formal change of things his wondering eyes did note. Warner, Albion's England, (1597.)

Not a swain
This night hath known his lodging here, or lain
Within these cotes. Fletcher, Faithful Shepherdess.

2. A sheepfold.

Stalls for all manner of beasts, and cotes for flocks. 2 Chron. xxxii. 28.

The folded flock penn'd in their wattled cotes. Milton, Comus.

3. A pigeon-house; a dove-cote.

To COTE.† v. a. [perhaps from the Fr. coté, the side of any thing; de coté, sidelong.] This word, which I have found only in Chapman, seems to signify the same as to leave behind, to overpass, Dr. Johnson says. It is used by Shakspeare, however, and several authors of his time.

Words her worth had prov'd with deeds,
Had more ground been allow'd the race, and coted far his steeds. Chapman, Iliad.

We coted them [the players] on the way, and hither are they coming. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

Marry, we presently coted and outstript them. Return from Parnassus, 1606.

To COTE.* See To QUOTE, which formerly was written cote.

COTE'MPORARY.† adj. [con and tempus, Lat. Bentley has remarked that cotemporary is a downright barbarism. "For the Latins never use co for con, except before a vowel, as, coequal, coeternal; but, before a consonant, they either retain the n, as contemporary, constitution, or melt it into another letter, as, collection, comprehension: so that the word cotemporary is a word of his [Boyle's] own coposition, for which the learned world will cogratulate him!" Diss. on Phalaris, Pref. — It will not be easy to confute the reasoning of this remark, by which the just rule of formation to our compound words of this class is given; though many indeed affectedly write cogenial, copartment, and the like, as well as cotemporary. Sprat might have been added by Dr. Johnson to Locke in aid of cotemporary; and in modern times, both the Wartons have adopted this spelling. Yet Locke, and Cowley, and Dryden, and Addison, are Johnson's examples for contemporary; and Chillingworth and Steele will be found on the same side.] Living at the same time; coetaneous; contemporary.

What would not, to a rational man, cotemporary with the first voucher, have appeared probable, is now used as certain, because several have since, from him, said it one after another. Locke.

COTE'MPORARY.* n. s. One who lives at the same time.

We now find so much artifice amongst those our cotemporaries, who only follow rude and untaught nature. Sprat, Hist. R. S. p. 81.

COTERI'E. n. s. [Fr. those who compose the modern coteries, will be surprised at Cotgrave's rude description of it! "COTERIE, company, society, association of country people." It is indeed a term adopted from the French trading partnerships or associations, where each contributed his quota of stock, and received in return the quota of profit. It has of late years been considered as meaning a select party, or club; and sometimes of ladies only.] A friendly or fashionable association. Of no great date in our language. Sterne somewhere uses it.

COTHU'RNATE.* } part. adj. [Lat. cothurCOTHU'RNATED. } natus.] Buskined; relating to tragedy. Cockeram.

Desist, O blest man, thy cothurnate stile,
And from these forc'd iambicks fall awhile.
Heywood, Hier. of Angels, p. 348.

COTI'LLON.* n. s. [Fr. cotillon, a petticoat.] A brisk lively dance; in which eight persons are usually employed.

Brawls were a sort of figure dance then in vogue, and probably deemed as elegant as our modern cotillons. Gray, Long Story, Note, ver. 11.

I could as easily reconcile it to my ideas of propriety, to see a chief justice, or an archbishop, display their activity in a cotillon, as to have seen Mr. Shenstone footing it in a country dance. Graves, Recollect. of Shenstone, p. 45.

CO'TLAND. n. s. [cot and land.] Land appendant to a cottage.

CO'TQUEAN. n. s. [probably from coquin, French.] A man who busies himself with women's affairs.

Look to the bak'd meats, good Angelica;
Spare not for costs. ——
—— Go, go, you cotquean, go;
Get you to bed. Shakspeare, Rom. and Jul.

A stateswoman is as ridiculous a creature as a cotquean: each of the sexes should keep within its bounds. Addison.

You have given us a lively picture of husbands hen-pecked; but you have never touched upon one of the quite different character, and who goes by the name of cotquean. Addison.

CO'TSWOLD.* n. s. [Sax. cote, a cottage, and pold, a place without wood.] Sheepcotes, in an open country; whence the large tract of downs called Cotswold hills in Gloucestershire.

CO'TTAGE. n. s. [from cot.] A hut; a mean habitation; a cot; a little house.

The sea-coast shall be dwellings and cottages for shepherds, and folds for flocks. Zeph. ii. 6.

They were right glad to take some corner of a poor cottage, and there to serve God upon their knees. Hooker.

The self-same sun that shines upon his court,
Hides not his visage from our cottage, but Looks on both alike. Shaksp. Wint. Tale.

Let the women of noble birth and great fortunes nurse their children, look to the affairs of the house, visit poor cottages, and relieve their necessities. Bp. Taylor, Holy Living.

It is difficult for a peasant, bred up in the obscurities of a cottage, to fancy in his mind the splendours of a court. South.

Beneath our humble cottage let us haste,
And here, unenvied, rural dainties taste.
Pope, Odyssey.

CO'TTAGED.* adj. [from cottage.] Having cottages.

Ev'n humble Harting's cottag'd vale
Shall learn the sad repeated tale,
And bid her shepherds weep. Collins, Ode v.

CO'TTAGELY.* adj. [from cottage.] Rustick; suitable to a cottage.

They envy others whatever they enjoy of estates, houses, or ornaments of life, beyond their tenuity or cottagely obscurity. Bp. Taylor, Artif. Hands. p. 172.

A dry morsel, a thread-bare coat, a cottagely condition. Bp. Ganden's Hieraspistes, 1653, p. 40.

CO'TTAGER. n. s. [from cottage.]

1. One who lives in a hut or cottage.

Let us from our farms,
Call forth our cottagers to arms. Swift.

The most ignorant Irish cottager will not sell his cow for a groat. Swift, Add. to Parliament.

2. A cottager, in law, is one that lives on the common, without paying rent, and without any land of his own.

The husbandmen and plowmen be but as their work-folks and labourers, or else mere cottagers, which are but housed beggars. Bacon, Hen. VII.

The yeomanry, or middle people, of a condition between gentlemen and cottagers. Bacon, H. VII.

CO'TTER.* n. s. This is our modern term for the next word, of which Dr. Johnson has noticed merely the existence; but cottier can boast good authority, and cotter indeed is an old Scottish word.

CO'TTIER.† n. s. [old Fr. cottier, Kelham and Cotgrave; "like enough," says Cotgrave, "the original of our cottager."] One who inhabits a cot.

Himself goes patch'd, like some bare cottyer. Bp. Hall, Satires, iv. 2.

Cottiers; rustick, clownish. Warburton.

CO'TTON. n. s. [named, according to Skinner, from the down that adheres to the mala cotonea, or quince, called by the Italians cotogni; whence cottone, Ital. cotton, French.]

1. The down of the cotton-tree.

The pin ought to be as thick as a rowling pin, and covered with cotton, that its hardness may not be offensive. Wiseman.

2. Cloth made of cotton.

CO'TTON. n. s. A plant.

The species are, 1. Shrubby cotton. 2. The most excellent American cotton, with a greenish seed. 3. Annual shrubby cotton of the island of Providence. 4. The tree cotton. 5. Tree cotton with a yellow flower. The first sort is cultivated plentifully in Candia, Lemnos, Cyprus, Malta, Sicily, and at Naples; as also between Jerusalem and Damascus, from whence the cotton is brought annually into these northern parts of Europe. The cotton is the wool which incloses or wraps up the seeds, and is contained in a kind of brown husk or seed-vessel growing upon this shrub. It is from this sort that the vast quantities of cotton are taken, which furnish our parts of the world. The second and third sorts are annual: these are cultivated in the West Indies in great plenty. But the fourth and fifth sorts grow in Egypt; these abide many years, and often arrive to be trees of great magnitude. Miller.

To CO'TTON. v. n.

1. To rise with a nap.

2. To cement; to unite with: a cant word.

A quarrel will end in one of you being turned off, in which case it will not be easy to cotton with another. Swift.

Co'TTONOUS, or Co'TTONY.* adj. [Fr. cottoneux.] Full of cotton; soft as cotton; overgrown with a white, soft, or cottonlike down. Cotgrave.

There is a salix near Darking in Surrey, in which the julus bears a thick cottonous substance. Evelyn, i. 19. § 8

Oaks bear also a knur full of a cottony matter of which they anciently made wick for their lamps and candles. Ib. i. 3. § 17.

Co'TYLA, or Co'TYLE.* n. s. [Fr. cotyle, Gr. κοτύλη, a cavity.]

1. The deep cavity of a bone, which receives the end of another in articulation.
2. A liquid measure in use among the ancients. [Lat. cotula, Fr. cotyle.]

To COUCH. v. n. [coucher, French.]

1. To lie down on a place of repose.

If I court more women, you'll couch with more men. Shakspeare.

Doth not the gentleman
Deserve as full, as fortunate a bed,
As ever Beatrice shall couch upon? Shakspeare.

When love's fair goddess
Couch'd with her husband in his golden bed.
Dryden, Æn.

2. To lie down on the knees, as a beast to rest.

Trees bent their heads to hear him sing his wrongs,
Fierce tygers couch'd around, and loll'd their fawning tongues. Dryden, Virg.

These, when death
Comes like a rushing lion, couch like spaniels,
With lolling tongues, and tremble at the paw.
Dryden.

3. To lie down in secret, or in ambush.

We'll couch i'the castle-ditch, till we see the light of our fairies. Shakspeare, M. W. of Windsor.

The earl of Angus couched in a furrow, and was passed over for dead, until a horse was brought for his escape. Hayward.

4. To lie in a bed, or stratum.

Blessed of the Lord be his land for the dew, and for the deep that coucheth beneath. Deut. xxxiii. 13.

5. To stoop; or bend down; to lower, in fear, in pain, in respect.

Issachar is a strong ass, couching down between two burdens. Gen. xlix. 14.

To COUCH. v. a.

1. To repose; to lay on a place of repose.

Where unbruis'd youth, with unstuff'd brain,
Doth couch his limbs, there golden sleep doth reign. Shakspeare.

2. To lay down any thing in a bed, or stratum.

If the weather be warm, we immediately couch malt about a foot thick; but if a hotter season require it, we spread it on the floor much thinner. Mortimer, Husbandry.

The sea and the land make one globe; and the waters couch themselves, as close as may be, to the centre of this globe, in a spherical convexity. Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

3. To bed; to hide in another body.

It is at this day in use at Gaza, to couch potsherds, or vessels of earth, in their walls; to gather the wind from the top, and to pass it down in spouts into rooms. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

4. To involve; to include; to comprise.

But who will call those noble who deface,
By meaner acts, the glories of their race;
Whose only title to their fathers' fame,
Is couch'd in the dead letters of their name?
Dryden, Juv.

That great argument for a future state, which St. Paul hath couched in the words I have read to you. Atterbury, Serm.

5. To include secretly; to hide: with under.

The foundation of all parables, is some analogy or similitude between the topical or allusive part of the parable and the thing couched under it, and intended by it. South.

There is all this, and more, that lies naturally couched under this allegory. L'Estrange.

The true notion of the institution being lost, the tradition of the deluge, which was couched under it, was thereupon at length suspended and lost. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

6. To lay close to another.

And over all, with brazen scales was arm'd,
Like plated coat of steel, so couched near,
That nought might pierce. Spenser, F. Q.

7. To fix the spear in the rest; in the posture of attack.

The knight 'gan fairly couch his steady spear,
And fiercely ran at him with rigorous might.
Spenser, F. Q.

Before each van
Prick forth the aery knights, and couch their spears,
Till thickest legions close. Milton, P. L.

The former wav'd in air
His flaming sword, Æneas couch'd his spear.
Dryden, Æn.

8. To depress the condensed crystalline humour or film that overspreads the pupil of the eye. This is improperly called couching the eye, for couching the cataract: with equal impropriety they sometimes speak of couching the patient.

Some artist, whose nice hand
Couches the cataracts, and clears his sight,
And all at once a flood of glorious light
Comes rushing on his eyes. Dennis.

Whether the cataract be wasted by being separated from its vessels, I have never known positively, by dissecting one that had been couched. Sharp.

COUCH.† n. s. [Fr. couche.]

1. A seat of repose, on which it is common to lie down dressed.

So Satan fell; and straight a fiery globe
Of angels on full sail of wing flew nigh,
Who on their plumy vans receiv'd him soft,
From his uneasy station, and upbore
As on a floating couch through the blithe air.
Milton, P. R.

To loll on couches, rich with citron steds,
And lay their guilty limbs in Tyrian beds.
Dryden, Virg. Geo.

O, ye immortal pow'rs that guard the just,
Watch round his couch, and soften his repose.
Addison, Cato.

2. A bed; a place of repose.

The beastes that ronne astraye, seketh their accustomed cowches.
Bale, Pref. to Leland's Journey, D. 2.

Let not the royal bed of Denmark be
A couch for luxury and damned incest.
Shakspeare, Hamlet.

Dire was the tossing! deep the groans! despair
Tended the sick, busiest from couch to couch.
Milton, P. L.

This gentle knight, inspir'd by jolly May,
Forsook his easy couch at early day. Dryd. Fab.

3. A layer, or stratum.

This heap is called by maltsters a couch, or bed of raw malt. Mortimer, Husbandry.

Co'UCHANT. adj. [couchant, Fr.] Lying down; squatting.

If a lion were the coat of Judah, yet were it not probably a lion rampant, but rather couchant or dormant. Brown.

As a tiger, who by chance hath spy'd,
In some purlieu, two gentle fawns at play,
Strait couches close; then rising, changes oft
His couchant watch. Milton, P. L.

CO'UCHEE.† n. s. [French.] Bedtime; the time of visiting late at night.

None of her sylvan subjects made their court;
Levees and couchées pass'd without resort. Dryd.

Two days afterwards I was at the king's couchée, and wondered to see him quite cheerful, amidst such an intricacy of trouble. Reresby's Mem. p. 95.

I was at the king's couchée, as I was three times in one week. Ibid. p. 121.

Co'UCHER.† n. s. [from couch.]

1. He that couches or depresses cataracts.
2. A bedfellow. [coucheur, Fr.] Cotgrave.

Co'UCHER.* n. s. [Fr. cachereau, the same as chartulaire. Cotgrave; from cacher, to keep secret.] A register-book in monasteries.

The churchwardens of every parish shall deliver unto our visitours the inventories of vestments, copes, and other ornaments, plate, books, and specially of grayles, couchers, legends, &c.
Q. Eliz. Injunctions, &c. p. 1559.

Co'UCHFELLOW. n. s. [couch and fellow.] Bedfellow; companion.

I have grated upon my good friends for three reprieves for you, and your couchfellow, Nim; or else you had looked through the grate like a geminy of baboons. Shakspeare.

Co'UCHGRASS. n. s. A weed.

The couchgrass, for the first year, insensibly robs most plants in sandy grounds apt to graze.
Mortimer, Husbandry.

Co'UCHING.* n. s. [from To couch.] The act of bending or bowing. See To COUCH.

These couchings, and these lowly courtesies,
Might fire the blood of ordinary men.
Shakspeare, Jul. Cæsar.

COUD.* Often used by our old authors for COULD.

COVE.† n. s.

1. A small creek or bay. [Icel. and Goth. kofe, a cavern; Lat. covum.]
2. A shelter; a cover. [Arab. couffe.]

To COVE.* v. a. [from the noun.] To arch over; to cover over.

The mosques and other buildings of the Arabians are rounded into domes and coved roofs.
Swinbourne, Trav. through Spain, L. 44.

Co'VENABLE.* adj. [old Fr. covenable, proper.] Fit; suitable.

When a covenable day was fallen, Eroude in his birthe day made a soper to the princes, &c.
Wicliffe, St. Mark, vi.

The covenable joynyng of every of the sayd partes one with another, as they come togyther in sentences. Palsgrave, Fr. Gr. 1521, B. iii. Intr.

Co'VENABLY.* adv. [from covenable.] Fitly; properly.

He shall bere hym, toward owre lord the kyng and his people, in the same office wele and covenably. Indenture of 1469, Archæol. xv. 177.

CO'VENANT.† n. s. [old Fr. covenans, couvenant, covenance; used for conventions, according to Lacombe, in the 10th century. Lat. conventum.]

1. A contract; a stipulation.

He makes a covenant never to destroy
The earth again by flood; nor let the sea
Surpass his bounds. Milton, P. L.

The English make the ocean their abode,
Whose ready sails with ev'ry wind can fly,
And make a cov'nant with th' unconstant sky.
Waller.

Some men live as if they had made a covenant with hell: let divines, fathers, friends say what they will, they stop their ears against them.
L'Estrange.

2. An agreement on certain terms; a compact.

A covenant is a mutual compact, as we now consider it, betwixt God and man; consisting of mercies on God's part, made over to man, and of conditions on man's part, required by God.
Hammond, Pract. Cat.

3. A writing containing the terms of agreement.

I shall but lend my diamond till your return; let there be covenants drawn between us.
Shakspeare, Cymb.

To Co'venant. v. n. [from the noun.]

1. To bargain; to stipulate.

His lord used commonly so to covenant with him, which if at any time the tenant disliked, he might freely depart at his pleasure. Spenser on Ireland.

By words men come to know one another's minds; by these they covenant and confederate.
South.

Jupiter covenanted with him, that it should be hot or cold, wet or dry, calm or windy, as the tenant should direct. L'Estrange.

2. To agree with another on certain terms: with for before either the price or the thing purchased.

They covenanted with him for thirty pieces of silver. St. Matt. xxvi. 15.

Pointing to a heap of sand,
For ev'ry grain to live a year demand;
But, ah! unmindful of th' effect of time,
Forgot to covenant for youth and prime.
Garth's Ovid.

To Co'venant.* v. a. To contract; to stipulate.

According to the word that I covenanted with you. Haggai, ii. 5.

It had been covenanted between him and the king of England, that neither of them should treat of peace or truce with the French king.
Hayward on Edw. VI.

Covenante'e. n. s. [from covenant.] A party to a covenant; a stipulator; a bargainer.

Both of them were respective rites of their admission into the several covenants, and the covenantees became thereby entitled to the respective privileges. Ayliffe, Parergon.

Co'venanter.† n. s. [from covenant.] One who takes a covenant. A word introduced in the civil wars, Dr. Johnson says; which may be doubted. Dr. Johnson introduces the word only from the Oxford Reasons against the Covenant; but it had been used by Sir H. Wotton; and by another author, whom I cite, the word is employed without any reference to the cant expression in the civil wars. And moreover the name of covenanter, as to its historical application, appears to have been imposed, not assumed. See Dalrymple's Mem. of the Reign of K. Ch. I. p. 70.

I am sorry to hear of new oaths in Scotland between the covenanters, who they say will have none but Jesus Christ to reign over them.
Sir H. Wotton, Letters.

They cut the calf in twaine; the manner of making covenants; whence the Hebrew phrase is to cut a covenant, that is, from the rite of cutting a beast in twaine, sometime for sacrifice, sometime for feasting; and the covenanters passing through between the parts of it, implying it seems, and that by way of execration, themselves to be alike cut in sunder in case of violating the conditions of the covenant. Bp. Richardson on the O. Test. (1655,) p. 424.

The covenanters shall have no more assurance of mutual assistance each from other, after the taking of the covenant, than they had before.
Oxford Reasons against the Covenant.

Co'venous. adj. [from covin.] Fraudulent; collusive; trickish.

I wish some means devised for the restraint of these inordinate and covenous leases of lands, holden in chief, for hundreds or thousands of years. Bacon, Off. of Alienation.

Co'vent.* n. s. [old Fr. covent, for convent. Rocquefort. Our old lexicography gives covent; and the word is usual in good writers. Covent-Garden is supposed to mean a garden that belonged to a convent; and thence its present name.] A convent, or monastery.

Their monasteries, covents, hospitals, &c.
Bale on the Revel. (1550,) I. 8.

You will find a scar in his face, that was from a Roman assassinate, that would have killed him as he was turned to a wall near to his covent.
Sir H. Wotton, Lett. to the Regius Professor.

Abbess of that covent. Bp. Hall, Works, iii. 993.

Putting the covent-seal to any deed.
Burnet, Hist. Ref. i. 3.

To CO'VER. v. a. [couvrir, French.]

1. To overspread any thing with something else.

The pastures are cloathed with flocks, the valleys also are covered over with corn. Ps. lxv. 13.

Sea cover'd sea,
Sea without shore. Milton, P. L.

The flaming mount appear'd
In Dothan cover'd with a camp of fire.
Milton, P. L.

Go to thy fellows, bid them cover the table, serve in the meat, and we will come in to dinner.
Shakspeare, Merch. of Venice.

2. To conceal under something laid over.

Nor he their outward, only with the skins
Of beasts, but inward nakedness much more
Opprobrious, with his robe of righteousness
Arraying, cover'd from his father's sight.
Milton, P. L.

Cover me ye pines,
Ye cedars with innumerable boughs
Hide me, that I may never see them more.
Milton, P. L.

In life's cool vale let my low scene be laid,
Cover me, gods, with Tempe's thickest shade.
Cowley.

Or lead me to some solitary place,
And cover my retreat from human race.
Dryden, Virg.

3. To hide by superficial appearances.

4. To overwhelm; to bury.

Raillery and wit serve only to cover nonsense with shame, when reason has first proved it to be mere nonsense. Watts.

5. To conceal from notice or punishment.

Charity shall cover the multitude of sins.
1 Pet. iv. 8.

Thou may'st repent,
And one bad act with many deeds well done

6. To shelter; to protect.

His calm and blameless life
Does with substantial blessedness abound,
And the soft wings of peace cover him round.
Cowley.

7. To incubate; to brood on.

Natural historians observe, that only the male birds have voices; that their songs begin a little before breeding time, and end a little after; that whilst the hen is covering her eggs, the male generally takes his stand upon a neighbouring bough within her hearing, and by that means amuses and diverts her with his songs during the whole time of her sitting. Addison, Spect.

8. To copulate with a female.

9. To wear the hat, or garment of the head, as a mark of superiority, or independence.

That king had conferred the honour of grandee upon him, which was of no other advantage or signification to him, than to be covered in the presence of that king. Dryden.

Co'ver.† n. s. [from the verb.]

1. Any thing that is laid over another.

The secundine is but a general cover, not shaped according to the parts, the skin is shaped according to the parts. Bacon.

The fountains could be strengthened no other way than by making a strong cover or arch over them. Burnet, Theory.

Orestes' bulky rage,
Unsatisfy'd with margins closely writ,
Foams o'er the covers, and not finish'd yet.
Dryden, Juv.

With your hand, or any other cover, you stop the vessel, so as wholly to exclude the air.
Ray on the Creation.

2. A concealment; a screen; a veil; a superficial appearance, under which something is hidden.

The truth and reason of things may be artificially and effectually insinuated, under the cover either of a real fact, or of a supposed one.
L'Estrange.

As the spleen has great inconveniences, so the pretence of it is a handsome cover for imperfections. Collier on the Spleen.

3. Shelter; defence from weather.

In the mean time, by being compelled to lodge in the field, which grew now to be very cold, whilst his army was under cover, they might be forced to retire. Clarendon.

4. [In hunting.] Shelter; retreat, where the fox or hare is supposed to be.

Co'vercle.* n. s. [Fr. couvercle.] A lid or cover. Cotgrave.

Except we take the onycha of that perfume for the covercle of a shell-fish, called unguis odoratus.
Sir T. Brown, Miscell. Tracts, p. 11.

Co'verchief.* n. s. [Fr. couvrechef, a kerchief. See Kerchief.] A covering for the head. Not now in use.

Her coverchiefs weren ful fine of ground,
That on the Sonday were upon her head.
Chaucer, C. T. Prol.

Co'verer.* n. s. [from cover.] That which covers or protects.

They shall make haste to the wall thereof, and the defence [in the margin, covering, or coverer,] shall be prepared. Nahum, ii. 5.

Co'ver-shame. n. s. [cover and shame.] Some appearance used to conceal infamy.

Does he put on holy garments for a covershame of lewdness? Dryden, Span. Fryar.

Co'ver-slut.* n. s. [cover and slut.] An appearance to hide sluttishness.

Great Britain was not there. Almost in despair, I hope she will never, in any rags and coversluts of infamy, be seen at such an exhibition.
Burke on a Regicide Peace.

Co'vering. n. s. [from cover.] Dress; vesture; any thing spread over another.

The women took and spread a covering over the well's mouth. 2 Sam. xvii. 19.

Bring some covering for this naked soul,
Whom I'll intreat to lead me. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

Through her flesh methinks is seen
The brighter soul that dwells within,
Our eyes the subtle covering pass,
And see the lily through its glass. Cowley.

Then from the floor he rais'd a royal bed,
With coverings of Sidonian purple spread.
Dryden, Fab.

Sometimes Providence cast things so, that truth and interest lie the same way; and when it is wrapt up in this covering, men can be content to follow it. South.

Co'verlet.† n. s. [couvrelict, French. Perhaps our word should be correctly coverlit.] The outermost of the bedcloaths; that under which all the rest are concealed.

Lay her in lillies and in violets,
And silken curtains over her display,
And odour'd sheets, and arras coverlets.
Spenser, Epithal.

A flag of double use; for it serves as an umbrella abroad, and at home for a coverlet.
Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 314.

This done, the host produc'd the genial bed,
Which with no costly coverlet they spread.
Dryden, Fables.

I was for want of a house and bed, forced to lie on the ground, wrapt up in my coverlet.
Swift, Gul. Trav.

Co'VERT. n. s. [from cover; couvert, French.]

1. A shelter; a defence.

Let mine outcasts dwell with thee, Moab; be thou a covert to them from the face of the spoiler.
Isaiah, xvi. 4.

There shall be a tabernacle for a shadow in the day time from the heat, and for a place of refuge, and for a covert from storm and rain. Isaiah, iv. 6.

They are by sudden alarm, or watch-word, to be called out to their military motions, under sky or covert, according to the season, as was the Roman wont. Milton on Education.

It was the hour of night, when thus the Son
Commun'd in silent walk, then laid him down
Under the hospitable covert nigh
Of trees thick interwoven. Milton, P. L.

Now have a care your carnations catch not too much wet, therefore retire them to covert.
Evelyn, Kalendar.

2. A thicket, or hiding place.

Tow'rds him I made; but he was 'ware of me,
And stole into the covert of the wood.
Shakspeare, Rom. and Juliet.

I shall be your faithful guide,
Through this gloomy covert wide. Milton, Comus.

Thence to the coverts, and the conscious groves,
The scenes of his past triumphs and his loves.
Denham.

Deep into some thick covert would I run,
Impenetrable to the stars or sun.
Dryden, State of Innocence.

The deer is lodg'd; I've track'd her to her covert:
Be sure ye mind the word; and when I give it,
Rush in at once, and seize upon your prey.
Addison, Cato.

Co'VERT. adj. [couvert, French.]

1. Sheltered; not open; not exposed.

You are, of either side the green, to plant a covert alley, upon carpenter's work, about twelve foot in height, by which you may go in shade into the garden. Bacon.

The fox is a beast also very prejudicial to the husbandman, especially in places that are near forest-woods and covert places.
Mortimer Husbandry.

Together let us beat this ample field,
Try what the open, what the covert yield.
Pope, Essays.

2. Secret; hidden; private; insidious.

And let us presently go sit in council,
How covert matters may be best disclos'd,
And open perils surest answered. Shaksp. Jul. Cæs.

By what best way,
Whether of open war, or covert guile,
We now debate. Milton, P. L.

Co'VERT. adj. [couvert, French.] Denoting the state of a woman sheltered by marriage under her husband; as covert baron, femme covert.

Instead of her being under covert baron, to be under covert feme myself; to have my body disabled, and my head fortified. Dryden, Span. Fryar.

Co'VERT-WAY. n. s. [from covert and way.] It is, in fortification, a space of ground level with the field, on the edge of the ditch, three or four fathom broad, ranging quite round the half moons, or other works toward the country. One of the greatest difficulties in a siege is to make a lodgement on the covert-way, because usually the besieged pallisade it along the middle, and undermine it on all sides. It is sometimes called the corridor, and sometimes the counterscarp, because it is on the edge of the scarp. Harris.

Co'VERTLY. adv. [from covert.] Secretly; closely; in private, with privacy.

Yet still Aragnol (so his foe was hight)
Lay lurking, covertly him to surprise.
Spenser, Muiopotmos.

How can'st thou cross this marriage?
—Not honestly, my lord; but so covertly, that no dishonesty shall appear in me. Shaksp. Much Ado.

Amongst the poets, Persius covertly strikes at Nero; some of whose verses he recites with scorn and indignation. Dryden.

Co'VERTNESS. n. s. [from covert.] Secrecy; privacy. Dict.

Co'VERTURE.† n. s. [old Fr. coverture, lieu secret. Roq.]

1. Shelter; defence; not exposure.

It may be it is rather the shade, or other coverture, that they take liking in, than the virtue of the herb. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

He saw their shame that sought
Vain covertures. Milton, P. L.

The winds being so fierce, and so severe, as not to suffer any thing to thrive beyond the height of a shrub, in those islands, unless protected by walls, or other like coverture. Woodward.

2. [In law. "Coverture, old Fr. marriage subsistant. 960." Lacombe.] The estate and condition of a married woman, who, by the laws of our realm, is in potestate viri, and therefore disabled to contract with any to the prejudice of herself or her husband, without his allowance or confirmation. Cowel.

The infancy of king Edward VI. and the coverture of queen Mary, did, in fact, disable them to accomplish the conquest of Ireland.
Davies on Ireland.

To CO'VET. v. a. [convoiter, French.]

1. To desire inordinately; to desire beyond due bounds.

If it be a sin to covet honour,
I am the most offending man alive. Shaks. Hen. V.

I am yet
Unknown to woman, never was forsworn,
Scarcely have coveted what was mine own,
At no time broke my faith. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

O father! can it be that souls sublime,
Return to visit our terrestrial clime?
And that the gen'rous mind, releas'd by death,
Can covet lazy limbs and mortal breath?
Dryden, Æn.

2. To desire earnestly.

All things coveting as much as may be to be like unto God in being ever; that which cannot hereunto attain personally, doth seek to continue itself another way, by offspring and propagation. Hooker.

But covet earnestly the best gifts. 1 Cor. xii. 31.

To Co'VET. v. n. To have a strong desire.

The love of money is the root of all evil, which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith. 1 Tim. vi.

Co'VETABLE. adj. [Fr. convoitable.] To be wished for; to be coveted. Sherwood.

Co'VETING.* n. s. [from covet.] Inordinate desire.

Be it lying, note it,
The woman's; flattering, her's; deceiving, her's;
Ambitions, covetings, change of prides, &c.
Shakspeare, Cymbeline.

Co'VETINGLY.* adv. [from coveting.] Eagerly.

Most covetingly ready. B. Jonson, Cynth. Revels.

Co'VETISE.† n. s. [old Fr. covetise.] Avarice; covetousness of money. Not in use.

Most wretched wight, whom nothing might suffice,
Whose greedy lust did lack in greatest store;
Whose need had end, but no end covetise.
Spenser, F. Q.

Co'VETOUS.† adj. [old Fr. coveuteus, covoitos, convoitos, convoiteux; from the Lat. convotare, Menage; from vovere votum, or concupire concupitum, Barbazan. V. Roquefort, Gloss.]

1. Inordinately desirous; eager.

While cumber'd with my dropping cloaths I lay,
The cruel nation, covetous of prey,
Stain'd with my blood the unhospitable coast.
Dryden, Æn.

2. Inordinately eager of money; avaricious.

An heart they have exercised with covetous practices. 2 Pet. ii. 14.

What he cannot help in his nature, you must not account a vice in him: you must in no ways say he is covetous. Shakspeare.

Let never so much probability hang on one side of a covetous man's reasoning, and money on the other, it is easy to foresee which will outweigh.
Locke.

3. Desirous; eager: in a good sense.

Sheba was never
More covetous of wisdom and fair virtue,
Than this fair soul shall be. Shaksp. Hen. VIII.

He that is envious or angry at a virtue that is not his own, at the perfection or excellency of his neighbour, is not covetous of the virtue, but of its reward and reputation, and then his intentions are polluted. Bp. Taylor, Rule of Living Holy.

Co'VETOUSLY.† adv. [from covetous.] Avariciously; eagerly.

If he care not for't, he will supply us easily; if he covetously reserve it, how shall's get it? Shaks.

Yet since the greater doth embrace the less,
We covetously obey. B. Jonson, Sejanus.

Co'VETOUSNESS. n. s. [from covetous.]

1. Avarice; inordinate desire of money; eagerness of gain.

He that takes pains to serve the ends of covetousness; or ministers to another's lust, or keeps a shop of impurities or intemperance, is idle in the worst sense. Bp. Taylor, Holy Living.

Covetousness debaseth a man's spirit, and sinks it into the earth. Tillotson.

2. Eagerness; desire: in a neutral sense.

When workmen strive to do better than well,
They do confound their skill in covetousness.
Shakspeare, K. John.

Co'VEY.† n. s. [couvée, French; from the Lat. cubo.]

1. A hatch; an old bird with her young ones.

2. A number of birds together.

A flight of wasps and covey of partridges went to a farmer, and begged a sup of him to quench their thirst. L'Estrange.

A covey of partridges springing in our front, put our infantry in disorder. Addison, Freeholder.

There would be no walking in a shady wood without springing a covey of toasts.
Addison, Guardian.

COUGH.† n. s. Goth. kuef, a catarrh; kof, suffocation; Su. quaf, shortness of breath; Dutch, kuch, a cough.] A convulsion of the lungs, vellicated by some sharp serosity. It is pronounced coff.

In consumptions of the lungs, when nature cannot expel the cough, men fall into fluxes of the belly, and then they die. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

For his dear sake long restless nights you bore,
While rattling coughs his heaving vessels tore.
Smith.

To COUGH.† v. n. [Su. quafva; Dutch, kuchgen.] To have the lungs convulsed; to make a noise in endeavouring to evacuate the peccant matter from the lungs.

Thou didst drink
The stale of horses, and the gilded puddle
Which beasts would cough at.
Shaksp. Ant. and Cleop.

Thou hast quarrelled with a man for coughing in the street, because he hath awakened thy dog that hath lain asleep in the sun.
Shaksp. Rom. and Jul.

The first problem enquireth why a man doth cough, but not an ox or cow; whereas the contrary is often observed. Brown.

If any humour be discharged upon the lungs, they have a faculty of casting it up by coughing.
Ray on the Creation.

I cough like Horace, and though lean, am short.
Pope's Ep.

To COUGH. v. a. To eject by a cough; to expectorate.

If the matter be to be discharged by expectoration, it must first pass into the substance of the lungs, then into the aspera arteria, or weasand, and from thence be coughed up, and spit out by the mouth. Wiseman's Surgery.

CO'UGHER. n. s. [from cough.] One that coughs. Dict.

CO'UHAGE.* n. s. A kind of kidney-beans imported from the East Indies, called stinking-beans. The down growing on the outside of the pod is so pointed, as like a nettle to sting the flesh. The word has been corrupted into cow-itch; has been so given by Mason in his Supplement to Johnson's Dictionary, and illustrated by a mistake of Congreve: "As if he had sat upon cow-itch."

CO'VIN.† } n. s. [Skinner writes it coven,
CO'VINE. } from the Lat. conventum. So Bacon, covenous. Thus the Welsh coven, a covenant. But covin is the old English word, and is so written by Chaucer; from the old Fr. covin, "convention secret, 906." Lacombe.] A deceitful agreement between two or more, to the hurt of another. Cowel.

One covyn followeth another, and deceit is met with the lyke. Knight, Trial of Truth, (1580,) fol. 32. b.

The lawes overlashed by covine and craft,
And we that did governe did winke at this geare:
The worser thereby our faithfull friends were.
Mir. for Mag. p. 84.

CO'VING. n. s. [from cove.] A term in building, used of houses that project over the ground-plot and the turned projecture arched with timber, lathed and plaistered. Harris.

COULD. [the imperfect preterite of can. See CAN.] Was able to; had power to.

And if I have done well, and as is fitting the story, it is that which I desired; but if slenderly and meanly, it is that which I could attain unto.
2 Mac. xv. 38.

What if he did not all the ill he could?
Am I oblig'd by that to assist his rapines,
And to maintain his murders?
Dryden, Span. Friar.

COULD.* pret. of can, to know. See To CAN. [Sax. cuðe.] Knew. More frequently written, by our old authors, coud.

It seem'd that whilome he had beene
Some goodly person, and of gentle race,
That could his good to all.
Spenser, F. Q. vi. v. 36.

Nor need he guide; the way right well he could,
Which leads to sandy plains of Gaza old.
Fairfax, Tass. x. 4.

CO'ULTER.† n. s. [coulter, Fr. culter, Sax. culter, Latin.] The sharp iron of a plow which cuts the earth, perpendicular to the share.

The Israelites went down to sharpen every man his share, and his coulter, and his ax, and his mattock. 1 Sam, xiii. 20.

Literature is the grindstone to sharpen the coulters, to whet their natural faculties.
Hammond on Fundamentals.

The plough for stiff clays is long and broad, and the coulter long, and very little bending, with a very large wing. Mortimer.

CO'UNCIL. n. s. [concilium, Latin.]

1. An assembly of persons met together in consultation.

The chief priests, and all the council, sought false witness. Mat. xxvi. 59.

The Stygian council thus dissolv'd; and forth
In order came the grand infernal peers.
Milton, P. L.

In histories composed by politicians, they are for drawing up a perpetual scheme of causes and events, and preserving a constant correspondence between the camp and the council table.
Addison, Spect.

2. Act of publick deliberation.

The scepter'd heralds call
To council in the city gates: anon
Grey-headed men and grave, with warriors mix'd,
Assemble, and harangues are heard.
Milton, P. L.

3. An assembly of divines to deliberate upon religion.

Some borrow all their religion from the fathers of the Christian church, or from their synods or councils. Watts.

4. Persons called together to be consulted on any occasion, or to give advice.

They being thus assembled, are more properly a council to the king, the great council of the kingdom, to advise his majesty in those things of weight and difficulty, which concern both the king and people, than a court.
Bacon, Adv. to Villiers.

5. The body of privy counsellors.

Without the knowledge
Either of king or council, you made bold
To carry into Flanders the great seal.
Shakspeare, Hen. VIII.

COU'NCIL-BOARD. n. s. [council and board.] Council-table; table where matters of state are deliberated.

He hath commanded,
To morrow morning to the council-board,
He be convened. Shakspeare, Hen. VIII.

When ship-money was transacted at the council-board, they looked upon it as a work of that power they were obliged to trust. Clarendon.

And Pallas, if she broke the laws,
Must yield her foe the stronger cause:
A shame to one so much ador'd
For wisdom at Jove's council-board. Swift.

CO'UNCIL-TABLE.* n. s. The same as council-board.

Wherewith he wont at Heaven's high council-table
To sit the midst of Trinal Unity.
Milton, Ode Nativ. st. 2.

Whether you be at the top of fame, or entirely unknown to mankind; at the council-table, or at Dick's coffee-house. Gray to West.

COUNDERSTA'NDING.* n. s. [from con and understanding.] Mutual understanding.

An art is invented to speak with hands only, to carry the alphabet upon one's joints, and at his fingers' ends; which may be learned without any great difficulty by any mean capacity, and whereby one may discourse and deliver the conceptions of his mind without ever wagging of his tongue, provided there be a reciprocal knowledge and co-understanding of the art 'twixt the parties.
Howell, Lett. ii. 71.

To COUNI'TE.* v. a. [from con and unite.] To unite.

Ahad these three in one doth co-unite.
More, Song of the Soul, i. i. 39.

COUNI'TE.* adj. [from the verb.] United.

She [the soul] ———
Should be more perfectly there co-unite
In this her high and holy union,
Than with the body.
More, Song of the Soul, iii. iii. 17.

CO'UNSEL.† n. s. [conſeil, Sax. consilium, Latin.]

1. Advice; direction.

There is as much difference between the counsel that a friend giveth, and that a man giveth himself, as there is between the counsel of a friend and of a flatterer. Bacon, Ess. 28.

The best counsel he could give him was, to go to his parliament. Clarendon, b. viii.

Bereave me not,
Whereon I live, thy gentle looks, thy aid,
Thy counsel in this uttermost distress.
Milton, P. L.

2. Consultation; interchange of opinions.

I hold as little counsel with weak fear
As you, or any Scot that lives. Shaksp. Hen. IV.

3. Deliberation; examination of consequences.

They all confess therefore, in the working of that first cause, that counsel is used, reason followed, and a way observed. Hooker, i. § 2.

4. Prudence; art; machination.

O how comely is the wisdom of old men, and understanding and counsel to men of honour.
Ecclus. xxv. 5.

There is no wisdom, nor understanding, nor counsel against the Lord. Prov. xxi. 30.

5. Secrecy; the secrets intrusted in consulting.

The players cannot keep counsel; they'll tell all. Shakspeare.

6. Scheme; purpose; design. Not in use.

The counsel of the Lord standeth for ever, the thoughts of his heart to all generations.
Psalm xxxiii. 11.

O God! from whom all holy desires, all good counsels, and all just works do proceed.
Common Prayer.

7. Those that plead a cause; the counsellors. This seems only an abbreviature usual in conversation.

Your hand, a covenant; we will have these things set down by lawful counsel.
Shaksp. Cymbeline.

For the advocates and counsel that plead, patience and gravity of learning is an essential part of justice; and an over-speaking judge is no well tuned cymbal. Bacon, Ess. 57.

What says my counsel learned in the law. Pope.

CO'UNSEL-KEEPER.* n. s. [counsel and keeper.] One who can keep a secret; a confidant.

His man; — his note-book, his counsel-keeper.
Shakspeare, K. Hen. IV. P. II.

Co'UNSEL-KEEPING.* adj. That preserves secrecy.

Curtain'd with a counsel-keeping cave.
Tit. Andronicus.

To Co'UNSEL.† v. a. [old Fr. conseiller; Lat. consilior.]

1. To give advice or counsel to any person.

But say, Lucetta, now we are alone,
Would'st thou then counsel me to fall in love?
Shaksp.

Truth shall nurse her;
Holy and heav'nly thoughts will counsel her.
Shaksp. Hen. VIII.

There is danger of being unfaithfully counsell'd, and more for the good of them that counsel than for him that is counsell'd. Bacon.

Ill fortune never crushed that man whom good fortune deceived not: I therefore have counselled my friends never to trust to her fairer side, though she seemed to make peace with them.
B. Jonson, Discoveries.

He supports my poverty with his wealth, and I counsel and instruct him with my learning and experience. Bp. Taylor.

2. To advise any thing.

The less had been our shame,
The less his counsell'd crime which brands the Grecian name. Dryden, Fab.

Co'UNSELLABLE.† adj. [from counsel.]

1. Willing to receive and follow the advice or opinions of others.

Very few men of so great parts were more counsellable than he; so that he would seldom be in danger of great errours, if he would communicate his own thoughts to disquisition.
Clarendon.

2. Advisable.

He did not believe it counsellable.
Ld. Clarendon's Life, i. 178.

Co'UNSELLOR. n. s. [from counsel.] This should rather be written counseller.

1. One that gives advice.

His mother was his counsellor to do wickedly.
2 Chr. xxii. 3.

She would be a counsellor of good things, and a comfort in cares. Wisd. viii. 9.

Death of thy soul! Those linen cheeks of thine
Are counsellors to fear. Shaksp. Macbeth.

2. Confidant; bosom friend.

In such green palaces the first kings reign'd,
Slept in their shades, and angels entertain'd;
With such old counsellors they did advise,
And by frequenting sacred groves grew wise.
Waller.

3. One whose province is to deliberate and advise upon publick affairs.

You are a counsellor,
And by that virtue no man dare accuse you.
Shaksp. Hen. VIII.

Of counsellors there are two sorts: the first, consiliarii nati, as I may term them; such are the prince of Wales, and others of the king's sons: but the ordinary sort of counsellors are such as the king, out of a due consideration of their worth and abilities, and, withal, of their fidelity to his person and to his crown, calleth to be of council with him, in his ordinary government.
Bacon, Adv. to Villiers.

4. One that is consulted in a case of law; a lawyer.

A counsellor bred up in the knowledge of the municipal and statute laws, may honestly inform a just prince, how far his prerogative extends.
Dryden, Juv. Ded.

Co'UNSELLORSHIP. n. s. [from counsellor.] The office or post of a privy counsellor.

Of the great offices and officers of the kingdom, the most part are such as cannot well be severed from the counsellorship. Bacon, Adv. to Villiers.

To COUNT.† v. a. [counter, old Fr. compter, mod. computare, Lat.]

1. To number; to tell.

Here through this grate I can count every one,
And view the Frenchmen. Shaksp. Hen. VI.

The vicious count their years; virtuous, their acts. Jonson.

For the preferments of the world, he that would reckon up all the accidents that they depend upon, may as well undertake to count the sands, or to sum up infinity. South.

When men in sickness ling'ring lie,
They count the tedious hours by months and years.
Dryden.

Argos now rejoice, for Thebes lies low;
Thy slaughter'd sons now smile, and think they won,
When they can count more Theban ghosts than theirs. Dryden.

2. To preserve a reckoning.

Some people in America counted their years by the coming of certain birds amongst them at their certain seasons, and leaving them at others.
Locke.

3. To reckon; to place to an account.

He believed in the Lord, and he counted it to him for righteousness. Gen. xv. 6.

Not barely the plowman's pains is to be counted into the bread we eat; the labour of those who broke the oxen, must all be charged on the account of labour. Locke.

4. To esteem; to account; to reckon; to consider as having a certain character, whether good or evil.

When once it comprehendeth any thing above this, as the differences of time, affirmations, negations, and contradictions in speech, we then count it to have some use of natural reason. Hooker.

Count not thine handmaid for a daughter of Belial. 1 Sam. i. 16.

Nor shall I count it heinous to enjoy
The publick marks of honour and reward
Conferr'd upon me. Milton, S. A.

You would not wish to count this man a foe!
In friendship, and in hatred, obstinate.
Philips's Briton.

5. To impute to; to charge to.

All th' impossibilities, which poets
Count to extravagance of loose description,
Shall sooner be. Rowe, Amb. Stepmother.

To COUNT. v. n. To found an account or scheme: with upon.

I think it a great errour to count upon the genius of a nation as a standing argument in all ages.
Swift.

COUNT.† n. s. [compte, French; computus, Latin.]

1. Number.

That we up to your palaces may mount,
Of blessed saints for to increase the count.
Spenser, Epithal.

2. Reckoning; number summed.

Every man according to his eating, shall make your count for the lamb. Exod. xii. 4.

By my count
I was your mother much upon these years. Shaks.
Since I saw you last,
There is a change upon you.
——— Well, I know not
What counts hard fortune casts upon my face.
Shakspeare.

3. Estimation; account.

Some other, that in hard assaies
Were cowards knowne, and little count did hold,
Either through gifts, or guile, or such like waies,
Crept in by stouping low. Spenser, F. Q. iv. x. 18.

4. In law, a charge in an indictment, or a declaration in pleading.

COUNT.† n. s. [comte, Fr. comes, Lat.] A title of foreign nobility; supposed equivalent to an earl.

Comes, the count of the Francs, is the earl of the shire. Blackstone.

Co'UNTABLE. adj. [from count.] That may be numbered.

The evils which you desire to be recounted are very many, and almost countable with those which were hidden in the basket of Pandora.
Spenser on Ireland.

COU'NTENANCE. n. s. [contenance, Fr.]

1. The form of the face; the system of the features.

2. Air; look.

A made countenance about her mouth between simpering and smiling, her head bowed, somewhat down, seemed to languish with over much idleness. Sidney.

Well, Suffolk, yet thou shalt not see me blush,
Nor change my countenance for this arrest.
A heart unspotted is not easily daunted.
Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

So spake our sire, and by his count'nance seem'd
Entering on studious thoughts abstruse.
Milton, P. L.

To whom, with count'nance calm, and soul sedate,
Thus Turnus. Dryden, Æn.

3. Calmness of look; composure of face.

She smil'd severe; nor with a troubled look,
Or trembling hand, the fun'ral present took;
Ev'n kept her count'nance, when the lid remov'd,
Disclos'd the heart unfortunately lov'd.
Dryden, Fab.

The two great maxims of any great man at court are, always to keep his countenance, and never to keep his word. Swift.

4. Confidence of mien; aspect of assurance: it is commonly used in these phrases in countenance, and out of countenance.

The night beginning to persuade some retiring place, the gentlewoman, even out of countenance before she began her speech, invited me to lodge that night with her father. Sidney.

We will not make your countenance to fall by the answer ye shall receive. Bacon, New Atlantis.

Their best friends were out of countenance, because they found that the imputations, which their enemies had laid upon them, were well grounded.
Clarendon.

Your examples will meet it at every turn, and put it out of countenance in every place; even in private corners it will soon lose confidence.
Sprat's Serm.

If the outward profession of religion and virtue were once in practice and countenance at court, a good treatment of the clergy would be the necessary consequence. Swift.

If those preachers would look about, they would find one part of their congregation out of countenance, and the other asleep. Swift.

It is a kind of ill manners to offer objections to a fine woman, and a man would be out of countenance that should gain the superiority in such a contest: a coquette logician may be rallied, but not contradicted. Addison, Freeholder.

It puts the learned in countenance, and gives them a place among the fashionable part of mankind. Addison, Freeholder.

5. Kindness or ill-will, as it appears upon the face.

Yet the stout fairy, 'mongst the middest crowd,
Thought all their glory vain in knightly view,
And that great princess too, exceeding proud,
That to strange knight no better countenance allow'd. Spenser, F. Q.

6. Patronage; appearance of favour; appearance on any side; support.

The church of Christ, which held that profession which had not the publick allowance and countenance of authority, could not use the exercise of Christian religion but in private. Hooker.

His majesty maintained an army here, to give strength and countenance to the civil magistrate. Davies on Ireland.

Now then, we'll use
His countenance for the battle; which being done,
Let her who would be rid of him, devise
His speedy taking off. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

This is the magistrate's peculiar province, to give countenance to piety and virtue, and to rebuke vice and profaneness. Atterbury.

7. Superficial appearance; show; resemblance.

The election being done, he made countenance of great discontent thereat. Ascham, Schoolmaster.

Oh, you blessed ministers above!
Keep me in patience, and with ripen'd time
Unfold the evil, which is here wrapt up
In countenance. Shakspeare, Meas. for Meas.

Bianca's love
Made me exchange my state with Tranio,
While he did bear my countenance in the town. Shakspeare.

To Co'UNTENANCE. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To support; to patronise; to vindicate.

Neither shalt thou countenance a poor man in his cause. Exod. xxiii. 3.

This conceit, though countenanced by learned men, is not made out either by experience or reason. Brown.

This national fault of being so very talkative, looks natural and graceful in one that has grey hairs to countenance it. Addison.

2. To make a shew of.

Each to these ladies love did countenance,
And to his mistress each himself strove to advance. Spenser, F. Q.

3. To act suitably to any thing; to keep up any appearance.

Malcolm! Banquo!
As from your graves rise up, and walk like sprights,
To countenance this horrour. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

4. To encourage; to appear in defence.

At the first descent on shore he was not immured with a wooden vessel, but he did countenance the landing in his longboat. Wotton.

Co'UNTENANCER.† n. s. [from countenance.] One that countenances or supports another.

Are you her Grace's countenancer, Lady?
Beaum. and Fl. Honest Man's Fortune.

He is a great countenancer of learned men. Brown, Travels, (1685,) p. 141.

Co'UNTER.† n. s. [from count.]

1. A false piece of money used as a means of reckoning.

Will you with counters sum
The vast proportion of his infinite?
Shakspeare, Tr. and Cress.

Though these half-pence are to be received as money in the Exchequer, yet in trade they are no better than counters. Swift, Consid. on Wood's Coin.

2. Money in contempt.

When Marcus Brutus grows so covetous,
To lock such rascal counters from his friends,
Be ready, gods! with all your thunder-bolts,
Dash him to pieces. Shakspeare, Jul. Cæs.

3. The table on which goods are viewed and money told in a shop.

A fine gaudy minx, that robs our counters every night; and then goes out, and spends it upon our cuckold-makers. Dryden.

In half-whipt muslin, needles useless lie;
And shuttle-cocks a-cross the counter fly.
Gay's Trivia.

Sometimes you would see him behind his counter selling broad-cloth, sometimes measuring linen. Arbuthnot.

Whether thy counter shine with sums untold,
And thy wide-grasping hand grows black with gold. Swift.

4. A box for cash. Coles.

5. A reckoner. [compteur, Fr.] Sherwood.

6. Encounter; trial of skill.

And he, the man whom nature selfe had made
To mock herselfe, and truth to imitate,
With kindly counter under mimick shade.
Spenser, Tears of the Muses.

7. An auditor. Chaucer uses this word, in the Prol. to his Canterbury Tales, saying of the Franklin, "A sheriff had he been, and a countour." Urry's edition of Chaucer reads coroner; and Mr. Warton has both adopted and illustrated that obtruded word. Nor has the genuine word, counter, satisfied Mr. Tyrwhitt, who confesses he knows not what to make of it; while he introduces, from Robert of Gloucester, what seems to illustrate the true expression, which exists in our old lexicography; namely, as an auditor, in that of Huloet.

And Adam of Arderne was his chief countour.
Robert of Glouc.

8. Counter of a horse, is that part of a horse's forehand that lies between the shoulder and under the neck. Farrier's Dict.

Co'UNTER.* n. s. A name of some prisons in London.

Thou might'st as well say, I love to walk by the Counter-gate; which is as hateful to me as the reek of a lime-kiln. Shaks. Merry W. of Windsor.

Co'UNTER. adv. [contre, Fr. contra, Lat.]

1. Contrary to; in opposition to: it is commonly used with the verb run, perhaps by a metaphor from the old tournaments.

Shall we erect two wills in God's, and make the will of his purpose and intention run counter to the will of his approbation. South.

The profit of the merchant, and the gain of the kingdom, are so far from being always parallels, that frequently they run counter one to the other. Child on Trade.

He thinks it brave, at his first setting out, to signalize himself in running counter to all the rules of virtue. Locke.

2. The wrong way; contrarily to the right course.

How chearfully on the false trail they cry,
Oh, this is counter, you false Danish dogs.
Shakspeare, Hamlet.

3. Contrary ways.

A man whom I cannot deny, may oblige me to use persuasions to another, which, at the same time I am speaking, I may wish may not prevail on him: in this case, it is plain, the will and the desire run counter. Locke.

4. The face in opposition to the back. Not in use.

They hit one another with darts, as the other do with their hands, which they never throw counter, but at the back of the flyer. Sandys, Journey.

5. This word is often found in composition, and may be placed before either nouns or verbs used in a sense of opposition.

That design was no sooner known, but others of an opposite party were appointed to set a counter-petition on foot. Clarendon.

To CO'UNTERACT.† v. a. [counter and act. Formerly written also contra-act.] To hinder any thing from its effect by contrary agency.

In this case we can find no principle within him strong enough to counteract that principle, and to relieve him. South.

These have no antagonist grinders, nor contra-acting milstones.
Smith's Portraiture of Old Age, p. 83.

Counterac'tion.* n. s. [from the verb.] Opposition.

The beauties of writing have been observed to be often such as cannot, in the present state of knowledge, be evinced by evidence or drawn out into demonstrations: they are therefore wholly subject to the imagination, and do not force their effects upon a mind preoccupied by unfavourable sentiments, nor overcome the counter-action of a false principle or of stubborn partiality.
Johnson, Rambler, No. 93.

Counterattra'ction.* n. s. [from counter and attraction.] Opposite attraction.

Attractions of either kind are less perspicuous, and less perceptible, through a variety of counter-attractions that diminish their effect. Shenstone.

To CO'UNTERBALANCE. v. a. [counter and balance.] To weigh against; to act against with an opposite weight.

There was so much air drawn out of the vessel, that the remaining air was not able to counterbalance the mercurial cylinder. Boyle.

Few of Adam's children are not born with some biass, which it is the business of education either to take off, or counterbalance. Locke.

Co'UNTERBALANCE. n. s. [from the verb.] Opposite weight; equivalent power.

But peaceful kings, o'er martial people set,
Each other's poise and counterbalance are.
Dryden, An. Mirab.

Money is the counterbalance to all other things purchaseable by it, and lying as it were, in the opposite scale of commerce. Locke.

Co'UNTERBOND.* n. s. [from counter and bond.] A counter-surety, or counter-bond, to a surety. Sherwood.

To CO'UNTERBUFF. v. a. [from counter and buff.] To impell in a direction opposite to the former impulse; to strike back.

The giddy ship, betwixt the winds and tides,
Forc'd back and forwards, in a circle rides,
Stunn'd with the diff'rent blows; then shoots amain,
'Till counterbuff'd she stops, and sleeps again.
Dryden.

Co'UNTERBUFF. n. s. [counter and buff.] A blow in a contrary direction; a stroke that produces a recoil.

He at the second gave him such a counterbuff, that, because Phalantus was not to be driven from the saddle, the saddle with broken girths was driven from the horse. Sidney.

Go, captain Stub, lead on and show
What house you come of, by the blow
You give Sir Quintin, and the cuff
You 'scape o' th' sandbags counterbuff. B. Jonson.

CO'UNTERCAST.* n. s. [from counter, a false piece of money; and cast, to devise.] A trick: delusive contrivance.

He gan devize this counter-cast of slight,
To give faire colour to that ladies cause in sight.
Spenser, F. Q. vi. iii. 16.

Co'UNTERCASTER. n. s. [from counter, for a false piece of money, and caster.] A word of contempt for an arithmetician; a book-keeper; a caster of accounts; a reckoner.

I, of whom his eyes had seen the proof
At Rhodes, at Cyprus, must be beleed and calm'd
By debtor and creditor, this countercaster.
Shakspeare, Othello.

CO'UNTERCHANGE.† n. s. [Fr. contrechange.] Exchange; reciprocation.

She, like harmless lightning, throws her eye
On him, her brothers, me, her master, hitting
Each object with a joy. The counterchange
Is sev'rally in all. Shakspeare, Cymbeline.

To Co'UNTERCHANGE.† v. a. [Fr. contrechanger.] To give and receive; to exchange.

Then shall aggrandiz'd love confess
That souls can mingle substances,
That hearts can eas'ly counter-changed be.
J. Hall, Poems, (1646,) p. 28.

CO'UNTERCHARM.† n. s. [counter and charm.] That by which a charm is dissolved; that which has the power of destroying the effects of a charm.

Now what your sense of the other world would be if you had seen it, that will your belief of it be, when 'tis founded upon clear and satisfactory evidence; 'twill be an infallible counter-charm against the most bewitching temptations.
Scott, Christian Life, ii. v.

But should I tell him that it was poison, that was of this so rare a taste, colour, and smell, this would be a full allay to his desire, and a sufficient counter-charm to all its other alluring qualities.
South, Serm. viii. 106.

Now touch'd by counter-charms they change again,
And stand majestick, and recall'd to men.
Pope, Odyssey.

To Co'UNTERCHARM.† v. a. [from counter and charm.] To destroy the effect of an enchantment.

For what to us is balm, to them are wounds,
Whom grief strikes, fear distracts, and shame confounds,
To find at once the magick counter-charm'd,
Their arts discover'd, and their strength disarm'd.
Ld. Falkland, Verses pref. to Sandys's Job, 1648.

Nor can her beams a heat convey
That may my frozen bosome warm,
Unless her smiles have power, as they
That a cross charm can countercharm.
Lovelace, Luc. P. p. 28.

Seducing Hope, farewell.
No more deceive me!
I now can countercharm thy spell.
Cotton's Ode to Hope.

Like a spell it was to keep us invulnerable, and so countercharm all our crimes, that they should only be active to please, not hurt us.
Decay of Piety.

To CO'UNTERCHECK.† v. a. [counter and check.] To oppose; to stop with sudden opposition.

Until some other realme, that on the frontiers lies,
Be hazarded again by other enemies,
Doe then betwixt themselves to composition fall,
To countercheck that sword, else like to conquer all.
Drayton, Polyolb. S. 3.

Who shall countercheck
The wanton pride of greatness.
Habington's Castara, P. ii.

Co'UNTERCHECK.† n. s. [from the verb.] Stop; rebuke.

If again I said his beard was not well cut, he would say I lye: this is called the countercheck quarrelsome. Shakspeare.

COUNTERDISTI'NCTION.* n. s. [from counter and distinction.] Contradistinction, which see.

I call it moral, in counterdistinction to philosophical or physical. More, Conject. Cabb. p. 195.

To Co'UNTERDRAW. v. a. [from counter and draw.] With painters to copy a design or painting by means of a fine linen cloth, an oiled paper, or other transparent matter, whereon the strokes appearing through are traced with a pencil.
Chambers.

COUNTERE'VIDENCE. n. s. [counter and evidence.] Testimony by which the deposition of some former witness is opposed.

Sense itself detects its more palpable deceits by a counter evidence, and the more ordinary impostures seldom outlive the first experiments.
Glanville, Scepsis.

We have little reason to question his testimony in this point, seeing it is backed by others of good credit, and all because there is no counterevidence, nor any witness that appears against it.
Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

COUNTERFA'ISANCE.* See COUNTERFESANCE.

To CO'UNTERFEIT. v. a. [contrefaire, French.]

1. To copy with an intent to pass the copy for an original; to forge.

What art thou,
That counterfeits the person of a king?
Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

It came into this priest's fancy to cause this lad to counterfeit and personate the second son of Edward IV. supposed to be murdered.
Bacon, Hen. VII.

There have been some that could counterfeit the distance of voices, which is a secondary object of hearing, in such sort, as when they stand fast by you, you would think the speech came from afar off in a fearful manner. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Say, lovely dream, where could'st thou find
Shadows to counterfeit that face? Waller.

It happens that not one single line or thought is contained in this imposture, although it appears that they who counterfeited me had heard of the true one. Swift.

2. To imitate; to copy; to resemble.

And, oh, you mortal engines, whose rude throats
Th' immortal Jove's dread clamours counterfeit,
Farewel! Shakspeare, Othello.

O Eve! in evil hour thou did'st give ear
To that false worm, of whomsoever taught
To counterfeit man's voice. Milton, P. L.

To counterfeit, is to put on the likeness and appearance of some real excellency: Bristol-stones would not pretend to be diamonds, if there never had been diamonds. Tillotson.

To Co'UNTERFEIT.* v. n. To feign.

How ill agrees it with your gravity,
To counterfeit thus grossly with your slave.
Shakspeare, Com. of Err.

Co'UNTERFEIT. adj. [from the verb.]

1. That which is made in imitation of another, with intent to pass for the original; forged; fictitious.

I learn
Now of my own experience, not by talk,
How counterfeit a coin they are, who friends
Bear in their superscription; in prosperous days
They swarm, but in adverse withdraw their head.
Milton, S. A.

General observations drawn from particulars, are the jewels of knowledge, comprehending great store in a little room; but they are therefore to be made with the greater care and caution, lest, if we take counterfeit for true, our shame be the greater, when our stock comes to a severe scrutiny. Locke.

2. Deceitful; hypocritical.

True friends appear less mov'd than counterfeit.
Roscommon.

Co'UNTERFEIT.† n. s. [from the verb.]

1. One who personates another: an impostor.

Now when these counterfeits were thus uncased
Out of the foreside of their foregerie,
And in the sight of all men cleane disgraced,
All gan to jest and gibe full merrilie
At the remembrance of their knaverie.
Spenser, F. Q. v. iii. 39.

I am no counterfeit; to die is to be a counterfeit; for he is but the counterfeit of a man, who hath not the life of a man. Shakspeare.

This priest, being utterly unacquainted with the true person, according to whose pattern he should shape his counterfeit, yet could think it possible for him to instruct his player, either in gesture or fashions or in fit answers to questions, to come near the resemblance. Bacon.

But trust me, child, I'm much inclin'd to fear
Some counterfeit in this your Jupiter.
Addison, Ovid.

2. Something made in imitation of another, intended to pass for that which it resembles; a forgery.

My father was I know not where,
When I was stampt. Some coiner, with his tools,
Made me a counterfeit; yet my mother seem'd
The Dian of that time. Shakspeare, Cymb.

There would be no counterfeits but for the sake of something real; though pretenders seem to be what they really are not, yet they pretend to be something that really is. Tillotson.

3. Formerly, it had not the bad sense which is given in the preceding definition; it meant merely a resemblance, a likeness, a picture, or, as we now say, a copy.

What find I here?
Fair Portia's counterfeit? What demigod
Hath come so near creation? Move these eyes?
Shakspeare, Merch. of Venice.

Co'UNTERFEITER.† n. s. [from counterfeit.]

1. A forger; one who contrives copies to pass for originals.

Henry the Second altered the coin, which was corrupted by counterfeiters, to the great good of the commonwealth. Camden.

2. An impostor; "a counterfeiter of devotion and religion." Sherwood.

Co'UNTERFEITLY. adv. [from counterfeit.] Falsely; fictitiously; with forgery.

Since the wisdom of their choice is rather to have my cap than my heart, I will practise the insinuating nod, and be off to them most counterfeitly. Shakspeare, Coriol.

Co'UNTERFEITNESS.* n. s. [from counterfeit.] The state of being counterfeit.

A reply to which came out afterwards, shewing the counterfeitness of Dr. Anthony's Aurum Potabile, Oxon. 1623. Ward's Gresham Prof. p. 265.

COUNTERFE'RMENT. n. s. [counter and ferment.] Ferment opposed to ferment.

What unnatural motions and counterferments must a medley of intemperance produce in the body! When I behold a fashionable table, I fancy I see innumerable distempers lurking in ambuscade among the dishes. Addison, Spect.

COUNTERFE'SANCE.† n. s. [contrefaisance, French. More usually written counterfaisance by our old writers.] The act of counterfeiting; forgery. Not now in use.

And his man Reynold, with fine counterfesance,
Supports his credit and his countenance.
Spenser, Hubb. Tale.

Such is the face of falsehood, such the sight
Of foul Duessa, when her borrow'd light
Is laid away, and counterfesance known.
Spenser, F. Q.

The outward expression and counterfaisance of all these is the form of godliness.
Bp. Hall, Serm. The Hypocrite.

But must he die to-morrow?
Shakspeare, Meas. for Meas.

To CO'UNTERMARCH. v. n. [counter and march.] To march backward; to march in direct ways.

Co'UNTERMARCH. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. Retrocession; march backward; march in a different direction from the former.

How are such an infinite number of things placed with such order in the memory, notwithstanding the tumults, marches, and countermarches of the animal spirits? Collier on Thought.

2. Change of measures; alteration of conduct.

They make him do and undo, go forward and backwards by such countermarches and retractions, as we do not willingly impute to wisdom. Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

CO'UNTERMARK. n. s. [from counter and mark.]

1. A second or third mark put on a bale of goods belonging to several merchants, that it may not be opened but in the presence of them all.

2. The mark of the goldsmith's company, to shew the metal is standard, added to that of the artificer.

3. An artificial cavity made in the teeth of horses, that have out-grown their natural mark, to disguise their age.

4. A mark added to a medal a long time after it is struck, by which the curious know the several changes in value which it has undergone. Chambers.

To Co'UNTERMARK. v. a. [counter and mark.]

A horse is said to be countermarked when his corner-teeth are artificially made hollow, a false mark being made in the hollow place, in imitation of the eye of a bean, to conceal the horse's age. Farrier's Dict.

CO'UNTERMINE. n. s. [counter and mine.]

1. A well or hole sunk into the ground, from which a gallery or branch runs out under ground, to seek out the enemy's mine, and disappoint it. Military Dict.

After this they mined the walls, laid the powder, and rammed the mouths; but the citizens made a countermine, and thereinto they poured such a plenty of water, that the wet powder could not be fired. Hayward.

2. Means of opposition; means of counteraction.

He thinking himself contemned, knowing no countermine against contempt but terror, began to let nothing pass, which might bear the colour of a fault, without sharp punishment. Sidney.

3. A stratagem by which any contrivance is defeated.

The matter being brought to a trial of skill, the countermine was only an act of self-preservation. L'Estrange.

To Co'UNTERMINE.† v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To delve a passage into an enemy's mine, by which the powder may evaporate without mischief.

2. To counterwork; to defeat by secret measures.

How intricate a work have they, who are gone to consult which of these sicknesses is mine; and then which of these fevers; and then what it would do; and then how it may be countermined. Donne, Devot. (1624.) p. 205.

Thus infallibly it must be, if God do not miraculously countermine us, and do more for us than we can do against ourselves. Decay of Piety.

COUNTERMO'TION. n. s. [counter and motion.] Contrary motion; opposition of motion.

That resistance is a countermotion, or equivalent to one, is plain by this, that any body which is pressed, must needs press again on the body that presses it. Digby on the Soul.

If any of the returning spirits should happen to fall foul upon others which are outward bound, these countermotions would overset them, or occasion a later arrival. Collier.

COUNTERMO'VEMENT.* n. s. [from counter and movement.] A manner of moving in opposition to another movement; chiefly, perhaps, a military term.

CO'UNTERMURE.† n. s. [contremur, Fr.] A wall built up behind another wall, to supply its place.

The great shot flying through the breach, did beat down houses; but the countermure, new built against the breach, standing upon a lower ground, it seldom touched. Knolles.

Cæsar, to besiege the conquered, made a countermure of dead carcasses. May's Lucan, B. 1. Notes.

To Co'UNTERMURE.* v. a. [from the noun.] To fortify, as with a countermure.

They are plac'd in those imperial heights,
Where, countermur'd with walls of diamond,
I find the place impregnable. Kyd, Spanish Trag.

COUNTERNA'TURAL. adj. [counter and natural.] Contrary to nature.

A consumption is a counternatural hectic extenuation of the body. Harvey on Consumptions.

Co'UNTERNOISE. n. s. [counter and noise.] A sound by which any noise is overpowered.

They endeavoured, either by a constant succession of sensual delights, to charm and lull asleep, or else, by a counternoise of revellings and riotous excesses, to drown the softer whispers of their conscience. Calamy, Serm.

COUNTERO'PENING. n. s. [counter and opening.] An aperture or vent on the contrary side.

A tent, plugging up the orifice, would make the matter recur to the part disposed to receive it, and mark the place for a counteropening. Sharp, Surgery.

Co'UNTERPACE. n. s. [counter and pace.] Contrary measure, attempts in opposition to any scheme.

When the least counterpaces are made to these resolutions, it will then be time enough for our malecontents. Swift.

Co'UNTERPANE.† n. s. [contrepoint, Fr.]

1. A coverlet for a bed, or any thing else woven in squares. It is sometimes written, according to etymology, counterpoint, which see.

2. One part of a pair of deeds; "the contrepayne of a deed or writing," Huloet; "the counterpane of a schedule," Cotgrave. [Fr. contrepan, or contrepant.] Not now in use; counterpart being its successor.

Read, scribe; give me the counterpane. B. Jonson, Barthol. Fair.

Co'UNTERPART. n. s. [counter and part.] The correspondent part; the part which answers to another, as the two papers of a contract; the part which fits another, as the key of a cipher.

In some things the laws of Normandy agreed with the laws of England; so that they seem to be, as it were, copies or counterparts one of another. Hale, Law of England.

An old fellow with a young wench, may pass for a counterpart of this fable. L'Estrange.

Oh counterpart
Of our soft sex; well are you made our lords:
So bold, so great, so god-like are you form'd,
How can you love so silly things as women?
Dryden.

He is to consider the thought of his author, and his words, and to find out the counterpart to each in another language. Dryden.

In the discovery the two different plots look like counterparts and copies of one another. Addison, Spect.

COUNTERPETI'TION.* n. s. [from counter and petition.] See Lord Clarendon in COUNTER.

To COUNTERPETI'TION.* v. n. [from the noun.] To petition against another petition.

The gentlemen and others of Yorkshire, who had counterpetitioned, and declared their abhorrence of the tumultuous petition for a meeting of parliament, were voted betrayers of the liberties of the people, &c. Reresby's Mem. p.102.

Co'UNTERPLEA. n. s. [from counter and plea.] In law, a replication: as if a stranger to the action begun, desire to be admitted to say what he can for the safeguard of his estate; that which the demandant allegeth against this request is called a counterplea. Cowel.

To CO'UNTERPLOT.† v. a. [counter and plot.] To oppose one machination by another; to obviate art by art.

Their enemies — being very active to deceive the nations; whom they should counterplot, by being as active to convert them to the truth. More, Ex. of the Seven Ch. p.155.

Prudentia had counterplotted us, and had bespoke on the same evening, the Puppet Show of The Creation of the World. Tatler, No.16.

Co'UNTERPLOT. n. s. [from the verb.] An artifice opposed to an artifice.

The wolf that had a plot upon the kid, was confounded by a counterplot of the kid's upon the wolf; and such a counterplot as the wolf, with all his sagacity, was not able to smell out. L'Estrange.

COUNTERPLO'TTING.* n. s. [from counterplot.] The act of opposing.

A third reason that God's displeasure so implacably burns against this sin is, because it is evidently a counterplotting of God. South, Serm. ix. 200.

CO'UNTERPOINT.* n. s. [Ital. contrappunto.] This word was formerly a monkish term for that kind of musick, in which notes of equal duration, but of different harmony, are set in opposition to each other; the art of composing harmony. See CONTRAPUNTIST.

Neyther shall the swete organs —— be played upon; not yet the fresh descant, prychsonge, counterpoint, &c. Bale on the Revel.(1550,) B.b.8.

What old Calvin meant to be sung in unison, they chose should be performed in counterpoint, or in four parts. Mason on Church Musick, p.208.

Co'UNTERPOINT.† n. s. A coverlet woven in squares, commonly spoken counterpain. See COUNTERPANE. Counterpoints were anciently composed of patchwork, says Mr. Steevens, referring analogically to counterpoint in musick; and were so contrived, that every pane or partition of them was contrasted with one of a different colour, though of the same dimensions.

In ivory coffers I have stuff'd my crowns;
In cypress chests my arras, counterpoints,
Costly apparel, tents, and canopies.
Shakspeare, Tam. of the Shrew.

Co'UNTERPOINT.* n. s. [from counter and point.] An opposite point or course.

Affecting in themselves, and their followers, a certain angelical purity, [they] fell sodainly into the very counterpoint of justifying bestiality. Sir E. Sandys, State of Religion.

To CO'UNTERPOISE. v. a. [counter and poise.]

1. To counterbalance; to be equi-ponderant to; to act against with equal weight.

Our spoil we have brought home,
Do more than counterpoise a full third part
The charges of the action. Shakspeare, Coriol.

The force and the distance of weights, counterpoising one another, ought to be reciprocal. Digby on the Soul.

2. To produce a contrary action by an equal weight.

The heaviness of bodies must be counterpoised by a plummet, fastened about the pulley to the axis. Wilkins.

3. To act with equal power against any person or cause.

So many freeholders of English will be able to beard and to counterpoise the rest. Spenser on Ireland.

Co'UNTERPOISE. n. s. [from counter and poise.]

1. Equiponderance; equivalence of weight; equal force in the opposite scale of the balance.

Take her by the hand,
And tell her she is thine; to whom I promise
A counterpoise, if not in thy estate,
A balance more replete. Shakspeare, All's well.

Fastening that to our exact balance, we put a metalline counterpoise into the opposite scale. Boyle, Spring of the Air.

2. The state of being placed in the opposite scale of the balance.

The Eternal — hung forth his golden scales,—
Wherein all things created first he weigh'd,
The pendulous round earth with balanc'd air
In counterpoise. Milton, P. L.

3. Equipollence; equivalence of power.

The second nobles are a counterpoise to the higher nobility, that they grow not too potent. Bacon.

Their generals, by their credit in the army, were, with the magistrates and other civil officers, a sort of counterpoise to the power of the people. Swift.

COUNTERPO'ISON. n. s. [counter and poison.] Antidote; medicine by which the effects of poison are obviated.

Counterpoisons must be adapted to the cause; for example, in poison from sublimate corrosive, and arsenick. Arbuthnot.

COUNTERPRA'CTICE.* n. s. [from counter and practice.] Practice in opposition.

Against the stroke of Providence, all counterpractices are vain.
Proceedings against Garnet, (1606,) C c c.2.b.

COUNTERPRE'SSURE. n. s. [counter and pressure.] Opposite force; power acting in contrary directions.

Does it not all mechanick heads confound,
That troops of atoms from all parts around,
Of equal number, and of equal force,
Should to this single point direct their course;
That so the counterpressure ev'ry way,
Of equal vigour, might their motions stay,
And, by a steady poise, the whole in quiet lay?
Blackmore.

COUNTERPRO'JECT. n. s. [counter and project.] Correspondent part of a scheme.

A clear reason why they never sent any forces to Spain, and why the obligation not to enter into a treaty of peace with France, until that entire monarchy was yielded as a preliminary, was struck out of the counterproject by the Dutch. Swift.

To Co'UNTERPROVE. v. a. [from counter and prove.] To take off a design in black lead, or red chalk, by passing it through the rolling-press with another piece of paper, both being moistened with a sponge. Chambers.

COU'NTER-REVOLU'TION.* n.s. [counter and revolution.] A revolution succeeding another, and opposite to it; as from monarchy to republicanism, and then from republicanism to monarchy.

A better witness back than words, which we,
On like conditions, will have counterseal'd.
Shakspeare, Coriol.

To Co'UNTERSECURE.* v. a. [from counter and secure.] To render more secure by corresponding means.

What have the regicides promised you in return, in case you should shew what they would call dispositions to conciliation and equity, whilst you are giving that pledge from the throne, and engaging parliament to countersecure it? Burke on a Regicide Peace.

Co'UNTERSENSE.* n. s. [from counter and sense.] Opposite meaning.

There are some words now in French, which are turned to a countersense. Howell, Lett. iv. 19.

To CO'UNTERSIGN.† v. a. [from counter and sign.] To sign an order or patent of a superiour, in quality of secretary, to render it more authentick. Thus charters are signed by the king, and countersigned by a secretary of state, or lord chancellor. Chambers.

He had brought a letter to his lordship from the king, with one enclosed in it to the lords of the privy council, which he shewed me. I read it it was countersigned Melford. Ld. Clarendon's Diary, 1688–9.

Co'UNTERSIGN.* n. s. [from the verb.] A military expression, denoting the watch-word of the day.

Co'UNTERSIGNAL.* n. s. [from counter and signal.] A corresponding signal; a naval term.

Co'UNTERSNARL.* n. s. [from counter and snarl.] Snarl in defence, or opposition.

As a cur that goes through a village, if he clap his tail between his legs and run away, every cur will insult over him; but if he bristle up himself, and stand to it, give but a countersnarl, there's not a dog dares meddle with him: much is in a man's courage and discreet carriage of himself.
Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 364.

Co'UNTERSTATUTE.* n. s. [from counter and statute.] A contradictory ordinance.

His own antinomy or counterstatute.
Milton, Doct. and Disc. of Divorce.

Co'UNTERSWAY.* n. s. [from counter and sway.] Opposite influence, or direction.

By a countersway of restraint curbing their wild exorbitance almost in the other extreme; as when we bow things the contrary way, to make them come to their natural straightness.
Milton, Doct. and Disc. of Divorce.

Co'UNTERSTROKE.* n. s. [from counter and stroke.] A stroke returned.

He met him with a counterstroke so swift,
That quite smit off his arme as he it up did lift.
Spenser, F. Q. v. xi. 7.

There is a kind of countertaste founded on surprise and curiosity, which maintains a sort of rivalship with the true. Shenstone.

COUNTERTE'NOR. n. s. [from counter and tenor.] One of the mean or middle parts of musick; so called, as it were, opposite to the tenor. Harris.

I am deaf: this deafness unqualifies me for all company, except a few friends with countertenor voices. Swift.

Co'UNTERTIDE. n. s. [counter and tide.] Contrary tide; fluctuations of the water.

Such were our countertides at land, and so
Presaging of the fatal blow,
In your prodigious ebb and flow. Dryden.

Co'UNTERTIME. n. s. [counter and time, contretemps, French.]

1. The defence or resistance of a horse, that intercepts his cadence, and the measure of his manage. Farrier's Dict.
2. Defence; opposition.

Let cheerfulness on happy fortune wait,
And give not thus the countertime to fate.
Dryden, Aurengz.

Co'UNTERTURN. n. s. [counter and turn.]

The catastasis, called by the Romans status, the height and full growth of the play, we may call properly the counterturn, which destroys that expectation, embroils the action in new difficulties, and leaves you far distant from that hope in which it found you. Dryden on Dramatick Poesy.

To CO'UNTERVAIL. v. a. [contra and valeo, Lat.] To be equivalent to; to have equal force or value; to act against with equal power.

In some men there may be found such qualities as are able to countervail those exceptions which might be taken against them, and such men's authority is not likely to be shaken off. Hooker.

And therewithal he fiercely at him flew,
And with important outrage him assail'd;
Who, soon prepar'd to field, his sword forth drew,
And him with equal valour countervail'd.
Spenser, F. Q.

The outward streams, which descend, must be of so much force as to countervail all that weight whereby the ascending side does exceed the other.
Wilkins's Dædalus.

We are to compute, that, upon balancing the account, the profit at last will hardly countervail the inconveniences that go along with it.
L'Estrange.

Co'UNTERVAIL. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. Equal weight; power or value sufficient to obviate any effect or objection.
2. That which has equal weight or value with something else.

Surely, the present pleasure of a sinful act is a poor countervail for the bitterness of the review, which begins where the action ends, and lasts for ever. South, Serm.

Co'UNTERVIEW. n. s. [counter and view.]

1. Opposition; a posture in which two persons front each other.

Mean while, ere thus was sinn'd and judg'd on earth
Within the gates of hell sat sin and death,
In counterview. Milton, P. L.

2. Contrast; a position in which two dissimilar things illustrate each other.

I have drawn some lines of Linger's character, on purpose to place it in counterview or contrast with that of the other company. Swift.

The law in our minds being countervoted by the law in our members. Scott, Chr. Life, i. iii.

To Co'UNTERWEIGH.* v. n. [counter and weigh.] To weigh against.

If wrights had ten fellowships of St. John's, it would not counterweigh with the loss of this occasion. Ascham, Letter to Raven.

To Co'UNTERWHEEL.* v. a. [from counter and wheel.] To make to wheel, or move backwards and forwards, in opposition to other movements; a military phrase.

The Falcon charges at first view
With her brigade of talons, through
Whose shoots the wary Heron beat
With a well counterwheel'd retreat.
Lovelace, Luc. P. p. 23.

Co'UNTERWIND.* n. s. [counter and wind.] Contrary wind. See COUNTER-TIDE.

Like as a ship, that through the ocean wyde
Directs her course unto one certaine coast,
Is met of many a counter-winde and tyde.
Spenser, F. Q. vi. xii. 1.

To Co'UNTERWORK.† v. a. [counter and work.] To counteract; to hinder any effect by contrary operations.

Whilst some, covetous
Above the rest, seek to engross me whole,
And counter-work the one unto the other,
Contend in gifts, as they would seem in love.
B. Jonson, Fox.

Can men think that God ever designed prayer as an engine to counter-work or control nature, to reverse its laws, and alter the course of the universe? South, Serm. vi. 393.

But heav'n's great view is one, and that the whole:
That counter-works each folly and caprice;
That disappoints th' effect of ev'ry vice. Pope.

Co'UNTESS.† n. s. [comitissa, Lat. comtesse, French, cunteyre, Sax.] The lady of an earl or count.

I take it, she that carries up the train,
Is that old noble lady, the dutchess of Norfolk.
— It is, and all the rest are countesses.
Shakspeare, Hen. VIII.

It is the peculiar happiness of the countess of Abingdon to have been so truly loved by you, while she was living; and so gratefully honoured after she was dead. Dryden.

Co'UNTING-HOUSE. n. s. [count and house.] The room appropriated by traders to their books and accounts.

Men in trade seldom think of laying out money upon land, 'till their profit has brought them in more than their trade can well employ; and their idle bags, cumbering their counting-houses, put them upon emptying them. Locke.

Co'UNTLESS. adj. [from count.] Innumerable; without number; not to be reckoned.

Ay, tear for tear, and loving kiss for kiss,
Thy brother Marcus tenders on thy lips:
O, were the sum of these that I should pay
Countless and infinite, yet would I pay them.
Shakspeare.

But oh, her mind, that orcus which includes
Legions of mischief, countless multitudes
Of former curses. Donne.

By one countless sum of woes opprest,
Hoary with cares, and ignorant of rest,
We find the vital springs relax'd and worn;
Thus, thro' the round of age, to childhood we return. Prior.

I see, I cry'd, his woes, a countless train;
I see his friends o'erwhelm'd beneath the main.
Pope, Odyssey.

Co'UNTRIFIED.* adj. [from country. A word of recent formation in our language; and in no dictionary, I believe; but now common.] Rustick; rude.

Although Hertfordshire is situated in the neighbourhood of the metropolis, yet, great part of it being no general thoroughfare, nor much-frequented high-road, the inhabitants are likely to be as countrified as persons living at a greater distance from town. Grose's Local Proverbs.

CO'UNTRY. n. s. [contrée, Fr. contrata, low Latin; supposed to be contracted from conterrata.]

1. A tract of land; a region, as distinguished from other regions.

They require to be examined concerning the descriptions of those countries of which they would be informed. Sprat.

2. The parts of a region distant from cities or courts; rural parts.

Would I a house for happiness erect
Nature alone should be the architect;
She'd build it more convenient than great,
And doubtless in the country chuse her seat.
Cowley.

I see them hurry from country to town, and then from the town back again into the country.
Spectator.

3. The place which any man inhabits, or in which he at present resides.

Send out more horses, skirre the country round,
Hang those that talk of fear. Shakspeare, Macb.

4. The place of one's birth; the native soil.

The king set on foot a reformation in the ornaments and advantages of our country. Sprat.

O, save my country, heav'n! shall be your last.
Pope.

5. The inhabitants of any region.

All the country, in a general voice,
Cry'd hate upon him; all their prayers and love
Were set on Hereford. Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

Co'UNTRY. adj.

1. Rustick; rural; villatick.

Cannot a country wench know, that having received a shilling from one that owes her three, and a shilling also from another that owes her three, that the remaining debts in each of their hands are equal? Locke.

I never meant any other, than that Mr. Trot should confine himself to country dances. Spect.

He comes no nearer to a positive, clear idea of a positive infinite, than the country fellow had of the water which was yet to pass the channel of the river where he stood. Locke.

Talk but with country people, or young people, and you shall find that the notions they apply this name to, are so odd that nobody can imagine they were taught by a rational man. Locke.

A country gentleman, learning Latin in the university, removes thence to his mansion-house. Locke.

The low mechanicks of a country town do somewhat outdo him. Locke.

Come, we'll e'en to our country seat repair,
The native home of innocence and love. Norris.

2. Of an interest opposite to that of courts; as, the country party.

3. Peculiar to a region or people.

She laughing the cruel tyrant to scorn, spake in her country language. 2 Macc. vii. 27.

4. Rude; ignorant; untaught.

We make a country man dumb, whom we will not allow to speak but by the rules of grammar. Dryden, Dufresnoy.

COUNTRY-DANCE.* n.s. A well-known kind of dance; usually so written, and noticed by Dr. Johnson under the adjective country. But some suppose country-dance to be a corruption of the French contre and danse, from the circumstance of the parties standing opposite to each other. Cotgrave takes no notice of such circumstance under danse; but, in the word CORDACE, he speaks of country-dance; which is in favour of the English origin and orthography. In the Shrewsbury Papers, "contrey dances" are part of an entertainment at Court, in 1602, vol. iii. p. 148.

CO'UNTRYMAN. n.s. [from country and man.]

1. One born in the same country, or tract of ground. Locke.

See, who comes here?
My countryman; but yet I know him not. Shakspeare, Macb.

Homer, great bard, so fate ordain'd, arose;
And bold as were his countrymen in fight,
Snatch'd their fair actions from degrading prose,
And set their battles in eternal light. Prior.

The British soldiers act with greater vigour under the conduct of one whom they do not consider only as their leader, but as their countryman. Addison on the War.

2. A rustick; one that inhabits the rural parts.

All that have business to the court, and all countrymen coming up to the city, leave their wives in the country. Graunt.

3. A farmer; a husbandman.

A countryman took a boar in his corn. L'Estrange.

CO'UNTY.† n.s. [counté, old Fr. comté, mod. comitatus, Lat.]

1. A shire; that is, a circuit or portion of the realm, into which the whole land is divided, for the administration of justice; so that there is no part of the kingdom, but what lieth within some county. Every county is governed by a yearly officer, called a sheriff, who puts in execution all the commands and judgements of the king's courts. Of these counties four are termed county-palatines, as that of Lancaster, Chester, Durham, and Ely. A county-palatine is a jurisdiction of so high a nature, that the chief governours of these, by special charter from the king, sent out all writs in their own name, and did all things touching justice as absolutely as the prince himself, only acknowledging him their superiour and sovereign. But this power has, by a statute in Henry VIII. his time, been much abridged. There are likewise counties corporate, which are certain cities or ancient boroughs upon which our princes have thought good to bestow extraordinary liberties. Of these London is one, York another, the city of Chester a third, and Canterbury a fourth. And to these may be added many more; as the county of the town of Kingston upon Hull, the county of the town of Haverfordwest, and the county of Litchfield. County is, in another signification, used for the county-court. Cowel.

Discharge your powers unto their several counties,
As we will ours. Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

He caught his death the last county sessions, where he would go to see justice done to a poor widow-woman, and her fatherless children. Addison, Spect.

2. An earldom.

Brave Impe of Bedford, grow apace in bountie,
And count of wisdome more than of thy countie! Spenser, Ruins of Time.

3. A count; a lord. [old Fr. countie.] Now wholly obsolete.

The gallant, young, and noble gentleman,
The county Paris, Shakspeare, Rom. and Juliet.

He made Hugh Lupus county palatine of Chester, and gave that earldom to him and his heirs, to hold the same ita liberè ad gladium sicut rex tenebat Angliam ad coronam. Davies.

COUNTY-COURT.* See COUNTY. It is a court incident to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff. It is not a court of record, but may hold pleas of debt or damages under forty shillings. Blackstone.

*COUP-DE-MAIN. n.s. [Fr.] A military expression, denoting an instantaneous, an unexpected, and generally a desperate attack. It is sometimes applied to any thing which is transacted with promptness and vigour.

The upper fort maintained its defence, and the attack was relinquished. It seems it could only have been carried by a coup de main, which unluckily failed. Guthrie, India within the Ganges.

*COUP-D'ŒIL. n.s. [Fr.] The first view of any thing; a slight view of it.

Only figure to yourself a vast semicircular basin, full of fine blue sea, and vessels of all sorts and sizes, &c. This is the first coup d'œil, and is almost all I am yet able to give you an account of. Gray, Lett. to West, from Genoa, 1739.

COUPE'E. n.s. [French.] A motion in dancing, when one leg is a little bent and suspended from the ground, and with the other a motion is made forwards. See COUPEE. Chambers.

CO'UPING-GLASS.* See CUPPING-GLASS.

CO'UPLABLE.* adj. [Fr. accouplable.] Fit to be coupled with. Cotgrave and Sherwood.

CO'UPLE. n.s. [couple, Fr. copula, Latin.]

1. A chain or tie that holds dogs together.

I'll keep my stables where
I lodge my wife; I'll go in couples with her,
Than when I feel and see her, no further trust her. Shakspeare.

It is in some sort with friends as it is with dogs in couples; they should be of the same size and humour. L'Estrange.

2. Two; a brace.

He was taken up by a couple of shepherds, and by them brought to life again. Sidney.

A schoolmaster, who shall teach my son and your's, I will provide; yea, though the three do cost me a couple of hundred pounds. Ascham.

A piece of chrystal inclosed a couple of drops, which looked like water when they were shaken, though perhaps they are nothing but bubbles of air. Addison on Italy.

By adding one to one, we have the complex idea of a couple. Locke.

3. A male and his female.

So shall all the couples three,
Ever true in loving be. Shaks. M. N. Dream.

Oh! alas!
I lost a couple, that 'twixt heaven and earth
Might thus have stood, begetting wonder, as You gracious couple do. Shakspeare, Wint. Tale.

I have read of a feigned commonwealth, where the married couple are permitted, before they contract, to see one another naked. Bacon, New Atlantis.

He said: the careful couple join their tears,
And then invoke the gods with pious prayers. Dryden.

All succeeding generations of men are the progeny of one primitive couple. Bentley's Sermons.

To CO'UPLE.† v.a. [old Fr. coupler, accoupler, joindre; Roq. copulo, Lat.]

1. To chain together.

Huntsman, I charge thee, tender well my hounds;
And couple Clowder with the deep-mouth'd Brach. Shakspeare.

2. To join one to another.

What greater ills have the heavens in store,
To couple coming harms with sorrow past. Sidney.

And wheresoe'er we went, like Juno's swans,
Still we went coupled and inseparable. Shakspeare, As you like it.

Put the taches into the loops, and couple the tent together that it may be one. Exod. xxvi. 1.

They behold your chaste conversation coupled with fear. 1 Pet. iii. 2.

Their concernments were so coupled, that if nature had not, yet their religions would have made them brothers. South.

That man makes a mean figure in the eyes of reason, who is measuring syllables and coupling rhimes, when he should be mending his own soul, and securing his own immortality. Pope.

3. To marry; to wed; to join in wedlock.

I shall rejoice to see you so coupled, as may be fit both for your honour and your satisfaction. Sidney.

I am just going to assist with the archbishop, in degrading a parson who couples all our beggars, by which I shall make one happy man. Swift.

To CO'UPLE. v.n. To join in embraces.

Waters in Africa being rare, divers sorts of beasts come from several parts to drink; and so being refreshed, fall to couple, and many times with several kinds. Bacon.

Thou, with the lusty crew,
Cast wanton eyes on the daughters of men,
And coupled with them, and begot a race. Milton, P. R.

After this alliance,
Let tigers match with hinds, and wolves with sheep,
And every creature couple with his foe.
Dryden, Spanish Friar.

Co'UPLE-BEGGAR. n. s. [couple and beggar.] One that makes it his business to marry beggars to each other.

No couple-beggar in the land,
E'er join'd such numbers hand in hand. Swift.

Co'UPLEMENT.* n. s. [from couple.] Union; two or more together. Not now in use. Mr. Malone believed this word to be of Shakspeare's invention; but Spenser is before him. Some editions of Shakspeare's Sonnets have converted it into compliment.

After all which up to their steeds they went,
And forth together rode, a goodly couplement.
Spenser, F. Q. vi. v. 24.

Making a couplement of proud compare
With sun and moon, with earth and sea's rich gems. Shakspeare, Sonn. xxi.

Co'UPLET. n. s. [French.]

1. Two verses; a pair of rhimes.

Then would they cast away their pipes, and, holding hand in hand, dance by the only cadence of their voices, which they would use in singing some short couplets, whereto the one half beginning, the other half should answer. Sidney.

Then at the last, an only couplet fraught
With some unmeaning thing they call a thought;
A needless Alexandrine ends the song,
That, like a wounded snake, drags its slow length along. Pope.

In Pope I cannot read a line,
But with a sigh I wish it mine;
When he can in one couplet fix,
More sense than I can do in six,
It gives me such a jealous fit,
I cry, pox take him and his wit. Swift.

2. A pair; as of doves.

Anon, as patient as the female dove,
Ere that her golden couplets are disclos'd,
His silence will sit drooping. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

Co'UPLING.* n. s. [from couple.]

1. A junction.

To the artificers and builders gave they it, to buy hewn stone, and timber for couplings.
2 Chron. xxxiv. 11.

2. Junction in embrace.

That great variety of brutes in Africa, is by reason of the meeting together of brutes of several species, at water, and the promiscuous couplings of males and females of several species.
Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

CO'URAGE.† n. s. [old Fr. corage; modern, courage; low Lat. coragium; from cor, the heart. Spenser repeatedly uses courage for heart or mind. This word is rarely found in the plural; but Shakspeare gives it in his Cymbeline; "Their discipline now mingled with their courages;" which Dr. Johnson, however, has, in all the editions of his dictionary, printed courage.] Bravery; active fortitude; spirit of enterprise.

The king becoming graces,
Devotion, patience, courage, fortitude;
I have no relish of them. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

Hope arms their courage: from their tow'rs they throw
Their darts with double force, and drive the foe.
Dryden.

Courage, that grows from constitution, very often forsakes a man when he has occasion for it; and when it is only a kind of instinct in the soul, it breaks out on all occasions, without judgement or discretion. That courage which arises from the sense of our duty, and from the fear of offending Him that made us, acts always in an uniform manner, and according to the dictates of right reason. Addison, Guardian.

Nothing but the want of common courage was the cause of their misfortunes. Swift.

To Co'URAGE.* v. a. [from the noun. An old verb in our language, unjustly slighted and forgotten. "To courage, or to make audacious, addere animum, vel audaciam." Huloet.] To encourage.

Moreover, charge Joshua, and courage him, and bolden him. Deut. iii. 28. Mathew's Transl.

COURA'GEOUS.† adj. [old Fr. or Norm. courajeux, angry, Kelham; couragieux, courageous, Cotgrave.]

1. Brave; daring; bold; enterprising; adventurous; hardy; stout.

And he that is courageous among the mighty, shall flee away naked in that day. Amos, ii. 16.

Let us imitate the courageous example of St. Paul, who chose then to magnify his office when ill men conspired to lessen it. Atterbury.

2. It is used ludicrously by Shakspeare for outrageous.

He is very courageous mad, about his throwing into the water. Shakspeare.

COURA'GEOUSLY.† adv. [from courageous.] Bravely; stoutly; boldly.

Deal courageously; and the Lord shall be with the good. 2 Chron. xix. 11.

The king the next day presented him battle upon the plain, the fields there being open and champaign; the earl courageously came down, and joined battle with him. Bacon, Hen. VII.

Endeavour resolutely and courageously to repel temptations, as often as they sollicit thee.
Hammond's Works, iv. 563.

COURA'GEOUSNESS. n. s. [from courageous.] Bravery; boldness; spirit; courage.

Nicanor hearing of the manliness and the courageousness that they had to fight for their country, durst not try the matter by the sword.
2 Mac. xiv. 18.

COURA'NT.† } n. s. [courante, Fr.] See
COURA'NTO. } CORANT.

1. A nimble dance.

I'll like a maid the better, while I have a tooth in my head: why, he is able to lead her a couranto.
Shakspeare.

2. Any thing that spreads quick, as a paper of news.

The weekly courants with Paul's seal; and all, Th' admir'd discourses of the prophet Ball.
B. Jonson, Underwoods.

New books, every day, pamphlets, courantoes, &c.
Burton, Anat. of Mel. to the Reader.

My distempered old acquaintance read, in the next place, the account of the affairs abroad in the courant. Tatler, No. 178.

To COURB. v. n. [courber, Fr.] To bend; to bow; to stoop in supplication. Not in use.

In the fatness of these pursy times,
Virtue itself of vice must pardon beg,
Yea, courb and woo, for leave to do it good.
Shakspeare, Hamlet.

COURB.* adj. Crooked. See CORB.

Her neck is short, her shoulders courb.
Gower, Conf. Am.

Co'URIER. n. s. [courier, Fr.] A messenger sent in haste; an express; a runner.

I met a courier, one mine ancient friend.
Shakspeare, Timon.

This thing the wary bassa well perceiving, by speedy couriers advertised Solyman of the enemy's purpose, requesting him with all speed to repair with his army to Tauris. Knolles, Hist.

COURSE.† n. s. [course, Fr. cursus, Lat.]

1. Race; career.

And some she arms with sinewy force,
And some with swiftness in the course. Cowley.

2. Passage from place to place; progress. To this may be referred the course of a river.

And when we had finished our course from Tyre, we came to Ptolemais. Acts, xxi. 7.

Like as a ship, that through the ocean wide
Directs her course unto one certain coast,
Is met of many a counter wind and tide.
Spenser, F. Q. vi. xii. 1.

A light, by which the Argive squadron steers
Their silent course to Ilium's well known shore.
Denham.

3. Tilt; act of running in the lists.

But this hot knight was cooled with a fall, which, at the third course, he received of Phalantus. Sidney.

4. Ground on which a race is run.

5. Track or line in which a ship sails, or any motion is performed.

6. Sail; means by which the course is performed.

To the courses we have devised studding-sails, spirit-sails, and top-sails. Ralegh, Ess.

7. Progress from one gradation to another; process.

When the state of the controversy is plainly determined, it must not be altered by another disputant in the course of the disputation. Watts.

8. Order of succession; as, every one in his course.

Their officers that serv'd the king in any matter of the courses, which came in and went out, month by month; — of every course was twenty and four thousand. 1 Chron. xxvii. 1.

If any man speak in an unknown tongue, let it be by two, or at the most by three, and that by course; and let one interpret. 1 Cor. xiv. 27.

9. Stated and orderly method, or manner.

If she live long,
And in the end meet the old course of death,
Women will all turn monsters. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

The duke cannot deny the course of law. Shaksp.

If God, by his revealed declaration, first gave rule to any man, he, that will claim by that title, must have the same positive grant of God for his succession; for, if it has not directed the course of its descent and conveyance, no body can succeed to this title of the first Ruler. Locke.

10. Series of successive and methodical procedure.

The glands did resolve during her course of physick, and she continueth very well to this day.
Wiseman, Surgery.

11. The elements of an art exhibited and explained, in a methodical series. Hence our courses of philosophy, anatomy, chemistry, and mathematicks.
Chambers.

12. Conduct; manner of proceeding.

Grittus perceiving the danger he was in, began to doubt with himself what course were best for him to take. Knolles.

That worthy deputy finding nothing but a common misery, took the best course he possibly could to establish a commonwealth in Ireland.
Davies on Ireland.

He placed commissioners there, who governed it only in a course of discretion, part martial, part civil. Davies on Ireland.

Give willingly what I can take by force;
And know, obedience is your safest course.
Dryden, Aurengz.

But if a right course be taken with children, there will not be so much need of common rewards and punishments. Locke.

'Tis time we should decree
What course to take. Addison, Cato.

The senate observing how, in all contentions, they were forced to yield to the tribunes and people, thought it their wisest course to give way also to time. Swift.

13. Method of life; train of actions.

A woman of so working a mind, and so vehement spirits, as it was happy she took a good course; for otherwise it would have been terrible. Sidney.

His addiction was to courses vain;
His companies, unletter'd, rude and shallow;
His hours fill'd up with riots, banquets, sports.
Shakspeare, Hen. V.

As the dropsy-man, the more he drinks, the drier he is, and the more he still desires to drink; even so a sinner, the more he sins, the apter he is to sin, and more desirous to keep still a course in wickedness. Perkins.

Men will say,
That beauteous Emma vagrant courses took,
Her father's house, and civil life forsook. Prior.

14. Natural bent; uncontrolled will.

It is best to leave nature to her course, who is the sovereign physician in most diseases. Temple.

So every servant took his course,
And, bad at first, they all grew worse. Prior.

15. Catamenia.

The stoppage of women's courses, if not suddenly looked to, sets them undoubtedly into a consumption, dropsy, or some other dangerous disease. Harvey on Consumptions.

16. Orderly structure.

The tongue defileth the whole body, and setteth on fire the course of nature. James, iii. 6.

17. [In architecture.] A continued range of stones, level or of the same height, throughout the whole length of the building, and not interrupted by any aperture. Harris.

18. Series of consequences.

19. Number of dishes set on at once upon the table.

Worthy sir, thou bleed'st:
Thy exercise hath been too violent
For a second course of fight. Shakspeare, Coriol.

Then with a second course the tables load,
And with full chargers offer to the god.
Dryden, Æn.

You are not to wash your hands 'till after you have sent up your second course.
Swift, Direct. to the Cook.

So quick retires each flying course, you'd swear
Sancho's dread doctor and his wand was there.
Pope.

20. Regularity; settled rule.

21. Empty form.

Men talk as if they believed in God, but they live as if they thought there was none; their vows and promises are no more than words of course.
L'Estrange.

22. The running of dogs upon bears. A phrase of bear-baiting times; whether it belongs to the no less savage practice of modern bull-baiting, I am unable to say.

They have tied me to a stake; I cannot fly,
But, bear-like, I must fight the course.
Shakspeare, Macbeth.

23. Of course. By consequence.

With a mind unprepossessed by doctors and commentators of any sect, whose reasonings, interpretation and language, which I have been used to, will of course make all chime that way; and make another, and perhaps the genuine meaning of the author, seem harsh, strained, and uncouth to me. Locke.

24. Of course. By settled rule.

Sense is of course annex'd to wealth and power;
No muse is proof against a golden show'r. Garth.

Neither shall I be so far wanting to myself, as not to desire a patent, granted of course to all useful projectors. Swift.

To COURSE. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To hunt; to pursue.

The big round tears
Cours'd one another down his innocent nose
In piteous chase. Shakspeare, As you like it.

The king is hunting the deer; I am coursing myself. Shakspeare, L. L. Lost.

Where's the thane of Cawdor?
We cours'd him at the heels, and had a purpose
To be his purveyor. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

2. To pursue with dogs that hunt in view.

I am continually starting hares for you to course: we were certainly cut out for one another; for my temper quits an amour just where thine takes it up.
Congreve, Old Bachelor.

3. To put to speed; to force to run.

When they have an appetite.
To venery, let them not drink nor eat,
And course them oft, and tire them in the heat.
May, Virg.

To COURSE. v. n. To run; to rove about.

Swift as quicksilver it courses through
The nat'ral gates and allies of the body.
Shakspeare, Hamlet.

The blood, before cold and settled, left the liver white and pale, which is the badge of pusillanimity and cowardice; but the sherris warms it, and makes it course from the inwards to the parts extreme. Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

She did so course o'er my exteriours, with such a greedy intention, that the appetite of her eye did seem to scorch me up like a burning glass.
Shakspeare, M. W. of Windsor.

Ten brace and more of greyhounds, snowy fair,
And tall as stags, ran loose, and cours'd around his chair. Dryden.

All, at once
Relapsing quick, as quickly re ascend
And mix, and thwart, extinguish, and renew,
All ether coursing in a maze of light.
Thomson, Autumn.

CO'URSER.† n. s. [from course; coursier, French.]

1. A swift horse; a war-horse: a word not used in prose.

He proudly pricketh on his courser strong,
And Atin ay him pricks with spurs of shame and wrong. Spenser, F. Q.

Then to his absent guest the king decreed
A pair of coursers, born of heav'nly breed;
Who from their nostrils breath'd etherial fire,
Whom Circe stole from her celestial sire.
Dryden, Æn.

Th' impatient courser pants in every vein,
And, pawing, seems to beat the distant plain;
Hills, vales, and floods appear already cross'd,
And, ere he starts, a thousand steps are lost. Pope.

2. One who pursues the sport of coursing hares; "a runner; a courser." See Cotgrave in V. COUREUR.

I am no bawd, nor a cheater, nor a courser
Of broken-winded women.
Beaum. and Fl. The Captain.

A leash is a leathern thong, by which a falconer holds his hawk, or a courser leads his greyhound.
Hanmer.

3. He who discourses upon a subject, and pursues it; a disputant. See the 11th sense of COURSE.

He was accounted a noted sophister, and remarkable courser in the time of Lent in the public schools. Life of A. Wood, p. 109.

CO'URSEY.* n. s. [Fr. coursie.] Part of the hatches in a galley. Sherwood.

CO'URSING.* n. s. See To COURSE. The sport of hunting hares, foxes, and sometimes deer, with greyhounds.

It would be tried also in flying of hawks, or in coursing of a deer, or hart, with greyhounds.
Bacon, Nat. Hist.

COURT.† n. s. [old Fr. court, mod. cour; Goth. kurt, civility of manners; Sax. cuꝛt; Dutch, koert; low Lat. curtis. See COURTEOUS.]

1. The place where the prince resides; the palace.

Of court, it seems, men courtesie do call,
For that it there most useth to abound.
Spenser, F. Q. vi. i. 1.

Here do you keep a hundred knights and squires,
Men so disorderly, so debauch'd and bold,
That this our court, infected with their manners,
Shews like a riotous inn; Epicurism and lust,
Make it more like a tavern, or a brothel,
Than a grac'd palace. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

It shall be an habitation of dragons, and a court for owls. Isaiah, xxvi. 13.

His exactness, that every man should have his due, was such, that you would think he had never seen a court: the politeness with which this justice was administred, would convince you he never had lived out of one. Prior, Dedication.

A suppliant to your royal court I come.
Pope, Odyssey.

2. The hall or chamber where justice is administered.

Are you acquainted with the difference
That holds this present question in the court?
Shakspeare.

St. Paul being brought unto the highest court in Athens, to give an account of the doctrine he had preached, concerning Jesus and the resurrection, took occasion to imprint on those magistrates a future state. Atterbury.

3. Open space before a house. [perhaps, in this sense, from the Sax. ȝẏnd, a yard, ȝ being changed into c. Or from the Lat, cors, cortis.]

You must have, before you come to the front, three courts: a green court plain, with a wall about it; a second court of the same, but more garnished, with little turrets, or other embellishments upon the wall; and a third court, to square with the front, not to be built but inclosed with a naked wall. Bacon.

Suppose it were the king's bedchamber, yet the meanest man in the tragedy must come and dispatch his business, rather than in the lobby or court yard (which is fitter for him), for fear the stage should be cleared, and the scenes broken. Dryden.

4. A small opening inclosed with houses and paved with broad stones, distinguished from a street.

5. Persons who compose the retinue of a prince.

The court's a school indeed, in which some few
Learn virtuous principles.
Beaum. and Fl. Custom of the Country.

Their wisdom was so highly esteemed, that some of them were always employed to follow the courts of their kings, to advise them. Temple.

6. Persons who are assembled for the administration of justice.

He was so zealous for his client, and so favourably received by the court, that he went on with great fluency to inform the bench, &c.
Tatler, No. 186.

7. Any jurisdiction, military, civil, or ecclesiastical.

If any noise or soldier you perceive
Near to the wall, by some apparent sign
Let us have knowledge at the court of guard.
Shakspeare, Hen. VI. P. I.

The archbishop
Of Canterbury, accompanied with other

Learned and reverend fathers of his order,
Held a late court at Dunstable. Shaks. Hen. VIII.

I have at last met with the proceedings of the court baron, held in that behalf. Spectator.

8. The art of pleasing; the art of insinuation; civility; flattery.

Him the prince with gentle court did board. Spenser.

Hast thou been never base? Did love ne'er bend
Thy frailer virtue, to betray thy friend?
Flatter me, make thy court, and say it did;
Kings in a crowd would have their vices hid. Dryden, Aurengzebe.

Some sort of people, placing a great part of their happiness in strong drink, are always forward to make court to my young master, by offering that which they love best themselves. Locke.

I have been considering why poets have such ill success in making their court, since they are allowed to be the greatest and best of all flatterers: the defect is, that they flatter only in print or in writing. Swift to Gay.

9. It is often used in composition in most of its senses.

COURT *of Guard. See the 7th sense of COURT.

1. The guard-room of soldiers; the place where the guard musters. See CORPS-DE-GARD.

The lieutenant to-night watches on the court of guard. Shakspeare, Othello.

Visit your courts of guard, view your munition. Beaum. and Fl. Beggar's Bush.

2. They who compose the guard.

Environed round with a court of guard about her, that stand in readiness with javelins in hand. Parthencia Sacra, (1633,) p. 18.

To COURT. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To woo; to solicit a woman to marriage.

Follow a shadow, it flies you;
Seem to fly it, it will pursue:
So court a mistress, she denies you;
Let her alone, she will court you. B. Jonson, Forest.

Fir'd with her love, and with ambition led,
The neigh'bring princes court her nuptial bed. Dryden, Æn.

Alas! Sempronius, would'st thou talk of love
To Marcia, whilst her father's life's in danger?
Thou might'st as well court the pale trembling vestal,
While she beholds the holy flame expiring. Addison, Cato.

Ev'n now, when silent scorn is all they gain,
A thousand court you, though they court in vain. Pope.

2. To solicit; to seek.

Their own ease and satisfaction would quickly teach children to court commendation, and avoid doing what they found condemned. Locke on Education.

3. To flatter; to endeavour to please.

To COURT.* v. n. To act the courtier; to imitate the manners of the court.

If noblemen will have their sons court it too soon, and be more in fashion than the rest, the fault shall be their own, not mine. Abp. Laud, Rem. Chanc. of Oxford, p. 61.

COURT-BARON.* See COURT. A court incident to every manor in the kingdom, and holden by the steward within the said manor. Blackstone.

COURT-BREEDING.* n. s. [from court and breed.] Education at court.

Court-breeding, and his perpetual conversation with flatterers, was but a bad school. Milton, Eiconoclastes.

COURT-BUBBLE.* n. s. [from court and bubble.] The trifle of a court; a thing of no moment.

You are no men, but masquers;
Shapes, shadows, and the signs of men; court-bubbles,
That every breath or breaks, or blows away. Beaum. and Fl. Elder Brother.

COURT-CARD.* See COAT-CARD.

COURT-CHAPLAIN. n. s. [court and chaplain.] One who attends the king to celebrate the holy offices.

The maids of honour have been fully convinced by a famous court-chaplain. Swift.

COURT-CUPBOARD.* n. s. The side-board, if it may so be called, of ancient days. It was a recess, fitted with shelves, on which plate was displayed; and was a moveable piece of furniture.

Away with the joint-stools, remove the court-cupboard, look to the plate. Shakspeare, Rom. and Jul.

COURT-DAY. n. s. [court and day.] Day on which justice is solemnly administred.

The judge took time to deliberate, and the next court-day he spoke. Arbuthnot and Pope.

COURT-DRESSER. n. s. [court and dresser.] One that dresses the court, or persons of rank; a flatterer.

There are many ways of fallacy; such arts of giving colours, appearances and resemblances, by this court-dresser, fancy. Locke.

COURT-FASHION.* n. s. [from court and fashion.] What is observed at court.

Christianity being the court-fashion, none would be out of it. Fuller, Holy War, p. 207.

COURT-FAVOUR. n. s. Favours or benefits bestowed by princes.

We part with the blessings of both worlds for pleasures, court-favours, and commissions; and at last, when we have sold ourselves to our lusts, we grow sick of our bargain. L'Estrange.

COURT-HAND. n. s. [court and hand.] The hand or manner of writing used in records and judicial proceedings.

He can make obligations, and write court-hand. Shakspeare.

COURT-LADY.† n. s. [court and lady.] A lady conversant or employed in court.

The court-ladies especially, that were faulty as the men. Bp. Richardson on the Old Test. (1655,) p. 385.

The same study, long continued, is as intolerable to them, as the appearing long in the same clothes or fashion is to a court-lady. Locke.

By their tricks and trinketting between party and party, and their intriguing it with courtiers and court-ladies, they had upon the matter set the whole together by the ears. South, Serm. vi. 114.

COURT-LEET.* n. s. [from court and leet, leoðe or leub, Sax. The court of the louts or vassals of a lord, where they render their leoðe-zelb, lout-yield or guild, suit, service, or homage.] A court of record, held once in the year, and not oftener, within a particular hundred, lordship, or manor, before the steward of the leet. Blackstone.

COURT-MARTIAL.* See COURT. A court appointed to investigate, and to punish, military offences; and is distinguished, as occasion requires, by the titles of a general, a regimental, and a garrison Court Martial.

CO'URTEOUS.† adj. [courtois, French; kurteis, Goth.] Elegant of manners; polite; well-bred; full of acts of respect.

He hath deserved worthily of his country; and his ascent is not by such easy degrees, as those who have been supple and courteous to the people. Shakspeare, Coriol.

They are one while courteous, civil, and obliging; but, within a small time after, are supercilious, sharp, troublesome, fierce, and exceptious. South.

CO'URTEOUSLY. adv. [from courteous.] Respectfully; civilly; complaisantly.

He thought them to be gentlemen of much more worth than their habits bewrayed, yet he let them courteously pass. Wotton.

Whilst Christ was upon earth, he was not only easy of access, he did not only courteously receive all that addressed themselves to him, but also did not disdain himself to travel up and down the country. Calamy, Sermons.

Alcinous, being prevailed upon by the glory of his name, entertained him courteously. Broome.

CO'URTEOUSNESS. n. s. [from courteous.] Civility; complaisance.

CO'URTER.* n. s. [from court.] He who wooes or solicits women.

A courtier of wenches. Sherwood.

2. One who solicits any favour; one who flatters, or endeavours to please.

Queen Elizabeth, the greatest courter of her people, and yet the best governour, would lose nothing of her prerogative. An Answer to Baxter, 4to. Lond. (sans date) p. 28.

CO'URTESAN.† } n. s. [Fr. courtisane, Ital.
CO'URTEZAN. } cortigiana, low Lat. cortisana. Our old word is cortizan, or cortisan. Cotgrave, in translating courtisane, renders it "a lady, gentlewoman, or waiting-woman of the court; also, but less properly, a courtizan, professed strumpet, famous or infamous whore." See also Roquefort, Supplem. "Courtisanie: débauche, galanterie. Mener train de courtisanie; se conduire comme une femme galante."] A woman of the town; a prostitute; a strumpet.

'Tis a brave night to cool a courtezan. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

With them there are no stews, no dissolute houses, no courtesans, nor any thing of that kind; nay, they wonder with detestation, at you in Europe, which permit such things. Bacon, New Atlantis.

The Corinthian is a column, lasciviously decked like a courtesan. Wotton.

Charixus, the brother of Sappho, in love with Rhodope the courtezan, spent his whole estate upon her. Addison.

CO'URTESY.† n. s. [courtoisie, Fr. cortesia, Ital. kurteisi, Goth.]

1. Elegance of manners; civility; complaisance.

Of court, it seems, men courtesy do call,
For that it there most useth to abound. Spenser, F. Q. vi. i. 1.

Sir, you are very welcome to our house:
It must appear in other ways than words,
Therefore I scant this breathing courtesy. Shaksp. Merch. of Ven.

Who have seen his estate, his hospitality, his courtesy to strangers. Peacham.

He who was compounded of all the elements of affability and courtesy towards all kind of people, brought himself to a habit of neglect, and even of rudeness, towards the queen. Clarendon.

Courtesy — is sooner found in lowly sheds
With smoky rafters, than in tap'stry halls,
And courts of princes, where it first was nam'd. Milton, Com.

So gentle of condition was he known,
That through the court his courtesy was blown.
Dryden, Fab.

2. An act of civility or respect.

You spurn'd me such a day: another time
You call'd me dog; and for these courtesies,
I'll lend you thus much money.
Shakspeare, Merch. of Ven.

Repose you there, while I to the hard house
Return, and force their scanty courtesy.
Shakspeare, K. Lear.

When I was last at Exeter,
The mayor in courtesy shew'd me the castle.
Shakspeare, Rich. III.

Sound all the lofty instruments of war,
And by that musick let us all embrace;
For heav'n to earth some of us never shall
A second time do such a coustesy.
Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

Other states, assuredly, cannot be justly accused for not staying for the first blow; or for not accepting Polyphemus's courtesy, to be the last that shall be eaten up. Bacon.

3. The reverence made by women.

Some country girl scarce to a court'sy bred,
Would I much rather than Cornelia wed;
If, supercilious, haughty, proud and vain,
She brought her father's triumphs in her train.
Dryden, Juv.

The poor creature was as full of courtesies as if I had been her godmother: the truth on't is, I endeavoured to make her look something Christian-like. Congreve, Old Bachelor.

4. A tenure, not of right, but by the favour of others; as, to hold upon courtesy.

5. COURTESY of England. A tenure by which, if a man marry an inheritance, that is, a woman seised of land, and getteth a child of her that comes alive into the world, though both the child and his wife die forthwith; yet, if she were in possession, shall he keep the land during his life, and is called tenant per legem Angliæ, or by the courtesy of England, Cowel.

To CO'URTESY.† v. n. [old Fr. courtiser.]

1. To perform an act of reverence: it is now only used of women.

Toby approaches; court'sies there to me.
Shakspeare, Tw. Night.

The petty traffickers,
That court'sy to them, do them reverence. Shaksp.

2. To make a reverence in the manner of ladies.

If I should meet her in my way,
We hardly court'sy to each other. Prior.

To CO'URTESY.* v. a. To treat with courtesy.

The prince politickly courtisied him with all favours. Sir R. Williams, Act of the L. Countries, (1618,) p. 5.

CO'URTIER. n. s. [from court.]

1. One that frequents or attends the courts of princes.

He hath been a courtier, he swears, ——
If any man doubts that, let him put me to my purgation. I have trod a measure; I have flattered a lady; I have been politick with my friend, smooth with mine enemy; I have undone three taylors; I have had four quarrels, and like to have fought one. Shakspeare, As you like it.

You are a flattering boy; now, I see you will be a courtier. Shakspeare, M. W. of Windsor.

You know I am no courtier, nor versed in state affairs. Bacon.

The principal figure in a picture, is like a king among his courtiers, who ought to dim the lustre of his attendants. Dryden.

2. One that courts or solicits the favour of another.

What
Made thee, all honour'd honest Roman Brutus,
With the arm'd rest, courtiers of beauteous freedom,
To drench the capital? Shaksp. Ant. and Cleop.

There was not among all our princes a greater courtier of the people than Richard the IIId. not out of fear but wisdom. Suckling.

CO'URTIERY.* n. s. [from courtier.] The manners of a courtier.

In this garb he savours
Little of the nicety,
In the sprucer courtiery.
B. Jonson, Entertainments.

CO'URTINE. See CURTAIN.

CO'URTLIKE.† adj. [court and like.] Elegant; polite. "After the manner of the court; or after the sort of a courtier." Huloet.

Our English tongue is, I will not say as sacred as the Hebrew, or as learned as the Greek, but as fluent as the Latin, as courteous as the Spanish, as courtlike as the French, and as amorous as the Italian. Camden's Remains.

'Fore me you are not modest,
Nor is this courtlike.
Beaum. and Fl. Double Marriage.

Instead of masks,
Musick, tilts, tourneys, and such courtlike shews;
The hollow murmur of the checkless winds
Shall groan again. Marston's Malcontent.

I have at my command
The smell of flowers and odoriferous drugs,
Of ointments sweet, and excellent perfumes,
And courtlike waters; which if once you smell,
You in your heart will wish, as I suppose,
That all your body were transform'd to nose.
Brewer's Com. of Lingua, iv. 3.

CO'URTLINESS. n. s. [from court.] Elegance of manners; grace of mien; complaisance; civility.

The slightest part that you excel in is courtliness. Ld. Digby to Sir Kenelm. Digby.

CO'URTLING. n. s. [from court.] A courtier; a retainer to a court.

Courtling, I rather thou should'st utterly
Dispraise my work, than praise it frostily.
B. Jonson.

CO'URTLY.† adj. [from court.] Relating or retaining to the court; elegant; soft; flattering.

But with remembrance of your gracious name,
Wherewith that courtly garland most ye grace,
And deck the world.
Spenser, Sonn. to Lady Carew.

Modesty should be embraced of courtly virgins, as the preserver of chastity.
A. Willet, on the Marriage of the Count Palatine with James the Ist's Daughter, 1612, p. 43.

Besides all the courtly preambles, necessary concomitants, and delightful consequences of marriage. More, Conj. Cabb. (1653,) p. 211.

In our own time, (excuse some courtly strains)
No whiter page than Addison's remains. Pope.

CO'URTLY. adv. In the manner of courts; elegantly.

They can produce nothing so courtly writ, or which expresses so much the conversation of a gentleman, as Sir John Suckling.
Dryden on Dram. Poetry.

CO'URTSHIP.† n. s. [from court.]

1. The act of soliciting favour.

You'll judge me a novice in the affairs of the world, in not pitching upon some other patron; and unacquainted with the courtship of the times, that holds it more commendable to toy and complement with a stranger, than speak truth of a known friend.
More, Song of the Soul, (1647,) Dedic.

He paid his courtship with the crowd,
As far as modest pride allow'd. Swift.

2. The solicitation of a woman to marriage.

Be merry, and employ your chiefest thoughts
To courtship, and such fair ostents of love,
As shall conveniently become you there.
Shakspeare, Merch. of Ven.

In tedious courtship we declare our pain,
And ere we kindness find, first meet disdain.
Dryden, Ind. Emp.

Every man in the time of courtship, and in the first entrance of marriage, puts on a behaviour like my correspondent's holiday suit.
Addison, Guardian.

3. Civility; elegance of manners; the manners of the court.

One Tylo, brought up at the court, cunningly sewing together all the old shreds of his courtship, and stretching them out with impudency, pretended to be Frederick the emperour.
Fuller's Holy War, p. 205.

My courtship to an university,
My modesty I give to soldiers bare;
My patience to a gamester's share. Donne.

CO'USIN.† n. s. [cousin, Fr. consanguineus, Lat. Our language has a feminine formation of this word, which has escaped Dr. Johnson, and is, I believe, in no dictionary. But the learned Lightfoot has employed it, who will, however, hardly be imitated: "My brethren and sisters, my cosens and cosenesses," Miscell. p. 135.]

1. Any one collaterally related more remotely than a brother or sister; a kinsman. Our ancestors considered cousin merely as importing one of the same blood; and so applied it to nephews, grand-children, &c.

Macbeth unseam'd him.
— Oh, valiant cousin! worthy gentleman. Shaks.

Tybalt, my cousin! O, my brother's child!
Unhappy sight! alas, the blood is spill'd,
Of my dear kinsman. Shaksp. Rom. and Jul.

Thou art, great lord, my father's sister's son,
and cousin german to great Priam's seed.
Shakspeare, Tr. and Cress.

2. A title given by the king to a nobleman, particularly to those of the council.

Then let me hear
Of you, my gentle cousin, Westmorland,
What yesternight our counsel did decree, &c.
Shakspeare.

CO'USIN.* adj. [from the substantive. A very ancient employment of the word.] Allied; kindred.

Eke Plato sayeth, whoso can him rede,
The wordës most ben cousin to the dede,
Chaucer, C. T. Prol.

Her former sorrow into sudden wrath
(Both coosen passions of distroubled spright)
Converting, forth she beates the dusty path.
Spenser, F. Q. iii. iv. 12.

COUTE'AU. n. s. [Fr. a knife.] A hanger; as the word is sometimes used.

COUTH.* adj. [Sax. cuð.] Known. See UNCOUTH. Bullokar.

COUTH.* In our old authors, used for coud. See COUD.

Couth commeth of the verb conne, that is, to know, or to have skill; as well interpreteth the same Sir T. Smith, in his booke of government.
E. K. on Spenser's Shep. Cal. Jan.

COW.† n. s. [in the plural, anciently kine or keen, now commonly cows; cu, Sax. koe, Dutch. So far Dr. Johnson. As to the plural kine, or keen, it is in fact nothing more than a corruption of cowen, the old plural of cow. The Goth. and Iceland. ku must be also added to the etymology. The Persian gow is the same word. See Sir T. Herbert's Travels, p. 317.] The female of the bull; the horned animal with cloven feet, kept for her milk and calves.

We see that the horns of oxen and cows, for the most part, are larger than the bulls; which is caused by abundance of moisture, which in the horns of the bull faileth. Bacon.

After the fever is diminished, asses and goats milk may be necessary; yea, a diet of cows milk alone. Wiseman's Surg.

Then, leaving in the fields his grazing cows,
He sought himself some hospitable house:
Good Cretan entertain'd his godlike guest.
Dryden, Fab.

Cow.* n. s. The moving top of the chimney of a hop-oast, or kiln. Kent. Supposed to be a corruption of cowl, being in the shape of the cowl or hood worn by some religious orders. Pegge.

To Cow.† v. a. [from coward by contraction, Dr. Johnson says. Mr. Horne Tooke considers it as implying "to make to cower." Neither of these quaint etymologies will stand against the northern origin of this word, Su. kufwa, to suppress, to keep under. V. Widegren, Su. Lex. The Iceland. kuga is the same.] To depress with fear: to oppress with habitual timidity.

Macduff was from his mother's womb
Untimely ripp'd. ——
—— Accursed be that tongue that tells me so;
For it hath cow'd my better part of man.
Shakspeare, Macb.

I would die with you, but first I would so torture ye,
And cow you in your end, and so despise you,
For a weak and wretched coward.
Beaum and Fl. Wife for a Month.

By reason of their frequent revolts they have drawn upon themselves the pressures of war so often, that it seems to have somewhat cowed their spirits. Howel, Vocal Forest.

For when men by their wives are cow'd,
Their horns, of course, are understood. Hudibras.

Cow-herd.† n. s. [Sax. cu-hepde; Teut. koe-herde.] One whose occupation is to tend cows.

Cow-house. n. s. [cow and house.] The house in which kine are kept.

You must house your milch cows, that you give hay to, in your cow-house all night. Mortimer.

Cow-itch.* See Couhage.

Cow-leech. n. s. [cow and leech.] One who professes to cure distempered cows.

To Cow-leech. v. n. To profess to cure cows.

Though there are many pretenders to the art of farriering and cow-leeching, yet many of them are very ignorant, especially in the country.
Mortimer, Husbandry.

Cow-weed. n. s. [cow and weed.] A species of chervil.

Cow-wheat. n. s. [from cow and wheat.] A plant.

Co'ward.† n. s. [couard, Fr. of uncertain derivation, Dr. Johnson says; but nothing further. He might have stated, that both Junius and Skinner have considered cowherd, as its origin; and Twisden and Somner. culum vertere, to turn tail, or run away; to which latter opinion Mr. Tyrwhitt has readily subscribed, thinking that the old French culvert, formed from the Latin culum vertere, might easily be corrupted into couart or couard. The supposition of cowherd might probably arise from the circumstance of reproachful terms having been anciently borrowed from the state of persons in a low degree, as villain, knave, &c. The old spelling of our word is cowherd or cowheard. See the adjective Coward. Others offer cowheart or cow-hearted, as the parent of this word of disgrace. But Mr. Horne Tooke asserts, that coward is the past participle of the verb To Cower; implying "one who has cower'd before an enemy." This assertion, I think, is not correct; and he might just as well have offered "one who had been cowed before an enemy." — There can be no doubt that our word is from the old French "couard, un lâche, un poltron." V. Lacombe and Roquefort; the latter of whom, under coardise, i. e. coüardie, refers the origin to coüe, Lat. cauda, the tail, "parce que les animaux qui craignent, portent la queue entre les jambes." The Italians have codardo, from coda, i. e. cauda also, as their coward; part of Menage's explanation of which is "dalla coda che fra le gambe portano i cani pavrosi." It may be added that coward is one of our hrealdick terms; as, "a lion coward," that is, with his tail hanging down between his legs.]

1. A poltron; a wretch whose predominant passion is fear.

Pyrocles did such wonders, beyond belief, as was able to lead Musidorous to courage, though he had been born a coward. Sidney.

There was a soldier that vaunted before Julius Cæsar, of the hurts he had received in his face. Cæsar knowing him to be but a coward, told him, You were best take heed, next time you run away, how you look back. Bacon.

Some are brave one day, and cowards another, as great captains have often told me, from their own experience and observation. Temple.

A coward does not always escape with disgrace, but sometimes also he loses his life. South.

Tremble ye not, Oh friends! and cowards fly,
Doom'd by the stern Telemachus to die.
Pope, Odyssey.

2. It is sometimes used in the manner of an adjective.

Having more man than wit about me, I drew!
And rais'd the house with loud and coward cries.
Shakspeare.

Invading fears repel my coward joy,
And ills foreseen the present bliss destroy. Prior.

Co'ward.* adj. [from the substantive.] Like a coward; dastardly.

Who when he none of all those knights did see
Hastily bent that enterprise to heare,
Nor undertake the same for cowheard feare,
He stepped forth with courage bold and great.
Spenser, F. Q. v. x. 15.

That craven cowherd knight. Ib. vi. vi. 26.

To Co'ward.* v. a. [old Fr. couarder.] To make timorous or cowardly.

What read you there,
That hath so cowarded and chas'd your blood
Out of appearance? Shakspeare, Hen. V.

Co'wardice.† n. s. [from the old Fr. coardise.] Fear; habitual timidity; pusillanimity; want of courage.

Certes, sir knight, ye been too much to blame,
Thus for to blot the honour of the dead;
And with foul cowardice his carcase shame,
Whose living hands immortaliz'd his name.
Spenser, F. Q.

Gallant and fearless courage will turn into a native and heroick valour, and make them hate the cowardice of doing wrong. Milton on Education.

None was disgraced; for falling is no shame,
And cowardice alone is loss of fame:
The vent'rous knight is from the saddle thrown,
But 'tis the fault of fortune, not his own.
Dryd. Fab.

This great, this holy, this terrible being is present to all our affections; sees every treacherous inclination of our heart to desert his service; and treasures up, against the day of his wrath, the secret cowardice which deters us from asserting his cause, which prevails on us to compliment the vices of the great, to applaud the libertine, and laugh with the prophane. Rogers, Serm.

To Co'wardize.* v. a. [from the noun: which indeed the excellent author whom I cite, as using this verb, writes cowardize.] To render timorous or cowardly.

Wickedness naturally tends to dishearten and cowardize men. Scott, Serm. before the Artill. Comp. 1680.

Co'wardlike.* adj. [from coward and like.] Resembling a coward; acting as a coward.

It would betray a poverty of spirit
In me to obstruct my fortunes, or descent,
If I should, coward-like surrender up
The interest which the inheritance of your virtue,
And mine own thrifty fate, can claim in honour.
Beaum. and Fl. Laws of Candy.

Co'wardliness.† n. s. [from cowardly.] Timidity; cowardice.

I know not whether he more detests cowardliness or cruelty. Bp. Hall, Char. The Valiant Man.

Hugh of France was already returned home, pretending the colick; though some impute it to cowardliness, and make the disease not in his bowels but his heart. Fuller, Holy War, p. 43.

Co'wardly. adj. [from coward.]

1. Fearful; timorous; pusillanimous.

An Egyptian soothsayer made Antonius believe that his genius, otherwise brave and confident, was in the presence of Octavius poor and cowardly.
Bacon, Nat. Hist.

2. Mean; befitting a coward; proceeding from fear.

I do find it cowardly and vile,
For fear of what might fall, so to prevent
The time of life. Shakspeare, Jul. Cæs.

Let all such as can enlarge their consciences like hell, and style a cowardly silence in Christ's cause discretion, know, that Christ will one day scorn them. South.

Co'wardly.† adv. In the manner of a coward; meanly; vilely.

He sharply reproved them as men of no courage, who had most cowardly turned their backs upon their enemies. Knolles.

This is the stupid state of drooping soul,
That loves his body, and false forms admires: —
But cowardly declines the noble strife
'Gainst vice and ignorance.
More, Song of the Soul, ii. i. 17.

Co'wardous.* adj. [from coward. This is our old word for cowardly, and is found in Barret's Alvearie; formed like hazardous, and jeopardous.] Cowardly. Not now in use.

Co'wardship. n. s. [from coward.] The character or qualities of a coward; meanness; a word not now in use.

A very paltry boy, and more a coward than a hare: his dishonesty appears in leaving his friend here in necessity, and denying him; and for his cowardship, ask Fabian. Shakspeare.

To CO'WER.† v. n. [cwrrian, Welsh; courber, Fr. or perhaps borrowed from the manner in which a cow sinks on her knees, Dr. Johnson says. But it may be rather from the manner in which a bird descends into its nest, or sits in it, or stoops over its prey. The Su. Goth. kure, is translated, "avium more reclinatus quiesco." V. Seren. and G. Andr. Our word is often written cour or coure. In the north of England it is still used for to crouch down, or squat upon one's hams.] To sink by bending the knees; to stoop; to shrink.

Let the pail be put over the man's head above water, then he cower down and the pail be pressed down with him. Bacon.

The splitting rocks cower'd in the sinking sands,
And would not dash me with their ragged sides.
Shakspeare.

Do you know the French knight that cowers i' the hams? Shakspeare, Pericles.

The metaphor of a wing [applied to an army] leanes most this way, whether we consider their figure and motion being stretched out, or their posture when birds of rapine sit couring over their prey. Mede on Dan. p. 41.

As thus he spake, each bird and beast behold
Approaching two and two; these cowering low
With blandishment; each bird stoop'd on his wing.
Milton, P.L.

Our dame sits cowering o'er a kitchen fire;
I draw fresh air, and nature's works admire.
Dryden.

To Co'WER.* v. a. [old Fr. couvre, "to cowre over, to cherish, to protect; also, to hatch." Cotgrave. See also Menage in V. COUVER. We thus use the active verb To BROOD.] To cherish by care.

Where finding life not yet dislodged quite,
He much rejoic'd, and cour'd it tenderly,
As chicken newly hatcht, from dreaded destiny.
Spenser, F. Q. ii. viii. 9.

Co'WISH.* adj. [from To cow, to awe.]

1. Timorous; fearful; mean; pusillanimous; cowardly. Not in use.

It is the cowish terrour of his spirit,
That dares not undertake: he'll not feel wrong,
Which tie him to an answer. Shaks. K. Lear,

2. Pertaining to a cow. Obsolete. Huloet.

Co'WKEEPER. n. s. [cow and keeper.] One whose business is to keep cows.

The terms cowkeeper and hogherd, are not to be used in our poetry; but there are no finer words in the Greek language. Broome.

COWL.† n. s. [old Fr. coule; cuzle, Sax. cucullus, Lat.]

1. A monk's hood.

You may imagine that Francis Cornfield did scratch his elbow, when he had sweetly invented, to signify his name, saint Francis with his friary cowl in a cornfield. Camden.

What differ more, you cry, than crown and cowl?
I'll tell you, friend, a wise man and a fool. Pope.

2. [Perhaps from cool, cooler, a vessel in which hot liquor is set to cool, Dr. Johnson says. Perhaps our word is allied to the Germ. kugel, a bowl or round substance; Iceland. koggul. In Essex a cowl is a tub.] A vessel in which water is carried on a pole between two; a tub.

They found out Christ-Church plate hid in the walls behind wainscot, and in the cellar, and carried it away in a great cowle between two men. A. Wood, Annals Univ. Ox. anno 1642.

COWL-STAFF.† n. s. [cowl and staff. More usually written colstaff. See COLSTAFF. Cotgrave calls it "a colestaff or stang," our old word for a long pole.] The staff on which a vessel is supported between two men.

Mounting him upon a cowl-staff,
Which (tossing him something high)
He apprehended to be Pegasus. Suckling.

The way by a cowl-staff is safer: the staff must have a bunch in the middle, somewhat wedge-like, and covered with a soft bolster. Wiseman.

Co'WLED.* adj. [from cowl.] Wearing a cowl.

Here the cowl'd zealots with united cries
Urg'd the crusade. Shenstone, Ruin'd Abbey.

Co'WLIKE.* adj. [from cow and like.] Resembling a cow.

With cowlike udders, and with oxlike eyes.
Pope, Dunciad.

Cowo'RKER.* n. s. [from con and worker.] One engaged in the same work; fellow-labourer.

There is mention made by Munster of one Moses Gerundensis, whose opinion it was, that God Almighty spake these words, "Let us make man," to the Earth; as if God and the Earth, as co-workers, made man betwixt them; the Earth his body, and God his soul!
Gregory, Doct. of the Trin. p. 29.

In all acquired gifts, or habits, such as those of philosophy, oratory, or divinity, we are properly συνεργοι, co-workers with God.
South, Serm. iii. 8. xi.

Co'WSLIP. n. s. [paralysis; cuplippe, Sax. as some think, from their resemblance of scent to the breath of a cow; perhaps from growing much in pasture grounds, and often meeting the cow's lip.] Cowslip is also called pagil, grows wild in the meadows, and is a species of primrose. Miller.

He might as well say, that a cowslip is as white as a lily. Sidney.

Where the bee sucks, there suck I;
In a cowslip's bell I lie. Shakspeare, Tempest.

Thy little sons
Permit to range the pastures: gladly they
Will mow the cowslip posies, faintly sweet. Philips.

COWS-LUNGWORT. n. s. A species of Mullein.

CO'XCOMB.† n. s. [cock and comb, corrupted from cock's comb.]

1. The top of the head.

As the cockney did to the eels, when she put them i' the pasty alive; she rapt them o' the coxcombs with a stick, and cried, down, wantons, down. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

2. The comb resembling that of a cock, which licensed fools wore formerly in their caps. "Natural ideots, and fools, have, and still do accustome themselves to weare in their cappes cockes feathers, or a hat with a neck and head of a cocke on the top, and a bell thereon." Minsheu.

There take my coxcomb: why this fellow has banished two of his daughters, and did the third a blessing against his will: if thou follow him, thou must needs wear my coxcomb. Shakspeare.

3. A fop; a superficial pretender to knowledge or accomplishments. This meaning was adopted from the preceding signification.

I sent to her,
By this same coxcomb that we have i' th' wind,
Tokens and letters, which she did resend. Shaks.

I scorn, quoth she, thou coxcomb silly,
Quarter or council from a foe. Hudibras.

It is a vanity for every pretending coxcomb to make himself one of the party still with his betters. L'Estrange.

They overflowed with smart repartees, and were only distinguished from the intended wits by being called coxcombs, though they deserved not so scandalous a name. Dryden.

Some are bewilder'd in the maze of schools;
And some made coxcombs, nature meant but fools.
Pope.

4. A kind of red flower.

Co'XCOMBLY.* adj. [from coxcomb.] Like a coxcomb; foolish; vain.

My looks terrify them, you coxcombly ass, you!
Beaum. and Fl. Maid's Tragedy.

She is a most engaging creature, if she were not so fond of that damn'd coxcombly lord of her's. Congreve, Doub. Dealer.

COXCO'MICAL. adj. [from coxcomb.] Foppish; conceited: a low word unworthy of use.

Because, as he was a very natural writer, and they were without prejudice, without prepossession, without affectation, and without the influence of coxcomical, senseless cabal, they were at liberty to receive the impressions which things naturally made on their minds. Dennis.

COY.† adj. [coy, old French, from quietus, Latin.]

1. Modest; decent.

Jason is as coy as is a maide;
He looked piteously, but nought he said. Chaucer.

2. Reserved; not accessible; not easily condescending to familiarity.

And vain delight she saw he light did pass,
A foe of folly and immodest toy;
Still solemn sad, or still disdainful coy. Spenser.

Hence with denial vain, and coy excuse.
Milton, Lycidas.

Like Phœbus sung the no less amorous boy;
Like Daphne she, as lovely, and as coy. Waller.

At this season, every smile of the sun, like the smile of a coy lady, is as dear as it is uncommon. Pope.

The Nile's coy source. Grainger.

To COY. v. n. [from the adjective.]

1. To behave with reserve; to reject familiarity.

What, coying it again!
No more; but make me happy to my gust,
That is, without your struggling.
Dryden, K. Arthur.

Retire! I beg you, leave me.——
—— Thus to coy it!
With one who knows you too! Rowe, Jane Shore.

2. To make difficulty; not to condescend willingly.

If he coy'd
To hear Cominius speak, I'll keep at home.
Shakspeare, Coriol.

To COY. v. a. [for decoy, Dr. Johnson says. The word bears that sense indeed; but may be from the old French verb coyer, "attacher, joindre ensemble," Lacombe. Dr. Johnson also, defining the present word, "to allure," says that it is not in use, and cites only the passage in Coriolanus. This is, however, a great mistake. It is one of our oldest verbs, and is abundantly employed, both figuratively and simply, with good effect, by some of our best writers. "To coyen, blandior," Prompt. Parv.] To allure; to flatter; to caress; to pat or stroke.

I'll mountebank their loves,
Coy their hearts from them, and come home belov'd
Of all the trades in Rome. Shakspeare, Coriol.

Come, sit thee down upon this flowery bed,
While I thy amiable cheeks do coy.
Shakspeare, Mids. N. Dream.

A fickle sex, and true in trust to no man;
A servant sex, soon proud if they be coy'd;
And to conclude, thy mistress is a woman.
Sidney, Arcad. b. ii.

Who shall march out before ye, coy'd and courted
By all the mistresses of war.
Beaum. and Fl. Bonduca.

Pleasure is like a dog, which being coyed, and stroked, follows us at the heels; but if rated and beaten off, is driven away from us with ease.
Bp. Hall, of Contentation, § 23.

Now there are sprung up a wiser generation in this kind, who have the art to coy the fonder sort into their nets, who have now reduced gaming to a science. Bp. Rainbow, Serm. (1635,) p. 29.

Co'YISH.* adj. [from coy.] Not condescending to familiarity; modest; reserved.

He tooke her in his arms, as yet so coyish to be kist. Warner, Albion's England, (1597.)

Co'YLY.† adv. [from coy.] With reserve; with disinclination to familiarity.

This said; his hand he coyly snatcht away,
From forth Antinous' hand. Chapman, Odyssey.

Then doth she coyly turn her face aside,
That half her cheek is scarce sometimes descried.
Sir J. Davies, Orchestra, (1599.)

There is no need at all,
That the balsam-sweating bough
So coyly should let fall
His med'cinable tears. Crashaw's Poems, p. 3.

The modest maid
But coyly sips, and blushing drinks, abash'd.
Somerville's Rural Games, C. iii.

Co'YNESS. n. s. [from coy.] Reserve; unwillingness to become familiar.

When the sun hath warmed the earth and water, three or four male carps will follow a female: and she putting on a seeming coyness, they force her through weeds and flags. Walton's Angler.

When the kind nymph would coyness feign,
And hides but to be found again. Dryden.

Co'YSTREL. n. s. A species of degenerate hawk. See COISTREL.

One they might trust, their common wrongs to wreak:
The musquet and the coystrel were too weak,
Too fierce the falcon. Dryden, Hind and Panther.

Coz. n. s. A cant or familiar word, contracted from cousin.

Be merry, coz; since sudden sorrow
Serves to say thus, some good thing comes to-morrow. Shakspeare.

To CO'ZEN. † v. a. [To cose is in the old Scotch dialect, as Junius observes, to chop or change; whence cozen, to cheat, because in such traffick there is commonly fraud. So far Dr. Johnson. But see To CHOUSE.] To cheat; to trick; to defraud.

Let the queen pay never so fully, let the muster-master view them never so diligently, let the deputy or general look to them never so exactly, yet they can cozen them all. Spenser.

Goring loved no man so well but that he would cozen him, and expose him to publick mirth for having been cozen'd. Clarendon.

He that suffers a government to be abused by carelessness or neglect, does the same thing with him that maliciously and corruptly sets himself to cozen it. L'Estrange.

You are not obliged to a literal belief of what the poet says; but you are pleased with the image, without being cozened by the fiction. Dryden.

What if I please to lengthen out his date
A day, and take a pride to cozen fate.
Dryden, Aurengzebe.

Children may be cozened into a knowledge of the letters, and be taught to read, without perceiving it to be any thing but a sport.
Locke on Education.

Co'ZENAGE. n. s. [from cozen.] Fraud; deceit; artifice; fallacy; trick; cheat; the practice of cheating.

They say this town is full of cozenage,
As nimble jugglers that deceive the eye
Disguised cheaters. Shakspeare.

Wisdom without honesty is meer craft and cozenage, and therefore the reputation of honesty must first be gotten, which cannot be but by living well: a good life is a main argument.
B. Jonson, Discoveries.

There's no such thing as that we beauty call,
It is meer cozenage all;
For though some long ago
Lik'd certain colours mingl'd so and so,
That doth not tie me now from chusing new.
Suckling.

Imaginary appearances offer themselves to our impatient minds, which entertain these counterfeits without the least suspicion of their cozenage.
Glanville, Scepsis.

Strange coz'nage! none would live past years again,
Yet all hope pleasure in what yet remain;
And from the dregs of life, think to receive
What the first sprightly running could not give.
Dryden, Aurengzebe.

But all these are trifles, if we consider the fraud and cozenage of trading men and shopkeepers.
Swift.

Co'ZENER.† n. s. [from cozen.] A cheater; a defrauder.

Indeed, sir, there are cozeners abroad, and therefore it behoves men to be wary.
Shakspeare, Wint. Tale.

Apt to all outrages, thefts, treasons, &c. coseners, shifters, outlaws.
Burton, Anat. of Mel. To the Reader.

Like to a jugler's trick of legerdemaine, in deluding his beholders, when he conveyeth a ring into another man's pocket, and then calleth the man cozener when he hath done.
Bp. Morton's Discharge, &c. p. 220.

COZIER.* See COSIER.

CRAB. n. s. [cpabba, Sax. krabbe, Dutch.]

1. A crustaceous fish.

Those that cast their shell are, the lobster, the crab, the crawfish, the hodmandod or dodman, and the tortoise. The old shells are never found; so as it is like they scale off and crumble away by degrees. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

The fox catches crab fish with his tail, which Olaus Magnus saith he himself was an eye-witness of. Derham.

2. A wild apple; the tree that bears a wild apple.

Noble stock
Was graft with crab-tree slip, whose fruit thou art.
Shakspeare.

Fetch me a dozen crab-tree staves, and strong ones: these are but switches. Shaks. Henry VIII.

When roasted crabs hiss in the bowl,
Then nightly sings the staring owl. Shakspeare.

Tell why a graft, taking nourishment from a crab-stock, shall have a fruit more noble than its nurse and parent. Taylor.

3. A peevish morose person.

4. A wooden engine with three claws for launching of ships; or heaving them into the dock. Philips.

5. The sign in the zodiack.

Then parts the Twins and Crab, the dog divides,
And Argo's keel, that broke the frothy tides.
Creech.

CRAB.† adj. It is used by way of contempt for any sour or degenerate fruit; as, a crab cherry, a crab plum.

That liberality hated to provide crab wine for his guests. Bp. Hall, Contempl. B. 2.

Better gleanings their worn soil can boast,
Than the crab vintage of the neighb'ring coast.
Dryden.

To CRAB.* v. a. [from the noun.] To sour; to render peevish or morose.

'Tis easy to observe how age or sickness sours and crabs our nature.
Glanville, Pre-exist. of Souls, p. 33.

CRA'BBED. adj. [from crab.]

1. Peevish; morose; cynical; sour.

A man of years, yet fresh, as mote appear,
Of swarth complexion, and of crabbed hue,
That him full of melancholy did shew.
Spenser, F. Q.

O, she is
Ten times more gentle, than her father's crabbed;
And he's compos'd of harshness. Shaks. Tempest.

2. Harsh; unpleasing.

That was when
Three crabbed months had sour'd themselves to death,
Ere I could make thee open thy white hand,
And clepe thyself my love. Shaks. Win. Tale.

How charming is divine philosophy!
Not harsh and crabbed, as dull fools suppose,
But musical as is Apollo's lute,
And a perpetual feast of nectar'd sweets,
Where no crude surfeit reigns. Milton, Comus.

3. Difficult; perplexing.

Beside he was a shrewd philosopher,
And had read ev'ry text and gloss over;
Whate'er the crabbed'st author hath,
He understood b' implicit faith. Hudibras.

Lucretius had chosen a subject naturally crabbed.
Dryden.

Your crabbed rogues that read Lucretius,
Are against Gods, you know. Prior.

And crucify his crabbedness.
Beaum. and Fl. The Pilgrim.

3. Difficulty; perplexity.

The mathematicks, with their crabbedness and intricacy, could not deter you. Howel, Lett. i. i. 9.

CRA'BBY.* adj. [from crab.] Difficult; crabbed; perplexing.

Persius is crabby, because ancient; and his jerks, being particularly given to private customs of his time, dusky. Marston, Scourge of Villany.

CRA'BER. n. s.

The poor fish have enemies enough, beside such unnatural fishermen; as otters, the cormorant, and the craber, which some call the water-rat.
Walton's Angler.

CRABS-EYES. n. s. Whitish bodies, rounded on one side and depressed on the other, heavy, moderately hard, and without smell. They are not the eyes of any creature, nor do they belong to the crab; but are produced by the common crawfish: the stones are bred in two separate bags, one on each side of the stomach. They are alkaline, absorbent, and in some degree diuretick. Hill.

Several persons had, in vain, endeavoured to store themselves with crabs-eyes. Boyle.

CRACK.† n. s. [Fr. crac; Ir. crac, a loud sound; Dutch, kraek.

1. A sudden disruption, by which the parts are separated but a little way from each other.

2. The chink, fissure, or vacuity made by disruption; a narrow breach.

Contusions, when great, do usually produce a fissure or crack of the skull, either in the same part where the blow was inflicted, or in the contrary part. Wiseman.

At length it would crack in many places; and those cracks, as they dilated, would appear of a pretty good, but yet obscure and dark sky-colour. Newton, Opticks.

3. The sound of any body bursting or falling.

If I say sooth, I must report, they were
As cannons overcharg'd with double cracks.
Shakspeare, Macbeth.

Now day appears, and with the day the king,
Whose early care had robb'd him of his rest:
Far off the cracks of falling houses ring,
And shrieks of subjects pierce his tender breast.
Dryden.

4. Any sudden and quick sound.

A fourth? — start eye!
What will the line stretch out to th' crack of doom?
Shakspeare.

Vulcan was employed in hammering out thunderbolts, that every now and then flew up from the anvil with dreadful cracks and flashes. Addison.

5. Change of the voice in puberty.

And let us, Paladour, though now our voices
Have got the mannish crack, sing him to th' ground. Shakspeare.

Shakspeare, K. Hen. IV. P. II.

Val. 'Tis a noble child.
Vir. A crack, madam. Shakspeare, Coriol.

Since we are turned cracks, let's study to be like cracks, act freely, carelessly, and capriciously.
B. Jonson, Cynth. Revels.

I think they suck this knowledge in their milk.
Massinger, Unnat. Combat.

To CRACK.† v. a. [Fr. craquer; Dutch, kraecken.]

1. To break into chinks; to divide the parts a little from each other.

Look to your pipes, and cover them with fresh and warm litter out of the stable, a good thickness, lest the frost crack them. Mortimer.

2. To break; to split.

O, madam, my heart is crack'd, its crack'd.
Shakspeare.

Thou wilt quarrel with a man for cracking nuts, having no other reason but because thou hast hasel eyes. Shakspeare.

Should some wild fig-tree take her native bent,
And heave below the gaudy monument,
Would crack the marble titles, and disperse
The characters of all the lying verse. Dryden, Juv.

Or as a lute, which in moist weather rings
Her knell alone, by cracking of her strings.
Donne.

Honour is like that glassy bubble,
That finds philosophers such trouble;
Whose least part crack'd, the whole does fly,
And wits are crack'd to find out why. Hudibras.

3. To do any thing with quickness or smartness.

Let the Fauns, drawn from their groves, beware,
Be I their judge, they do at no time dare,
Like men street-born, and near the hall rehearse
Their youthful tricks in over-wanton verse:
Or crack out bawdy speeches, and unclean.
B. Jonson, Hor. Art of Poetry.

Sir Balaam now, he lives like other folks;
He takes his chirping pint, he cracks his jokes.
Pope.

4. To break or destroy any thing.

You'll crack a quart together! Ha, will you not. Shakspeare.

Love cools, friendship falls off, brothers divide: in cities, mutinies; in countries, discord; in palaces treason; and the bond cracked 'twixt son and father. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

5. To craze; to weaken the intellect.

I was ever of opinion, that the philosopher's stone, and an holy war, were but the rendezvous of cracked brains, that wore their feather in their heads. Bacon, Holy War.

He thought none poets till their brains were crackt. Roscommon.

To CRACK.† v. n.

1. To burst; to open in chinks.

By misfortune it cracked in the cooling, whereby we were reduced to make use of one part, which was straight and intire. Boyle.

— Come hither, you rogue:
What, have you forgot me?
Shakspeare, Tam. of the Shrew.

CRACK-ROPE. n. s. [from crack and rope.] A fellow that deserves hanging.

CRA'CKER.† n. s. [from crack. Dutch. kraecher.]

1. A noisy boasting fellow. [Gael. cracaire, A talker.]

Beware of flattering and glosing people, of boasters and crackers, for they will thee beguile.
Old Poem in Ashmole's Theat. Chem. p. 208.

What cracker is this same that deafs our ears
With this abundance of superfluous breath.
Shakspeare, K. John.

2. A quantity of gunpowder confined so as to burst with great noise.

Beat her into gunpowder,
She would make rare crackers.
Beaum. and Fl. Women pleas'd.

The bladder, at its breaking, gave a great report, almost like a cracker. Boyle.

And when, for furious haste to run,
They durst not stay to fire a gun,
Have don't with bonfires, and at home
Made squibs and crackers overcome. Hudibras.

Then furious he begins his march,
Drives rattling o'er a brazen arch,
With squibs and crackers arm'd to throw
Among the trembling crowd below. Swift.

3. That which cracks or breaks a thing.

Or chance to like
The nut-crackers throughout.
B. Jonson, Hor. Art of Poetry.

To CRA'CKLE. v. n. [from crack.] To make slight cracks; to make small and frequent noises; to decrepitate.

All these motions, which we saw,
Are but as ice, which crackles at a thaw. Donne.

I fear to try new love,
As boys to venture on the unknown ice
That crackles underneath them. Dryden.

Caught her dishevell'd hair and rich attire;
Her crown and jewels crackled in the fire.
Dryden, Æneid.

CRA'CKLING.* n. s. [from the verb.]

1. A small but frequent noise.

As the crackling of thorns under a pot, so is the laughter of a fool. Eccles. vii. 6.

Marrow is a specifick in that scurvy which occasions a crackling of the bones; in which case marrow performs its natural function of moistening them. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

2. A thin and crisp wheaten cake. North. Also the rind of roasted pork. See Grose, and Craven Dialect.

CRA'CKNEL.† n. s. [Craquelin, Fr. "a cracknell, made of the yolks of eggs, water, and flour, and fashioned like a hollow trendle." Cotgrave.] A hard brittle cake.

His clownish gifts and curtsies I disdain,
His kids, his cracknels, and his early fruit.
Spenser, Shep. Cal. Jan.

Take with thee ten loaves, and cracknels.
1 Kings, xiv, 3.

Pay tributary cracknels, which he sells;
And with our offerings, help to raise his veils.
Dryden, Juv.

CRA'DLE.† n. s. [cpaðel, Saxon.]

1. A moveable bed, on which children or sick persons are agitated with a smooth and equal motion, to make them sleep.

She had indeed, sir, a son for her cradle, ere she had a husband for her bed. Shaksp. K. Lear.

No jutting frieze,
Buttrice, nor coigne of vantage, but this bird,
Hath made his pendant bed and procreant cradle.
Shakspeare.

His birth, perhaps, some paltry village hides,
And sets his cradle out of fortune's way. Dryden.

A child knows his nurse and his cradle, and by degrees the playthings of a little more advanced age. Locke.

The cradle and the tomb, alas! so nigh:
To live, is scarce distinguish'd from to die. Prior.

Me let the tender office long engage,
To rock the cradle of reposing age;
With lenient arts extend a mother's breath,
Make languor smile, and smooth the bed of death.
Pope.

2. It is used for infancy, or the first part of life.

He knew them to be inclined altogether to war, and therefore wholly trained them up, even from their cradles, in arms and military exercises.
Spenser on Ireland.

The new duke's daughter, her cousin, loves her; being ever, from their cradles, bred together.

Let him be thine, and from his cradling
Begin his services first reckoning.
Otia Sacra, Poems, 1648, p. 33.

CRADLE-CLOTHES. n. s. [from cradle and clothes.] Bed clothes belonging to a cradle.

O that it could be prov'd,
That some night tripping fairy had exchang'd
In cradle-clothes our children where they lay,
And call mine Percy, his Plantagenet;
Then would I have his Harry, and he mine.
Shakspeare, Hen. IV. P. I.

CRAFT.† n. s. [cpæft, Sax. crefft, in old Welsh.]

1. Manual art; trade. [Touz les craftus du citee de Londres, old Fr. all the craftsmen, companies, of London. Kelham.]

I hear an objection, even from some well-meaning men, that these delightful crafts may be divers ways ill applied in a land. Wotton, Architecture.

2. Art; ability; dexterity.

A poem is the work of the poet, poesy is his skill or craft of making, the very fiction itself of the work. B. Jonson.

3. Fraud; cunning; artifice.

The offence is holy, that she hath committed;
And this deceit loses the name of craft,
Of disobedience, or unduteous title. Shakspeare.

This gives us a full view of wonderful art and craft in raising such a structure of power and iniquity. Ayliffe.

4. Small sailing vessels.

To CRAFT. v. n. [from the noun.] To play tricks; to practise artifice. Now out of use.

You've made fair hands,
You and your crafts! You've crafted fair.
Shakspeare, Coriol.

CRA'FTILY.† adv. [Sax. cpæftilice. Our old adverb exactly corresponded with the Saxon: "craftelyke or workmanly done." Huloet.]

1. Cunningly; artfully; with more art than honesty.

But that which most impaired his credit was the common report that he did, in all things, favour the Christians; and had, for that cause, craftily persuaded Solyman to take in hand the unfortunate Persian war. Knolles.

May he not craftily infer
The rules of friendship too severe,
Which chain him to a hated trust;
Which make him wretched to be just? Prior.

2. Skilfully. Obsolete.

On their heades bare
Of divers flowers, made full craftely
All in a sute, goodly chaplets they ware.
Chaucer, Fl. and Leaf.

CRA'FTINESS.† n. s. [from crafty.] Cunning; stratagem.

Such there are in this age, whose hearts are so framed to dwell in frowardnesse, as to say, that these be not daies of innocencie: what, shall it then follow, that their wickednesse would make them the daies of craftinesse?
Knight, Trial of Truth, 1580, fol. 51. b.

He taketh the wise in their own craftiness.
Job, v. 13.

CRA'FTSMAN.† n. s. [craft and man, Dr. Johnson says. But formerly it was crafty man, to denote this word in the sense of artificer: "A citee — whose crafti man and maker is God." Wicliffe, Heb. xi.] An artificer; a manufacturer; a mechanick.

That her became, as polish'd ivory,
Which cunning craftsman's hand hath overlaid
With fair vermillion. Spenser, F. Q.

What reverence he did throw away on slaves;
Wooing poor craftsmen with the craft of smiles.
Shakspeare.

What a resemblance this advice carries to the oration of Demetrius to his fellow craftsmen!
Decay of Piety.

CRA'FTSMASTER.† n. s. [craft and master.] A man skilled in his trade.

He is not his craft's-master, he doth not do it right. Shakspeare.

As for alchymy and magick — the crafts and the crafts-masters are not only despised, but named with derision.
Sir T. Bodley, to Bacon, Supp. to Cabala, p. 75.

There is art in pride: a man might as soon learn a trade. Those who were not brought up to it, seldom prove their craftsmaster. Collier on Pride.

CRA'FTY. adj. [from craft.] Cunning; artful; full of artifices; fraudulent; sly.

Nay, you may think my love was crafty love,
And call it cunning. Shakspeare, K. John.

This oppression did, of force and necessity, make the Irish a crafty people; for such as are oppressed, and live in slavery, are ever put to their shifts. Davies on Ireland.

Before he came in sight, the crafty god
His wings dismiss'd, but still retain'd his rod.
Dryden.

No body was ever so cunning as to conceal their being so; and every body is shy and distrustful of crafty men. Locke.

CRAG.† n. s.

1. Crag is, in British, a rough steep rock; and is used in the same sense in the northern counties at this day. Gibson: The Celt. craig is also a rock.

2. The rugged protuberances of rocks.

And as mount Etna vomits sulphur out,
With cliffs of burning crags, and fire and smoke.
Fairfax.

Who hath dispos'd, but thou, the winding way,
Where springs down from the steepy crags do beat.
Wotton.

A lion spied a goat upon the crag of a high rock. L'Estrange.

3. The neck. [krage, Goth.]

They looken bigge as bulls that been bate,
And bearen the crag so stiff and so state.
Spenser, Shep. Cal. Sept.

4. The small end of a neck of mutton: a low word.

CRA'GGED.† adj. [from crag.] Full of inequalities and prominences.

On a huge hill,
Cragged and steep, truth stands. Crashaw.

The body becomes more uncomely, cragged, and crumpled; the bones stare through the skin; the flesh that should cover them, is wasted much away. Smith, Portraiture of Old Age, p. 187.

CRA'GGEDNESS. n. s. [from cragged.] Fulness of crags or prominent rocks.

That craggedness or steepness of that mountain, — maketh many parts of it in a manner inaccessible. Brerewood on Lang. p. 176.

CRA'GGINESS.† n. s. [from craggy.] The state of being craggy.

The cragginess and steepiness of places up and down is a great advantage to the dwellers, and makes them inaccessible.
Howell, Instruct. For. Trav. p. 132.

CRA'GGY. adj. [from crag.] Rugged: full of prominences; rough to walk on, or climb.

That same wicked wight
His dwelling has low in an hollow cave,
Far underneath a craggy cliff ypight,
Dark, doleful, dreary, like a greedy grave.
Spenser, F. Q.

It was impossible to pass up the woody and craggy hills, without the loss of those commanders.
Ralegh, Essays.

Mountaineers that from Severus came,
And from the craggy cliffs of Tetrica. Dryden.

The town and republick of St. Marino stands on the top of a very high and craggy mountain.
Addison on Italy.

CRAKE.* n. s. [See CRACK.] A boast.

Leasings, backbitings, and vain-glorious crakes.
Spenser, F. Q. ii. xi. 10.

No perfectness of life, no crake of God's Word, no colour of religion, can please Almighty God, without the true and right faith.
Stapleton, Fort. of the Faith, 1565, fol. 5. b.

To CRAKE.* v. n. [from the noun.] To brag; to boast: sometimes with of.

Then she is mortal born, how so ye crake.
Spenser, F. Q. vii. vii. 50.

Nothing more proveth that all the light of the gospel, which they crake of, is mere darkness, than to say, as they say, &c.
Stapleton, Fort. of the Faith, fol. 88.

Each man may crake of that which was his owne;
Our parents' good is their's, and no whit our's:
Who therefore will of noble birth be knowne,
Or shine in virtue like his ancestours;
Gentrie consisteth not in lands and towers.
Mir. for Mag. p. 297.

To CRAKE.* v. a. To utter boastingly, or with insult.

To whom the boaster, that all knights did blot,
With proud disdain did scornefull answer make:—
And further did uncomely speeches crake.
Spenser, F. Q. v. iii. 16.

CRA'KER.* n. s. [from crake.] A boaster; a bragger; a vaunter.
Huloet and Barret.

These barking whelps were never good biters,
Ne yet great crakers were ever great fighters.
Damon and Pithias, sign. E. iiij.

To CRAM. v. a. [cpamman, Saxon.]

1. To stuff; to fill with more than can conveniently be held.

As much love in rhyme,
As would be cramm'd up in a sheet of paper,
Writ on both sides the leaf, margent and all. Shaks.

Being thus crammed in the basket, a couple of Ford's knaves were called.
Shakspeare, M. W. of Windsor.

Thou hast spoke as if thy eldest son should be a fool, whose skull Jove cram with brains.
Shakspeare, Twelfth Night.

Cram not in people by sending too fast company after company; but so as the number may live well in the plantation, and not by surcharge be in penury. Bacon.

2. To fill with food beyond satiety.

You'd mollify a judge, would cram a squire;
Or else some smiles from court you may desire.
King.

I am sure children would be freer from diseases, if they were not crammed so much as they are by fond mothers, and were kept wholly from flesh the first three years. Locke.

As a man may be eating all day, and, for want of digestion, is never nourished; so these endless readers may cram themselves in vain with intellectual food. Watts on the Mind.

But Annius, crafty seer,
Came cramm'd with capon, from where Pollio dines. Pope.

3. To thrust in by force.

You cram these words into mine ears, against
The stomach of my sense. Shakspeare, Tempest.

Huffer, quoth Hudibras, this sword
Shall down thy false throat cram that word.
Hudibras.

Fate has cramm'd us all into one lease,
And that even now expiring. Dryden, Cleomenes.

In another printed paper it is roundly expressed, that he will cram his brass down our throats.
Swift.

To CRAM. v. n. To eat beyond satiety.

The godly dame, who fleshly failings damns,
Scolds with her maid, or with her chaplain crams.
Pope.

CRA'MBO.† n. s. [a cant word, probably without etymology.] A play at which one gives a word, to which another finds a rhyme; a rhyme.

So Mævius, when he drain'd his skull
To celebrate some suburb trull,
His similes in order set,
And ev'ry crambo he could get. Swift.

Crowd is nothing but a botch, and a mere crambo to cloud. Dennis on Pope's Homer.

On a late gratulating occasion, our very worthy vice-chancellor deigned to tag a rhyme; and our learned professors play'd at crambo in Hebrew, Arabick, and Welsh. The Student, ii. 225.

CRAMP. n. s. [krampe, Dutch, crampe, Fr.]

1. A spasm or contraction of the limbs, generally removed by warmth and rubbing.

For this, be sure, to-night thou shalt have cramps,
Side-stitches that shall pen thy breath up.
Shakspeare, Tempest.

In a retreat, he outruns any lacquey; marry, in coming on, he has the cramp. Shakspeare.

The cramp, cometh of contraction of sinews; which is manifest, in that it cometh either by cold or dryness. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Hares, said to live on hemlock, do not make good the tradition; and he that observes what vertigoes, cramps, and convulsions follow thereon, in these animals, will be of our belief.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

2. A restriction; a confinement; obstruction; shackle.

A narrow fortune is a cramp to a great mind, and lays a man under incapacities of serving his friend. L'Estrange.

3. A piece of iron bent at each end, by which two bodies are held together.

To the uppermost of these there should be fastened a sharp grapple, or cramp of iron, which may be apt to take hold of any place where it lights.
Wilkins.

CRAMP.† adj. [perhaps it should be crampt, or cramped, from the verb.] Difficult; knotty: a low term.

With a little patience and attention you shall find those phrases very intelligible, and neither to be nonsense, or gibberish, nor cramp words to conceal a conceited ignorance under, as your old friends the epicureans are wont to call them.
Goodman, Wint. Ev. Conf. P. iii.

To CRAMP.† v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To pain with cramps or twitches.

When the contracted limbs were cramp'd, ev'n then
A wat'rish humour swell'd, and ooz'd again.
Dryden, Virgil.

2. To restrain; to confine; to obstruct; to hinder.

It is impossible to conceive the number of inconveniences that will ensue, if borrowing be cramped. Bacon.

There are few but find that some companies benumb and cramp them, so that in them they can neither speak nor do any thing that is handsome.
Glanville, Scepsis.

He, who serves, has still restraints of dread upon his spirits, which, even in the midst of action, cramps and ties up his activity. South, Serm.

Dr. Hammond loves to contract and cramp the sense of prophecies. Burnet, Theory.

The antiquaries are for cramping their subjects into as narrow a space as they can, and for reducing the whole extent of a science into a few general maxims. Addison on Italy.

Marius used all endeavours for depressing the nobles, and raising the people; particularly for cramping the former in their power of judicature.
Swift.

No more
Th' expansive atmosphere is cramp'd with cold,
But full of life, and vivifying soul.
Thomson, Spring.

3. To bind with crampirons.

The diversified but connected fabrick of universal justice is well cramped and bolted together in all its parts. Burke, Speech at Bristol, 1780.

4. To contract; to crumple, or pucker. [Teut. krompen.] Brockett's Northern Words.

CRAMP-FISH.† n. s. [from cramp and fish.] The torpedo, which benumbs the hands of those that touch it.

The torpedo or cramp-fish also came to land; a fish, if Pliny writes truth, that by hiding itself with mud and dirt catches lesser fish very strangely; for by his frigidity he benums such fish as swim over or lodge near him.
Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 384.

CRA'MPIRON.† n. s. [from cramp and iron.] See CRAMP, Sense 3.

The cramp-irons, that it moves on still,
Are the good motions of the will.
Watson, Hist. of the Art of Printing.

CRA'NAGE. n. s. [cranagium, low Latin.] A liberty to use a crane for drawing up wares from the vessels, at any creek of the sea or wharf, unto the land, and to make profit of it. It signifies also the money paid and taken for the same.
Cowel.

CRA'NBERRY.* n. s. A wild fruit. The bilberry, cranberry, and whortle-berry, are distinct fruits, differing as well in taste, as in external appearance, though they all belong to the class of vaccinia. See Ayton's Hortus Kewensis.

To CRANCH.* v. a. [See To CRAUNCH.] To crush in the mouth.

She cannot shoot at buts
Or manage a great horse; but she can cranch
A sack of small coal, eat you lime and hair,
Soap-ashes, loam; and has a dainty spice
O' the green-sickness. B. Jonson, Magn. Lady.

CRANE. n. s. [cpan, Sax. kraen, Dutch.]

1. A bird with a long beak.

Like a crane or a swallow, so did I chatter.
Isaiah, xxxviii. 14.

That small infantry warr'd on by cranes.
Milton, P. L.

2. An instrument made with ropes, pullies, and hooks, by which great weights are raised.

In case the mould about it be so ponderous as not to be removed by any ordinary force, you may then raise it with a crane. Mortimer.

Then commerce brought into the publick walk
The busy merchant, the big warehouse built,
Rais'd the strong crane. Thomson, Autumn.

3. A siphon; a crooked pipe for drawing liquors out of a cask.

CRANE-FLY.* n. s. A name given by some to the creature we call father-long-legs.
Chambers.

CRANE'S-BILL. n. s. [from crane and bill.]

1. An herb.

2. A pair of pincers terminating in a point, used by surgeons.

CRANIO'LOGY.* n. s. [κράνιον and λόγος, Gr.] The science of cerebral pathology.

CRA'NIUM. n. s. [Latin.] The skull.

In wounds made by contusion, when the cranium is a little naked, you ought not presently to croud in dossils; for if that contused flesh be well digested, the bone will incarn with the wound without much difficulty. Wiseman, Surgery.

CRANK.† n. s. [This word is perhaps a contraction of crane-neck, to which it may bear some resemblance, and is part of the instrument called a crane, Dr. Johnson says. But it is Saxon; cpanertæf, an instrument for weavers.]

1. A crank is the end of an iron axis turned square down, and again turned square to the first turning down; so that, on the last turning down, a leather thong is slipt to tread the treddle-wheel about.
Moxon.

2. Any bending or winding passage.

I send it through the rivers of your blood,
Even to the court, the heart; to the seat o'the brain;
And, through the cranks and offices of man,
The strongest nerves, and small inferiour veins,

From me receive that natural competency,
Whereby they live. Shakspeare, Coriolanus.

Like a young pine,
He grows up planted under a fair oak,
Whose strong large branches yet do shelter him;
And every traveller admires his beauty:
But like a wind, I'll work into his cranks,
Trouble his stream, and drown all vesels that
Ride on his greatness.
Beaum. and Fl. Queen of Corinth.

Meet you no ruin, but the soldier in
The crancks and turns of Thebes?
Beaum. and Fl. Two Noble Kinsmen.

The politick heart is too full of cranks and angles for the discovery of a plain familiar.
Feltham, Res. i. 83.

3. Any conceit formed by twisting or changing, in any manner, the form or meaning of a word.

I know not by what stratagem, or cunning crank of the schools, you can be made agreeable to yourself. Hayward, Answ. to Doleman, ch. 1.

Haste thee, nymph, and bring with thee
Jest and youthful jollity,
Quips and cranks, and wanton wiles,
Nods and becks, and wreathed smiles,
Such as hang on Hebe's cheek,
And love to live in dimple sleek. Milton, L'All.

To shew us the ways of the Lord straight and faithful as they are, not full of cranks and contradictions. Milton, Doctrine and Discip. of Diworce.

4. An impostor. Obsolete.

A lawyer of Bruges hath some notable examples of such counterfeit cranks; and every village almost will yield abundant testimonies amongst us; we have dummerers, Abraham-men, &c.
Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 159.

Thou art a counterfeit crank, a cheater.
Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 436.

CRANK.† adj. [from onkranck, Dutch, i. e. not sick, Skinner. Serenius refers it to the W. Goth. kranger, bold, daring.]

1. Healthy; sprightly: sometimes corrupted to cranky. Not in use, Dr. Johnson says, citing the solitary instance of Spenser. Yet the word has other good authorities; and it is still used in Kent for merry.

They looken bigge, as bulls that been bate,
And bearen the cragg so stiff and so state,
As cock on his dunghill crowing crank.
Spenser, Shep. Cal. Sep.

For I was a crank wit, a brisk young boy.
More, Song of the Soul, i. i. 121.

How came they to grow so extremely crank and confident? South, Serm. vi. 21.

2. Among sailors, a ship is said to be crank, when, by the form of its bottom, or by being loaded too much above, it is liable to be overset. [from kranck, Dut. sick, which is from the Cimbr. krank.]

We use the Dutch word crank, in English, "to be well-disposed," which in the original signifieth to be sick. Howell, Lett. iv. 19.

To CRANK.* v. n. [from the noun.] To turn; to run in and out. The following passage in Shakspeare's Henry the Fourth has been cited by Dr. Johnson to illustrate the verb crankle: but that is not the true reading, though it is found in some editions. Pope altered the word to crankling.

See how this river comes me cranking in,
And cuts me from the best of all my land
A huge half-moon, a monstrous cantle out.
Shakspeare, K. Hen. IV.

The purblind hare —
How he out-runs the wind, and with what care
He cranks and crosses, with a thousand doubles.
Shakspeare, Ven. and Adon.

To CRA'NKLE.† v. n. [from crank, as it signifies something bent.] To run in and out; to run in flexures and windings.

Meander, who is said so intricate to be,
Hath not so many turns, nor crankling nookes, as she. [The Wye.] Drayton, Polyolb. S. 7.

Now on along the crankling path doth keep,
Then by a rock turns up another way.
Drayton, Barons' Wars, b. 6.

To CRA'NKLE. v. a. To break into unequal surfaces; to break into angles.

Old Vaga's stream,
Forc'd by the sudden shock, her wonted track
Forsook, and drew her humid train aslope,
Crankling her banks. Philips.

CRA'NKLES. n. s. [from the verb.] Inequalities; angular prominences.

CRA'NKNESS. n. s. [from crank.]

1. Health; vigour.
2. Disposition to overset.

CRA'NKY.* See CRANK.

CRA'NNIED. adj. [from cranny.] Full of chinks.

A wall it is, as I would have you think,
That had in it a crannied hole or chink. Shaksp.

A very fair fruit, and not unlike a citron; but somewhat rougher chopt and crannied, vulgarly conceived the marks of Adam's teeth.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

CRA'NNY. n. s. [cren, Fr. crena, Lat.] A chink; a cleft: a fissure.

The eye of the understanding is like the eye of the sense; for as you may see great objects through small crannies or holes, so you may see great axioms of nature through small and contemptible instances. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

And therefore beat, and laid about,
To find a cranny to creep out. Hudibras.

In a firm building, the cavities ought not to be filled with rubbish, but with brick or stone, fitted to the crannies. Dryden.

Within the soaking of water and springs, with streams and currents in the veins and crannies.
Burnet, Theory.

He skipped from room to room, ran up stairs and down stairs, from the kitchen to the garrets, and he peeped into every cranny.
Arbuthnot, John Bull.

CRA'NNY.* adj. Pleasant; agreeable; praiseworthy. Bailey, and Wilbraham's Cheshire Gloss.

CRANTS.* n. s. [Germ. krantz, garlands; Icel. krans, a wreath or chaplet. V. Ihre, Gloss. Su. Goth.] The garlands carried before the bier of a maiden, and hung over her grave. Not wholly discontinued in this country. Warburton changed this word into chants, as others had into rites. But crants is the true word.

Yet here she is allowed her virgin crants,
Her maiden strewments, and the bringing home
Of bell and burial. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

CRAPE.† n. s. [crespe and crepe, Fr. crepa, low Lat.] A thin stuff, loosely woven, of which the dress of the clergy is sometimes made.

And proud Roxana, fir'd with jealous rage,
With fifty yards of crape shall sweep the stage.
Swift.

To thee I often call'd in vain,
Against that assassin in crape. Swift.

'Tis from high life high characters are drawn;
A saint in crape, is twice a saint in lawn. Pope.

CRA'PLE.* n. s. [Germ. krappeln, to seize.] A claw.

Soone as they did the monstrous Scorpion view
With ugly craples crawling in their way,
The dreadfull sight did them so sore affray,
That their well-knowen courses they forewent.
Spenser, F. Q. v. viii. 40.

And still he thought he felt their craples tare
Him by the heels back to his ugly den.
G. Fletcher, Christ's Vict. B. 2.

CRA'PULA. n. s. [Lat. from the Gr. κραιπάλη, which is from κρᾶς, the head, and πάλλω, to shake.] A surfeit, or sickness by intemperance.

The drunkard now supinely snores,
His load of ale sweats thro' his pores,
Yet when he wakes, the swine shall find,
A crapula remains behind.
Cotton, Night Quatrains.

CRA'PULENCE. n. s. [crapula, a surfeit, Latin.] Drunkenness; sickness by intemperance. Dict.

CRA'PULOUS. adj. [crapulosus, Lat.] Drunken; intemperate; sick with intemperance. Dict.

To CRASE.* See To CRAZE.

To CRASH.† v. n. [a word probably formed from the thing, Dr. Johnson says. Perhaps it may be from the Fr. croissir, "to crack, or crash; to crackle, as wood that's ready to break." Cotgrave.] To make a loud complicated noise, as of many things falling or breaking at once.

When convulsions cleave the lab'ring earth,
Before the dismal yawn appears, the ground
Trembles and heaves, the nodding houses crash.
Smith.

To CRASH.† v. a. To break or bruise. This is one our old verbs; but it is not in Shakspeare, as cited by Dr. Johnson; for the poet reads "crush a cup of wine," and not crash. See To CRUSH. Our word, in the sense of break, is traced by Serinius to the Goth. krassa, to tear. We have an expression, "to crash the "teeth for anger; to grind the teeth." Barret's Alvearie; which squares with the old Fr. See Lacombe in V. CROUSSI, croquer, grincer les dents, craquer." We may compare also the Fr. ecraser.

CRASH. n. s. [from the verb. A loud sudden mixed sound, as of many things broken at the same time.

Senseless Ilium,
Seeming to feel this blow, with flaming top
Stoops to his base; and, with a hideous crash
Takes prisoner Pyrrhus' ear. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

Moralizing sat I by the hazard table: I look'd upon the uncertainty of riches, the decay of beauty, and the crash of worlds, with as much contempt as ever Plato did. Pope.

CRA'SHING.* n. s. [from crash.] A violent, complicated noise.

There shall be the noise of a cry from the fish-gate, and an howling from the second, and a great crashing from the hills. Zeph. i. 10.

CRA'SIS.† n. s. [κρᾶσις.]

1. Temperature; constitution arising from the various properties of humours.

The fancies of men are so immediately diversified by the individual crasis, that every man owns something wherein none is like him. Glanville.

A man may be naturally inclined to pride, lust, and anger, as these inclinations are founded in a peculiar crasis, and constitution of the blood and spirits. South.

2. Weakness; craziness. See CRAZY.

Which kind of meats if I want, I decay forthwith, and fall into crases and diseases of my body.
Bp. Fisher, 1534, Strype's Eccl. Mem. vol. i. p. 175.

CRASS.† adj. [old Fr. crass, gras; Lat. crassus.] Gross; coarse; not thin; not comminuted; not subtle; not consisting of small parts.

Iron in aquafortis, will fall into ebullition, with noise and emication; as also a crass and fumid exhalation caused from the combat of the sulphur of iron with the acid and nitrous spirits of aquafortis.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

A cloud of folly and distraction darkens the soul, and makes it crass and material.
Bp. Taylor, Serm. (1653,) p. 208.

Metals are intermixed with the common terrestrial matter, so as not to be discoverable by human industry; or, if discoverable, so diffused and scattered amongst the crasser and more unprofitable matter, that it would never be possible to separate and extract it. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

CRA'SSIMENT.* n. s. [Lat. crassamentum.] Thickness.

Now, as the bones are principally here intended, so also all the other solid parts of the body, that are made of the same crassiment of seed, may be here included. Smith's Portrait. of Old Age, p. 179.

CRA'SSITUDE. n. s. [crassitudo, Latin.] Grossness; coarseness; thickness.

They must be but thin, as a leaf, or a piece of paper or parchment; for if they have a greater crassitude, they will alter in their own body, though they spend not. Bacon.

The Dead Sea, which vomiteth up bitumen, is of that crassitude, as living bodies, bound hand and foot, cast into it, have been born up, and not sunk.
Bacon, Nat. Hist.

The terrestrial matter carried by rivers into the sea, is sustained therein partly by the greater crassitude and gravity of the sea-water, and partly by its constant agitation. Woodward.

CRA'SSNESS.* n. s. [from crass.] Grossness.

The ethereal body contracts crassness and impurity by the same degrees as the immaterial faculties abate in their exercise.
Glanville, Pre-exist. of Souls, p. 118.

CRASTINA'TION. n. s. [from cras, Latin, tomorrow.] Delay. Dict.

CRATCH.† n. s. [Fr. creicche, Lat. crates. One of our oldest substantives. "She leyde him in a cracche, &c." Wicliffe, St. Luke, ii.] The palisaded frame in which hay is put for cattle.

When being expelled out of Paradise, by reason of sin, thou wert held in the chains of death; I was inclosed in the virgin's womb, I was laid in the cratch, I was wrapped in swathling-cloaths.
Hakewill on Providence.

We see the Son of God, the God of all the world, in the form of a servant: not a cratch to cradle him in, not a grave to bury him in, was his own. Bp. Hall, of Contentation, § 16.

Our meats and our sports (much of them) have relation to church-works. The coffin of our christmas pies in shape long, is in imitation of the cratch.
Selden, Table-Talk.

To CRATCH.* v. a. [our old verb for scratch; Welsh, crach, scabies. But see To SCRATCH.] To tear; as, "to cratch out one's eyes." Huloet.

CRA'TER. n. s. [Lat.] A vent, or aperture; a passage at which any thing is let out.

This mount, I could see, was made of the stones thrown up and fallen back again into the crater.
Berkeley to Arbuthnot, Descrip. of Vesuvius, 1717.

CRATE.* n. s. [Germ. kraet, a basket.] A pannier wicker vessel, in which things are carried on a horse.

I have seen a horse carrying home the harvest on a crate. Johnson, Journey to the Western Isles.

CRAVA'T.† n. s. [of uncertain etymology, Dr. Johnson says. Fr. cravate, which Menage derives from the Croats, a sort of German troops, usually called Cravates; from whom, in 1636, this ornament, he adds, was adopted in France. — Serenius refers at once to the part which the cravat adorns, and so deduces it from the West Goth. krafwe for krage, the neck. Appendix, Eng. and Sw. Dict. Pope places the accent on the first syllable.] A neck-cloth; any thing worn about the neck.

Less delinquents have been scourg'd,
And hemp on wooden anvils forg'd;
Which others for cravats have worn
About their necks, and took a turn. Hudibras.

With eager beats his Mechlin cravat moves.
Pope, Basset-Table.

The restrictives were applied, one over another, to her throat: then we put her on a cravat.
Wiseman, Surgery.

To CRAVE. v. a. [cpapian, Sax.]

1. To ask with earnestness; to ask with submission; to beg; to entreat.

What one petition is there found in the whole litany, whereof we shall ever be able at any time to say, that no man living needeth the grace or benefit therein craved at God's hands? Hooker.

As for my nobler friends, I crave their pardons;
But for the mutable rank-scented many,
Let them regard me as I do not flatter.
Shakspeare, Coriolanus.

The poor people not knowing where to hide themselves from the fury of their enemies, nor of whom to crave help, fled as men and women dismayed. Knolles.

I would crave leave here, under the word action, to comprehend the forbearance too of any action proposed. Locke.

Each ardent nymph the rising current craves,
Each shepherd's pray'r retards the parting waves.
Prior.

2. To ask insatiably.

The subjects arm'd; the more their princes gave,
Th' advantage only took the more to crave.
Denham.

Him dost thou mean, who, spite of all his store,
Is ever craving, and will still be poor?
Who cheats for halfpence; and who doffs his coat,
To save a farthing in a ferry-boat. Dryden, Pers.

3. To long; to wish unreasonably. See CRAVING.

4. To call for importunately.

Bestow
Your needful counsel to our businesses,
Which crave the instant use. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

The antecedent concomitants and effects of such a constitution, are acids, taken in too great quantities; sour eructations, and a craving appetite, especially of terrestrial and absorbent substances.
Arbuthnot on Aliments.

5. Sometimes with for before the thing sought.

Once one may crave for love,
But more would prove
This heart too little, that too great. Suckling.

CRA'VEN.† n. s. [derived by Skinner from crave, as one that craves or begs his life; perhaps it comes originally from the noise made by a conquered cock, Dr. Johnson says. "Craven," says Mr. Horne Tooke, "is one who has craved or craven his life from his antagonist; dextramque precantem protendens." Div. of Purley, ii. 71. Another learned etymologist has also said, "our word craven, a coward, is nothing but the humble and submissive craver." Whiter, Etym. Magn. p. 148. Thus fortified is the etymology of craven; but it is not impregnable. The word craven, cravent, or cravant, was the ancient exclamation, in a criminal trial by battle, of those who yielded to their opponents; which therefore was considered a term of the greatest infamy, and in time became the common appellation of all cowards. The law was, that the conquered should acknowledge his submission, before the people, in pronouncing this "word of fear;" and Lord Coke says, that if the accuser joined battle, and cried craven, he was to lose "liberam legem;" if the accused, he was to be hanged. Now this expression cravent, or cravant, is, as Dr Jamieson also has observed, undoubtedly from the old French creant, "terme de jurisprudence feodale: c'est une promesse de rendre service." Dict. Trev. By the use of it, therefore, Dr. Jamieson adds, the vanquished person merely did homage to the victor as his superiour. Creante is the old Fr. substantive for consent, or promise; and cranter, or creanter, the verb. V. Lacombe, and Roquefort. And Du Cange, in the low Lat. CREANTUM. The Scottish word for craven is crawdoun, which, if not a corruption of creant itself, may be, as Dr. Jamieson has remarked, from creant and donner, to give faith, or do homage. In the north of England, I may add, craddenly is yet used for cowardly.]

1. A cock conquered and dispirited.

What, is your crest a coxcomb? ———
—— A combless cock, so Kate will be my hen.
— No cock of mine; you crow too like a craven.
Shakspeare, Tam. of the Shrew.

Oh craven-chicken of a cock o' the game!
Beaum. and Fl. Martial Maid.

2. A coward; a recreant; a weak-hearted, spiritless fellow.

Is it fit this soldier keep his oath?
— He is a craven and a villain else.
Shakspeare, Hen. V.

Oh! here's one made to my hand,
Methinks looks like a craven:
Less pains will serve his trial; some slight justle.
Beaum. and Fl. Passion. Madman.

CRA'VEN. adj. Cowardly; base.

Upon his coward breast
A bloody cross, and on his craven crest
A bunch of hairs discolour'd diversly.
Spenser, F. Q.

Whether it be
Bestial oblivion, or some craven scruple
Of thinking too precisely on the event;—
A thought, which, quarter'd, hath but one part wisdom,
And, ever, three parts coward. Shaksp. Hamlet.

Yet if the innocent some mercy find
From cowardice, not ruth did that proceed;
His noble foes durst not his craven kind
Exasperate by such a bloody deed. Fairfax.

To CRA'VEN.† v. a. [from the noun.] To make recreant or cowardly. Hanmer.

Against self-slaughter
There is a prohibition so divine,
That cravens my weak hand. Shaksp. Cymbeline.

Dejected souls, cravened with their own distrusts, are the world's footballs, to be kicked and spurned.
Quarles, Judg. and Mercy. The Proud Man.

CRA'VER.† n. s. [from crave.] An insatiable asker. It is used in Clarissa, Dr. Johnson says; and, I may add, it is one of our old substantives, being in Huloet's Dictionary, and there rendered mendicus. It is also in Sherwood, a century after Huloet, and a century before Richardson.

Of all these cravers not one of them should lack.
Tooker's Fab. of the Church, 1604, p. 25.

CRA'VING.* n. s. [from crave.] Unreasonable desire.

Levity pushes us on from one vain desire to another, in a regular vicissitude and succession of cravings and satiety. L'Estrange.

He is actually under the power of a temptation, and the sway of an impetuous lust; both hurrying him to satisfy the cravings of it, by some wicked action. South.

CRA'VINGNESS.* n. s. [from craving.] The state of craving. Kersey.

To CRAUNCH.† v. a. [schrantsen, Dutch; whence the vulgar say more properly to scraunch.] To crush in the mouth. See To CRANCH.

She would craunch the wing of a lark, bones and all, between her teeth.
Swift, Voy. to Brobdingnag, ch. 3.

CRAW.† n. s. [kroe, Danish.]

1. The crop or first stomach of birds.

In birds there is no mastication, or comminution of the meat in the mouth; but in such as are not carnivorous, it is immediately swallowed into the crop or craw, or at least into a kind of anti-stomach, which I have observed in many, especially piscivorous birds. Ray on the Creation.

2. The human stomach, in contempt.

That this holy prophet, the Baptist, should be great in the sight of God; and should not give himselfe with the wicked priestes of the earth, or the false prophets of Israel, to gorge their craws with bibbing cheer, but should lead an austere and temperate diet.
Anderson, Expos. on Benedictus, (1573,) fol. 43.

CRA'WFISH. n. s. [sometimes written crayfish, properly crevis; in French ecrevisse.] A small crustaceous fish found in brooks; the small lobster of fresh water.

Those that cast their shell are the lobster, the crab, the crawfish, the hodmandod or dodman, and the tortoise. Bacon.

Let me to crack live crawfish recommend. Pope.

The common crawfish, and the large sea crawfish, both produce the stones called crabs eyes.
Hill.

To CRAWL. v. n. [krielen, Dutch.]

1. To creep; to move with a slow motion; to move without rising from the ground, as a worm.

I saw them under a green mantling vine,
That crawls along the side of yon small hill.
Milton, Comus.

That crawling insect, who from mud began;
Warm'd by my beams, and kindled into man.
Dryden.

The streams but just contain'd within their bounds,
By slow degrees into their channels crawl;
And earth increases as the waters fall. Dryden.

A worm finds what it searches after, only by feeling, as it crawls from one thing to another.
Grew, Cosmol.

The vile worm, that yesterday began
To crawl; thy fellow-creature, abject man!
Prior.

2. To move weakly, and slowly, or timorously.

'Tis our first intent
To shake all cares and business from our age,
While we unburthen'd crawl tow'rd death.
Shakspeare, K. Lear.

They like tall fellows crept out of the holes; and secretly crawling up the battered walls of the fort, got into it. Knolles.

For the fleets of Solomon and the kings of Egypt, it is very apparent they went with great leisure, and crawled close by the shore side.
Heylin.

A look so pale no quartane ever gave;
Thy dwindled legs seem crawling to a grave.
Dryden, Juv.

He was hardly able to crawl about the room, far less to look after a troublesome business.
Arbuthnot, J. Bull.

Man is a very worm by birth,
Vile reptile, weak and vain!
A while he crawls upon the earth,
Then shrinks to earth again. Pope.

It will be very necessary for the threadbare gownman, and every child who can crawl, to watch the fields at harvest-time. Swift.

3. To advance slowly and slily.

Cranmer
Hath crawl'd into the favour of the king,
And is his oracle. Shakspeare, Henry VIII.

4. To move about hated and despised.

Reflect upon that litter of absurd opinions that crawl about the world, to the disgrace of reason.
South.

How will the condemned sinner then crawl forth, and appear in his filth, before that undefiled tribunal? South.

Behold a rev'rend sire, whom want of grace
Has made the father of a nameless race
Crawl through the street, shov'd on, or rudely press'd
By his own sons, that pass him by unbless'd!
Pope.

CRAWL.* n. s. [Span. corral, a vault, or cellar.] The well in a boat.

CRA'WLER.† n. s. [from crawl.] A creeper; any thing that creeps.

Unarm'd of wings and scaly oare,
Unhappy crawler on the land.
Lovelace, Luc. p. 140.

CRAY, CRAYER, or CRARE,* n. s. [old Fr. craier, "sorte de vaisseau de guerre," Lacombe; low Lat. crayera; Sw. krejare, "a small vessel with one mast," Widegren.] A small sea vessel.

O, melancholy!
Who ever yet could sound thy bottom? find
The ooze, to shew what coast thy sluggish crare
Might easiliest harbour in. Shaksp. Cymb.

To ships, and barks, with gallies, bulks, and crayes. Harington, Orl. Fur. xxxix. 28.

Let him venture
In some decay'd crare of his own.
Beaum. and Fl. The Captain.

The owner of every ship, vessel, or crayer.
Stat. 2 Jac. I. ch. 32.

CRA'YFISH. n. s. [See CRAWFISH.] The river lobster.

The cure of the muriatick and armoniack saltness requires slimy meats; as snails, tortoises, jellies, and crayfishes. Floyer.

CRA'YON. n. s. [crayon, Fr.]

1. A kind of pencil; a roll of paste to draw lines with.

Let no day pass over you without drawing a line: that is to say, without working, without giving some strokes of the pencil or the crayon.
Dryden, Dufresnoy.

2. A drawing or design done with a pencil or crayon.

To CRAZE. v. a. [ecraser, Fr. to break to pieces.]

1. To break; to crush; to weaken.

In this consideration the answer of Calvin unto Farrel, concerning the children of Popish parents, doth seem crazed. Hooker.

Relent, sweet Hermia; and, Lysander, yield
Thy crazed title to my certain right. Shakspeare.

Till length of years
And sedentary numbness craze my limbs.
Milton, P. L.

Then through the fiery pillar, and the cloud,
God looking forth, will trouble all his host,
And craze their chariot-wheels. Milton, P. L.

2. To powder.

The tin ore passeth to the crazing mill, which, between two grinding stones, bruiseth it to a fine sand. Carew's Survey.

3. To crack the brain; to impair the intellect.

I lov'd him, friend,
No father his son dearer, true, to tell thee,
That grief hath craz'd my wits. Shaksp. K. Lear.

Wickedness is a kind of voluntary frenzy, and a chosen distraction; and every sinner does wilder and more extravagant things than any man can do that is crazed and out of his wits, only with this sad difference, that he knows better what he does.
Tillotson.

CRA'ZEDNESS.† n. s. [from crazed.] Decrepitude; brokenness; diminution of intellect.

The nature, as of men that have sick bodies, so likewise of the people in the crazedness of their minds, possessed with dislike and discontentment at things present, is to imagine that any thing would help them. Hooker.

Four several persons were scarcely able to hold him; and this at first without any distemper in his head, or crazedness in his brain.
Hallywell, Melampr. p. 78.

CRA'ZINESS.† n. s. [from crazy.]

1. State of being crazy; imbecility; weakness.

Touching other places, she may be said to hold them as one should do a wolf by the ears; nor will I speak now of the craziness of her title to many of them. Howell, Vocal Forest.

There is no crasiness we feel, that is not a record of God's having been offended by our nature; and every little ache about us is a thorn or briar springing out of that offensive earth, whereof we are composed.
W. Mountagu, Dev. Ess. P. ii. (1654,) p. 196.

2. Weakness of intellect.

CRA'ZY.† adj. [ecrazé, Fr.]

1. Broken; decrepit.

Come, my lord,
We will bestow you in some better place;
Fitter for sickness and for crazy age.
Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

When people are crazy and in disorder, it is natural for them to groan. L'Estrange.

2. Broken witted; shattered in the intellect.

I have heard for certain of a minister of no small print and repute among the people, who took great offence at the great sleeves of a lady's new fashioned gown, calling them anti-christian, ungodly, strange apparel, and such as the Lord was displeased with; yet within one year this good man's wife was in the same fashion, without any scandal to her supercilious husband; so crazy are some men's judgements, and so easy their censures, as to matters of scandal!
Bp. Taylor, Artif. Hands. p. 144.

The queen of night, whose large command
Rules all the sea and half the land,

And over moist and crazy brains,
In high spring-tides, at midnight reigns.
Hudibras.

3. Weak; feeble; shattered; ailing; out of order; as it is still used in some places.
Ant. How is't, signior?
Mer. Crazy a little.
Mar. What ail you, sir?
Beaum. and Fl. The Coxcomb.
Physick can but mend our crazy state,
Patch an old building, not a new create. Dryden.
Were it possible that the near approaches of eternity, whether by a mature age, a crazy constitution, or a violent sickness, should amaze so many, had they truly considered. Wake.

CREAGHT. n. s. [an Irish word.] In these fast places, they kept their creaghts, or herds of cattle, living by the milk of the cow, without husbandry or tillage. Davies on Ireland.

To CREAGHT. v. n. It was made penal to the English to permit the Irish to creaght or graze upon their lands, or present them to ecclesiastical benefices.
Davies on Ireland.

To CREAK.† v. n. [corrupted from crack, Dr. Johnson says. But it is from the old Fr. verb, criquer.]

1. To make a harsh protracted noise; "to creak as a shoe." Sherwood.
No door there was th' unguarded house to keep,
Or creaking hinges turn'd, to break his sleep.
Dryden.

2. It is sometimes used of animals; as, to creak, or cry like a gander, Barret; to creak like a crane, Sherwood. [Welsh, crech, a scream.]
The creaking locusts with my voice conspire,
They fry'd with heat, and I with fierce desire.
Dryden.

CRE'AKING.* n. s. [from the verb.] A harsh noise.
Let not the creaking of shoes, nor the rustling of silks, betray thy poor heart to women.
Shakspeare, K. Lear.
Their black and neat slipper, or stertup, with the creaking, allureth young men.
A. Willet on the Marriage of the C. Palatine, &c. 1612, p. 47.
With what patience doth this man bear the loud scoldings of his Xantippe, making no more of them than the creaking of a cart-wheel!
Bp. Hall, of Contentation, § 16.

CREAM.† n. s. [Goth. kreima, Lat. cremor.]

1. The unctuous or oily part of milk, which, when it is cold, floats on the top, and is changed by the agitation of the churn into butter: the flower of milk.
It is not your inky brows, your black silk hair,
Your bugle eye-balls, nor your cheek of cream,
That can entame my spirits to your worship.
Shakspeare.
I am as vigilant as a cat to steal cream.
Shakspeare, Hen. IV.
Cream is matured and made to rise speedily, by putting in cold water; which, as it seemeth, getteth down the whey. Bacon, Nat. Hist.
How the drudging goblin swet,
To earn his cream bowl duly set;
When in one night, ere glimpse of morn,
His shadowy flail had thresh'd the corn.
Milton, L'All.
Let your various creams encircled be
With swelling fruit, just ravish'd from the tree.
King.
Milk, standing some time, naturally separates into an oily liquor called cream, and a thinner, blue, and more ponderous liquor called skimmed milk. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

2. It is used for the best part of any thing; as, the cream of a jest.
This is the fourth degree of love, and the cream and top of love, whilst we are on this side heaven.
Hewyt's Serm. 1658, p. 94.

To CREAM.† v. n. [from the noun.] To gather on the surface. This figurative expression from milk is, in the north of England, applied to beer, which is said to cream, i. e. to froth or mantle.
There are a sort of men, whose visages
Do cream and mantle, like a standing pond;
And do a wilful stiffness entertain,
With purpose to be drest in an opinion
Of wisdom, gravity, profound conceit.
Shakspeare, Merch. of Venice.
Not any wrinkle creaming in their faces.
Chapman, Bussy D'Ambois.

To CREAM.† v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To skim off the cream.
Have you some creamed or curded milk?
Wodroephe, Fr. Gr. 1623, p. 211.

2. To take the flower and quintessence of any thing.
Such a man, truly wise, creams off nature, leaving the sour, and the dregs, for philosophy and reason to lap up. Swift, Tale of a Tub. sect. 9.

CREAM-FACED. adj. [cream and faced.] Pale; coward-looking.
Thou cream-fac'd lown,
Where got'st thou that goose-look? Shaks. Macb.

CRE'AMY.† adj. [from cream.] Full of cream; having the nature of cream.
Your creamy words but cozen.
Beaum. and Fl. Queen of Corinth.
There each trim lass, that skims the milky store,
To the swart tribes their creamy bowls allots.
Collins, Popular Superstitions of the Highlands.

CRE'ANCE. n. s. [French.] Is, in falconry, a fine small line, fastened to a hawk's leash when she is first lured.

CREASE.† n. s. [from creta, Latin, chalk, Skinner; to which Dr. Johnson assents. In the old chronicle of Robert of Gloucester, creysede occurs in the sense of crossed; whence Hearne conjectures our creased to be derived. See also Kelham in creises, old Fr. crossed. But I must not omit the Teut. kroesen, to curl or wreath.] A mark made by doubling any thing.
Men of great parts are unfortunate in business, because they go out of the common road: I once desired lord Bolingbroke to observe, that the clerks used an ivory knife, with a blunt edge, to divide paper, which cut it even, only requiring a strong hand; whereas a sharp penknife would go out of the crease, and disfigure the paper. Swift.

To CREASE. v. a. [from the noun.] To mark any thing by doubling it, so as to leave the impression.

To CREA'TE. v. a. [creo, Lat.]

1. To form out of nothing; to cause to exist.
In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth. Genesis, i. 1.
We having but imperfect ideas of the operations of our minds, and much imperfecter yet of the operations of God, run into great difficulties about free created agents, which reason cannot well extricate itself out of. Locke.

2. To produce; to cause; to be the occasion of.
Now is the time of help: your eye in Scotland
Would create soldiers, and make women fight.
Shakspeare.
His abilities were prone to create in him great confidence of undertakings, and this was like enough to betray him to great errours and many enemies. K. Charles.
They eclipse the clearest truths, by difficulties of their own creating, or no man could miss his way to heaven for want of light. Decay of Piety.
None knew, till guilt created fear,
What darts or poison'd arrows were. Roscommon.
Must I new bars to my own joy create,
Refuse myself what I had forc'd from fate?
Dryden, Aurengz.
Long abstinence is troublesome to acid constitutions, by the uneasiness it creates in the stomach.
Arbuthnot.

3. To beget.

4. To invest with any new character.
Arise my knights of the battle: I create you
Companions to our person, and will fit you
With dignities becoming your estates.
Shakspeare, Cymb.

5. To give any new qualities; to put any thing in a new state.
The best British undertaker had but a proportion of three thousand acres for himself, with power to create a manor, and hold a court-baron.
Davies on Ireland.

CREA'TE.* adj. [from the verb.]

1. Begotten.
And the issue there create
Ever shall be fortunate. Shakspeare.

2. Composed; made up.
[They] do serve you
With hearts create of duty and of zeal.
Shakspeare, K. Hen. V.

CREA'TION.† n. s. [from create.]

1. The act of creating or conferring existence.
Consider the immensity of the Divine Love, expressed in all the emanations of his providence; in his creation, in his conservation of us.
Bp. Taylor.

2. The act of investing with new qualities or character: as, the creation of peers.

3. The things created; the universe.
As subjects then, the whole creation came;
And from their natures Adam them did name.
Denham.
Such was the saint, who shone with ev'ry grace,
Reflecting, Moses like, his master's face:
God saw his image lively was express'd,
And his own work as his creation bless'd.
Dryden, Fab.
Nor could the tender new creation bear
Th' excessive heats or coldness of the year.
Dryden, Virg.
In days of yore, no matter where or when,
Before the low creation swarm'd with men. Parnel.
The whole creation preys upon itself: every living creature is inhabited. Tatler, No. 229.

4. Any thing produced, or caused.
Art thou not, fatal vision, sensible
To feeling as to sight? Or art thou but
A dagger of the mind, a false creation,
Proceeding from the heat-oppressed brain?
Shakspeare, Macbeth.

CREA'TIVE. adj. [from create.]

1. Having the power to create.
But come, ye generous minds, in whose wide thought,
Of all his works, creative beauty burns,
With warmest beam. Thomson, Spring.

2. Exerting the act of creation.
To trace the outgoings of the ancient of days in the first instance, and of his creative power, is a research too great for mortal enquiry. South.

CREA'TOR. n. s. [creator, Lat.] The Being that bestows existence.
Open, ye heavens, your living doors; let in
The great Creator, from his work return'd
Magnificent; his six days work, a world.
Milton, P. L.
When you lie down, close your eyes with a short prayer, commit yourself into the hands of your faithful Creator; and when you have done, trust him with yourself, as you must do when you are dying. Bp. Taylor, Guide to Devotion.

CREA'TRESS.* n. s. [from the Lat. creatrix.] She who makes, or creates, any thing.

Him long she so with shadowes entertain'd,
As her creatresse had in charge to her ordain'd.
Spenser, F. Q. iii. viii. 10.

CREA'TURAL.* adj. Belonging to a creature; having the qualities of a creature. See CREATURELY.

Their understandings being but creatural huffiness of mind, and an ambition of approving themselves the broachers and maintainers of strange paradoxes. Annot. on Glanville, p. 248.

CRE'ATURE. n. s. [creatura, low Lat.]

1. A being not self-existent, but created by the supreme power.

Were these persons idolaters for the worship they did not give to the Creator, or for the worship they did give to his creatures. Stilling fleet.

2. Any thing created.

God's first creature was light.
Bacon, New Atlantis.

Imperfect the world, and all the creatures in it, must be acknowledged in many respects to be.
Tillotson.

3. An animal, not human.

The queen pretended satisfaction of her knowledge only
In killing creatures vile, as cats and dogs.
Shakspeare, Cymbeline.

4. A general term for man.

Yet crime in her could never creature find;
But for his love, and for her own self-sake,
She wander'd had from one to other Ind.
Spenser, F. Q.

Most cursed of all creatures under sky,
Lo Tantalus, I here lamented lye. Spenser, F. Q.

Though he might burst his lungs to call for help,
No creature would assist or pity him. Roscommon.

5. A word of contempt for a human being.

Hence; home, you idle creatures, get you home;
Is this a holiday? Shakspeare, Jul. Cæs.

He would into the stews,
And from the common creatures pluck a glove,
And wear it as a favour. Shakspeare, Rich. III.

I've heard that guilty creatures, at a play
Have, by the very cunning of the scene,
Been struck so to the soul, that presently
They have proclaim'd their malefactions.
Shakspeare, Hamlet.

Nor think to-night of thy ill nature,
But of thy follies, idle creature. Prior.

A good poet no sooner communicates his works, but it is imagined he is a vain young creature, given up to the ambition of fame. Pope.

6. A word of petty tenderness.

And then, sir, would he gripe and wring my hand;
Cry, Oh sweet creature, and then kiss me hard.
Shakspeare.

Ah, cruel creature, whom do'st thou despise?
The gods, to live in woods, have left the skies.
Dryden, Virg.

Some young creatures have learnt their letters and syllables by having them pasted upon little tablets. Watts.

7. A person who owes his rise or his fortune to another.

He sent to colonel Massey to send him men, which he, being a creature of Essex's, refused.
Clarendon.

The duke's creature he desired to be esteemed.
Clarendon.

Great princes thus, when favourites they raise,
To justify their grace, their creatures praise.
Dryden.

The design was discovered by a person whom every body knows to be the creature of a certain great man. Swift.

CRE'ATURELY. adj. [from creature.] Having the qualities of a creature.

The several parts of relatives, or creaturely infinities, may have finite proportions to one another.
Cheyne, Phil. Prin.

CRE'ATURESHIP.* n. s. [from creature.] The state of a creature.

The laws of our creature-ship and dependance do necessarily and indispensably subject us to God as our Creator; and we can as soon cease to be creatures, as become independent.
Dr. Cave, Serm. p. 10.

CRE'BRITUDE. n. s. [from creber, frequent, Lat.] Frequentness. Dict.

CRE'BROUS. adj. [from creber, Lat.] Frequent. Dict.

CRE'DENCE. n. s. [from credo, Lat. credence, Norman Fr.]

1. Belief; credit.

Ne let it seem, that credence this exceeds;
For he that made the same was known right well,
To have done much more admirable deeds;
It Merlin was. Spenser, F. Q.

Love and wisdom,
Approv'd so to your majesty, may plead
For ample credence. Shaksp.

They did not only underhand give out that this was the true earl, but the friar, finding some credence in the people, took boldness in the pulpit to declare as much. Bacon.

2. That which gives a claim to credit or belief.

After they had delivered to the king their letters of credence, they were led to a chamber richly furnished. Hayward.

To CRE'DENCE.* v. a. [from the noun.] To believe. Not now in use.

In crédencing his tales. Skelton, Poems, p. 154.

CREDE'NDA. n. s. [Latin.] Things to be believed; articles of faith; distinguished in theology from agenda, or practical duties.

These were the great articles and credenda of Christianity, that so much startled the world.
South.

CRE'DENT. adj. [credens, Lat.]

1. Believing; easy of belief.

Then weigh what loss your honour may sustain,
If with too credent ear you list' his songs.
Shaksp. Hamlet.

2. Having credit; not to be questioned. Less proper.

My authority bears a credent bulk,
That no particular scandal once can touch,
But it confounds the breather.
Shaksp. Meas. for Meas.

CREDE'NTIAL.† n. s. [from credens, Lat.] That which gives a title to credit; the warrant upon which belief or authority is claimed.

A few persons of an odious and despised country could not have filled the world with believers, had they not shown undoubted credentials from the Divine Person who sent them on such a message.
Addison on the Christian Religion.

They reject the strongest credentials, and will accept of lesser.
Leslie, Short Method with the Jews.

CREDE'NTIAL.* adj. Giving a title to credit.

Credential letters were read from the Frisians.
Lett. from the Syn. of Dort, Hales's Rem. p. 106.

CREDIBI'LITY. n. s. [from credible.] Claim to credit; possibility of obtaining belief; probability.

The first of those opinions I shall shew to be altogether incredible, and the latter to have all the credibility and evidence of which a thing of that nature is capable. Tillotson.

Calculate the several degrees of credibility and conviction, by which the one evidence surpasseth the other. Atterbury.

CRE'DIBLE.† adj. [credibilis, Latin.] Worthy of credit; deserving of belief; having a just claim to belief.

A tale written in the Bible,
Whiche must needes be credible.
Gower, Conf. Am. Prol.

The ground of credit is the credibility of things credited; and things are made credible, either by the known condition and quality of the utterer, or by the manifest likelihood of truth in themselves. Hooker.

None can demonstrate to me, that there is such an island as Jamaica; yet upon the testimony of credible persons, I am free from doubt. Tillotson.

CRE'DIBLENESS. n. s. [from credible.] Credibility; worthiness of belief; just claim to belief.

The credibleness of a good part of these narratives has been confirmed to me by a practiser of physick. Boyle.

CRE'DIBLY. adv. [from credible.] In a manner that claims belief.

This, with the loss of so few of the English as is scarce credible, being, as hath been rather confidently than credibly reported, but of one man, though not a few hurt. Bacon.

CRE'DIT. n. s. [credit, Fr.]

1. Belief of; faith yielded to another.

When the people heard these words, they gave no credit unto them, nor received them.
1 Mac. x. 46.

I may give credit to reports. Addison, Spect.

Some secret truths, from learned pride conceal'd,
To maids alone and children are reveal'd:
What though no credit doubting wits may give,
The fair and innocent shall still believe. Pope.

2. Honour; reputation.

I published, because I was told I might please such as it was a credit to please. Pope.

3. Esteem; good opinion.

There is no decaying merchant, or inward beggar, hath so many tricks to uphold the credit of their wealth, as these empty persons have to maintain the credit of their sufficiency. Bacon.

His learning, though a poet said it,
Before a play, would lose no credit. Swift.

Yes, while I live, no rich or noble knave,
Shall walk the world in credit to his grave.
Pope, Hor.

4. Faith; testimony: that which procures belief.

We are contented to take this upon your credit, and to think it may be. Hooker.

The things which we properly believe, be only such as are received upon the credit of divine testimony. Hooker.

The author would have done well to have left so great a paradox only to the credit of a single assertion. Locke.

5. Trust reposed; with regard to property: correlative to debt.

Credit is nothing but the expectation of money, within some limited time. Locke.

6. Promise given.

They have never thought of violating the publick credit, or of alienating the revenues to other uses than to what they have been thus assigned.
Addison.

7. Influence; power not compulsive; interest.

She employed his uttermost credit to relieve us, which was as great as a beloved son with a mother. Sidney.

They sent him likewise a copy of their supplication to the king, and desired him to use his credit that a treaty might be entered into. Clarendon.

Having credit enough with his master to provide for his own interest, he troubled not himself for that of other men. Clarendon.

To CRE'DIT. v. a. [credo, Lat.]

1. To believe.

Now I change my mind,
And partly credit things that do presage.
Shaksp. Jul. Cæs.

To credit the unintelligibility both of this union and motion, we need no more than to consider it.
Glanville.

2. To procure credit or honour to any thing.

May here her monument stand so,
To credit this rude age; and show
To future times, that even we
Some patterns did of virtue see. Waller.

It was not upon design to credit these papers, nor to compliment a society so much above flattery. Glanville.

At present you credit the church as much by your government, as you did the school formerly by your wit. South.

3. To trust; to confide in.

4. To admit as a debtor.

CRE'DITABLE. adj. [from credit.]

1. Reputable; above contempt.

He settled him in a good creditable way of living, having procured him by his interest one of the best places of the country. Arbuthnot, John Bull.

2. Honourable; estimable.

The contemplation of things, that do not serve to promote our happiness, is but a more specious sort of idleness, a more pardonable and creditable kind of ignorance. Tillotson.

CRE'DITABLENESS. n. s. [from creditable.] Reputation; estimation.

Among all these snares, there is none more entangling than the creditableness and repute of customary vices. Decay of Piety.

CRE'DITABLY.† adv. [from creditable.] Reputably; without disgrace.

Many will chuse rather to neglect their duty safely and creditably, than to get a broken pate in the church's service, only to be rewarded with that which will break their hearts too. South.

He who would act the destroyer, if he would do it effectually, should put on the reformer; and he who would be creditably, and successfully, a villain, let him go whining, praying, and preaching to his work; let him knock his breast, and his hollow heart, and pretend to lie in the dust before God, before he can be able to lay others there! South, Serm. v. 218.

CRE'DITOR. n. s. [creditor, Latin.]

1. He to whom a debt is owed; he that gives credit; correlative to debtor.

There came divers of Anthonio's creditors in my company to Venice, that swear he cannot chuse but break. Shakspeare.

I am so used to consider myself as creditor and debtor, that I often state my accounts after the same manner, with regard to heaven and my own soul. Addison, Spect.

No man of honour, as that word is usually understood, did ever pretend that his honour obliged him to be chaste or temperate, to pay his creditors, to be useful to his country, to do good to mankind, to endeavour to be wise or learned, to regard his word, his promise, or his oath.
Swift.

2. One who credits, one who believes. Not used.

Many sought to feed
The easy creditors of novelties,
By voicing him alive. Shaksp.

The prejudice of credulity may in some measure, be cured by learning to set a high value on truth. Watts, Logick.

CRE'DULOUS. adj. [credulus, Latin.] Apt to believe; unsuspecting; easily deceived.

A credulous father, and a brother noble,
Whose nature is so far from doing harm,
That he suspects none. Shaksp. K. Lear.

Who now enjoys thee credulous all gold,
Who always vacant, always amiable,
Hopes thee, of flattery gales
Unmindful, hapless he,
T' whom thou untry'd seem'st fair. Milton.

CRE'DULOUSLY.* adv. [from credulous.] In an unsuspecting manner.

If you shall observe a man pretend to believe plain impossibilities, and not only supinely and credulously swallow them, but, &c.
Goodman, Wint. Ev. Conf. P. iii.

CRE'DULOUSNESS.† n. s. [from credulous.] Aptness to believe; credulity.

A woman, whose sex hath been famous ever for devotion and credulousness.
Sir E. Sandys, State of Rel. 1605. F. 4. b.

CREED.† n. s. [Sax. cpeda, from the Lat. credo, the first word of the Apostles' Creed. "As the first word Credo, I believe, giveth a denomination to the whole confession of faith, from thence commonly called the Creed; so is the same word to be imagined not to stand only where it is expressed, but to be carried through the whole body of the confession." Pearson on the Creed.]

1. A form of words in which the articles of faith are comprehended.

The larger and fuller view of this foundation is set down in the creeds of the church.
Hammond on Fundamentals.

Will they, who decry creeds and creedmakers, say that one who writes a treatise of morality ought not to make in it any collection of moral precepts?
Fiddes's Sermons.

2. Any solemn profession of principles or opinion.

For me, my lords,
I love him not, nor fear him; there's my creed.
Shaksp.

To CREEK. v. a. [See To CREAK.] To make a harsh noise.

4. To move slowly and feebly.

To-morrow, and to-morrow, and to-morrow,
Creeps in this petty pace from day to day,
To the last syllable of recorded time.
Shaksp. Macbeth.

Why should a man
Sleep when he wakes, and creep into the jaundice
By being peevish? Shaksp. Merch. of Venice.

He who creeps after plain, dull, common sense, is safe from committing absurdities; but can never reach the excellence of wit.
Dryden, Tyran. Love.

5. To move secretly and clandestinely.

I'll creep up into the chimney. ——
— There they always use to discharge their birding-pieces: creep into the kiln-hole.
Shaksp. Merry W. of Windsor.

Whate'er you are,
That in this desart inaccessible,
Under the shade of melancholy boughs,
Lose and neglect the creeping hours of time.
Shakspeare.

Of this sort are they which creep into houses, and lead captive silly women. 2 Tim. iii. 6.

Thou makest darkness, and it is night, wherein all the beasts of the forest do creep forth.
Psal. civ. 20.

Now or then a work or two has crept in to keep his first design in countenance. Atterbury.

6. To move timorously without soaring, or venturing into dangers.

Paradise Lost is admirable; but am I therefore bound to maintain, that there are no flats amongst his elevations, when it is evident he creeps along sometimes for above an hundred lines together?
Dryden.

We here took a little boat, to creep along the sea-shore as far as Genoa. Addison on Italy.

7. To come unexpected; to steal forward unheard and unseen.

By those gifts of nature and fortune he creeps, nay he flies, into the favour of poor silly women.
Sidney.

That the poem be not inflate or gingling with an empty noise of words, nor creepingly low and insipid. Phillips, Theatr. Poet. Pref.

How slily and creepingly did he address himself to our first parents. South, Serm. viii. 92.

CRE'EPLE.† n. s. [Dutch, krepel, Sax. cpypel. This was the more usual way of writing what is now written cripple. Dr. Johnson has merely noticed it only in Donne. The old dictionaries of Huloet and Barret give creple; and what recent editions of the New Testament present as "a cripple," Acts xiv. 8. continued to be creeple till about the close of the 17th century.] A lame person, a cripple.

She to whom this world must itself refer
As suburbs or the microcosm of her,
She, she is dead, she's dead when thou know'st this,
Thou know'st how lame a creeple this world is.
Donne.

Not lying like creeples on the bank, when we have a Bethesda before us.
Hammond's Works, iv. 508.

CREMA'TION. n. s. [crematio, Latin.] A burning.

CREMO'NA Fiddle.* [probably from Cremona in Italy.] A violin so called, and highly valued.

A lady whisking about her long train, which was then the fashion, threw down and broke a fine Cremona fiddle; upon which Swift cried out,

Mantua væ miseræ nimium vicina Cremonæ!
Sheridan, Life of Swift.

Came Astoreth, whom the Phœnicians call'd
Astarte, queen of heaven, with crescent horns.
Milton.

CRE'SCENT. n. s. [crescens, Lat.] The moon in her state of increase; any similitude of the moon increasing.

My power's a crescent, and my auguring hope
Says it will come to the full.
Shakspeare, Ant. and Cleop.

Or Bactrian Sophi, from the horns
Of Turkish crescent, leaves all waste beyond
The realm of Aladule, in his retreat. Milton, P. L.

Jove in dusky clouds involves the skies,
And the faint crescent shoots by fits before their eyes. Dryden.

And two fair crescents of translucent horn,
The brows of all their young increase adorn.
Pope, Odyssey.

To CRE'SCENT.* v. a. [from the adj.] To form into a crescent. The old heraldick adjective crescented, i. e. having a crescent, has long been unsupported by any usage of the verb. The verb is of recent date.

A dark wood crescents more than half the lawn.
Seward's Letters, vi. 195.

CRE'SCIVE. adv. [from cresco, Latin.] Increasing; growing.

So the prince obscur'd his contemplation
Under the veil of wildness, which, no doubt,
Grew like the summer-grass, fastest by night,
Unseen, yet crescive in his faculty. Shaks. Hen. V.

CRESS.† n. s. [perhaps from cresco, it being a quick grower, nasturtium, Lat. But the word is also the Sax. cepre, pl. cpeppen.] An herb.

Its flower consists of four leaves, placed in form of a cross: the pointal arises from the centre of the flower-cup, and becomes a roundish smooth fruit, divided into two cells, and furnished with seeds generally smooth. Miller.

His court with nettles and with cresses stor'd,
With soups unbought, and salads, blest his board.
Pope.

CRE'SSET.† n. s. [croissete, Fr. because beacons had crosses anciently on their tops.]

1. A great light set upon a beacon, light-house, or watch-tower. Hanmer. They still raise armies in Scotland by carrying about the fire-cross.

At my nativity
The front of heaven was full of fiery shapes,
Of burning cressets. Shakspeare, Hen. IV. P. I.

From the arched roof,
Pendant by subtle magick, many a row
Of starry lamps, and blazing cressets, fed
With naphtha and asphaltus, yielded light
As from a sky. Milton, P. L. ii. 728.

2. Simply a lamp, or torch.

The countie Palatine of Rhene was conveied by cresset light, and torch light, to Sir T. Gresham's house. Holinshed, Chron.

CREST.† n. s. [cpæꝛta, Sax. crista, Lat.]

1. The Plume of feathers, or tuft of horse-hair, on the top of the ancient helmet; the helmet.

His valour, shewn upon our crests to-day,
Hath taught us how to cherish such high deeds,
Ev'n in the bosom of our adversaries.
Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

2. The comb of a cock; whence Milton calls him crested.

Others, on ground
Walk'd firm; the crested cock, whose clarion sounds
The silent hours. Milton, P. L.

3. The ornament of the helmet in heraldry.

Of what esteem crests were, in the time of king Edward the third's reign, may appear by his giving an eagle, which he himself had formerly born, for a crest to William Montacute, earl of Salisbury.
Camden, Remains.

The horn;
It was a crest ere thou wast born:
Thy father's father wore it. Shaks. As you like it.

4. Any tuft or ornament on the head; as some which the poets assign to serpents.

Their crests divide,
And, tow'ring o'er his head, in triumph ride.
Dryden, Virgil.

5. Pride; spirit: fire; courage; loftiness of mien.

When horses should endure the bloody spur,
They fall their crests. Shakspeare.

To CREST.* v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To mark with long streaks, in allusion to the streaming hair of the crest.

Like as the shining skie in summer's night,
What time the days with scorching heat abound,
Is creasted all with lines of firie light,
That it prodigious seems in common people's sight.
Spenser, F. Q. iv. i. 13.

2. To serve as a crest for, in allusion to a crest of heraldry.

His legs bestrid the ocean; his rear'd arm crested the world. Shakspeare, Ant. and Cleop.

CRE'STED.† adj. [from crest; cristatus, Latin.]

1. Adorned with a plume or crest.

The bold Ascalonite,
Fled from his lion ramp; old warriors turn'd
Their plated backs under his heel;
Or, groveling, soil'd their crested helmets in the dust. Milton, S. A. 141.

At this, for new replies he did not stay;
But lac'd his crested helm, and strode away.
Dryden.

2. Wearing a comb.

The crested bird shall by experience know,
Jove made not him his master-piece below.
Dryden.

CRE'ST-FALLEN. adj. [crest and fall.] Dejected; sunk; dispirited; cowed; heartless; spiritless.

I warrant you, they would whip me with their fine wits, till I were as crest-fallen as a dried pear. Shakspeare, M. Wives of Windsor.

They prolate their words in a whining kind of querulous tone, as if they were still complaining and crest-fallen. Howell.

CRE'STLESS. adj. [from crest.] Not dignified with coat-armour; not of any eminent family.

His grandfather was Lionel duke of Clarence,
Third son to the third Edward king of England,
Sprung crestless yeomen from so deep a root.
Shakspeare, Hen. VI. P. I.

CRETA'CEOUS. adj. [creta, chalk, Lat.]

1. Having the qualities of chalk; chalky.

What gives the light, seems hard to say; whether it be the cretaceous salt, the nitrous salt, or some igneous particles. Grew.

2. Abounding with chalk.

Nor from the sable ground expect success,
Nor from cretaceous stubborn and jejune. Phillips.

CRETA'TED. adj. [cretatus, Lat.] Rubbed with chalk. Dict.

CRE'VICE.† n. s. [old Fr. crevis, "ruptures, crevasses," Lacombe; from crever, Fr. crepare, Lat. to burst. Chaucer writes it crevasse.] A crack; a cleft; a narrow opening.

I pried me through the crevice of a wall,
When for his hand he had his two sons heads.
Titus Andronicus.

I thought it no breach of good manners to peep at a crevice, and look in at people so well employed. Spectator, No. 266.

To CRE'VICE. v. a. [from the noun.] To crack; to flaw.

So laid they are more apt in swagging down to pierce with their points, than in the jacent posture, and so to creivce the wall. Wotton's Architecture.

CRE'VIS, or CRE'VISSE.* n. s. [Fr. ecrevisse.] Crayfish; the word is yet used in our northern counties.

And there are abundance of more perfect creatures also, which depositing their old skins or shells, or some such emblem of their age, are at certain seasons brought back again to a youthful state, and such are snakes, lizards, crabs, crevises, eagles, king-fishers, and such like.
Smith's Portraiture of Old Age, p. 265.

CREW.† n. s. [probably from cpuð, Saxon, Dr. Johnson says. He might have added cpeaþ, a crowd. But it is perhaps from the old Fr. crue, or creue, "growth, accession, augmentation, &c." Cotgrave.]

1. A company of people associated for any purpose; as, gallant crew, for troops.

There a noble crew,
Of lords and ladies stood on every side,
Which with their presence fair, the place much beautify'd. Spenser, F. Q.

2. The company of a ship.

The anchors drop'd, his crew the vessels moor.
Dryden, Æn.

3. It is now generally used in a bad sense.

One of the banish'd crew,
I fear, hath ventur'd from the deep, to raise
New troubles. Milton, P. L.

He, with a crew, whom like ambition joins
With him, or under him to tyrannize,
Marching from Eden tow'rds the West, shall find
The plain. Milton, P. L.

The last was he, whose thunder slew
The Titan race, a rebel crew. Addison.

CREW.† [the preterite of crow, Sax. cpeop. Mr. Pegge inclines to Bailey's opinion, that crew is the bastard preterite, and crow'd the right heir; yet this preterite is warranted by the Saxon.]

Immediately the cock crew. St. Matt. xxvi. 74.
It was about to speak, when the cock crew.
Shakspeare, Ham.

CRE'WEL.† n. s. [klewel, Dutch.] Fine worsted.

A piece of arras is composed of several parcels, some wrought of silk, some of gold, silver, crewel of divers colours. Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 342.

To his most worsted worship. B. Jonson, Alchemist.

Take silk or crewel, gold or silver thread, and make these fast at the bent of the hook.
Walton's Angler.

CRIB.† n. s. [cpybb, Sax. crib, German.]

1. The rack or manger of a stable.

Let a beast be lord of beasts, and his crib shall stand at the king's mess. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

Look into all the cribs and troughs of brutish diet, and see whether you can find such a beast as a glutton. Bp. Hall, St. Paul's Combat.

The steer and lion at one crib shall meet,
And harmless serpents lick the pilgrim's feet.
Pope.

2. The stall or cabin of an ox.

Where no oxen are, the crib is clean.
Prov. xiv. 4.

3. A small habitation; a cottage.

Why rather, sleep, liest thou in smoky cribs,
Upon uneasy pallets stretching thee,
Than in the perfum'd chambers of the great?
Shakspeare.

4. A child's bed. Brockett.

To CRIB. v. a. [from the noun.] To shut up in a narrow habitation; to confine; to cage.

Now I'm cabin'd, cribb'd, confin'd, bound in,
To saucy doubts and fears. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

To CRIB.* v. n. To be confined; to be cooped up.

Who sought to make the glory of the nation and church truckle under a Scotch canopy, and bishops to crib in a presbyterian trundle-bed.
Bp. Ganden, Anti-Baal-Berith, 1661, p. 35.

CRI'BBAGE.† n. s. A game at cards.

For cardes, the philologie of them is not for an essay. A man's fancy would be summed up in cribbidge; gleeke requires a vigilant memory, &c.
John Hall, Horæ Vac. (1646,) p. 150.

CRI'BBLE.† n. s. [old Fr. crible, from cribrum, Lat. "De puiser l'eau en un crible," French Prov. Wodroephe, Fr. and Eng. Gr. 1623, p. 486.]

1. A corn sieve. Dict.

2. Coarse meal, a degree better than bran. [old Fr. criblure.]

CRI'BBLE *Bread. Bread made of coarse meal. Huloet.

The gardens, with digging for novelties, are turned over and over, because we will not eat common cribble bread.
Transl. of Bullinger's Sermons, p. 243.

To CRI'BBLE.* v. a. [from the noun.] To sift or cribble through a sieve.
Littleton, in V. Cerno.

CRIBRA'TION. n. s. [cribro, Lat.] The act of sifting or separating by a sieve.

CRICK.† n. s.

1. [from cricco, Italian.] The noise of a door.

2. [from cpýce, Saxon, a stake.] A painful stiffness in the neck.

When the weight of her years has almost brought both ends together; 'tis nothing, she'll tell ye, but a crick she has got in her back; and though she might recover her youth again, by confessing her age, she'll never acknowledge it.
L'Estrange, Tr. of Quevedo's Visions.

3. A corruption of cricket; we say, "as merry as a cricket." "She'll talk sometimes; 'tis the maddest cricket!" Beaum. and Fl. This I take to be the origin of our phrase "as merry as a grig;" which Dr. Johnson and others derive from Græcus, a Greek! See GRIG. Crick is used for cricket in the old song of Take thy old Cloak about thee.

A merry cricke, and boon companion.
Sheldon, Mir. of Antichrist, (1616,) p. 323.

CRI'CKET. n. s. [krekel, from kreken, to make a noise, Dutch.]

1. An insect that squeaks or chirps about ovens and fireplaces.

Did'st thou not hear a noise. ——
—— I heard the owl scream, and the crickets cry.
Shakspeare.

Far from all resort of mirth,
Save the cricket on the hearth. Milton, Il Pens.

The solemn death-watch click'd the hour she died,
And shrilling crickets in the chimney cry'd. Gay.

2. [from cpýce, Saxon, a stick.] A sport, at which the contenders drive a ball with sticks or bats in opposition to each other.

The judge, to dance, his brother serjeant call,
The senator at cricket urge the ball. Pope.

3. [from kriechen, Germ. to creep.] A low seat or stool.

CRI'CKETING Apple. n. s. A small species of apple.

CRI'ER.† n. s. [old Fr. crieur.] The officer whose business is to cry or make proclamation.

He openeth his mouth like a crier.
Ecclus. xx. 15.

The criers command silence, and the whole multitude present stand in a suspense.
Brerewood on Languages.

The crier calls aloud
Our old nobility of Trojan blood,
Who gape among the crowd for their precarious food. Dryden.

CRIME.† n. s. [crimen, Lat. crime, Fr.]

1. An act contrary to right; an offence; a great fault; an act of wickedness.

High God be witness, that I guiltless am;
But if yourself, sir knight, ye guilty find,
Or wrapped be in loves of former dame,
With crime do not it cover, but disclose the same.
Spenser, F. Q.

Undergo with me one guilt, one crime,
Of tasting. Milton, P. L.

Like in punishment
As in their crime. Milton, P. L.

No crime was thine, if 'tis no crime to love.
Pope.

2. Reproach. A Latinism.

The tree of life, the crime of our first father's fall. Spenser, F. Q. i. xi. 46.

I rue
That error now, which is become my crime,
And thou the accuser. Milton, P. L. ix. 1180.

CRI'MEFUL.† adj. [from crime and full.] Wicked; criminal; faulty in a high degree; contrary to duty; contrary to virtue.

You proceeded not against these feats,
So crimeful and so capital in nature. Shak. Hamlet.

Devise extremes beyond extremity,
To make him curse this cursed crimeful night.
Shakspeare, Rape of Lucrece.

CRI'MELESS. adj. [from crime.] Innocent; without crime.

My foes could not procure me any scathe,
So long as I am loyal, true, and crimeless.
Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

CRI'MINAL.† adj. [old Fr. adj. criminel.]

1. Faulty; contrary to right; contrary to duty; contrary to law.

Live thou, and to thy mother dead attest,
That clear she died from blemish criminal.
Spenser, F. Q.

What we approve in our friend, we can hardly be induced to think criminal in ourselves. Rogers.

2. Guilty; tainted with crime; not innocent.

The neglect of any of the relative duties, renders us criminal in the sight of God. Rogers.

3. Not civil: as, a criminal prosecution; the criminal law.

The discussion and admeasurement of crimes, and their punishment, forms in every country the code of criminal law. Blackstone.

CRI'MINAL.† n. s. [old Fr. criminel, n. s.]

1. A man accused.

Was ever criminal forbid to plead?
Curb your ill-manner'd zeal. Dryd. Span. Friar.

2. A man guilty of a crime.

All three persons, that had held chief place of authority in their countries; all three ruined, not by war, or by any other disaster, but by justice and sentence, as delinquents and criminals. Bacon.

CRIMINA'LITY.* n. s. [Fr. criminalité.] A criminal action, case, or cause.
Cotgrave.

If this perseverance in wrong often appertains to individuals, it much more frequently appertains to public bodies; in them the disgrace of error, or even the criminality of conduct, belongs to so many, that no one is ashamed of the part which belongs to himself.
Bp. Llandaff, (Watson,) Charge, (1805,) p. 28.

CRI'MINALLY. adv. [from criminal.] Not innocently; wickedly; guiltily.

As our thoughts extend to all subjects, they may be criminally employed on all. Rogers.

CRI'MINALNESS. n. s. [from criminal.] Guiltiness; want of innocence.

To CRI'MINATE.* v. a. [Lat. crimino.] To accuse; to charge with crime.

And as for our church liturgy it is now criminated by many as idolatrous, because in some things it resembleth the mass, though not in the main.
Ld. North, Light in the Way to Paradise, (1682,) p. 29.

CRIMINA'TION.† n. s. [crimination, old Fr. criminatio, Latin.] The act of accusing; accusation; arraignment; charge.

If this horrible crimination were cast upon thee, O Saviour, in whom the prince of this world found nothing, what wonder is it, if we thy sinful servants be branded on all sides with evil tongues.
Bp. Hall, Contempl. B. 3.

The story of that calumnious crimination, devised by the Arian faction against Athanasius, as a charge of no small impiety. Mede, Diatr. p. 67.

The detractor, who accuses the saints with false criminations.
Bp. Patrick, Answ. to the Touchstone, &c. p. 169.

Nor was there a single heathen, who confessed a deity, exempt from this crimination of holding the truth in unrighteousness.
Ellis, Knowledge of Divine Things, p. 275.

CRI'MINATORY.† adj. [Fr. criminatoire.] Relating to accusation; accusing; censorious.

CRI'MINOUS.† adj. [criminosus, Lat. criminieux, Fr.] Wicked; iniquitous; enormously guilty.

They are led manacled after him as less criminous. Bp. Hall, Contempl. The Crucifixion.

The punishment that belongs to that great and criminous guilt, is the forfeiture of his right and claim to all mercies, which are made over to him by Christ. Hammond.

CRI'MINOUSLY. adv. [from criminous.] Enormously; very wickedly.

Some particular duties of piety and charity, which were most criminously omitted before.
Hammond.

CRI'MINOUSNESS. n. s. [from criminous.] Wickedness; guilt; crime.

I could never be convinced of any such criminousness in him, as willingly to expose his life to the stroke of justice and malice of his enemies.
King Charles.

CRI'MOSIN.† adj. [cremosino, Italian, commonly written as it is pronounced, crimson.] A species of red colour, tinged with blue.

Upon her head a cremosin coronet,
With damask roses and daffadilies set.
Bay leaves between,
And primroses green,
Embellish the white violet.
Spenser, Shep. Cal. April.

CRIMP.† adj. [from crumble or crimble, Dr. Johnson says. It is, however, from the Sax. verb acpýmman, friare.]

1. Friable; brittle; easily crumbled; easily reduced to powder.

Now the fowler warn'd
By these good omens, with swift early steps,
Treads the crimp earth, ranging through fields and glades. Philips.

2. Not consistent; not forcible. A low cant word.

The evidence is crimp; the witnesses swear backwards and forwards, and contradict themselves; and his tenants stick by him.
Arbuthnot, John Bull.

CRIMP.* n. s.

1. A game at cards formerly.

Laugh, and keep company, at gleek or crimp.
B. Jonson, Magn. Lady.

2. In modern times, one who is employed to enlist soldiers, but not in the usual manner by beat of drum; one who unfairly decoys others into military service; a low word.

To CRIMP.* v. a. [Sax. ȝe-cpýmpt, crimped, calamistratus, Lye.]

1. To curl or crisp the hair. See To CALAMISTRATE.

2. In modern cookery, applied to cod-fish; as, to crimp cod, is to cut the fish, while very fresh, into slices, and to throw it into pump water and salt. This renders it crisp.

To CRI'MPLE.† v. a. [from rumple, crumple, crimple, Dr. Johnson says; but this sonorous triad must give way to the Teut. krimpen, to contract.] To contract; to corrugate: to cause to shrink or contract.

He passed the cautery through them, and accordingly crimpled them up. Wiseman's Surgery.

CRI'MSON.† n. s. [Ital. cremosino, and chermisi; Fr. cramoisi; low Lat. kermesinus; from the Arabick kermes; a little worm which is bred in the berry of the coccus, made use of to dye this colour.]

1. Red, somewhat darkened with blue.

As crimson seems to be little else than a very deep red, with an eye of blue; so some kinds of red seem to be little else than heightened yellow.
Boyle on Colours.

2. Red in general.

Can you blame her then, being a maid yet rosed over with the virgin crimson of modesty, if she deny the appearance of a naked blind boy, in her naked seeing self. Shakspeare, Hen. V.

CRI'MSON.* adj. [The adjective is not noticed by Dr. Johnson, though among the examples to the substantive, in his dictionary, several of them present the adjective.

1. Red, somewhat darkened with blue.

Why does the soil endue
The blushing poppy with a crimson hue? Prior.

2. Red, in general.

Beauty's ensign yet
Is crimson in thy lips and in thy cheeks. Shaksp.

The crimson stream distain'd his arms around.
Dryden.

To CRI'MSON. v. a. [from the noun.] To dye with crimson.

Pardon me, Julius. — Here wast thou bay'd, brave hart:
Here didst thou fall; and here thy hunters stand
Sign'd in thy spoil, and crimson'd in thy lethe.
Shakspeare.

CRI'NCUM. n. s. [a cant word.] A cramp; a contraction; whimsy.

For jealousy is but a kind
Of clap and crincum of the mind. Hudibras.

CRINGE.† n. s. [from the verb.] Bow; servile civility.

These travellers, in lieu of the ore of Ophir wherewith they should come home richly freighted, may be said to make their return in apes and owls, in a cargazon of complements and cringes, or som huge monstrous periwigs, which is the golden fleece they bring over with them.

Howell, Instr. For. Trav. p. 188.
By this time Appetite is at the table,
And with a lowly cringe presents the wine
To his old master Gustus.
Brewer's Com. of Lingua, (1657,) v. 3.
Let me be grateful; but let far from me
Be fawning cringe, and false dissembling looks.
Philips.

To CRINGE.† v. a. [kriechen, German. Probably from the Iceland. kringe, to turn round.] To draw together; to contract.
Whip him, fellows,
'Till, like a boy, you see him cringe his face,
And whine aloud for mercy.
Shaksp. Ant. and Cleop.

To CRINGE.† v. n. [kriechen, German.] To bow; to pay court with bows; to fawn; to flatter.
One so superstitiously devout, that he is ready to cringe and crouch to every stock!
Bp. Hall, Select Thoughts, § 61.
Flatterers have the flexor muscles so strong, that they are always bowing and cringing. Arbuthnot.
The cringing knave, who seeks a place
Without success, thus tells his case. Swift.

CRI'NGER.* n. s. [from cringe, Germ. kriecher, a cringing fellow.] One who is always bowing and cringing for some mean purpose; a flatterer.

CRINI'GEROUS. adj. [criniger, Lat.] Hairy; overgrown with hair. Dict.

CRI'NITE.* adj. [Lat. crinitus.] Having the appearance of hair; streaming.

Fairfax, Tass. xiv. 44.

To CRI'NKLE. v. n. [krinckelen, Dutch.] To go in and out; to run in flexures: diminutive of crankle.
Unless some sweetness at the bottom lie,
Who cares for all the crinkling of the pie?
King's Cookery.

To CRI'NKLE.† v. a. To mould into inequalities.
Her face all bowsy,
Comely crinkled,
Wondrously wrinkled. Skelton's Poems, p. 124.

CRI'NKLE.† n. s. [from the verb.] A wrinkle; a sinuosity.
It is the crinkles in this glass making objects appear double.
Search's Freewill, Foreknowledge, &c. p. 114.

CRI'NOSE. adj. [from crinis, Lat.] Hairy. Dict.

CRINO'SITY. n. s. [from crinose.] Hairiness. Dict.

CRI'PPLE. n. s. [cpýpel, Sax. krepel, Dutch; crupl, Welsh. See CREEPLE. Mr. Whiter refers this word to "grapple, which means to confine by seizing or holding any thing; and the idea of confinement or hindrance brings us at once to the term cripple." Etym. Magn. p. 132. Junius has strangely deduced it from the Gr. κραιπαλη, a crapula. It is true that κραιπαλοντες are those who totter, no doubt from κραιπαλη; i. e. those who have drunk too much, and cannot stand. But the origin of our word cripple, is clearly from creep, to move slowly.] A lame man; one that has lost or never enjoyed the use of his limbs. Donne with great appearance of propriety writes it creeple, from creep.
He, poor man, by your first order died,
And that a winged Mercury did bear:
Some tardy cripple had the countermand,
That came too lag to see him buried. Shaksp.
I am a cripple in my limbs; but what decays are in my mind, the reader must determine.
Dryden.
Among the rest, there was a lame cripple from his birth, whom Paul commanded to stand upright on his feet. Bentley.
See the blind beggar dance, the cripple sing,
The sot a hero, lunatick a king. Pope.

CRI'PPLE.* adj. Lame.
And chide the cripple tardy-gaited night,
Who, like a foul and ugly witch, doth limp
So tediously away. Shaksp. K. Hen. V.

To CRI'PPLE.† v. a. [from the noun.] To lame; to make lame; to deprive of the use of limbs.
Thou cold sciatica,
Cripple our senators, that their limbs may halt
As lamely as their manners!
Shakspeare, Tim. of Athens.
Knots upon his gouty joints appear,
And chalk is in his crippled fingers found. Dryd.
Tettyx, the dancing-master, threw himself from the rock, but was crippled in the fall. Addison.

CRI'PPLENESS. n. s. [from cripple.] Lameness; privation of the limbs. Dict.

CRIS-CROSS-ROW.* See CHRIST-CROSS-ROW.
It is folly for a schoolmaster to put his scholar into the Psalter, that cannot learn his cris-crosse row.
Barnard, Serm. on Catechising, 1613, p. 18.

CRI'SIS. n. s. [κρισις.]
1. The point in which the disease kills, or changes to the better; the decisive moment when sentence is passed.
Wise leeches will not vain receipts obtrude;
Deaf to complaints, they wait upon the ill,
Till some safe crisis authorize their skill. Dryden.
2. The point of time at which any affair comes to the height.
This hour's the very crisis of your fate;
Your good or ill, your infamy or fame,
And all the colour of your life depends
On this important now. Dryden, Span. Friar.
The undertaking, which I am now laying down, was entered upon in the very crisis of the late rebellion, when it was the duty of every Briton to contribute his utmost assistance to the government, in a manner suitable to his station and abilities.
Addison, Freeholder.

CRISP.† adj. [cpırp, Sax. crispus, Lat.]
1. Curled.
Bulls are more crisp on the forehead than cows.
Bacon.
The Ethiopean black, flat nosed, and crisp haired. Hale.
2. Indented; winding; or alluding to the little wave or curl, as it is commonly called, which the gentlest wind occasions on the surface of waters. See the 3d sense of To CRISP.
You nymphs, call'd Naiads, of the wandering brooks,
With your sedg'd crowns, and ever-harmless looks,
Leave your crisp channels, and on this green land
Answer your summons; Juno does command.
Shakspeare, Tempest.
3. Brittle; friable.
In frosty weather, musick within doors soundeth better; which may be by reason not of the disposition of the air, but of the wood or string of the instrument, which is made more crisp, and so more porous and hollow. Bacon, Nat. Hist.
4. Short; brisk.
Friar, you must leave
Your neat crisp claret, and fall to your cyder
A while. Beaum. and Fl. Bloody Brother.

To CRISP.† v. a. [cıppıan, to crisp; Lat. crispo.]
1. To curl; to contract into knots or curls.
Severn—affrighted with their bloody looks,
Ran fearfully among the trembling reeds,
And hid his crisp'd head in the hollow bank.
Shakspeare, Hen. IV. P. I.
Young I'd have him too,
Yet a man, with crisped hair,
Cast in thousand snares and rings,
For love's fingers, and his rings. B. Jonson.
Spirit of wine is not only unfit for inflammations in general, but also crisps up the vessels of the dura mater and brain, and sometimes produces a gangrene. Sharp's Surg.
2. To twist; to curl; as was the manner of decorating gardens in Milton's time; who also speaks of "curling a grove with ringlets quaint," Arcades, ver. 46.; and represents Leisure "taking his pleasure in trim gardens," Il Pens. ver. 50. Herrick has "the crisped yew," that is, trimmed, shaped. Hesperides, 1648. p. 337.
Along the crisped shades and bowers,
Revels the spruce and jocund spring. Milton, Com.
3. To indent; to make to wave.
From that saphire fount the crisped brooks,
Rolling on orient pearl and sands of gold,
Ran nectar, visiting each plant. Milton, P. L.

To CRISP.* v. n. To curl.
Their hair crisps, but grows longer than the Africans. Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 337.

CRISPA'TION. n. s. [from crisp.]
1. The act of curling.
2. The state of being curled.
Some differ in the hair and feathers, both in the quantity, crispation, and colours of them; as he lions are hirsute, and have great manes; the she's are smooth, like cats. Bacon.

CRI'SPING-IRON.* n. s. [from crisp.] A curling iron.
For never powder, nor the crisping-iron
Shall touch these dangling locks.
Beaum. and Fl. Queen of Corinth.

CRI'SPING-PIN. n. s. [from crisp.] A curling iron.
The changeable suits of apparel, and the mantles, and the wimples, and the crisping-pins.
Isaiah, iii. 22.

CRI'SPNESS. n. s. [from crisp.] Curledness.

CRI'SPY. adj. [from crisp.] Curled.
So are those crispy snaky locks, oft known
To be the dowry of a second head.
Shakspeare, Merch. of Venice.

CRISS-CROSS-ROW.* [a corruption of Christ-Cross-Row, which see. See also CROSS-ROW.] Alphabet; beginning.
She is not come to the criss-cross-row of her perfection yet. Southerne.

CRITE'RION.† n. s. [κριτηριον, Gr. formerly written criterium; the plural is criteria.] A mark by which any thing is judged of, with regard to its goodness or badness.
Of the diseases of the mind there is no criterium, no canon, no rule. Donne, Letters, p. 288.
Mutual agreement and endearments was the badge of primitive believers; but we may be known by the contrary criterion. Glanville, Sceptis.

We have here a sure infallible criterion, by which every man may discover and find out, the gracious or ungracious disposition of his own heart. South.

By what criterion do ye eat, d'ye think,
If this is priz'd for sweetness, that for stink?
Pope, Hor.

CRI'TICK.† n.s. [old Fr. critiquièr; modern, critiqueur, critique; from the Gr. κριτικὸς. The first definition, which Dr. Johnson has given of this word, presents not the earliest usage of it. The last is probably the earliest; under which, however, he has sought no authority more ancient than that of Swift. Cowel, as Mr. Malone also thinks, is perhaps the first author who uses critick in the sense of Dr. Johnson's primary definition; though Cotgrave, I must also observe, renders critiqueur, "a criticke, a controller, or corrector of other men's works or doings." Shakspeare had long before used it in the sense of a cynick or censurer.]

1. A man skilled in the art of judging of literature; a man able to distinguish the faults and beauties of writing.

The word certiorari is used diverse times in the Digest of the Civil Law; but our later criticks think it so barbarous, that they suspect it to be rather foisted in by Tribonian.
Cowel, Law Interpreter, 1607.

This settles truer ideas in men's minds of several things, whereof we read the names in ancient authors, than all the large and laborious arguments of criticks. Locke.

Now learn what morals criticks ought to show,
For 'tis but half a judge's task to know. Pope.

2. An examiner: a judge. But see CRITIQUE.

But you with pleasure own your errours past,
And make each day a critick on the last. Pope.

3. A snarler; a carper; a caviller.

Criticks I saw, that others' names deface,
And fix their own with labour in their place.
Pope.

Where an author has many beauties consistent with virtue, piety, and truth, let not little criticks, exalt themselves, and shower down their ill-nature. Watts.

4. A censurer; a man apt to find fault.

My adder's sense
To critick and to flatterer stopped are.
Shakspeare, Sonn. 122.

Do not give advantage
To stubborn criticks, apt, without a theme,
For depravation. Shakspeare, Tr. and Cr.

My chief design, next to seeing you, is to be a severe critick on you and your neighbour. Swift.

5. Critical examination. See CRITIQUE.

CRI'TICK. adj. Critical; relating to criticism; relating to the art of judging of literary performances.

Thence arts o'er all the northern world advance,
But critick learning flourish'd most in France.
Pope.

To CRI'TICK.† v.n. [from critick.] To play the critick; to criticise.

Nay, if you begin to critick once, we shall never have done. Brewer's Com. of Lingua, (1657,) v.9.

They do but trace over the paths that have been beaten by the ancients; or comment, critick, and flourish upon them. Temple.

CRI'TICAL. adj. [from critick.]

1. Exact; nicely judicious; accurate; diligent.

It is submitted to the judgement of more critical ears, to direct and determine what is graceful and what is not. Holder.

Virgil was so critical in the rites of religion, that he would never have brought in such prayers as these, if they had not been agreeable to the Roman customs. Stilling fleet.

2. Relating to criticism: as, he wrote a critical dissertation on the last play.

3. Captious; inclined to find fault; censorious.

What wouldst thou write of me, if thou shouldst praise me? —
— O, gentle lady, do not put me to't;
For I am nothing, if not critical. Shaksp. Othello.

4. [From crisis.] Comprising the time at which a great event is determined.

The moon is supposed to be measured by sevens, and the critical or decretory days to be dependent on that number. Brown, Vulg. Err.

5. Decisive; nice.

Opportunity is in respect to time, in some sense, as time is in respect of eternity: it is the small moment, the exact point, the critical minute, on which every good work so much depends. Sprat, Serm.

The people cannot but resent to see their apprehensions of the power of France, in so critical a juncture, wholly laid aside. Swift.

6. Producing a crisis or change of the disease: as, a critical sweat.

CRI'TICALLY. adv. [from critical.]

1. In a critical manner; exactly; curiously.

Difficult it is to understand the purity of English, and critically to discern good writers from bad, and a proper stile from a corrupt one. Dryden.

These shells which are digged up out of the earth, several hundreds of which I now keep by me, have been nicely and critically examined by very many learned men. Woodward.

2. At the exact point of time.

CRI'TICALNESS. n.s. [from critical.] Exactness; accuracy; nicety; incidence at a particular point of time.

To CRI'TICISE. v.n. [from critick.]

1. To play the critick; to judge; to write remarks upon any performance of literature; to point out faults and beauties.

They who can criticise so weakly, as to imagine I have done my worst, may be convinced, at their own cost, that I can write severely with more ease than I can gently. Dryden.

Know well each ancient's proper character,
Without all this at once before your eyes,
Cavil you may, but never criticise. Pope.

2. To animadvert upon as faulty.

Nor would I have his father look so narrowly into these accounts, as to take occasion from thence to criticise on his expences. Locke.

To CRI'TICISE. v.a. [from critick.] To censure; to pass judgement upon.

Nor shall I look upon it as any breach of charity to criticise the author, so long as I keep clear of the person. Addison.

CRI'TICISER.* n.s. [from criticise.] One who makes or writes remarks.

Others took upon them to be pert criticisers and saucy correctors of the original before them.
Blackwall, Sac. Class. (1731,) ii.265.

CRI'TICISM. n.s. [from critick.]

1. Criticism, as it was first instituted by Aristotle, was meant a standard of judging well. Dryden, State of Innocence, Pref.

2. Remark; animadversion; critical observations.

There is not a Greek or Latin critick who has not shewn, even in the stile of his criticisms, that he was a master of all the eloquence and delicacy of his native tongue. Addison.

CRITI'QUE.† n.s. [Fr. See CRITICK. This word is now generally so written, to distinguish it from critick, the person; and accordingly some of Dr. Johnson's examples give it critique; though when Pope wrote, and indeed long after him, no distinction of the spelling or accent obtained; and it may be doubted, whether Dr. Johnson has not, in his third definition of the person, by applying to it what probably belongs to the thing, overlooked this confusion. Yet critique is found for critick, the person in an old example. See the bishop of Lincoln's Sermon at the funeral of K. James I. Lond. 1625, p. 61. "It will be a question among critiques in ages to come, &c."]

1. A critical examination; critical remarks; animadversions.

I should be glad if I could persuade him to continue his good offices, and write such another critick on any thing of mine. Dryden.

I should as soon expect to see a critique on the poesy of a ring, as on the inscription of a medal. Addison on Medals.

I would recommend the gentlemen of this taste to the Edict of Apollo, given us by Boccalini; the most ingenious and justest piece of critic on the manner of writing history that ever was wrote. Dr. Parr, Tracts by a Warburtonian, &c. p.108.

2. Science of criticism.

If ideas and words were distinctly weighed, and duly considered, they would afford us another sort of logick and critick than what we have been hitherto acquainted with. Locke.

What is every year of a wise man's life, but a censure and critick on the past? Pope.

Not that my quill to criticks was confin'd,
My verse gave ampler lessons to mankind. Pope.

To CROAK.† v.n. [cpaceatan, Saxon; crocare, Italian; crocitare, Latin, Dr. Johnson says. But it is perhaps adopted from the old Fr. croäquer.]

1. To make a hoarse low noise, like a frog.

The subtle swallow flies about the brook,
And querulous frogs in muddy pools do croak.
May, Virgil.

So when Jove's block descended from on high,
Loud thunder to its bottom shook the bog,
And the hoarse nation croak'd. Pope.

Blood, stuff'd in skins, is British Christians' food;
And France robs marshes of the croaking brood.
Gay.

2. To caw or cry as a raven or crow.

The raven himself is hoarse,
That croaks the fatal entrance of Duncan
Under my battlements. Shakspeare.

The hoarse raven, on the blasted bough,
By croaking from the left, presag'd the coming blow. Dryden.

At the same time the walk of elms, with the croaking of the ravens, looks exceeding solemn and venerable. Addison.

3. It may be used in contempt for any disagreeable or offensive murmur.

Their understandings are but little instructed, when all their whole time and pains is laid out to still the croaking of their own bellies. Locke.

CROAK.† n.s. [croäc, old Fr. the croaking of ravens, &c. V. Cotgrave.] The cry or voice of a frog or raven.

The swallow skims the river's watry face,
The frogs renew the croaks of their loquacious race. Dryden.

Was that a raven's croak, or my son's voice?
No matter which, I'll to the grave and hide me.
Lee.

CRO'AKER.* n. s. [from croak.] A word, in modern times, used in contempt for those who are perpetually discanting on dangers and difficulties, and making unfair comparisons of the present with the past.

CRO'CEOUS. adj. [croceus, Lat.] Consisting of saffron; like saffron. Dict.

CROCITA'TION. n. s. [crocitatio, Lat.] The croaking of frogs or ravens. Dict.

CROCK.† n. s. [cpocca, Sax. krok, kruick, Gael. kruik, Dutch; kruka, Goth. Chaucer writes our word crouke.]

1. A cup; any vessel made of earth.
Therefore the vulgar did about him flocke,—
Like foolish flies unto an honey crocke.
Spenser, F. Q. v. ii. 33.

2. A little stool. [perhaps a corruption of cricket; of which see the third sense.]
I bid her come out of the croud, and seated her upon a little crook at my left hand.
Tatler, No. 116.

3. The black or soot of a pot, or a kettle, or a chimney-stock, is called crock.
Ray, South and East Country Words.

4. The plate or bricks of a fire back.
Moor's Suffolk Words.

5. A bellied pot, either of iron or other metal, for the purpose of boiling food.
Jennings's W. Country Words.

6 Crocks are crooked timbers, resting on stone blocks to support the roofs of ancient buildings. Craven Dialect.

CRO'CKERY.† n. s. [cpochpæpe, Sax.] Earthen ware.

CRO'CODILE.† n. s. [from κρόκος, saffron, and δειλων, fearing, Dr. Johnson says. In this opinion he is supported by other writers; among whom is Fuller, who quaintly observes, that "crocodiles' tears are never true, save when he is forced where saffron grows, knowing himself to be all poison, and it to be all antidote; whence he is called the saffron-fearer." We have, however, no authentick proofs of this fear. Others derive it from κρόκη, the shore, and δειλων, fearing; as if fearing snares there laid for it. V. Morin, Dict. Etym. Fr. & Gr. But this is not probable; as the animal perpetually frequents the banks or shore, instead of being afraid of them. Sir T. Herbert, the traveller, speaking of the alligator, or crocodile, says, "the name we give is à croceo colore, or per antiphrasin quòd crocum timeat." Trav. p. 364. See ALLIGATOR.] An amphibious voracious animal, in shape resembling a lizard, and found in Egypt and the Indies. It is covered with very hard scales, which cannot, without great difficulty, be pierced; except under the belly, where the skin is tender. It has a wide throat, with several rows of teeth, sharp and separated, which enter one another. It runs with great swiftness; but does not easily turn itself. It is long lived, and is said to grow continually to its death. Some are fifteen or eighteen cubits long. Crocodiles lay their eggs, resembling goose-eggs, sometimes amounting to sixty, near the water-side, covering them with the sand, that the heat of the sun may hatch them. Calmet.

Gloster's show
Beguiles him; as the mournful crocodile,
With sorrow, snares relenting passengers.
Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

Crocodiles were thought to be peculiar unto the Nile. Brown, Vulg. Err.

Cæsar will weep, the crocodile will weep. Dryd.

Enticing crocodiles, whose tears are death;
Syrens that murder with enchanting breath.
Granville.

Crocodile is also a little animal, otherwise called stinx, very much like the lizard, or small crocodile. It lives by land and water; has four short small legs, a very sharp muzzle, and a short small tail. It is pretty enough to look at, being covered all over with little scales of the colour of silver, intermixt with brown, and of a gold colour upon the back. It always remains little. Trevoux.

CRO'CODILINE. adj. [crocodilinus, Lat.] Like a crocodile. Dict.

CRO'CUS.† n. s. [old Fr. crocus, Lat. crocus. "Ce mot vient du Persan." Lacombe.] A flower.
Fair-handed Spring unbosoms every grace,
Throws out the snow-drop and the crocus first.
Thomson.

CROFT. n. s. [cpoꝛt, Saxon.] A little close joining to a house that is used for corn or pasture.
This have I learn'd,
Tending my flocks hard by, i' th' hilly crofts
That brow this bottom glade. Milton, Com.

CROISA'DE.† } n. s. [croisade, Fr. from croix,
CROISA'DO. } a cross.] A holy war; a war carried on against infidels under the banner of the cross.
If envy make thy labours prove thy loss,
No marvel if a croisade wear the cross.
Verses Pref. to Fuller's Holy War.

See that he take the name of Urban, because a pope of that name did first institute the croisado; and, as with an holy trumpet, did stir up the voyage for the Holy Land. Bacon.

CRO'ISES.† n. s. [old Fr. crois for croix; old Eng. crois, Ch.]

1. Pilgrims who carry a cross.

2. Soldiers who fight against infidels under the banner of the cross.
The conquests of the croises, extending over Palestine and a part of Syria, had been erected into a sovereignty under the name of the kingdom of Jerusalem. Burke, Abridg. of Eng. Hist. iii. 7.

CRO'MLECHE.* [In British antiquity, from the Welsh crom, crooked, and llêch, a flat stone, according to Richards; from the Heb. carem-luach, a devoted stone or altar.] Huge, broad, flat stones, raised upon other stones set up on end for that purpose. They are common in Anglesey, and are supposed to be the remains of altars. See Rowland's Mona Antiqua Restaurata.

CRONE. n. s. [cpone, Sax. according to Verstegan; kronie, Dut. according to Skinner.]

1. An old ewe.
Fresh herrings plenty Michel brings,
With fatted crones, and such old things. Tusser.

2. In contempt, an old woman.
Take up the bastard,
Take't up, I say; giv't to thy crone.
Shaksp. Wint. Tale.

The crone being in bed with him on the wedding-night, and finding his aversion, endeavours to win his affection by reason. Dryden.

CRO'NET. n. s. The hair which grows over the top of an horse's hoof.

CRO'NICAL, or CRO'NYCAL.* adj. The same as ACRONYCAL, which see.
Cronychall, or acronychall, that is, vespertine, or at the beginning of night.
More, Notes on Psych. p. 425.

Why far remov'd with so vast distancy,
When they [the planets] go down with setting cronical. More, Song of the Soul, iii. iii. 72.

CRO'NY. n. s. [a cant word.] An old acquaintance; a companion of long standing.
So when the Scots, your constant cronies,
Th' espousers of your cause and monies.
Hudibras.

To oblige your crony Swift,
Bring our dame a new year's gift. Swift.

Strange, an astrologer should die,
Without one wonder in the sky!
Not one of all his crony stars,
To pay their duty at his herse. Swift.

CROOK.† n. s. [Celt. crok; Su. Goth. krok; Fr. croc. See To CROOK.]

1. Any crooked or bent instrument.

2. A sheephook.
I sing the man who Judah's sceptre bore,
In that right hand which held the crook before.
Cowley.

He left his crook, he left his flocks,
And wand'ring through the lonely rocks,
He nourish'd endless woe. Prior.

3. Any thing bent; a meander.
There fall those saphire-colour'd brooks,
Which, conduit like, with curious crooks,
Sweet islands make in that sweet land. Sidney.

4. An artifice; a trick; "by hook or crook," i. e. by bending a thing to one's purpose.
I neither therein have foil nor trip; but for all your bragges, hookes, and crookes, you have such a fall, as you shall never be able to stand upright again in this matter.
Abp. Cranmer to Bp. Gardiner.

5. A gibbet. [Fr. croce, from the Lat. crux. So Huloet uses cross for a gibbet.]
Terpine —
She caus'd to be attacht and forthwith led
Unto the crooke —
Where he full shamefully was hanged by the hed.
Spenser, F. Q. v. v. 18.

To CROOK.† v. a. [Su. Goth. kroka, to crook; Fr. crocher, or croquer.]

1. To bend; to turn into a hook.
Why should the poor be flatter'd?
No! let the candied tongue lick absurd pomp;
And crook the pregnant hinges of the knee,
Where thrift may follow fawning. Shaks. Hamlet.

It is highly probable, that this disease proceeds from a redundant acidity, because vinegar will soften and crook tender bones. Arbuthnot on Diet.

2. To bend, figuratively; to thwart.
Conscyence confoundeth the reason, it croketh the wyll, and enquyeteth the soule.
Bp. Fisher's Ps. p. 11, 12.

3. To pervert from rectitude; to divert from the original end.
Whatsoever affairs pass such a man's hands, he crooketh them to his own ends; which must needs be often eccentrick to the ends of his master or state. Bacon.

To CROOK.† v. n. To be bent; to have a curvature.

Their shoes and pattens are snouted and piked more than a finger long, crooking upwards. Camden.

The eagle might live much longer, but that her upper beak crooketh in time over the lower, and so she faileth not with age but hunger. Gregory's Posthuma, 1650, p. 207.

CRO'OKBACK. n. s. [crook and back.] A term of reproach for a man that has gibbous shoulders.

Ay, crookback, here I stand to answer thee,
Or any he the proudest of thy sort. Shaks. Hen. VI.

CRO'OKBACKED. adj. Having bent shoulders.

A dwarf as well may for a giant pass,
As negro for a swan; a crookback'd lass
Be call'd Europa. Dryden, Juvenal.

There are millions of truths that a man is not, or may not think himself, concerned to know; as whether our king Richard III. was crookbacked or no. Locke.

CROOK-KNEED.* adj. [crook and knee.] Having crooked knees.

Crook-kneed and dewlapt like Thessalian bulls. Shakspeare, Mids. N. Dream.

CROOK-SHOULDERED.* adj. [crook and shoulder.] Having bent shoulders; crook-backed.

It is reported of Plato, that being crook-shouldered, his scholars, who so much admired him, would endeavour to be like him, by bolstering out their garments on that side, that they might appear crooked too. South, Serm, vii. 190.

CROO'KED.† adj. [properly the participle of the verb crook.] Formerly written croked, like its northern root. See To CROOK.

1. Bent; not strait; curve.

A bell or a cannon may be heard beyond a hill, which intercepts the sight of the sounding body; and sounds are propagated as readily through crooked pipes as through straight ones. Newton, Opt.

Mathematicians say of a straight line, that it is as well an index of its own rectitude as of the obliquity of a crooked one. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

2. Winding; oblique; anfractuous.

A man shall never want crooked paths to walk in, if he thinks that he is in the right way, wherever he has the footsteps of others to follow. Locke.

Among the crooked lanes, on every hedge,
The glow-worm lights his gem. Thomson, Summer.

3. Perverse; untoward; without rectitude of mind; given to obliquity of conduct.

They have corrupted themselves: they are a perverse and crooked generation. Deut. xxxii. 5.

Hence, heap of wrath; foul, indigested lump!
As crooked in thy manners as thy shape. Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

We were not born crooked; we learned those windings and turnings of the serpent. South.

CROO'KEDLY. adv. [from crooked.]

1. Not in a strait line.
2. Untowardly; not compliantly.

If we walk perversely with God, he will walk crookedly towards us. Bp. Taylor, Rules of Living Holy.

CROO'KEDNESS.† n. s. [from crooked.]

1. Deviation from straitness; curvity; the state of being inflected; inflection.

He that knoweth what is straight, doth even thereby discern what is crooked; because the absence of straightness, in bodies capable thereof, is crookedness. Hooker.

As he that useth an upright shoe, may correct the obliquity or crookedness by wearing it on the other side; we may overcome passions if we will. Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 288.

2. Deformity of a gibbous body.

When the heathens offered a sacrifice to their false gods, they would make a severe search to see if there were any crookedness or spot, any uncleanness or deformity, in their sacrifice. Bp. Taylor, Worthy Communicant.

3. Lewdness; depravity; perverseness. Barret.

To CROO'KEN.* v. a. [from crook.] To make crooked. Huloet.

Images be of more force to crooken an unhappy soul, than to teach and instruct it. Homilies, B. ii. Against Idolatry.

CROP.† n. s. [cpop, Sax. krop, Teut. kropp, Goth.] The craw of a bird; the first stomach into which its meat descends.

In birds there is no mastication or comminution of the meat in the mouth; but in such as are not carnivorous, it is immediately swallowed into the crop or craw. Ray.

But flutt'ring there, they nestle near the throne,
And lodge in habitations not their own,
By their high crops and corny gizzards known. Dryden.

CRO'PFUL. adj. [crop and full.] Satiated; with a full belly.

He stretch'd out all the chimney's length,
Basks at the fire his hairy strength;
And, crop-full, out of doors he flings,
Ere the first cock his matin rings. Milton, L'All.

CROP-SICK.† adj. [crop and sick.] Sick with repletion; sick with excess and debauchery.

This daughter that I tell you of, is fall'n
A little crop-sick, with the dangerous surfeit
She took of your affection. Beaum. and Fl. Tamer Tamed.

Strange odds! where crop-sick drunkards must engage
A hungry foe, and arm'd with sober rage. Tate, Juv.

CROP-SICKNESS.* n. s. [crop and sickness.] Sickness arising from repletion.

Every visitant is become a physician; one that scarce knew any but crop-sickness, cryeth, No such apothecary's shop as the sack-shop! Whitlock, Mann. of the Eng. p. 126.

CROP.† n. s. [cpopp, Saxon.]

1. The highest part or end of any thing; as the head of a tree, the ear of corn.

When Zephirus eke with his sweete brethe
Enspired hath in every holt and hethe
The tendre croppes. Chaucer, C. T. Prol.

2. The harvest; the corn gathered off a field; the product of the field.

And this of all my harvest hope I have,
Nought reaped but a weedy crop of care. Spenser, Past.

Lab'ring the soil, and reaping plenteous crop,
Corn, wine, and oil. Milton, P. L.

The fountain which from Helicon proceeds,
That sacred stream, should never water weeds,
Nor make the crop of thorns and thistles grow. Roscommon.

Nothing is more prejudicial to your crop than mowing of it too soon. Mortimer, Husbandry.

3. Any thing cut off.

Guiltless of steel, and from the razor free,
It falls a plenteous crop reserv'd for thee. Dryden, Fab.

To CROP. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To cut off the ends of any thing; to mow; to reap; to lop.

Crop'd are the flower-de-luces in your arms;
Of England's coat, one half is cut away. Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

He, upon whose side
The fewest roses are crop'd from the tree,
Shall yield the other in the right opinion. Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

All the budding honours on thy crest
I'll crop, to make a garland for my head. Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

I will crop off from the top of his young twigs a tender one, and will plant it upon an high mountain. Ezek. xvii. 22.

There are some tears of trees, which are combed from the beards of goats; for when the goats bite and crop them, especially in the mornings, the dew being on, the tear cometh forth, and hangeth upon their beards. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

No more, my goats, shall I behold you climb
The steepy cliffs, or crop the flow'ry thyme! Dryden, Virgil.

2. To gather before it falls.

O fruit divine!
Sweet of thyself, but much more sweet thus cropp'd. Milton, P. L.

Age, like ripe apples, on earth's bosom drops:
While force our youth, like fruits, untimely crops. Denham.

Death destroys
The parent's hopes, and crops the growing boys. Creech.

To CROP. v. n. To yield harvest.

Royal wench!
She made great Cæsar lay his sword to-bed;
He plough'd her, and she cropt. Shakspeare, Ant. and Cleop.

CROP-EAR.* n. s. [crop and ear.] A horse, having his ears cropped.

What horse? a roan, a crop-ear, is it not?
Shakspeare, K. Hen. IV. P. I.

I'll lay a thousand pound upon my crop-ear. Beaum. and Fl. Scornful Lady,

CROP-EARED.* Having the ears cropped.

A crop-ear'd scrivener, this. B. Jonson Masques.

CRO'PPER. n. s. [from crop.] A kind of pigeon with a large crop.

There be tame and wild pigeons; and of tame there be croppers, carriers, runts. Walton's Angler.

CRO'SIER. n. s. [croiser, Fr. from croix, a cross.] The pastoral staff of a bishop, which has a cross upon it.

When prelates are great, there is also danger from them; as in the times of Anselmus and Thomas Becket, who, with their crosiers, did almost try it with the king's sword. Bacon.

Grievances there were, I must confess, and some incongruities in my civil government; wherein some say the crosier, some say the distaff, was too busy. Howell, England's Tears.

Her front erect with majesty she bore,
The crosier wielded, and the mitre wore. Dryden.

CRO'SLET.† n. s. [croisselet, French.]

1. A small cross.

Then Una 'gan to ask, if aught he knew,
Or heard abroad, of that her champion true,
That in his armour bare a croslet red. Spenser, F. Q. i. vi. 36.

Here an unfinish'd diamond croslet lay,
To which soft lovers adoration pay. Gay, Fan.

2. It seems to be printed in the following passage, by mistake for corselet.

The croslet some, and some the cuishes mould,
With silver plated, and with ductile gold. Dryden, Æn.

3. A crucible. [old Fr. croisueil.] Bullokar.

The coles right anon weren yset,
And this canon took out a crosselet. Chaucer, Chan. Yeo. Tale.

Your crosslets, crucibles, and cucurbites. B. Jonson, Alchemist.

CROSS.† n. s. [Welsh, croes; bas Bret croas, croes; croix, Fr. croce, Ital. crux, Latin.]

1. One strait body laid at right angles over another; the instrument by which the Saviour of the world suffered death.

They make a little cross of a quill, long ways, of that part of the quill which hath the pith, and crossways of that piece of the quill without pith. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

You are first to consider seriously the infinite love of your Saviour, who offered himself for you as a sacrifice upon the cross. Bp. Taylor, Guide to the Penitent.

2. The ensign of the Christian religion.

And on his brest a bloodie crosse he bore,
The deare remembrance of his dying Lorde,
For whose sweete sake that glorious badge he bore. Spenser, F. Q. i. i. 2.

We do sign him with the sign of the cross, in token that hereafter he shall not be ashamed to confess the faith of Christ crucified, and manfully to fight under his banner against sin, the world, and the devil, and to continue Christ's faithful soldier and servant unto his life's end. Ministration of Public Baptism.

Her holy faith and Christian cross oppos'd
Against the Saxon gods. Rowe.

3. A monument with a cross upon it to excite devotion; such as were anciently set in market-places.

She doth stray about
By holy crosses, where she kneels and prays. Shaks.

4. A line drawn through another.

And some against all idolizing
The cross in shop-books. Hudibras, iii. ii.

5. Any thing that thwarts or obstructs; misfortune; hindrance; vexation; opposition; misadventure; trial of patience.

Wishing unto me many crosses and mischances in my love, whensoever I should love. Sidney.

Then let us teach our trial patience,
Because it is a customary cross. Shakspeare.

Heaven prepares good men with crosses; but no ill can happen to a good man. B. Jonson, Discoveries.

A great estate hath great crosses, and a mean fortune hath but small ones. Bp. Taylor, Rule of Living Holy.

6. Money so called, because marked with a cross.

He was said to make soldiers spring up out of the very earth to follow him, though he had not a cross to pay them salary. Howell, Vocal Forest.

Whereas we cannot much lament our loss,
Who neither carry'd back nor brought one cross. Dryden.

7. Cross and Pile, a play with money; at which it is put to chance whether the side, which bears a cross, shall lie upward, or the other.

Whacum had neither cross nor pile;
His plunder was not worth the while. Hudibras.

This I humbly conceive to be perfect boys play; cross I win, and pile, you lose; or, what's yours is mine, and what's mine is my own. Swift.

8. Church lands in Ireland.

The absolute palatines made their own judges, so as the king's writ did not run in those counties, but only in the church lands lying within the same, which were called the cross; wherein the king made a sheriff: so in each of these counties palatines there was one sheriff of the liberty, and another of the cross. Sir J. Davies.

Cross.† adj. [from the substantive.]

1. Transverse; falling athwart something else.

Whatsoever penumbra should be made in the circles by the cross refraction of the second prism, that penumbra would be conspicuous in the right lines which touch those circles. Newton.

The sun, in that space of time, by his annual contrary motion eastward, will be advanced near a degree of the ecliptick, cross to the motion of the equator. Holder on Time.

The ships must needs encounter, when they either advance towards one another in direct lines, or meet in the intersection of cross ones. Bentley.

2. Oblique; lateral.

Was this a face,
To stand against the deep dread bolted thunder?
In the most terrible and nimble stroke
Of quick cross lightning? Shakspeare, K. Lear.

The cross blue lightning seem'd to open
The breast of heaven. Shakspeare, Jul. Cæsar.

The harms of thwarting thunder blue,
Or what the cross dire-looking planet smites. Milton, Arcades.

3. Adverse; opposite: often with to.

Were both love's captives; but with fate so cross,
One must be happy by the other's loss. Dryden.

Cross to our interests, curbing sense and sin;
Oppress'd without, and undermin'd within,
It thrives through pain. Dryden.

It runs cross to the belief and apprehension of the rest of mankind; a difficulty, which a modest and good man is scarce able to encounter. Atterbury.

4. Perverse; untractable.

When, through the cross circumstances of a man's temper or condition, the enjoyment of a pleasure would certainly expose him to a greater inconvenience, then religion bids him quit it. South.

5. Peevish; fretful; ill-humoured. [Welsh, croes, surly.]

Did ever any man upon the rack afflict himself, because he had received a cross answer from his mistress? Taylor.

All cross and distasteful humours, and whatever else may render the conversation of men grievous and uneasy to one another, must be shunned. Tillotson.

6. Contrary; contradictory.

The mind brings all the ends of a long and various hypothesis together; sees how one part coheres with, and depends upon another; and so clears off all the appearing contrarieties and contradictions, that seemed to lie cross and uncouth, and to make the whole unintelligible. South.

7. Contrary to wish; unfortunate.

We learn the great reasonableness of not only a contented, but also a thankful acquiescence in any condition, and under the crossest and severest passages of Providence. South.

I cannot, without some regret, behold the cross and unlucky issue of my design; for by my dislike of disputes, I am engaged in one. Glanville.

8. Interchanged.

Evarchus made a cross marriage also with Dorilaus's sister, and shortly left her with child of the famous Pyrocles. Sidney.

Cross marriages, between the king's son and the archduke's daughter; and again, between the archduke's son and the king's daughter. Bacon, Hen. VII.

Cross.† prep.

Addison, Cato.

CRU'SHER.* n. s. [from crush.] A beater, or crusher of things flat; a violent breaker. Cotgrave, in VV. Escacheur and Fracasseur.

CRUST.† n. s. [Fr. crouste; Ital. crosta; Lat. crusta. Perhaps allied to the Goth. krusts, a collision or crashing together.]

1. Any shell, or external coat, by which any body is enveloped.

I have known the statue of an emperor quite hid under a crust of dross. Addison on Medals.

2. An incrustation; collection of matter into a hard body.

Were the river a confusion of never so many different bodies, if they had been all actually dissolved, they would at least have formed one continued crust; as we see the scorium of metals always gathers into a solid piece. Addison on Italy.

The viscous crust stops the entry of the chyle into the lacteals. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

3. The case of a pie made of meal, and baked.

He was never suffered to go abroad, for fear of catching cold: when he should have been hunting down a buck, he was by his mother's side learning how to season it, or put it in crust. Addison, Spect.

4. The outer part of bread.

Th' impenetrable crust thy teeth defies,
And petrify'd with age, securely lies. Dryden, Juv.

5. A waste piece of bread.

Y' are liberal now; but when your turn is sped,
You'll wish me choak'd with every crust of bread.
Dryden.

Men will do tricks, like dogs, for crusts.
L'Estrange.

To CRUST. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To envelope; to cover with a hard case.

Why gave you me a monarch's soul,
And crusted it with base plebeian clay? Dryden.

Nor is it improbable but that, in process of time, the whole surface of it may be crusted over, as the islands enlarge themselves, and the banks close in upon them. Addison on Italy.

And now their legs, and breasts, and bodies stood
Crusted with bark, and hard'ning into wood.
Addison.

In some, who have run up to men without education, we may observe many great qualities darkened and eclipsed; their minds are crusted over, like diamonds in the rock. Felton.

2. To foul with concretions.

If your master hath many musty, or very foul and crusted bottles, let those be the first you truck at the alehouse. Swift.

To CRUST. v. n. To gather or contract a crust; to gain a hard covering.

I contented myself with a plaister upon the place that was burnt, which crusted and healed in very few days. Temple.

CRUSTA'CEOUS.† adj. [from crusta, Lat.] Shelly, with joints; not testaceous; not with one continued uninterrupted shell. Lobster is crustaceous, oyster testaceous.

It is true that there are some shells, such as those of lobsters, crabs, and others of crustaceous kinds, that are very rarely found at land.
Woodward, Nat. Hist.

That most witty conceit of Anaximander, that the first men and all animals were bred in some warm moisture; inclosed in crustaceous skins, as if they were various kinds of crabfish and lobsters!
Bentley, Serm. iv.

CRUSTA'CEOUSNESS. n. s. [from crustaceous.] The quality of having jointed shells.

CRUSTA'TION.* n. s. [Lat. crustatus.] An adherent covering; an incrustation.

The crustation of the building was changed to what it now is.
Pegge, Anecdotes of the Eng. Language.

CRU'STILY. adv. [from crusty.] Peevishly; snappishly; harshly.

CRU'STINESS. n. s. [from crusty.]

1. The quality of a crust.
2. Peevishness; moroseness.

CRU'STY.† adj. [from crust.]

1. Covered with a crust.

The wheat of Christ's Gospel once grew in Rome; but, it being cast into the river of contempt and neglect, sunk and settled in the bottom of oblivion, till with the mud and gravel of traditions and violent interpretations it increased to a huge heap; which, pressed softly by hypocrisy and pretences of devotion, made it as crusty as the hardness of heart or a seared conscience.
Dr. Favour's Antiq. (1619,) p. 421.

There be two sorts: either the fluid, moist, succulent, tender, and soft parts of the body; or the dry, solid, tensile, hard, and crusty parts of the body. Smith, Portraiture of Old Age, p. 173.

For sense cannot arrive to th' inwardness
Of things, nor penetrate the crusty fence
Of constipated matter close compress.
More, Song of the Soul, i. i. 28.

The egg itself deserves our notice: its parts within, and its crusty coat without, are admirably well fitted for the business of incubation.
Derham, Physico-Theology.

2. Sturdy; morose; snappish: a low word.

Maister Ruf, are ye so crusty?
Preston's Trag. of K. Cambyses, (about 1561.)

CRUTCH.† n. s. [croccia, Ital. croce, Fr. crucke, Germ. cnicc, Sax.]

1. A support used by cripples.

Ah, thus king Henry throws away his crutch,
Before his legs be firm to bear his body.
Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

Hence, therefore, thou nice crutch:
A scaly gauntlet now, with joints of steel,
Must glove this hand. Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

On these new crutches let them learn to walk.
Dryden, Georg.

This fair defect, this helpless aid call'd wife,
The bending crutch of a decrepit life. Dryden
Rhyme is a crutch that lifts the weak along,
Supports the feeble, but retards the strong. Smith
The dumb shall sing, the lame his crutch forego,
And leap exulting like the bounding roe.
Pope, Messiah.

2. It is used for old age.

Beauty doth varnish age, as if new born,
And gives the crutch the cradle's infancy. Shaksp.

To CRUTCH. v. a. [from crutch.] To support on crutches as a cripple.

I hasten Og and Doeg to rehearse,
Two fools that crutch their feeble sense on verse.
Dryden.

*CRUX. n. s. [Lat.] Figuratively, any thing that vexes or puzzles.

Dear dean, since in cruxes and puns you and I deal,
Pray, why is a woman a sieve and a riddle?
Dr. Sheridan to Swift.

CRUZA'DO.* n. s. [Portug.] See CRUSADO.

To CRY.† v. n. [Fr. crier; old Fr. crida; Span. gritar; Ital. gridare; Welsh, crio; Icel. kra, or kria, to exclaim, to cry out.]

1. To speak with vehemence and loudness.

Methought I heard a voice cry, sleep no more!
Macbeth, doth murther sleep! the innocent sleep.
Shakspeare.
While his falling tears the stream supply'd,
Thus mourning to his mother goddess cry'd.
Dryden, Virg.

2. To call importunately.

I cried, by reason of mine affliction, unto the Lord, and he heard me. Jon. ii. 2.

3. To talk eagerly or incessantly; to repeat continually.

They be idle; therefore they cry, saying let us go. Ex. v. 8.
To Thee Cherubin and Seraphin continually do cry, Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God of hosts.
Te Deum.

4. To proclaim; to make publick.

Go and cry in the ears of Jerusalem. Jer. ii. 2.

5. To exclaim.

Yet let them look they glory not in mischief,
Nor build their evils on the graves of great men;
For then, my guiltless blood must cry against them.
Shakspeare.
What's the matter,
That in the several places of the city
You cry against the noble senate. Shaksp. Coriol.
If dressing, mistressing, and compliment,
Take up thy day, the sun himself will cry
Against thee. Herbert.
Lysimachus having obtained the favour of seeing his ships and machines, surprised at the contrivance, cried out that they were built with more than human art. Arbuthnot on Coins.

6. To utter lamentations.

We came crying hither:
Thou know'st the first time that we smell the air,
We wawle and cry. Shakspeare, K. Lear.
Behold, my servants shall sing for joy of heart; but ye shall cry for sorrow of heart, and shall howl for vexation of spirit. Is. lxv. 14.
When any evil has been upon philosophers, they groan as pitifully, and cry out as loud, as other men. Tillotson.

7. To squall, as an infant.

Should some god tell me, that should I be born,
And cry again, his offer I should scorn. Denham.
Thus, in a starry night, fond children cry
For the rich spangles that adorn the sky. Waller.
He struggles first for breath, and cries for aid;
Then helpless in his mother's lap is laid.
Dryden, Fab.

The child certainly knows that the wormseed or mustardseed it refuses, is not the apple or sugar it cries for. Locke.

8. To weep; to shed tears.

Her who still weeps with spungy eyes,
And her who is dry cork, and never cries. Donne.

9. To utter an inarticulate voice, as an animal.

He giveth to the beast his food, and to the young ravens which cry. Psalm cxlvii. 9.
The beasts of the field cry also unto thee.
Joel, i. 20.

10. To yelp, as a hound on a scent.

He cried upon it at the meerest loss;
Trust me, I take him for the better dog. Shaksp.

11. To proclaim as a hawker.

Why, you can have nothing there; there's nobody cries brooms.
Beaum. and Fl. King and No King.

12. To call for vengeance or punishment.

The hire of the labourers, who have reaped down your fields, which is of you kept back by fraud, crieth. St. James, v. 4.
Heinous offences are called crying sins.
Lowth on Jonah, i. 2.

To CRY. v. a. To proclaim publickly something lost or found, in order to its recovery or restitution.

She seeks, she sighs, but nowhere spies him:
Love is lost, and thus she cries him. Crashaw.

To CRY down. v. a.

1. To blame; to depreciate; to decry.

Bavius cries down an admirable treatise of philosophy, and says there's atheism in it. Watts.
Men of dissolute lives cry down religion because they would not be under the restraints of it.
Tillotson.

2. To prohibit.

By all means cry down that unworthy course of late times, that they should pay money.
Bacon to Villiers.

3. To overbear.

I'll to the king,
And from a mouth of honour quite cry down
This Ipswich fellow's insolence. Shaks. Hen. VIII.

To CRY out. v. n.

1. To exclaim; to scream; to clamour.

They make the oppressed to cry; they cry out by reason of the arm of the mighty. Job, xxxv. 9.
With that Susanna cried with a loud voice, and the two elders cried out against her.
Susanna, xxiv.

2. To complain loudly.

We are ready to cry out of an unequal management, and to blame the Divine adminisration.
Atterbury.

3. To blame; to censure: with of, against, upon.

Are these things then necessities?
Then let us meet them like necessities;
And that same word even now cries out on us.
Shakspeare.
Giddy censure
Will then cry out of Marcius: oh, if he
Had borne the business. Shakspeare, Coriol.
Behold, I cry out of wrong, but I am not heard.
Job, xix. 7.
Cry out upon the stars for doing
Ill offices, to cross their wooing. Hudibras.
Epiphanius cries out upon it as rank idolatry, and destructive to their souls who did it.
Stillingfleet.
Tumult, sedition and rebellion, are things that the followers of that hypothesis cry out against.
Locke.
I find every sect, as far as reason will help them, make use of it gladly; and where it fails them, they cry out it is matter of faith, and above reason. Locke.

4. To declare loud.

5. To be in labour.

What! is she crying out? ——
—— So said her woman; and that her suff'rance made
Each pang a death. Shakspeare, Hen. VIII.

To CRY up. v. a.

1. To applaud; to exalt; to praise.

Instead of crying up all things which are brought from beyond sea, let us advance the native commodities of our own kingdom. Bacon to Villiers.
The philosopher deservedly suspected himself of vanity, when cried up by the multitude.
Glanville, Scepsis.
The astrologer, if his predictions come to pass, is cried up to the stars from whence he pretends to draw them. South.
They slight the strongest arguments that can be brought for religion, and cry up very weak ones against it. Tillotson.
He may, out of interest, as well as conviction, cry up that for sacred, which if once trampled on and profaned, he himself cannot be safe, nor secure. Locke.
Poets, like monarchs on an Eastern throne,
Confin'd by nothing but their will alone,
Here can cry up, and there as boldly blame,
And, as they please, give infamy or fame. Walsh.
Those who are fond of continuing the war, cry up our constant success at a most prodigious rate.
Swift.

2. To raise the price by proclamation.

All the effect that I conceive was made by crying up the pieces of eight, was to bring in much more of that species, instead of others current here. Temple.

CRY. n. s. [cri, Fr.]

1. Lamentation; shriek; scream.

And all the first-born in the land of Egypt shall die, and there shall be a great cry throughout all the land. Exodus.

2. Weeping; mourning.

3. Clamour; outcry.

Amazement seizes all; the general cry
Proclaims Laocoon justly doom'd to die.
Dryden, Virg.
These narrow and selfish views have so great an influence in this cry, that there are several of my fellow freeholders who fancy the church in danger upon the rising of bank-stock. Addison.

4. Exclamation of triumph or wonder, or any other passion.

In popish countries some impostor cries out, a miracle! a miracle! to confirm the deluded vulgar in their errours; and so the cry goes round, without examining into the cheat. Swift.

5. Proclamation.

6. The hawkers proclamation of wares to be sold in the street: as, the cries of London.

7. Acclamation; popular favour.

The cry went once for thee,
And still it might, and yet it may again. Shaksp.

8. Voice; utterance; manner of vocal expressions.

Sounds also, besides the distinct cries of birds and beasts, are modified by diversity of notes of different length, put together, which make that complex idea called tune. Locke.

9. Importunate call.

Pray not thou for this people, neither lift up cry nor prayer for them. Jeremiah, vii. 18.

10. Yelping of dogs.

He scorns the dog, resolves to try
The combat next; but if their cry
Invades again his trembling ear,
He strait resumes his wonted care. Waller.

11. Yell; inarticulate noise.

There shall be the noise of a cry from the fish-gate, and an howling from the second, and a great crashing from the hills. Zeph. i. 10.

12. A pack of dogs.

You common cry of curs, whose breath I hate
As reek o' th' rotten fens; whose loves I prize
As the dead carcases of unburied men,
That do corrupt my air. Shaksp. Coriol.
About her middle round,
A cry of hell-hounds never ceasing bark'd.
Milton, P. L.

CRY'AL. n. s. The heron. Ainsworth.

CRY'ER. See CRIER.

CRY'ER. n. s. A kind of hawk called the falcon gentle, an enemy to pigeons, and very swift. Ainsworth.

CRY'ING.* n. s. [from cry.] Importunate call, or outcry; shout; clamour; exclamation.

Vociferation is syngynge, redynge, or cryinge.
Sir T. Eliot, Castell of Health, ch. 35. p. 50. b.

There is a crying for wine in the streets; all joy is darkened. Isaiah, xxiv. 11.

He scorneth the multitude of the city, neither regardeth he the crying of the driver.
Job, xxxix. 7.

These troubles are nothing unto his mighty cryings, who was compassed about for our sakes with fears and horrours, till his sweat was as drops of blood. Dering on the Hebrews, ch. 5.

CRYPT.* n. s. [Fr. crypte; Lat. crypta; from the Gr. κρύπτω, to hide. A word of great age in our language, which I had not discovered when the first edition of this dictionary was compiled.] A subterranean cell or cave; more especially, under a church, for the interment of particular persons. Formerly, crypta signified a subterranean oratory or chapel; and also the grave of a martyr.

This I write, because Bristowe would have Jerome, by often entering into the crypts or vaults of the churches at Rome, to signify that he went on pilgrimage. Dr. Fulke's Def. of the Transl. of the Bible, Tract at the end, 1583, p. 24.

CRY'PTICAL.† } adj. [Lat. crypticus. See
CRY'PTICK. } CRYPT.] Hidden; secret; occult; private; unknown; not divulged.

The students of nature, conscious of her more cryptick ways of working, resolve many strange effects into the near efficiency of second causes.
Glanville's Apology.

Speakers, whose chief business is to amuse or delight, do not confine themselves to any natural order, but in a cryptical or hidden method adapt every thing to their ends. Watts.

CRY'PTICALLY. adv. [from cryptical.] Occultly; secretly: perhaps in the following example; the author might have written critically.

We take the word acid in a familiar sense, without cryptically distinguishing it from those sapors that are akin to it. Boyle.

CRYPTO'GRAPHY. n. s. [κρύπτω and γράφω.]
1. The art of writing secret characters.
2. Secret characters; cyphers.

CRYPTO'LOGY. n. s. [κρύπτω and λόγος.] Enigmatical language.

CRYPTO'GAMOUS.* adj. See CRYPTOGAMY.

CRYPTO'GAMY.* n. s. [κρύπτω, to conceal, and γάμος, marriage. Lat. cryptogamia.] In botany, applied to a genus of plants whose fructification is concealed.

The picturesque dingle Nant-y-bi abounds with what the botanists name the cryptogamous plants. The idea of cryptogamy inspired Timæus with ideas of loves of other kind; and he makes our Nant the tender scene of courtship for all the nymphs and swains of Whiteford parish, which he candidly admits does always terminate in honest matrimony in the parish church. Pennant, Hist. of Whiteford and Holywell, 1796.

CRY'STAL.† n. s. [Sax. cpiꝛtalla, Gr. κρύσταλλος.]
1. Crystals are hard, pellucid, and naturally colourless bodies, of regularly angular figures, composed of simple, not filamentous plates, not flexile or elastick, giving fire with steel, not fermenting with acid menstrua, and calcining in a strong fire. There are many various species of it produced in different parts of the globe.
Hill on Fossils.

Island crystal is a genuine spar, of an extremely pure, clear, and fine texture, seldom either blemished with flaws or spots, or stained with any other colour. A remarkable property of this body, which has much employed the writers on opticks, is its double refraction; so that if it be laid over a black line, drawn on paper, two lines appear in the place of one. Hill.

Water, as it seems, turneth into crystal; as is seen in divers caves, where the crystal hangs in stillicidiis. Bacon.

If crystal be a stone, it is not immediately concreted by the efficacy of cold, but rather by a mineral spirit. Brown.

Crystal is certainly known, and distinguished by the degree of its diaphaneity and of its refraction, as also of its hardness, which are ever the same. Woodward.

2. Crystal is also used for a factitious body cast in the glass houses, called also crystal glass, which is carried to a degree of perfection beyond the common glass; though it comes far short of the whiteness and vivacity of the natural crystal. Chambers.
3. Crystals [in chymistry] express salts or other matters shot or congealed in manner of crystal. Chambers.

If the menstruum be overcharged, within a short time the metals will shoot into certain crystals.
Bacon.

CRY'STAL. adj.
1. Consisting of crystal.

Then Jupiter, thou king of Gods,
Thy crystal window ope, look out. Shaksp. Cymb.

2. Bright; clear; transparent; lucid; pellucid.

In groves we live, and lie on mossy beds
By crystal streams, that murmur through the meads. Dryden.

CRY'STALLINE.† adj. [crystallinus, Lat. It is to be observed, that Shakspeare places the accent on the first syllable of this word; and Milton on the second; but Milton does not always write the word crystallin, as an eminent critick has asserted, either in the passage cited by him from Paradise Lost or that from Samson Agonistes. The poet's own editions there read crastalline; but elsewhere, unintentionally perhaps, crystallin.]
1. Consisting of crystal.

Mount eagel to my palace crystalline.
Shaksp. Cymbeline.

We provided ourselves with some small receivers, blown of crystalline glass. Boyle.

2. Bright; clear; pellucid; transparent.

The clarifying of water is an experiment tending to the health; besides the pleasure of the eye, when water is crystalline. It is effected by casting in and placing pebbles at the head of the current, that the water may strain through them.
Bacon, Nat. Hist.

He on the wings of cherub rode sublime
On the crystalline sky, in saphir thron'd
Illustrious far and wide. Milton, P. L.

CRY'STALLINE Humour. n. s. The second humour of the eye, that lies immediately next to the aqueous behind the uvea, opposite to the papilla, nearer to the forepart than the backpart of the globe. It is the least of the humours, but much more solid than any of them. Its figure, which is convex on both sides, resembles two unequal segments of spheres, of which the most convex is on its backside, which makes a small cavity in the glassy humour in which it lies. It is covered with a fine coat called aranea.

The parts of the eye are made convex, and especially the crystalline humour, which is of a lenticular figure, convex on both sides.
Ray on the Creation.

CRYSTALLIZA'TION. n. s. [from crystallize.]
1. Congelation into crystals.

Such a combination of saline particles as resembles the form of a crystal, variously modified, according to the nature and texture of the salts. The method is by dissolving any saline body in water, and filtering it, to evaporate, till a film appear at the top, and then let it stand to shoot; and this it does by that attractive force which is in all bodies, and particularly in salt by reason of its solidity: whereby, when the menstruum or fluid, in which such particles flow, is sated enough or evaporated, so that the saline particles are within each other's attractive powers, they draw one another more than they are drawn by the fluid, then will they run into crystals. And this is peculiar to those, that let them be ever so much divided and reduced into minute particles, yet when they are formed into crystals, they each of them reassume their proper shapes; so that one might as easily divest them of their saltness, as of their figure. This being an immutable and perpetual law, by knowing the figure of the crystals, we may understand what the texture of the particles ought to be, which can form those crystals; and, on the other hand, by knowing the texture of the particles, may be determined the figure of the crystals. Quincy.

2. The mass formed by congelation or concretion.

All natural metallick and mineral crystallizations were effected by the water, which first brought the particles, whereof each consists, out from amongst the matter of the strata.
Woodward, Nat. Hist.

To CRY'STALLIZE. v. a. [from crystal.] To cause to congeal or concrete in crystals.

If you dissolve copper in aqua fortis, or spirit of nitre, you may, by crystallizing the solution, obtain a goodly blue. Boyle.

To CRY'STALLIZE. v. n. To coagulate; congeal; concrete; or shoot into crystals.

Recent urine will crystallize by inspissation, and afford a salt neither acid nor alkaline. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

CUB. n. s. [of uncertain etymology.]

1. The young of a beast; generally of a bear or fox.

I would outstare the sternest eyes that look,
Pluck the young sucking cubs from the she-bear. Shakspeare.

This night, wherein the cub-drawn bear would couch,
The lion, and the belly pinched wolf,
Keep their fur dry. Shaksp. K. Lear.

In the eagle's destroying one fox's cubs, there's power executed with oppression. L'Estrange.

2. The young of a whale, perhaps of any viviparous fish.

Two mighty whales, which swelling seas had tost,
One as a mountain vast, and with her came
A cub, not much inferior to his dame. Waller.

3. In reproach or contempt, a young boy or girl.

O thou dissembling cub! what wilt thou be,
When time hath sow'd a grizzle on thy case?
Or will not else thy craft so quickly grow,
That thine own trip shall be thine overthrow? Shakspeare.

O most comical sight! a country squire, with the equipage of a wife and two daughters, came to Mr. Snipwel's shop last night; but, such two unlicked cubs! Congreve.

CUB.* n. s. [perhaps from the Lat. cubo, to lie down; or a corruption of coop.]

1. A stall for cattle; it is still so used in Gloucestershire.

The anchors also, and charter-monks, vowed they not to die in theyr houses? And why are they not turned out of theyr cubbes, if vowes may not be broken?

Confutation of N. Shaxton, (1546,) H. vi. b.

2. A case or receptacle; a cupboard.

The great leidger-book of the statutes is to be placed in archivis among the university charters, and not in any cub of the library. Abp. Laud, Hist. of his Ch. of Oxf. p. 132.

To CUB.† v. a. [from the noun.] To coop up; to confine.

Cubb'd in a cabin, on a mattress laid,
On a brown George with lousy swabbers fed;
Dead wine, that stinks of the borachio, sup
From a foul jack, or greasy maple cup. Dryden, Pers.

To be cubbed up on a sudden, how shall he be perplexed what shall become of him. Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 153.

CUBA'TION. n. s. [cubatio, Lat.] The act of lying down. Dict.

CU'BATORY. adj. [from cubo, Lat.] Recumbent. Dict.

CU'BATURE. n. s. [from cube.] The finding exactly the solid content of any proposed body. Harris.

CUBE. n. s. [from κύβος, a die.]

1. [In geometry.] A regular solid body, consisting of six square and equal faces or sides, and the angles all right, and therefore equal. Chambers,

2. [In arithmetick.] See CUBICK Number.

All the master planets move about the sun at several distances, as their common centre, and with different velocities. This common law being observed in all of them, that the squares of the times of the revolutions are proportional to the cubes of their distances. Grew, Cosmol.

CUBE Root. } n. s. The origin of a cu-
CU'BICK Root. } bick number; or a number, by whose multiplication into itself, and again into the product, any given number is formed: thus two is the cube-root of eight. Chambers.

CU'BEB. n. s. A small dried fruit resembling pepper, but somewhat longer, of a greyish-brown colour on the surface. It has an aromatick smell, and is acrid to the taste. Cubebs are brought from Java. Hill.

Aromaticks, as cubebs, cinnamon, and nutmegs, are usually put into crude poor wines, to give them more oily spirits. Floyer on the Humours.

CU'BICAL. } adj. [from cube.]
CU'BICK. }

1. Having the form or properties of a cube.

A close vessel, containing ten cubical feet of air, will not suffer a wax-candle of an ounce to burn in it above an hour before it be suffocated. Wilkins, Math. Mag.

It is above a hundred to one, against any particular throw, that you do not cast any given set of faces with four cubical dice; because there are so many several combinations of the six faces of four dice. Bentley's Serm.

2. It is applied to numbers.

The number of four, multiplied into itself, produceth the square number of sixteen; and that again multiplied by four, produceth the cubick number of sixty-four. If we should suppose a multitude actually infinite, there must be infinite roots, and square and cubick numbers; yet, of necessity, the root is but the fourth part of the square, and the sixteenth part of the cubick number. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

The number of ten hath been as highly extolled, as containing even, odd, long, and plain, quadrate and cubical numbers. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CU'BICALLY.* adv. [from cubical.] In a cubical method.

Such is sixty-four, either made by multiplying eight into eight, and so it is a square; or else by multiplying four cubically. More, Conject. Cabb. p. 217.

CU'BICALNESS. n. s. [from cubical.] The state or quality of being cubical.

CUBI'CULAR.* adj. [old Fr. cubiculaire, "belonging to the bedchamber," Cotgrave; "cubiculaire, valet de chambre," Lacombe.] Belonging to the chamber.

Being the inseparable cubicular companion the king took comfort in, in the height of his troubles. Howell, Lett. iv. 16.

CUBI'CULARY.† adj. [Lat. cubicularis, Fr. cubiculaire; from cubiculum.] Fitted for the posture of lying down.

Custom by degrees, changed their cubiculary beds into discubitory, and introduced a fashion to go from the baths unto these. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CU'BIFORM. adj. [from cube and form.] Of the shape of a cube.

CU'BIT. n. s. [from cubitus, Lat.] A measure in use among the ancients; which was originally the distance from the elbow, bending inwards to the extremity of the middle finger. This measure is the fourth part of a well proportioned man's stature. Some fix the Hebrew cubit at twenty inches and a half, Paris measure; and others at eighteen. Calmet.

From the tip of the elbow to the end of the long finger, is half a yard and a quarter of the stature, and makes a cubit; the first measure we read of, the ark of Noah being framed and measured by cubits. Holder on Time.

Measur'd by cubit, length, and breadth, and height. Milton.

The Jews used two sorts of cubits; the sacred, and the profane or common one. Arbuthnot on Measures.

When on the goddess first I cast my sight,
Scarce seem'd her stature of a cubit height. Pope.

CU'BITAL.† adj. [cubital, old Fr. cubitalis, Latin.] Containing only the length of a cubit.

The watchmen of Tyre might well be called pygmies, the towers of that city being so high, that, unto men below, they appeared in a cubital stature. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CU'BITED.* adj. [from cubit.] Having the measure of a cubit.

The twelve-cubited man, as Jacobus à Voragine measureth his length; or the twelve-footed man, as he is measured by Petrus de Natalibus!

Sheldon, Miracles of Antichrist, p. 303.

CU'CKINGSTOOL.† n. s. [derived by Hickes from coquina, anciently cockaigna, signifying an idle jade, a base woman. But it seems nearly allied to the Teut. kaecke, a sort of pillory. It is sometimes called a ducking-stool; because the scold, after having been placed in the chair or stool fixed at the end of a long pole, was immerged in some muddy or stinking pool. The Saxons, (for it is of great antiquity,) called it ꝑcealpinꝝ-ꝑtole. Brewers and bakers, transgressing against the laws, were also formerly thus punished. Our Homilies notice the punishment as inflicted on the unquiet.] An engine invented for the punishment of scolds and unquiet women, which, in ancient times, was called tumbrel. Cowel.

In all well-ordered cities, common brawlers and scolders be punished with a notable kind of pain; as to be set on the cucking-stool, pillory, or such like. Homilies, B. i. Against Contention.

We'll ship them out in cuck-stools, there they'll sail
As brave Columbus did. Beaum. and Fl. Tamer Tamed.

These mounted on a chair-curule,
Which moderns call a cucking-stool,
March proudly to the river's side. Hudibras.

CU'CKOLD.† n. s. [Dr. Johnson derives this word from the Fr. cocu, which has been given to the cuckold in allusion to the cuckoo bird. The old French is coux, "mari dont la femme est infidelle," Lacombe. But as Howell, in his Letters, nearly two centuries since observed, "In French, cocu is taken for one whose wife is light, and hath made him a passive cuckold; whereas clean contrary, cocu, which is the cuckoo, doth use to lay her eggs in another bird's nest." Lett. iv. 19. Serenius refers our word to a northern origin; the Icelandick quonkall, signifying the same; and which he derives from quona, a woman, and kala, to blemish. Chaucer has given a bantering etymology of the word, which there is no occasion to cite. Mr. Horne Tooke considers it formed from the Italian cuculo, the cuckoo; which is from the Lat. cuculus. That the husbands of false women wear horns, is an old saying, and common in other countries. And Dr. Burn, in his History of Westmoreland, would trace this crest of cuckoldom, to horns worn as crests by those who went to the crusades, as their armorial distinctions; to the infidelity of consorts during their absence; and to the finger of scorn pointing at them, on their return, crested indeed, but abused.] One that is married to an adultress; one whose wife is false to his bed.

But for all the whole world; why, who would not make her husband a cuckold, to make him a monarch? I should venture purgatory for't.
Shakspeare, Othello.

There have been,
Or I am much deceiv'd, cuckolds ere now;
And many a man there is, ev'n at this present,
Now while I speak this, holds his wife by th' arm,
That little thinks she has been sluic'd in's absence.
Shakspeare.

For though the law makes null th' adulterer's deed
Of lands, to her the cuckold may succeed.
Dryden, Juv.

Ever since the reign of king Charles II. the alderman is made a cuckold, the deluded virgin is debauched, and adultery and fornication are committed behind the scenes. Swift.

To CU'CKOLD.† v. a. [from the Ital. cuculo, the cuckoo; as Mr. H. Tooke thinks, that is, to serve as the cuckoo serves other birds. Our verb has been sometimes written without the d, and is sometimes pronounced without it. But Beaumont and Fletcher are those only whom I have found to support it.]

1. To corrupt a man's wife; to bring upon a man the reproach of having an adulterous wife; to rob a man of his wife's fidelity.

If thou canst cuckold him, thou do'st thyself a pleasure, and me a sport. Shakspeare, Othello.

2. To wrong a husband by unchastity.

But suffer not thy wife abroad to roam,
Nor strut in streets with amazonian pace;
For that's to cuckold thee before thy face.
Dryden, Juv.

CU'CKOLDLY. adj. [from cuckold.] Having the qualities of a cuckold; poor; mean; cowardly; sneaking.

Poor cuckoldly knave, I know him not: yet I wrong him to call him poor; they say the jealous knave hath masses of money.
Shakspeare, M. Wives of Windsor.

CU'CKOLDMAKER. n. s. [cuckold and maker.] One that makes a practice of corrupting wives.

If I spared any that had a head to hit, either young or old, he or she, cuckold or cuckoldmaker, let me never hope to see a chine again.
Shaksp. Hen. VIII.

One Hernando, cuckoldmaker of this city, contrived to steal her away. Dryden, Span. Friar.

CU'CKOLDOM. n. s. [from cuckold.]

1. The act of adultery.

She is thinking on nothing but her colonel, and conspiring cuckoldom against me.
Dryden, Span. Friar.

2. The state of a cuckold.

It is a true saying, that the last man of the parish that knows of his cuckoldom, is himself.
Arbuthnot, John Bull.

CU'CKOO.† n. s. [Welsh, cwccw, gwccw; Fr. coucou, cocu; German, guguck; Dan. kuckuck; Ital. cuculo; Lat. cuculus; Gr. κόκκυξ.]

1. A bird which appears in the Spring; and is said to suck the eggs of other birds; and lay her own to be hatched in their place; from which practice, it was usual to alarm a husband at the approach of an adulterer by calling cuckoo, which, by mistake, was in time applied to the husband. This bird is remarkable for the uniformity of his note, from which his name in most tongues seems to have been formed.

Finding Mopsa, like a cuckoo by a nightingale, alone with Pamela, I came in. Sidney.

The merry cuckoo, messenger of Spring,
His trumpet shrill hath thrice already sounded.
Spenser.

The plainsong cuckoo gray,
Whose note full many a man doth mark,
And dares not answer, nay. Shakspeare.

Take heed, have open eye; for thieves do foot by night:
Take heed ere Summer comes, or cuckoo birds affright. Shakspeare.

I deduce,
From the first note the hollow cuckoo sings,
The symphony of Spring; and touch a theme
Unknown to fame, the passion of the grove.
Thomson.

2. It is a name of contempt.

Why, what a rascal art thou then, to praise him so for running? ——
— A horseback, ye cuckoo; —— but a-foot, he will not budge a-foot. Shaksp. Hen. IV.

CU'CKOO-BUD. } n. s. [cardaminus, Lat.] The name
CU'CKOO-FLOWER. } of a flower.

When daizies pied, and violets blue,
And cuckoo-buds of yellow hue,
Do paint the meadows much bedight. Shaksp.

Nettles, cuckoo flowers,
Darnel, and all the idle weeds. Shaksp. K. Lear.

CU'CKOO-SPITTLE. n. s. [cuckoo and spittle.] Cuckoo-spittle, or woodseare, is that spumous dew or exudation, or both, found upon plants, especially about the joints of lavender and rosemary; observable with us about the latter end of May. Brown, Vul. Err.

CU'CQUEAN.* n. s. [from cuck, the first syllable of cuckold, and from quean.] A she-cuckold; a woman, whose husband is not faithful to her.

Now [he] her, hourly, her own cucquean makes.
B. Jonson.

CU'CULLATE. } adj. [cucullatus, hooded, Lat.]
CU'CULLATED. }

1. Hooded; covered, as with a hood or cowl.

2. Having the resemblance or shape of a hood.

They are differently cucullated, and capuched upon the head and back. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CU'CUMBER.† n. s. [cucummer, German; coucombre, old Fr. cucumis, Lat.] The name of a plant, and also of the fruit of that plant.

It hath a flower consisting of one single leaf, bell-shaped, and expanded toward the top, and cut into many segments; of which some are male, or barren, having no embryo, but only a large style in the middle, charged with the farina; others are female, or fruitful, being fastened to an embryo, which is afterwards changed into a fleshy fruit, for the most part oblong and turbinated, which is divided into three or four cells, inclosing many oblong seeds. The species are, 1. The common cucumber, 2. The white cucumber. 3. The long Turky cucumber. Miller.

How cucumbers along the surface creep,
With crooked bodies and with bellies deep.
Dryden, Virg.

CUCURBITA'CEOUS. adj. [from cucurbita, Lat. a gourd.]

Cucurbitaceous plants are those which resemble a gourd; such as the pumpion and melon. Chambers.

CU'CURBITE. n. s. [cucurbita, Latin.] A chymical vessel, commonly called a body, made of earth or glass, in the shape of a gourd, and therefore called cucurbite.
Quincy.

I have, for curiosity's sake, distilled quicksilver in a cucurbite, fitted with a capacious glass-head.
Boyle on Colours.

Let common yellow sulphur be put into a cucurbite glass, upon which pour the strongest aqua fortis. Mortimer.

CUCU'RBITIVE.* adj. [from cucurbite.] Applied to small flat worms of the shape of the seed of a gourd. Hist. R. S. iv. 138.

CUD.† n. s. [cuð, Saxon. That which is chewed.] That food which is reposited in the first stomach in order to rumination, or to be chewed again.

Many times, when my master's cattle came hither to chew their cud in this fresh place, I might see the young bull testify his love. Sidney.

You range the pathless wood,
While on a flow'ry bank he chews the cud.
Dryden.

CU'DDEN.† } n. s. [without etymology, Dr.
CU'DDY. } Johnson says. Serenius refers it to the Icel. kutte, a dwarf. But I conceive it may more easily be derived from the Teut. kudde, a herd of cattle, and also a pig.] A clown; a stupid rustic; a low dolt: a low bad word.

The slavering cudden, propp'd upon his staff,
Stood ready gaping with a grinning laugh.
Dryden.

To CU'DDLE.† v. n. [a low word, I believe, without etymology, Dr. Johnson says. But it may be from the Welsh cuddio, to hide, to get out of sight. To cuddle, in the north of England, is to huddle.]

1. To lie close; to squat.

Have you mark'd a partridge quake,
Viewing the tow'ring falcon nigh?
She cuddles low behind the brake;
Nor would she stay, nor dares she fly. Prior.

2. [from the Teut. kudden perhaps, to meet, to come together.] To join in an embrace.

CU'DDY.* n. s. A fish which frequents the coasts of Scotland; the cole-fish.

The cuddy is a fish, of which I know not the philosophical name. It is not much bigger than a gudgeon, but it is of great use in these islands, as it affords the lower people both food and oil for their lamps.
Johnson, Journey to the Western Isles.

CU'DGEL.† n. s. [kudse, Dutch, Dr. Johnson says. The Scotch use the word cud for a strong staff, which Dr. Jamieson refers to the same original. Cudgel-play, as it is an imitation of the sword-exercise, leads one to suppose an affinity between our cudgel and the Spanish cuchillo; "à cuchilládas, by cuts, by slashes." Minsheu, Span Dict. The guard of the Spanish sword resembles also, in some degree, the basket-hilt of our rustick cudgels.]

1. A stick to strike with, lighter than a club, shorter than a pole.

Vine twigs, while they are green, are brittle; yet the wood, dried, is extreme tough; and was used by the captains of armies, amongst the Romans, for their cudgels. Bacon.

All we have seen compar'd to his experience
Has been but cudgel-play or cock-fighting.
Beaum. and Fl. The Captain.

Do not provoke the rage of stones
And cudgels to thy hide and bones.
Tremble and vanish. Hudibras.

The ass was quickly given to understand, with a good cudgel, the difference betwixt the one playfellow and the other. L'Estrange.

His surly officer ne'er fail'd to crack
His knotty cudgel on his tougher back.
Dryden, Juv.

This, if well reflected on, would make people more wary in the use of the rod and the cudgel. Locke.

The wise Cornelius was convinced, that these, being polemical arts, could no more be learned alone than fencing or cudgel-playing. Arbuthnot and Pope.

2. To cross the CUDGELS, is to forbear the contest, from the practice of cudgel-players to lay one over the other.

It is much better to give way than it would be to contend at first, and then either to cross the cudgels, or to be baffled in the conclusion. L'Estrange.

To CU'DGEL. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To beat with a stick.

My lord, he speaks most vilely of you, like a foul-mouth'd man, as he is; and said he would cudgel you. Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

The ass courting his master, just as the spaniel had done, instead of being stroked and made much of, is only rated off and cudgelled for all his courtship. South.

Three duels he fought, thrice ventur'd his life;
Went home, and was cudgell'd again by his wife.
Swift.

2. To beat in general.

Cudgel thy brains no more about it; for your dull ass will not mend his pace with beating. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

A good woman happened to pass by as a company of young fellows were cudgelling a walnut-tree, and asked them what they did that for. L'Estrange.

CU'DGEL-PLAY.* See CUDGEL.

CU'DGEL-PROOF. adj. Able to resist a stick.

His doublet was of sturdy buff,
And though not sword, yet cudgel-proof. Hudibras.

CU'DGELLER.* n. s. [from cudgel.] One who cudgels another.

They were often liable to a night-walking cudgeller, or the emptying of an urinal. Milton, Apol. for Smectym.

CU'DLE. n. s. A small sea-fish.

Of round fish there are brit, sprat, cudles, eels. Carew.

CU'DWEED.† n. s. [from cud and weed.] A plant. Miller.

There is a plant, which our herbalists call "herbam impiam," or wicked cudweed, whose younger branches still yield flowers to overtop the elder. Bp. Hall, Rem. of Profaneness, ii. § 9.

CUE.† n. s. [old Fr. cowe, a tail; "cowe, coue, pour queue, couda, 960." Lacombe.]

1. The tail or end of any thing; as, the long curl of a wig.

2. The last words of a speech which the player who is to answer catches, and regards as intimation to begin. See ALLOQUY.

Pyramus, you begin: when you have spoken your speech, enter into that brake; and so every one according to his cue. Shaksp. Mids. N. Dream.

3. A hint; an intimation; a short direction.

What's Hecuba to him, or he to Hecuba,
That he should weep for her? What would he do,
Had he the motive and the cue for passion
That I have? He would drown the stage with tears. Shakspeare.

Let him know how many servants there are, of both sexes, who expect vails; and give them their cue to attend in two lines, as he leaves the house. Swift.

4. The part which any man is to play in his turn.

Hold your hands,
Both you of my inclining, and the rest:
Were it my cue to fight, I should have known it
Without a prompter. Shakspeare, Othello.

Neither is Otto here a much more taking gentlemen: nothing appears in his cue to move pity, or any way make the audience of his party. Rymer, Tragedies of the last Age.

5. Humour; temper of mind; a low word.

6. A farthing, or a farthing's worth. [merely the sound of q, as an abbreviation of the Lat. quadrans, a farthing.] Obsolete.

You are fain
To size your belly out with shoulder fees,
With rumps, and kidneys, and cues of single beer.
Beaum. and Fl. Wit at several Weapons.

And trust me, I'll not give a cue so soon
To see an ape, a monkey, or baboon,
Play his forc'd tricks; as I would give a tester,
To come and view them and their apish gesture.
Wither's Satires, 1613.

CUE'RPO.† n. s. [Spanish. Our expression is often corruptly written querpo, which see.] To be in cuerpo, is to be without the upper coat or cloke, so as to discover the true shape of the cuerpo or body.

Expos'd in cuerpo to their rage,
Without my arms and equipage. Hudibras.

CUFF.† n. s. [zuffa, a battle; zuffare, to fight, Italian. This is Dr. Johnson's etymology. Skinner derives the word from the Gr. κόπτω, and Junius from κόλαφος. But Lye notices the Danish kiep, a club, which, with our word, he refers to the Goth. kaupathian, to strike with the hands. Serenius makes the same reference.]

1. A blow with the fist; a box; a stroke.

The priest let fall the book,
And as he stoop'd again to take it up,
The mad-brain'd bridegroom took him such a cuff,
That down fell priest and book, and book and priest. Shakspeare.

There was no money bid for argument, unless the poet and the player went to cuffs in the question. Shakspeare.

He gave her a cuff on the ear, and she would prick him with her knitting-needle. Arbuthnot, John Bull.

Their own sects, which now lie dormant, would be soon at cuffs again with each other about power and preferment. Swift.

2. Any stroke or blow.

The billows rude, rouz'd into hills of water,
Cuff after cuff, the earth's green banks did batter.
Mir. for Mag. p. 619.

Great Seymer and stout Winter did so gall
With wounding cuff of cannon's fierie ball,
That on the Belgian coast, by friends forsaken,
They with their captains, by their foes were taken.
Mir. for Mag. p. 834.

3. It is used of birds that fight with their talons.

CUFF.† n. s. [coeffe, French,] Part of the sleeve.

But here are no clothes;
Yes, here's a cuff. Beaum. and Fl. Little Thief.

To CUFF. v. n. [from the noun.] To fight; to scuffle.

Clapping farces acted by the court,
While the peers cuff to make the rabble sport.
Dryden, Juv.

To CUFF. v. a.

1. To strike with the fist.

I'll after him again, and beat him.———
——— Do, cuff him soundly, but never draw thy sword. Shakspeare.

Were not you, my friend, abused, and cuffed, and kicked? Congreve, Old Bachelor.

2. To strike with the talons.

Those lazy owls, who, perch'd near fortune's top,
Sit only watchful with their heavy wings
To cuff down new-fledg'd virtues, that would rise
To nobler heights, and make the grove harmonious. Otway.

The dastard crow that to the wood made wing,
With her loud kaws her craven kind does bring,
Who, safe in numbers, cuff the noble bird.
Dryden.

They with their quills did all the hurt they cou'd,
And cuff'd the tender chickens from their food.
Dryden.

3. To strike with the wings. This seems improper.

Hov'ring about the coast, they make their moan,
And cuff the cliffs with pinions not their own.
Dryden, Æn.

He railed at fops; and, instead of the common fashion, he would visit his mistress in a morning-gown, band, short cuffs, and a peaked beard. Arbuthnot.

*CUI BONO. [a Latin expression often used in modern times, and, as it appears, adopted more than two centuries since.] For what purpose; to what end.

For, what of all this? what good? cui bono?
Bp. Andrews, Serm. when Dean of Westm. 1604, sign. E. i. b.

CUI'NAGE. n. s. The making up of twine into such forms, as it is commonly framed into, for carriage to other places. Cowel.

CUI'RASS.† n. s. [cuirasse, Fr. from cuir, leather; coraccia, Ital.] A breastplate.

Ten years of bitter nights and heavy marches,
When many a frozen storm sung through my cuirass,
And made it doubtful whether that or I
Were the more stubborn metal.
Beaum. and Fl. Bonduca.

The lance pursu'd the voice without delay,
And pierc'd his cuirass, with such fury sent,
And sign'd his bosom with a purple dint. Dryden.

CUIRA'SSIER. n. s. [from cuirass.] A man at arms; a soldier in armour.

The field all iron, cast a gleaming brown,
Nor wanted clouds of foot, nor on each horn
Cuirassiers, all in steel, for standing fight. Milton.

The picture of St. George, wherein he is described like a cuirassier, or horseman completely armed, is rather a symbolical image than any proper figure. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CUISH.† n. s. [cuisse, French, the thigh. Perhaps our word should be written cuiss. Steevens has adopted cuisses, in his edition of Shakspeare. From cuisse the word has, in old authors, been converted also into cuss and cusche.] The armour that covers the thighs.

I saw young Harry with his beaver on,
His cuishes on his thighs, gallantly arm'd,
Rise from the ground like feather'd Mercury.
Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

The crosslet some, and some the cuishes mould,
With silver plated, and with ductile gold.
Dryden, Æn.

But what had our author to wound Æneas with at so critical a time? And how came the cuishes to be worse tempered than the rest of his armour?
Dryden.

CU'LERAGE. n. s. The same plant with ARSMART. Ainsworth.

CU'LINARY. adj. [culina, Latin.] Relating to the kitchen; relating to the art of cookery.

Great weight may condense those vapours and exhalations, as soon as they shall at any time begin to ascend from the sun, and make them presently fall back again into him, and by that action increase his heat; much after the manner that, in our earth, the air increases the heat of a culinary fire. Newton.

To those, who, by reason of their northern exposition, will be still forced to be at the expence of culinary fires, it will reduce the price of their manufacture. Arbuthnot.

To CULL. v. a. [cueillir, French.] To select from others; to pick out of many.

The best of every thing they had, being culled out for themselves, if there were in their flocks any poor diseased thing not worth the keeping, they thought it good enough for the altar of God.
Hooker.

Our engines shall be bent
Against the brows of this resisting town:
Call for our chiefest men of discipline,
To cull the plots of best advantage.
Shakspeare, K. John.

Like the bee, culling from every flower,
Our thighs are packt with wax, our mouths with honey. Shakspeare.

I do remember an apothecary
In tatter'd weeds, with overwhelming brows,
Culling of simples. Shakspeare, Rom. and Jul.

Then in a moment fortune shall cull forth,
Out of one side, her happy minion. Shaks. K. John.

The choicest of the British, the Roman, Saxon, and Norman laws, being culled, as it were, this grand charter was extracted.
Howell, Parley of Beasts.

When false flowers of rhetorick thou would'st cull,
Trust nature, do not labour to be dull. Dryden.

From his herd he culls,
For slaughter, four the fairest of his bulls.
Dryden, Virg.

When the current pieces of the same denomination are of different weights, then the traders in money cull out the heavier, and melt them down with profit. Locke.

With humble duty and officious haste,
I'll cull the farthest mead for thy repast. Prior.

The various offerings of the world appear:
From each she nicely culls with curious toil,
And decks the goddess with the glittering spoil.
Pope.

CULL.* n. s. [abbreviated from cully.] A fool; one who is imposed upon. See CULLY.

CU'LLENDER.* n. s. A strainer. See COLANDER. But cullender is a common way of writing it.

CU'LLER.† n. s. [Fr. cueilleur.] One who picks or chooses. Sherwood.

CULLIBI'LITY.* n. s. [from To cully.] Credulity; easiness of belief.

Providence never designed Gay to be above two and twenty, by his thoughtlessness and cullibility.
Swift, Lett.

CU'LLING.* n. s. [from To cull.] Any thing separated or selected from a mass; refuse.

Those that are big'st of bone I still reserve for breed,
My cullings I put off, or for the chapman feed.
Drayton, Nymph. 6. p. 1496.

It is highly improbable, that the lord Fairfax would take any thing out of the cabinet, and send up the cullings to the parliament.
Dr. Walker's True Acc. of the Icon Bas. 1692, p. 32.

CU'LLION.† n. s. [coglione, a fool, Ital. or perhaps from scullion. It seems to import meanness rather than folly. So far Dr. Johnson. Coglione is an Italian expression, denoting the highest personal contempt. So the old Fr. couille, "a lubberly coward."] A scoundrel, a mean wretch.

Such a one as leaves a gentleman,
And makes a god of such a cullion.
Shakspeare, Tam. of the Shrew.

Up to the breach, you dogs; avaunt, you cullions.
Shakspeare.

Their wives and loveliest daughters constuprated by every base cullion.
Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 165.

CU'LLIONLY. adj. [from cullion.] Having the qualities of a cullion; mean; base.

I'll make a sop o' th' moonshine of you: you whorson, cullionly barber-monger, draw.
Shakspeare, K. Lear.

CU'LLIS.* n. s. [Fr. coulis.] Broth of boiled meat strained. Cotgrave.

When I am excellent at cawdles,
And cullises, and have enough spare gold
To boil away, you shall be welcome to me.
Beaum. and Fl. The Captain.

Then by my cawdle and my cullis I set
My daughter on her feet about the house here.
B. Jonson, Magn. Lady.

CU'LLUMBINE. n. s. [more properly spelt COLUMBINE.] The flowers of this plant are beautifully variegated with blue, purple, red, and white. Miller.

Her goodly bosom, like a strawberry bed;
Her neck, like to a bunch of columbines. Spenser.

CU'LLY. n. s. [coglione, Ital. a fool.] A man deceived or imposed upon; as by sharpers or a strumpet.

Why should you, whose mother wits
Are furnish'd with all perquisits,
B' allow'd to put all tricks upon
Our cully sex, and we use none. Hudibras.

Yet the rich cullies may their boasting spare:
They purchase but sophisticated ware. Dryden.

He takes it in mighty dudgeon, because I won't let him make me over by deed as his lawful cully.
Arbuthnot.

To CU'LLY. v. a. [from the noun.] To befool; to cheat; to trick; to deceive; to impose upon.

CU'LLYISM.* n. s. [from cully.] The state of a cully.

What is this but being a cully in the grave! Sure this is being henpecked with a vengeance! But without dwelling upon these less frequent instances of eminent cullyism, what is there so common as to hear a fellow curse his fate that he cannot get rid of a passion to a jilt, and quote an half-line out of a miscellany poem to prove his weakness is natural! Spectator, No. 486.

CULM.* n. s. [Welsh, culm.] A kind of dust coal found in pits with coals, and sometimes by itself: mixed up with clay in balls, it makes a strong fire, does not smoke, but emits a sulphurous smell. In this form, Mr. Bagshaw says, it is much used in some parts of Wales. The name is also known among our northern miners.

CU'LMEN.* n. s. [Lat.] Summit.

At the culmen or top was a chapel.
Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 227.

CULMI'FEROUS. adj. [culmus and fero, Lat.] Culmiferous plants are such as have a smooth jointed stalk, and usually hollow; and at each joint the stalk is wrapped about with single, narrow, long, sharp-pointed leaves, and their seeds are contained in chaffy husks. Quincy.

There are also several sorts of grasses, both of the Cyprus and culmiferous kinds; some with broader, others with narrower leaves.
Woodward on Fossils.

The properest food of the vegetable kingdom is taken from the farinaceous or mealy seeds of some culmiferous plants; as, oats, barley, wheat, rice, rye, maize, panic, millet. Arbuthnot.

To CU'LMINATE.† v. n. [culmen, Latin.] To be vertical; to be in the meridian.

Far and wide his eye commands:
For sight no obstacle found here, or shade,
But all sun-shine, as when his beams at noon
Culminate from th' equator. Milton, P. L.

When a star culminates, the first moment of his departure from the meridian is the first step to his declining. Sir H. Sheere, in Ld. Halifax's Misc. p. 34.

The regal star, then culminating, was the sun.
Dryden, Vind. of the D. of Guise.

CULMINA'TION.† n. s. [from culminate.]

1. The transit of a planet through the meridian.

2. Top or crown.

We upbraid the end with the beginning, the harvest with the spring, and wonder how that which in its putting forth was a flower, should in its growth and culmination become a thistle.
Farindon's Serm. (1657,) p. 429.

CULPABI'LITY. n. s. [from culpable.] Blamableness.

CU'LPABLE. adj. [culpabilis, Latin.]

1. Criminal.

Proceed no straiter 'gainst our uncle Glo'ster,
Than from true evidence of good esteem,
He be approv'd in practice culpable.
Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

2. Guilty; with of.

These being perhaps culpable of this crime, or favourers of their friends. Spenser on Ireland.

3. Blamable; blameworthy.

The wisdom of God setteth before us in Scripture so many admirable patterns of virtue, and no one of them, without somewhat noted wherein they were culpable; to the end that to him alone it might always be acknowledged, Thou only art holy, Thou only art just. Hooker.

All such ignorance is voluntary, and therefore culpable; for as much as it was in every man's power to have prevented it. South.

CU'LPABLENESS.† n. s. [from culpable.] Blame; guilt.

All those who have known me, cannot be ignorant of my culpableness in those particulars.
W. Montague, Dev. Ess. (1648,) p. 145.

CU'LPABLY. adv. [from culpable.] Blamably; criminally.

If we perform this duty pitifully and culpably, it is not to be expected we should communicate holily. Bp. Taylor.

CU'LPRIT.† n. s. [about this word there is great dispute. It is used by the judge at criminal trials, who, when the prisoner declares himself not guilty, and puts himself upon his trial, answers; Culprit, God send thee a good deliverance. It is likely that it is a corruption of Qu'il paroit, May it so appear, the wish of the judge being that the prisoner may be found innocent. So far Dr. Johnson. What he has ascribed to the judge, however, belongs to the clerk of arraigns. Barrington also, in his Observations on the Statutes, thinks that the French qu'il paroit, i. e. make it appear, may be the origin of our word; the criminal having answered to the charge that he is not guilty, being required to make his innocence appear. Blackstone refers it to two abbreviations, viz. to cul for culpable, which the clerk declares the prisoner to be; and to the Fr. prit, ready to prove him so. Others to cul for culpable, and to the Fr. prist, (from prendre,) taken. Mr. Tyrwhitt considers it as a vulgar name for a prisoner, from the Fr. cul and prist; meaning one seized by the skirts, caught by the back. This countenances my remark on bumbailiff, which see.] A man arraigned before his judge.

The knight appear'd, and silence they proclaim:
Then first the culprit answer'd to his name;
And, after forms of law, was last requir'd
To name the thing that woman most desir'd.
Dryden.

An author is in the condition of a culprit; the publick are his judges: by allowing too much, and condescending too far, he may injure his own cause; and by pleading and asserting too boldly, he may displease the court. Prior, Pref. to Solomon.

Cu'lter.† n. s. [culcop, Sax. culter, Latin.] The iron of the plow perpendicular to the share. It is commonly written coulter.

Her fallow lees
The darnel, hemlock, and rank fumitory,
Doth root upon; while that the culter rusts,
That should deracinate such savagery.
Shakspeare, Hen. V.

Cu'ltivable.* adj. [from cultivate.] Capable of cultivation. This word has lately been adopted by our writers on agriculture.

To Cu'ltivate. v. a. [cultiver, French.]

1. To forward or improve the product of the earth, by manual industry.

Those excellent seeds implanted in your birth, will, if cultivated, be most flourishing in production; and, as the soil is good, and no cost nor care wanting to improve it, we must entertain hopes of the richest harvest. Felton on the Classicks.

2. To improve; to meliorate.

Were we but less indulgent to our faults,
And patience had to cultivate our thoughts,
Our muse would flourish. Waller.

To make man mild and sociable to man,
To cultivate the wild licentious savage
With wisdom, discipline, and liberal arts,
Th' embellishments of life. Addison, Cato.

Cultiva'tion.† n. s. [from cultivate.]

1. The art or practice of improving soils, and forwarding or meliorating vegetables.

The state of cultivation among this rude people was so imperfect, that it was with difficulty they could afford subsistence to their new guests. Robertson.

2. Improvement in general; promotion; melioration.

An innate light discovers the common notions of good and evil, which, by cultivation and improvement, may be advanced to higher and brighter discoveries. South.

A foundation of good sense, and a cultivation of learning, are required to give a seasoning to retirement, and make us taste the blessing. Dryden.

Cu'ltivator. n. s. [from cultivate.] One who improves, promotes, or meliorates; or endeavours to forward any vegetable product, or any thing else capable of improvement.

It has been lately complained of, by some cultivators of clover-grass, that from a great quantity of the seed not any grass springs up. Boyle.

Cu'lture.† n. s. [culture, old Fr. cultura, Latin.]

1. The act of cultivation; the act of tilling the ground; tillage.

Give us seed unto our heart, and culture to our understanding, that there may came fruit of it. 2 Esd. viii. 6.

These three last were slower than the ordinary wheat of itself, and this culture did rather retard than advance. Bacon.

The plough was not invented till after the deluge; the earth requiring little or no care or culture, but yielding its increase freely, and without labour and toil. Woodward.

Where grows? — Where grows it not? If vain our toil,
We ought to blame the culture, not the soil.
Fix'd to no spot is happiness sincere. Pope.

They rose as vigorous as the sun;
Then to the culture of the willing glebe. Thomson.

2. Art of improvement and melioration.

One might wear any passion out of a family by culture, as skilful gardeners blot a colour out of a tulip that hurts its beauty. Tatler.

To Cu'lture.† v. a. [from the noun.] To cultivate; to manure; to till. It is used by Thomson, but without authority; yet it is frequent in modern poetry.

In countries cultur'd high,
In ornamented towns, where order reigns,
Free social life, and polish'd manners fair.
Thomson, Liberty, P. II.

Cu'lver. n. s. [columba, Lat. culpep, Sax.] A pigeon. An old word.

Had he so done, he had him snatch'd away,
More light than culver in the faulcon's fist.
Spenser.

Whence, borne on liquid wing,
The sounding culver shoots. Thomson, Spring.

Cu'lverhouse.* n. s. [from culver and house.] A dovecot.

Yet was this poor culverhouse sorer shaken.
Harmar, Tr. of Beza's Serm. (1587,) p. 279.

Cu'lverin.† n. s. [Fr. couleuvrine, from couleuvre, a snake; ordnance being ornamented with sculptured snakes. See Basilisk.] A species of ordnance; originally an hawk.

A whole cannon requires for every charge, forty pounds of powder, and a bullet of sixty-four pounds; a culverin, sixteen pounds of powder, and a bullet of nineteen pounds; a demi culverin, nine pounds of powder, and a bullet of twelve pounds. Wilkins, Math. Magick.

Here a well polish'd mall gives us the joy
To see our prince his matchless force employ:
No sooner has he touch'd the flying ball,
But 'tis already more than half the mall;
And such a fury from his arm 't has got,
As from a smoaking culverin 'twere shot. Waller.

Cu'lverkey. n. s. A flower.

Looking down the meadows I could see a girl cropping culverkeys and cowslips, to make garlands. Walton's Angler.

Cu'lvertail.* n. s. In carpentry, the same as dovetail, which see. Bullokar.

Cu'mbent.* adj. [from the Lat. cumbens.] Lying down.

Too cold the grassy mantle of the marl,
In stormy winter's long and dreary night,
For cumbent sheep. Dyer's Fleece.

To Cu'mber.† v. a. [kommeren, komberen, to disturb, Dutch. Our word was formerly accomber. "Acombred, vexatus," Prompt. Parv. "Acombrynge a combrement vexatio." Ibid.]

1. To embarrass; to entangle; to obstruct.

Why asks he, what avails him not in fight,
And would but cumber, and retard his flight,
In which his only excellence is plac'd!
You give him death, that intercept his haste.
Dryden, Fab.

Hardly his head the plunging pilot rears,
Clog'd with his cloaths, and cumber'd with his years. Dryden.

The learning and mastery of a tongue, being uneasy and unpleasant enough in itself, should not be cumbered with any other difficulties, as is done in this way of proceeding. Locke.

2. To croud or load with something useless.

Let it not cumber your better remembrance.
Shakspeare, Timon.

The multiplying variety of arguments, especially frivolous ones, is not only lost labour, but cumbers the memory to no purpose. Locke.

3. To involve in difficulties and dangers; to distress.

Domestick fury, and fierce civil strife,
Shall cumber all the parts of Italy. Shaks. Jul. Cæs.

4. To busy; to distract with multiplicity of cares.

Martha was cumbered about much serving. Luke.

5. To be troublesome in any place.

Behold, these three years I come seeking fruit on this fig-tree, and find none: cut it down; why cumbereth it the ground? St. Luke, xiii. 7.

Doth the bramble cumber a garden? It makes the better hedge; where, if it chances to prick the owner, it will tear the thief. Grew, Cosmol.

Cu'mber. n. s. [komber, Dutch.] Vexation; burdensomeness; embarrassment; obstruction; hindrance; disturbance; distress.

By the occasion thereof I was brought to as great cumber and danger, as lightly any might escape. Sidney.

Thus fade thy helps, and thus thy cumbers spring.
Fairfax, Tass. ii. 73.

The greatest ships are least serviceable, go very deep in water, are of marvellous charge and fearful cumber. Ralegh.

Cu'mbersome. adj. [from cumber.]

1. Troublesome; vexatious.

Thinking it too early, as long as they had any day, to break off so pleasing a company, with going to perform a cumbersome obedience. Sidney.

2. Burdensome; embarrassing.

I was drawn in to write the first part by accident, and to write the second by some defects in the first: these are the cumbersome perquisites of authors. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

3. Unwieldy; unmanageable.

Very long tubes are cumbersome, and scarce to be readily managed. Newton, Opt.

Cu'mbersomely.† adj. [from cumbersome.] In a troublesome manner; in a manner that produces hindrance and vexation. Sherwood.

Cu'mbersomeness.† n. s. [from cumbersome.] Encumbrance; hindrance; obstruction. Sherwood.

Cu'mbrance.† n. s. [from cumber.] Burden; hindrance; impediment.

How can I myself alone bear your cumbrance, and your burden, and your strife? Deut. i. 12.

Extol not riches then, the toil of fools,
The wise man's cumbrance, if not snare; more apt
To slacken virtue, and abate her edge,
Than prompt her to do aught may merit praise.
Milton, P. R. ii. 454.

CU'MBROUS. adj. [from cumber.]

1. Troublesome; vexatious; disturbing.
A cloud of cumbrous gnats do him molest;
All striving to infix their feeble stings,
That from their noyance he no where can rest.
Spenser, F. Q. i. i. 23.

2. Oppressive; burdensome.
Henceforth I fly not death, nor would prolong
Life much! Bent rather, how I may be quit,
Fairest and easiest, of this cumbrous charge.
Milton, P. L.
They rear'd him from the ground,
And from his cumbrous arms his limbs unbound;
Then lanc'd a vein. Dryden.
Possession's load was grown so great,
He sunk beneath the cumb'rous weight. Swift.

3. Jumbled; obstructing each other.
Swift to their several quarters hasted then
The cumbrous elements, earth, flood, air, fire.
Milton, P. L.

CU'NNING.† adj. [from the Goth. kunnan. See To CUN; connan, Sax. konnen, Dut. to know.]

1. Skilful; knowing; well instructed; learned.
Schoolmasters will I keep within my house,
Fit to instruct her youth. — To cunning men
I will be very kind, and liberal
To mine own children, in good bringing up.
Shakspeare.
I do present you with a man of mine,
Cunning in musick and the mathematicks,
To instruct her fully in those sciences. Shaks.
Wherein is he good, but to taste sack and drink it? Wherein cunning, but in craft? Wherein crafty, but in villainy? Shakspeare, Hen. IV.
Send me now therefore a man cunning to work in gold, and in silver, and that can skill to cut and to grave. 2 Chron.
When Pedro does the lute command,
She guides the cunning artist's hand. Prior.

2. Performed with skill; artful.
And over them Arachne high did lift
Her cunning web, and spread her subtile net,
Enwrapped in foul smoak, and clouds more black than jet. Spenser.
And there beside of marble stone was built
An altar, carv'd with cunning imagery;
On which true Christians blood was often spilt,
And holy martyrs often done to die. Spenser.
Once put out thy light,
Thou cunning'st pattern of excelling nature,
I know not where is that Promethean heat
That can thy light relumine. Shaksp. Othello.

3. Artfully deceitful; sly; designing; trickish; full of fetches and stratagems; subtle; crafty; subdolous.
These small wares and petty points of cunning are infinite, and it were a good deed to make a list of them; for nothing doth more hurt than that cunning men pass for wise. Bacon.
Men will leave truth and misery to such as love it; they are resolved to be cunning: let others run the hazard of being sincere. South.

4. Acted with subtilty.
The more he protested, the more his father thought he dissembled, accounting his integrity to be but a cunning face of falsehood. Sidney.

CU'NNING.† n. s. cunninge, Saxon. This word is not often found in the plural number; but it is so used by Shakspeare, in the sense of skill, to which definition Dr. Johnson gives no example.]

1. Artifice; deceit; slyness; sleight; craft; subtilty; dissimulation; fraudulent dexterity.
What if I be not so much the poet, as even that miserable subject of his cunning, whereof you speak. Sidney.
We take cunning for a sinister or crooked wisdom; and certainly there is great difference between a cunning man and a wise man, not only in point of honesty, but in point of ability. Bacon.
Discourage cunning in a child; cunning is the ape of wisdom. Locke.

2. Art; skill; knowledge.
If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning. Psalm cxxxvii. 5.
We'll make a solemn wager on your cunnings.
Shakspeare, Hamlet.
Notes, with many a winding bout
Of linked sweetness long drawn out,
With wanton heed and giddy cunning.
Milton, L'Allegro.

CU'NNINGLY.† adv. [from cunning.]

1. Artfully; slily; subtilly; by fraudulent contrivance; craftily.
Amongst other crimes of this nature, there was diligent enquiry made of such as had raised and dispersed a bruit and rumour, a little before the field fought, that the rebels had the day, and that the king's army was overthrown, and the king fled; whereby it was supposed, that many succours were cunningly put off and kept back. Bacon, Hen. VII.
I must meet my danger, and destroy him first;
But cunningly and closely. Denham, Sophy.
When stock is high, they come between,
Making by second-hand their offers;
Then cunningly retire unseen,
With each a million in his coffers. Swift.

2. Skilfully.
A stately palace built of squared bricke,
Which cunningly was without mortar laid,
Whose walls were high, but nothing strong nor thick,
And golden foile all over them displaid,
That purest skye with brighnesse they dismaid.
Spenser, F. Q. i. iv. 4.
And many bardes, that to the trembling chord
Can tune their timely voices cunningly.
Spenser, F. Q. i. v. 3.
They shoot wondrous cunningly.

One Flaccianus — being about to purchase a piece of ground, went to this diviner or cunningman, to see, what he could tell him about it.
M. Casaubon, of Credulity, &c. p. 148.
He sent him for a strong detachment
Of beadle, constable, and watchmen,
T' attack the cunningman, for plunder
Committed falsely on his lumber. Hudibras.

CU'NNINGNESS.† n. s. [from cunning.] Deceitfulness; slyness.
But mine is such a drench of balderdash,
Such a strange carded cunningness.
Beaum. and Fl. Tamer Tamed.
The doctor by this oversight, or cunningness rather, got a supply of money. Howell, Lett. iv. 2.

CUP.† n. s. [cupp, Sax. cup, Welsh; kop, Dutch; kupp, Iceland. kub and kubba, Pers, κύβα, Gr. Hesychius.]

1. A small vessel to drink in.
Thou shalt deliver Pharaoh's cup into his hand, after the former manner when thou wast his butler. Genesis, xl. 13.
Ye heav'nly pow'rs, that guard
The British isles, such dire events remove
Far from fair Albion; nor let civil broils
Ferment from social cups. Phillips.

2. The liquor contained in the cup; the draught.

Which when the vile enchanteress perceiv'd,
With cup thus charm'd, imparting she deceiv'd.
Spenser.

All friends shall taste
The wages of their virtue, and all foes
The cups of their deservings. Shaks. K. Lear.

Will't please your lordship, drink a cup of sack.
Shakspeare.

They that never had the use
Of the grape's surprising juice,
To the first delicious cup
All their reason render up. Waller.

The best, the dearest fav'rite of the sky,
Must taste that cup; for man is born to die.
Pope, Odyss.

3. Social entertainment; merry bout, [in the plural.]

Then shall our names,
Familiar in their mouth as household words,
Be in their flowing cups freshly remember'd.
Shakspeare, Hen. V.

Let us suppose that I were reasoning, as one friend with another, by the fireside, or in our cups, without care, without any great affection to either party. Knolles.

It was near a miracle to see an old man silent, since talking is the disease of age; but amongst cups, makes fully a wonder.
B. Jonson, Discoveries.

Thence from cups to civil broils. Milton, P. L.

Amidst his cups with fainting shiv'ring seiz'd,
His limbs disjointed, and all o'er diseas'd,
His hand refuses to sustain the bowl.
Dryden, Persius.

4. Any thing hollow like a cup; as, the husk of an acorn, the bell of a flower.

A pyrites of the same colour and shape, placed in the cavity of another of an hemispherick figure, in much the same manner as an acorn in its cup.
Woodward on Fossils.

5. CUP and Can. Familiar companions. The can is the large vessel, out of which the cup is filled, and to which it is a constant associate.

You boasting tell us where you din'd,
And how his lordship was so kind;
Swear he's a most facetious man;
That you and he are cup and can:
You travel with a heavy load,
And quite mistake preferment's road. Swift.

6. [Couper, French, to scarify.] A glass to draw the blood in scarification.

Hippocrates tells you, that in applying of cups, the scarification ought to be made with crooked instruments. Arbuthnot.

To CUP. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To supply with cups. This sense is obsolete.

Plumpy Bacchus, with pink eyne,
In thy vats our cares be drown'd:
With thy grapes our hairs be crown'd!
Cup us, 'till the world go round.
Shakspeare, Ant. and Cleop.

2. [Couper, to cut, Fr.] To fix a glass-bell or cucurbite upon the skin, to draw the blood in scarification.

The clotted blood lies heavy on his heart,
Corrupts, and there remains in spite of art:
Nor breathing veins, nor cupping will prevail;
All outward remedies and inward fail.
Dryden, Fab.

You have quartered all the foul language upon me, that could be raked out of the air of Billingsgate, without knowing who I am; or whether I deserve to be cupped and scarified at this rate. Spectator.

Blistering, cupping, and bleeding are seldom of use but to the idle and intemperate. Addison, Spect.

Him the damn'd doctors and his friends immur'd;
They bled, they cupp'd, they purg'd; in short they cur'd. Pope.

CU'PBEARER. n. s.

1. An officer of the king's household.

There is conveyed to Mr. Villiers an intimation of the king's pleasure to wait and to be sworn his servant, and shortly after his cupbearer at large; and the Summer following he was admitted in ordinary. Wotton.

2. An attendant to give wine at a feast.

This vine was said to be given to Tros, the father of Priam, by Jupiter, as a recompence for his carrying away his son Ganymede to be his cupbearer. Broome.

CU'PBOARD. n. s. [cup and bopd, a case or receptacle, Saxon.] A case with shelves, in which victuals or earthen ware is placed.

Some trees are best for planchers, as deal; some for tables, cupboards, and desks, as walnut.
Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Codrus had but one bed; so short to boot,
That his short wife's short legs hung dangling out:
His cupboard's head six earthen pitchers grac'd,
Beneath them was his trusty tankard plac'd.
Dryden, Juv.

Yet their wine and their victuals these curmudgeon-lubbards,
Lock up from my sight, in cellars and cupboards.
Swift.

To CU'PBOARD. v. a. [from the noun.] To treasure in a cupboard; to hoard up.

The belly did remain
I' th' midst o' th' body, idle and unactive,
Still cupboarding the viand, never bearing
Like labour with the rest. Shaksp. Coriol.

CUPELLA'TION.* n. s. [from coppel, which is also written cupel. See COPPEL.] The process of assaying and purifying gold and silver.

From its [silver's] alloy with copper, iron, and antimony, it may be easily refined by cupellation with the necessary quantity of lead.
Babington, System of Mineralogy, 1799.

CUPI'DITY.† n. s. [cupiditas, Latin, Dr. Johnson says. It may be from the French cupidité; which, however, Menage thinks to be of no great age in that language. Cotgrave has it. Our own word is old, and in the vocabularies of Bullokar and Cockeram; though Dr. Johnson has cited neither the authority of any dictionary, nor an example.] Concupiscence; unlawful or unreasonable longing.

Our wicked flesh; the fragile, and soft worldly things; all sorts of cupidities do hinder us to know the word of God.
Wodroephe's Fr. Grammar, (1623,) p. 216.

The serpent covertly windeth into your heart; first by blandishments he entangleth your reason, and then by fallacies he diverteth your fear, affirming you shall not surely die; and thus sharpens the curiosity, while he suggesteth the cupidity; and by these degrees presenteth the fruit, and putteth you out of the garden.
W. Montagu, Dev. Ess. (1648,) p. 170.

CU'POLA.† n. s. [Italian, Dr. Johnson says. I may add the French coupole, because our own word was formerly written coupolo. But the word is by some referred to the Gr. κύπελλον, a sort of cup; by others, to κύμβαλον, sometimes written κύβαλον, a cymbal; both resembling, in their hollowness, a dome or cupola. Yet it is originally, perhaps, from the Arabick cubba or kubba, round; "Fifteen mosques express their bravery here, which in shape are round, after the alkaba, in Mecca." Sir T. Herbert's Trav. p. 129.] A dome; the hemispherical summit of a building.

The carravans raw was very neatly built, adorned with coupolos at top.
Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 118.

Nature seems to have designed the head as the cupola to the most glorious of her works; and when we load it with supernumerary ornaments, we destroy the symmetry of the human figure.
Addison, Spect.

CU'POLAID.* adj. [from cupola.] Having a cupola.

Opposite to this palace is a fair temple — cupolo'd, compassed with walls, and open to the air.
Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 163.

Now hast thou chang'd thee, Saint; and made
Thyself a fane that's cupola'd.
Lovelace, Luc. P. p. 16.

CU'PPEL. n. s. See COPPEL.

There be other bodies fixed, as we see in the stuff whereof cuppels are made, which they put into furnaces, upon which fire worketh not.
Bacon, Nat. Hist.

CU'PPER. n. s. [from cup.] One who applies cupping-glasses; a scarifier.

CUPPING-GLASS.† n. s. [from cup and glass. Fr. couper. See the 2d sense of To CUP.] A glass used by scarifiers to draw out the blood by rarefying the air.

I should rather substitute couping glasses, applied on the legs.
Ferrand, Love Melancholy, p. 840.

The greatest mercy of the physician is to leave him with these cupping-glasses at the neck.
Hammond's Works, iv. 487.

A bubo, in this case, ought to be drawn outward by cupping-glasses, and brought to suppuration. Wiseman.

CU'PREOUS. adj. [cupreus, Latin.] Coppery; consisting of copper.

Having, by the intervention of a little sal armoniack, made copper inflammable, I took some small grains, and put them under the wick of a burning candle, whereby they were with the melted tallow so kindled, that the green, not blue, flame of the cupreous body did burn. Boyle.

CU'PROSE.* n. s. The poppy, so called in the north of England.

CUR.† n. s. [korre, Dutch, from the Goth. korhund. See CURTAIL.]

1. A worthless degenerate dog.

'Tis a good dog.
— A cur, sir. ——
— Sir, he's a good dog, and a fair dog. Shaksp.

Here's an old grudging cur turned off to shift for himself, for want of the very teeth and heels that he had lost in his master's service.
L'Estrange.

A cur may bear
The name of tiger, lion, or what'e'er
Denotes the noblest or the fairest beast.
Dryden, Juv.

2. A term of reproach for a man.

What would ye have, ye curs,
That like not peace nor war? Shaksp. Coriol.

This knight had occasion to enquire the way to St. Anne's lane; the person, whom he spoke to, called him a young popish cur, and asked him, who made Anne a saint. Addison.

CU'RABLE. adj. [from cure.] That admits a remedy; that may be healed.

A consumption of the lungs, at the beginning, herein differs from all other curable diseases, that it is not to be worn away by change of diet, or a chearful spirit. Harvey.

A desperate wound must skilful hands employ,
But thine is curable by Philip's boy. Dryden, Juv.

CU'RABLENESS. n. s. [from curable.] Possibility to be healed.

CU'RACY.† n. s. [from curate.]

1. Employment of a curate, distinct from a benefice; employment which a hired clergyman holds under the beneficiary.

They get into orders as soon as they can, and, if they be very fortunate, arrive in time to a curacy here in town. Swift.

2. A benefice, distinguished by the name of a perpetual curacy; holden, not as a rectory or vicarage by institution and induction, but by licence from the bishop; who, having received the presentation to the curacy from the patron, (who is usually impropriator of the rectory to which the curacy is appendant, and which had formerly perhaps belonged to some religious house,) admits the curate into all the rights and privileges of the curacy. When these curacies have received an augmentation from the governours of the bounty of queen Anne, they are subject, in regard to voidance or cession, to the same rules as other benefices.

CU'RATE.† n. s. [curator, Latin.]

1. A clergyman hired to perform the duties of another.

He spar'd no pains; for curate he had none;
Nor durst he trust another with his care.
Dryden, Fab.

2. A parish priest.

Bishops and curates, and all congregations.
Comm. Prayer.

I thought the English of curate had been an ecclesiastical hireling. —— No such matter; the proper import of the word signifies one who has the cure of souls. Collier on Pride.

3. One who holds a perpetual curacy.

CU'RATESHIP.† n. s. [from curate.] The same with curacy.

Except he be shortly after to be admitted to some benefice or curateship then void.
Constitut. and Canons Eccl. 33.

CU'RATIVE. adj. [from cure.] Relating to the cure of diseases; not preservative.

The therapeutick or curative physick, we term that which restores the patient unto sanity.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

There may be taken proper useful indications, both preservative and curative, from the qualities of the air. Arbuthnot.

CURATOR.† n. s. [Latin.]

1. One that has the care and superintendence of any thing.

The curators of Bedlam assure us, that some lunaticks are persons of honour. Swift.

2. A guardian appointed by law.

She was full five and twenty years old, at which age the civil law freeth from a curator.
Bacon, Collect of Q. Eliz.

A minor cannot appear as a defendant in court, but by his guardian and curator. Ayliffe, Parergon.

CURB. n. s. [courber, to bend, French.]

1. A curb is an iron chain, made fast to the upper part of the branches of the bridle, in a hole called the eye, and running over the beard of the horse.
Farrier's Dict.

The ox hath his bow, the horse his curb, and the faulcon his bells; so man hath his desires.
Shakspeare, As you like it.

So four fierce coursers, starting to the race,
Scow'r through the plain, and lengthen ev'ry pace;
Nor reins, nor curbs, nor threat'ning cries they fear. Dryden.

2. Restraint; inhibition; opposition, hindrance.

The Roman state, whose course will on
The way it takes, cracking ten thousand curbs
Of more strong links asunder, than can ever
Appear in your impediment. Shaksp. Coriol.

We remain
In strictest bondage, though thus far remov'd,
Under th' inevitable curb, reserv'd
His captive multitude. Milton, P. L.

By these men, religion, that should be
The curb, is made the spur to tyranny.
Denham, Sophy.

Even they who think us under no other tie to the true interest of our country, will allow this to be an effectual curb upon us. Atterbury.

3. A curb is a hard and callous tumour, which runs along the inside of a horse's hoof; that is, on that part of the hoof that is opposite to the leg of the lame side. Farrier's Dict.

To CURB. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To guide or restrain a horse with a curb.

Part wield their arms, part curb the foaming steed. Milton, P. L.

2. To restrain; to inhibit; to check; to confine; to hold back.

Were not the laws planted amongst them at the first, and had they not governours to curb and keep them still in awe and obedience?
Spenser on Ireland.

Then thou, the mother of so sweet a child,
Her false imagin'd loss cease to lament,
And wisely learn to curb thy sorrows wild.
Milton.

If sense and learning are such unsociable imperious things, he ought to keep down the growth of his reason, and curb his intellectuals.
Collier on Pride.

Knowing when a muse should be indulged
In her full flight, and when she should be curbed.
Roscommon.

At this she curb'd a groan, that else had come;
And pausing, view'd the present in the tomb.
Dryden, Fab.

'Till force returns, his ardour we restrain
And curb his warlike wish to cross the main.
Dryden.

Some poor cottage on the mountain's brow
Where pinching want must curb thy warm desires,
And household cares suppress thy genial fires.
Prior.

Nature to all things fix'd the limits fit,
And wisely curb'd proud man's pretending wit.
Pope.

3. Sometimes with from.

Yet you are curb'd from that enlargement by
The consequence of the crown. Shaksp. Cymb.

4. In the following passage it signifies, I think, as in Fr. to bend.

Though the course of the sun be curbed between the tropics, yet are not those parts directly subject to his perpendicular beams unhabitable or extremely hot. Ray.

CU'RBING.* n. s. [from curb.] Check.

The mind that is warping to vice, should not think much to be kept upright by the curbings and the strokes of adversity. Feltham, Res. ii. 57.

CURD. n. s. [See CRUDLE.] The coagulation of milk; the concretion of the thicker parts of any liquor.

Milk of itself is such a compound of cream, curds, and whey, as it is easily turned and dissolved. Bacon.

This night, at least, with me forget your care;
Chesnuts and curds, and cream shall be your fare.
Dryden.

Let Sporus tremble — What! that thing of silk!
Sporus, that mere white curd of ass's milk? Pope.

To CURD.† v. a. [from the noun.] To turn to curds; to cause to coagulate.

Maiden, does it curd thy blood,
To say I am thy mother? Shaksp. All's well.

It doth posset
And curd, like eager droppings into milk,
The thin and wholesome blood. Shaksp. Ham.

The young men were friends,
As is the life and blood coagulate,
And curded in your body.
Beaum. and Fl. Maid in the Mill.

This curded milk, this poor unlittered whelp,
My body. Donne, Poems, p. 228.

To CU'RDLE. v. n. [from curd.] To coagulate; to shoot together; to concrete.

Powder of mint, and powder of red roses, keep the milk somewhat from turning or curdling in the stomach. Bacon.

Some to the house,
The fold and dairy, hungry bend their flight,
Sip round the pail, or taste the curdling cheese.
Thomson, Summer.

To CU'RDLE. v. a. To cause to coagulate; to force into concretions.

His changed powers at first themselves not felt,
'Till curdled cold his courage gan t' assail. Spenser.

Mixed with the sixth part of a spoonful of milk, it burnt to the space of one hundred pulses, and the milk was curdled. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

My soul is all the same,
Unmov'd with fear, and mov'd with martial fame;
But my chill blood is curdled in my veins,
And scarce the shadow of a man remains.
Dryden, Virg.

Even now a fatal draft works out my soul;
Ev'n now it curdles in my shrinking veins
The lazy blood, and freezes at my heart. Smith.

There is in the spirit of wine some acidity, by which brandy curdles milk. Floyer.

CU'RDY. adj. [from curd.] Coagulated; concreted; full of curds; curdled.

It differs from a vegetable emulsion, by coagulating into a curdy mass with acids.
Arbuthnot on Aliments.

CURE.† n. s. [cura, Latin. Our word was formerly synonymous with care. "I take no cure," i. e. care, Chaucer. "Take cure of him," St. Luke, x. 35. Mathewe's Version. In this sense, "cure of souls" is still applied to the charge or care committed to every clergyman at the institution to his benefice. The old French cure is also care.]

1. Remedy; restorative.

This league that we have made,
Will give her sadness, very little cure,
Brother of England, how may we content
This widow lady? Shakspeare, K. John.

Cold, hunger, prisons, ills without a cure,
All these he must, and guiltless oft, endure.
Dryden, Fab.

Now we're ador'd, and the next hour displease;
At first your cure, and after your disease.
Granville.

Horace advises the Romans to seek a seat in some remote part, by way of a cure for the corruption of manners. Swift.

2. Act of healing.

I do cures to-day, and to-morrow.
St. Luke, xiii. 32.

3. The benefice or employment of a curate or clergyman.

Certain honourable persons, as well spiritual as temporal, shall have chaplains beneficed with cure to serve them in their honourable houses.
Acts of Parl. 25 Hen. 8. ch. 16.

If his cure lies among the lawyers, let nothing be said against entangling property, spinning out causes, squeezing clients, and making the laws a greater grievance than those who break them. Collier.

To CURE.† v. a. [curo, Lat.]

1. To heal; to restore to health; to remedy; to recover: with of before the disease. Used of patients or diseases.

The bones, in sharp colds, wax brittle; and therefore all contusions of bones, in hard weather, are more difficult to cure. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Here the poor lover, that has long endur'd
Some proud nymph's scorn, of his fond passion's cur'd. Waller.

I never knew any man cured of inattention. Swift.

Hear what from love unpractis'd hearts endure;
From love, the sole disease thou canst not cure. Pope.

2. To prepare in any manner, so as to be preserved from corruption. [Fr. curer, to pickle. Cotgrave.]

The beef would be so ill chosen, or so ill cured, as to stink many times before it came so far as Holland. Temple.

CU'RELESS. adj. [cure and less.] Without cure; without remedy.

Bootless are plaints, and cureless are my wounds;
No way to fly, nor strength to hold out flight. Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

Repair thy wit, good youth, or it will fall
To cureless ruin. Shakspeare, Merch. of Venice.

If, said he,
Your grief alone is hard captivity,
For love of heav'n, with patience undergo
A cureless ill, since fate will have it so. Dryden, Fab.

CU'RER. n. s. [from cure.] A healer; a physician.

He is a curer of souls, and you a curer of bodies: if you should fight, you go against the hair of your professions. Shakspeare.

The indexterity and worse success of the most famous of our consumption curers, do evidently demonstrate their dimness in beholding its causes. Harvey on Consumptions.

CU'RFEW.† n. s. [couvre feu, French. Of earlier practice than William the Conquerour's time. It was an ancient custom among all the convents of the north, to put out their fire when a bell rung; and is mentioned in the Leges Burgorum sub Dav. rege Scotiæ, c. 86. See Lord Lyttelton's Hist. of Hen. II. i. 490. And Dr. Warton's Essay on Pope, i. 22. See also Lacombe in V. COUVREFEU. The old French word is carre-feu, or cerre-feu, which comes nearer to our own.] An evening peal, by which the Conquerour willed, that every man should rake up his fire, and put out his light; so that in many places at this day, where a bell is customarily rung towards bed time, it is said to ring curfew. Cowel.

You whose pastime
Is to make midnight mushrooms, that rejoice
To hear the solemn curfew. Shaksp. Tempest.

Oft on a plat of rising ground,
I hear the far off curfew sound,
Over some wide-water'd shore,
Swinging slow with sullen roar. Milton, Il. Pens.

2. A cover for a fire; a fire-plate.

But now for pans, pots, curfews, counters and the like, the beauty will not be so much respected, so as the compound stuff is like to pass. Bacon.

CURIA'LITY. n. s. [from curialis, Latin.] The privileges, prerogatives, or perhaps retinue of a court.

The court and curiality. Bacon to Villiers.

CURIO'SITY.† n. s. [Fr. curiosité. Cotgrave.]

1. Inquisitiveness; inclination to enquiry.

First granting, as I do, it was a weakness
In me, but incident to all our sex,
Curiosity, inquisitive, importune
Of secrets. Milton, S. A. 775.

2. Nicety; delicacy.

When thou wast in thy gilt, and thy perfume, they mockt thee for too much curiosity; in thy rags thou knowest none, but are despised for the contrary. Shakspeare, Timon.

3. Accuracy; exactness.

Qualities are so weighed, that curiosity in neither can make choice of either's moiety. Shakspeare, King Lear.

Our senses, however armed or assisted, are too gross to discern the curiosity of the workmanship of nature. Ray.

4. An act of curiosity; nice experiment.

There hath been practised also a curiosity, to set a tree upon the north-side of a wall, and, at a little height, to draw it through the wall, and spread it upon the south-side; conceiving that the root and lower part of the stock should enjoy the freshness of the shade, and the upper boughs and fruit, the comfort of the sun; but it sorted not. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

5. An object of curiosity; rarity.

We took a ramble together to see the curiosities of this great town. Addison, Freeholder.

CURIO'SO. n. s.* [Ital.] A curious person, such as we now call a virtuoso.

Dr. J. Wilkins, warden of Wadham college, the greatest curioso of his time, invited him and some of the musicians to his lodgings, purposely to have a consort. Life of A. Wood, p. 112.

CU'RIOUS.† adj. [old Fr. curios, curious, Roq. modern, curieux; Lat. curiosus.]

1. Inquisitive; desirous of information; addicted to enquiry.

Be not curious in unnecessary matters; for more things are shewn unto thee than men understand. Ecclus. iii. 23.

Even then to them the spirit of lies suggests,
That they were blind, because they saw not ill;
And breath'd into their uncorrupted breasts
A curious wish, which did corrupt their will. Davies.

If any one too curious should enquire
After a victory which we disdain,
Then let him know the Belgians did retire
Before the patron saint of injur'd Spain. Dryden.

Reader if any curious stay
To ask my hated name,
Tell them, the grave that hides my clay
Conceals me from my shame. Wesley.

2. Attentive to; diligent about; sometimes with after.

It is pity a gentleman so very curious after things that were elegant and beautiful, should not have been as curious as to their origin, their uses, and their natural history. Woodward.

3. Sometimes with of.

Then thus a senior of the place replies,
Well read, and curious of antiquities. Dryd. Fab.

4. Accurate; careful not to mistake.

Till Arianism had made it a matter of great sharpness and subtlety of wit to be a sound believing Christian, men were not curious what syllables or particles of speech they used. Hooker.

We all should be curious and watchful against vanities. Bp. Taylor, Life of Christ, i. § 2.

5. Difficult to please; solicitous of perfection; not negligent; full of care.

A temperate person is not curious of fancies and deliciousness; he thinks not much, and speaks not often of meat and drink. Taylor.

6. Exact; nice; subtle.

Both these senses embraced their objects at greater distance, with more variety, and with a more curious discrimination, than the other sense. Holder.

7. Artful; not neglectful; nicely diligent.

A vaile obscur'd the sunshine of her eyes,
The rose within herself her sweetness closed;
Each ornament about her seemly lies,
By curious chance, or careless art, composed. Fairfax.

8. Elegant; neat; laboured; finished.

Understanding to devise curious works, to work in gold. Exodus.

9. Rigid; severe; rigorous.

For curious I cannot be with you
Signior Baptista, of whom I hear so well. Shaksp.

CU'RIOUSLY.† adv. [from curious.]

1. Inquisitively; attentively; studiously.

He looked very curiously upon himself, sometimes fetching a little skip, as if he said his strength had not yet forsaken him. Sidney.

At first I thought there had been no light reflected from the water in that place; but observing it more curiously, I saw within it several smaller round spots, which appeared much blacker and darker than the rest. Newton, Opticks.

2. Elegantly; neatly.

Nor is it the having of wheels and springs, though never so curiously wrought, and artificially set, but the winding of them up, that must give motion to the watch. South.

3. Artfully; exactly.

My substance was not hid from thee, when I was made in secret, and curiously wrought in the lowest parts of the earth. Psalm cxxxix. 15.

4. Captiously.

CU'RIOUSNESS.* n. s. [from curious.]

1. Curiosity; inquisitiveness. Sherwood.

Ah! curiousness first cause of all our ill,
And yet the plague which most torments us still. Sir W. Alexander's Hours, H. i. st. 62.

Thus curiousness to knowledge is the guide. Sir W. Alexander's Hours, H. i. st. 65.

2. Exactness.

He pursues the rational purposes of his own art; that, to the excellence of the metal, he may also add the curiousness of the figure. South, Serm. viii. 321.

3. Nicety.

There is that coolness and curiousness in a verse, which speaks it greatly unsuitable to the vehemence and seriousness of the prophetick spirit. Spenser, Vanity of Vulg. Prophecies, p. 53.

CURL. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. A ringlet of hair.

She apparelled herself like a page, cutting off her hair, leaving nothing but the short curls to cover that noble head. Sidney.

Just as in act he stood, in clouds enshrin'd
Her hand she fasten'd on his hair behind;
Then backward by his yellow curls she drew
To him, and him alone confess'd in view. Dryden, Fab.

2. Undulation; wave; sinuosity; flexure.

Thus it happens, if the glass of the prisms be free from veins, and their sides be accurately plain and well polished, without those numberless waves or curls, which usually arise from the sand holes. Newton, Opticks.

To CURL.† v. a. [krollen, Dutch, cyppan, Sax. krille, Dan.]

1. To turn the hair in ringlets.

What hast thou been? —
— A serving man, proud in heart and mind, that curled my hair, wore gloves in my cap, served the lust of my mistress's heart, and did the act of darkness with her. Shaksp. King Lear.

2. To writhe; to twist.

I sooner will find out the beds of snakes,
And with my youthful blood warm their cold flesh,

Letting them curl themselves about my limbs,
Than sleep one night with thee.
Beaum. and Fl. Maid's Tragedy.

3. To dress with curls.
If she first meet the curled Antony,
He'll make demand of her a kiss. Shakspeare.
They, up the trees
Climbing, sat thicker than the snaky locks
That curl'd Megæra. Milton, P. L.

4. To raise in waves, undulations, or sinuosities.
The visitation of the winds,
Who take the ruffian billows by the top,
Curling their monstrous heads. Shaksp. Hen. IV.
Seas would be pools, without the brushing air
To curl the waves. Dryden, Fab.

To CURL.† v. n.

1. To shrink into ringlets.
Those slender aerial bodies are separated and stretched out, which otherwise, by reason of their flexibleness and weight, would flag or curl. Boyle.

2. To rise in undulations.
To every nobler portion of the town,
The curling billows roll their restless tide;
In parties now they straggle up and down,
As armies, unoppos'd, for prey divide. Dryden.
While curling smoaks from village tops are seen.
Pope.

3. To twist itself.
Then round her slender waist he curl'd,
And stamp'd an image of himself, a sov'reign of the world. Dryden, Fab.

4. To shrink back.
The very thinking it
Would make a citizen start! some politick tradesman
Curl with the caution of a constable.
B. Jonson, Mortimer's Fall.

CURL-HEADED.* adj. Having the hair of the head curled. Huloet.

CU'RLED-PATE.* adj. Having the hair curled. See CURL-HEADED.
Make curl'd-pate ruffians bald.
Shakspeare, Timon of Athens.

CU'RLEW. n. s. [courlieu, Fr. arquata, Latin.]

1. A kind of water-fowl, with a large beak of a grey colour, with red and black spots.
Among birds we reckon creysers, curlews, and puffins. Carew.

2. A bird larger than a partridge, with longer legs. It runs very swiftly, and frequents the cornfields in Spain, in Sicily, and sometimes in France.
Trevoux.

CU'RLINESS.* n. s. [from curl.] The state of any thing curled. A modern word.

CU'RLING-IRONS.* n. s. [from curl and iron.] An invention to curl the hair with.
Finding that her literature was thrown away upon me, she bid me, with great vehemence, reach the curling-irons. Johnson, Idler, No. 46.

CU'RLINGLY.* adv. [from curling.] In a waving fashion or manner. Sherwood.

CU'RLY.* adj. Inclining to curl; falling into ringlets.

CURMU'DGEON.† n. s. [It is a vitious manner of pronouncing cœur mechant, Fr., Dr. Johnson says, which he received from an unknown correspondent. To this Mr. Nares subscribes. Dr. Ash has transferred this into his vocabulary, as if "an unknown correspondent" was the etymology; distinguishing cœur by the interpretation of unknown, and mechant by that of correspondent; which will always excite both in foreigners and natives a harmless smile! But, to be serious, I doubt the etymology given by Dr. Johnson's correspondent. The French cœur mechant means a bad heart, a malicious perverted mind; our curmudgeon signifies merely a miser, a griper, with some tincture of crossness. Nor is it in the usual manner of derivation from the French language to form a single word from a compound expression. Perhaps it is a derivation from the German curmede, a kind of vassalage in Germany, when the lord claimed, at the death of certain persons, such of their goods as he chose. Hence a German expression, curmedige güter, bona conductitia. See Ludewig, Jura Feudorum Rom. Imp. et Germ. Princip. 1740, p. 509. And Du Cange in V. CURMEDIA. From claims of this kind might easily arise an application to him who made them, similar to that of miser or griper; and the custom might also suggest our word. It is of no great age in our lexicography, being first, I believe, in that edition of Phillips's dictionary, which appeared in 1706. Anthony Wood, in the Life of himself, under the year 1661, writes it curr-mudgin. "Though he used it not half, yet at the yeare's end he did, like a curr-mudgin, sell it, and put the money in his purse." Some may perhaps think the word allied to a snarling cur, connecting it with the Saxon murcnunz, a complaint, a murmuring. But the German custom seems the more rational etymology.] An avaricious churlish fellow; a miser; a niggard; a churl; a griper.
And when he has it in his claws,
He'll not be hide-bound to the cause;
Nor shalt thou find him a curmudgeon,
If thou dispatch it without grudging. Hudibras.
A man's way of living is commended, because he will give any rate for it; and a man will give any rate rather than pass for a poor wretch, or a penurious curmudgeon. Locke.

CURMU'DGEONLY. adj. [from curmudgeon.] Avaricious; covetous; churlish; niggardly.
In a country where he that killed a hog invited the neighbourhood, a curmudgeonly fellow advised with his companions how he might save the charge. L'Estrange.

CU'RRANT.† n. s. [ribes, Lat. Currant is an equivocal word with us, taken either for the fruit of a shrub called in Latin ribes; or a small sort of grape, growing in Zante. The name currant is taken from Corinthus, whence it's likely this fruit was first brought to us. Ray, Diction. Trilingue, p. 12. n.]

1. The tree hath no prickles; the leaves are large: the flower consists of five leaves, placed in form of a rose: the ovary, which arises from the centre of the flower-cup, becomes a globular fruit, produced in bunches.
The barberry and currant must escape,
Though her small clusters imitate the grape.
Tate's Cowley.

2. A small dried grape; properly written corinth.
They butter'd currants on fat veal bestow'd,
And rumps of beef with virgin honey stew'd;
Insipid taste, old friend, to them who Paris know,
Where rocombole, shallot, and the rank garlick grow. King.

CU'RRENCY. n. s. [from current.]

1. Circulation; power of passing from hand to hand.
The currency of those half-pence would, in the universal opinion of our people, be utterly destructive to this kingdom. Swift.

2. General reception: as, the report had a long currency.

3. Fluency; readiness of utterance; easiness of pronunciation.

4. Continuance; constant flow; uninterrupted course.
The currency of time to establish a custom, ought to be with a continuando from the beginning to the end of the term prescribed.
Ayliffe, Parergon.

5. General esteem; the rate at which any thing is vulgarly valued.
He that thinketh Spain to be some great overmatch for this estate, assisted as it is, and, may be, is no good mintman, but takes greatness of kingdoms according to their bulk and currency, and not after intrinsick value. Bacon.

6. The papers stamped in the English colonies by authority, and passing for money.

CU'RRENT. adj. [currens, Lat.]

1. Circulatory; passing from hand to hand.
Shekels of silver, current money with the merchant. Genesis, xxiii. 16.
That there was current money in Abraham's time is past doubt, though it is not sure that it was stampt; for he is said to be rich in cattle, in silver, and in gold. Arbuthnot.

2. Generally received; uncontradicted; authoritative.
Many strange bruits are received for current.
Sidney.
Because such as openly reprove supposed disorders of state, are taken for principal friends to the common benefit of all, under this fair and plausible colour, whatsoever they utter passeth for good and current. Hooker.
I have collected the facts, with all possible impartiality, from the current histories of those times.
Swift.

3. Common; general.
They have been trained up from their infancy in one set of notions, without ever hearing or knowing what other opinions are current among mankind. Watts.
About three months ago we had a current report of the king of France's death. Addison.

4. Popular; such as is established by vulgar estimation.
We are also to consider the difference between worth and merit, strictly taken; that is, a man's intrinsick; this, his current value; which is less or more, as men have occasion for him.
Grew, Cosmol.

5. Fashionable; popular.
Oft leaving what is natural and fit,
The current folly proves our ready wit;
And authors think their reputation safe,
Which lives as long as fools are pleas'd to laugh.
Pope.

6. Passable; such as may be allowed or admitted.
Fouler than heart can think thee, thou canst make
No excuse current, but to hang thyself.
Shakspeare, Rich. III.

7. What is now passing; what is at present in its course: as, the current year.

CU'RRENT. n. s.

1. A running stream.

The current, that with gentle murmur glides,
Thou know'st, being stopp'd, impatiently doth rage:
But his fair course is not hindered;
He makes sweet musick with th' enamel'd stones.
Shakspeare.

These inequalities will vanish in one place, and presently appear in another, and seem perfectly to move like waves, succeeding and destroying one another; save that their motion oftentimes seems to be quickest, as if in that vast sea they were carried on by a current, or at least by a tide, Boyle.

Heav'n her Eridanus no more shall boast,
Whose fame in thine, like lesser currents lost;
Thy nobler streams shall visit Jove's abodes,
To shine among the stars, and bathe the gods.
Denham.

Not fabled Po more swells the poet's lays,
While through the sky his shining current strays.
Pope.

2. [In navigation.] Currents are certain progressive motions of the water of the sea in several places, either quite down to the bottom, or to a certain determinate depth; by which a ship may happen to be carried more swiftly or retarded in her course, according to the direction of the current, with or against the way of the ship. Harris.

3. Course; progression.

The castle of Cadmus was taken, and Thebes invested by Phebidas the Lacedemonian insidiously, which drew on a re-surprize of the castle, a recovery of the town, and a current of the war even into the walls of Sparta. Bacon.

CU'RRENTLY. adj. [from current.]

1. In a constant motion.

2. Without opposition.

The very cause which maketh the simple and ignorant to think they even see how the word of God runneth currently on your side, is, that their minds are forestalled, and their conceits perverted beforehand. Hooker, Preface.

3. Popularly; fashionably; generally.

4. Without ceasing.

CU'RRENTNESS. n. s. [from current.]

1. Circulation.

2. General reception.

3. Easiness of pronunciation.

When substantialness combineth with delightfulness, and currentness with stayedness, how can the language sound other than most full of sweetness? Camden, Remains.

CU'RRICLE.* n. s.

1. A course. [Lat. curriculum.]

Upon a curricle in this world depends a long course of the next, and upon a narrow scene here an endless expansion hereafter.
Brown, Christ. Mor. ii. 23.

2. A chariot. [Lat. curriculus; old Fr. curicule, un petit chariot. Lacombe.] In modern times the word has been adopted for an open chaise with two wheels drawn by two horses abreast.

CU'RRIER.† n. s. [correour, old Fr. coriarius, Lat.] One who dresses and pares leather for those who make shoes, or other things.

A currier bought a bearskin of a huntsman, and laid him down ready money for it. L'Estrange.

Warn'd by frequent ills, the way they found
To lodge their loathsome carrion under ground;
For useless to the currier were their hides,
Nor could their tainted flesh with ocean tides
Be free'd from filth. Dryden, Virg.

CU'RRISH. adj. [from cur.] Having the qualities of a degenerate dog; brutal; sour; quarrelsome; malignant; churlish; uncivil; untractable; impracticable.

Sweet speaking oft a currish heart reclaims.
Sidney.

No care of justice, nor no rule of reason,
Did thenceforth ever enter in his mind,
But cruelty, the sign of currish kind.
Spenser, Hubb. Tale.

In fashions wayward, and in love unkind;
For Cupid deigns not wound a currish mind.
Fairfax.

I would she were in heaven, so she could
Entreat some pow'r to change this currish Jew.
Shakspeare.

She says your dog was a cur; and tells you, currish thanks is good enough for such a present. Shakspeare.

CU'RRISHLY.* adv. [from currish.] In a brutal or malignant manner.

Boner being restored againe, — currishly, without all order of law or honesty, — wrasted from them all the livings they had.
Foxe's Acts and Mon. Acc. of Ridley.

To use or deal currishly with. Sherwood.

CU'RRISHNESS.* n. s. [from currish.] Moroseness; churlishness; malignity.

Diogenes, though he had wit, by his currishness got the name of dog. Feltham, Res. ii. 69.

Hell's porter, Cerberus,
That currishness into our breasts dost put!
May's Lucan, B. 6.

To CU'RRY.† v. a. [Fr. courroyer, from corium, leather, Lat.]

1. To dress leather, by beating and rubbing it.

2. To beat; to drub; to thrash; to chastise.

He hath well curried thy coat. Barret, 1580.

I have seen him
Curry a fellow's carcass handsomely.
Beaum. and Fl. Island Princess.

A deep design in't to divide
The well affected that confide;
By setting brother against brother,
To claw and curry one another. Hudibras.

I may expect her to take care of her family, and curry her hide in case of refusal. Addison, Spect.

3. To rub a horse with a scratching instrument, so as to smooth his coat, and promote his flesh.

Your short horse is soon curried.
Beaum. and Fl. Valentinian.

4. To scratch in kindness; to rub down with flattery; to tickle.

If I had a suit to master Shallow, I would humour his men; if to his men, I would curry with master Shallow. Shakspeare.

5. To CURRY Favour. To become a favourite by petty officiousness, slight kindnesses, or flattery. [This expression requires further illustration, than the preceding words of Dr. Johnson. The rubbing down a horse, is a process that conveys pleasure to the animal. So much for curry in the present instance; but favour is a corruption. The true word is favel, as Mr. Douce has abundantly shewn in his Illustr. of Shakspeare, i. 474. Thus, in the Merch. Tale of Beryn, in Urry's Chaucer, p. 597. "As though he had lerned cury favel of some old frere." Now the name of favel, Mr. Douce observes, was anciently given to yellow-coloured horses, in like manner as bayard, blanchard, and lyard were to brown, white, or gray. One of Richard the First's horses, he adds, was so called. Robert of Brunne's Chron. p. 175. He therefore rightly concludes, that to curry favel, or, as we now say, to curry favour, is a metaphorical expression adopted from the stable.]

He judged them still over-abjectly to fawn upon the heathens, and to curry favour with infidels.
Hooker.

This humour succeeded so with the puppy, that an ass would go the same way to work to curry favour for himself. L'Estrange.

CU'RRY.* n. s. A word imported from the East-Indies, denoting a mixture of various eatables, a very relishable composition. The leaves of the canthium parviflorum, one of the plants of the Coromandel coast, being much used in curries, that plant has also there the name of kura, which means esculent. See Plants of the Coromandel Coast, 1795.

CU'RRYCOMB. n. s. [from curry and comb.] An iron instrument used for currying or cleaning horses.

He has a clearer idea from a little print than from a long definition; and so he would have of strigil and sistrum, if, instead of a currycomb and cymbal, he could see stamped in the margin small pictures of these instruments. Locke.

CU'RRYING.* n. s. [from the verb.] The act of rubbing down a horse.

Frictions make the parts more fleshy and full; as we see both in men, and in the currying of horses: the cause is, for that they draw a greater quantity of spirits and blood to the parts. Bacon.

To CURSE. v. a. [cuppian, Saxon.]

1. To wish evil to; to execrate; to devote,

Curse me this people; for they are too mighty for me. Numbers, xxxiii. 6.

After Solyman had looked upon the dead body, and bitterly cursed the same, he caused a great weight to be tied unto it, and so cast into the sea. Knolles.

What, yet again! the third time hast thou curst me:
This imprecation was for Laius' death,
And thou hast wished me like him.
Dryden and Lee.

2. To mischief; to afflict; to torment.

On impious realms and barb'rous kings impose
Thy plagues, and curse 'em with such sons as those.
Pope.

To CURSE. v. n. To imprecate; to deny or affirm with imprecation of divine vengeance.

The silver about which thou cursedst, and speakest of also in my ears, behold the silver is with me. Jud. xvi. 2.

CURSE.† n. s. [Sax. cuppr.]

1. Malediction; wish of evil to another.

Neither have I suffered my mouth to sin, by wishing a curse to his soul. Job.

I never went from your lordship but with a longing to return, or without a hearty curse to him who invented ceremonies, and put me on the necessity of withdrawing. Dryden.

2. Affliction; torment; vexation.

Curse on the stripling! how he apes his sire!
Ambitiously sententious! Addison, Cato.

CU'RSED. part. adj. [from curse.]

1. Deserving a curse; hateful; detestable; abominable; wicked.

Merciful pow'rs!
Restrain in me the cursed thoughts that nature
Gives way to in repose. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

2. Unholy; unsanctified; blasted by a curse.

Come lady, while heav'n lends us grace,
Let us fly this cursed place,
Lest the sorcerer us entice
With some other new device;
Not a waste or needless sound,
Till we come to holier ground. Milton, Comus.

3. Vexatious; troublesome.

This cursed quarrel be no more renew'd;
Be, as becomes a wife, obedient still;
Though griev'd, yet subject to her husband's will.
Dryden.

One day, I think, in Paradise he liv'd;
Destin'd the next his journey to pursue,
Where wounding thorns and cursed thistles grew.
Prior.

CU'RSEDLY.† adv. [from cursed.] Miserably; shamefully; a low cant word, Dr. Johnson says; as it certainly is in the two examples from L'Estrange and Pope which he has given. But it was formerly used in the solemn sense of curse.

[They] wicked counsel eke
Conspire against me cursedly.
Old Metr. Vers. of the Psalms, Ps. xxii.

Satisfaction and restitution lies so cursedly hard on the gizzards of our publicans. L'Estrange.

Sure this is a nation that is cursedly afraid of being overrun with too much politeness, and cannot regain one great genius but at the expence of another. Pope.

CU'RSEDNESS.† n. s. [from cursed.] The state of being under a curse.

His mouth is full of cursedness,
Of fraud, deceit, and guile.
Old Metr. Vers. of the Psalms, Ps. x.

CU'RSER.* n. s. [from curse.] One that utters curses or execrations.

All men, lovers of virtue, ought to hold him for a viper, and like a curser of father and mother.
Wodroephe's Fr. Gram. (1623,) p. 382.

The curse causeless: as, the pope's excommunications, and execrations, with bell, book, and candle. Such cursers are cursed; the curse will fall upon the curser's head.
Bp. Richardson on the O. Test. (1655,) p. 298.

The curser's punishment should fright the curse.
Drayton, Rel. Laici.

CU'RSHIP. n. s. [from cur.] Dogship; meanness; scoundrelship.

How durst th', I say, oppose thy curship,
'Gainst arms, authority, and worship. Hudibras.

CU'RSING.* n. s. [Sax. cuppunȝ.] An execration; a curse.

He read all the words of the law, the blessings and cursings. Joshua, viii. 34.

Theodoret calls them execrations, cursings, and revilings of God. Abp. Laud, Serm. p. 227.

CU'RSITOR. n. s. [Latin.] An officer or clerk belonging to the Chancery, that makes out original writs. They are called clerks of course, in the oath of the clerks of Chancery. Of these there are twenty-four in number, which have certain shires allotted to each of them, into which they make out such original writs as are required. They are a corporation among themselves. Cowel.

Then is the recognition and value, signed with the handwriting of that justice, carried by the cursitor in Chancery for that shire where those lands do lie, and by him is a writ of covenant thereupon drawn, and ingrossed in parchment. Bacon.

CU'RSORARY. adj. [from cursus, Latin.] Cursory; hasty; careless. A word, I believe, only found in the following line.

I have but with a cursorary eye
O'erglanc'd the articles. Shakspeare, Hen. V.

CU'RSORILY.† adv. [from cursory.] Hastily; without care; without solicitous attention.

We are so far from slighting or contemning the Scripture, that we are the great admirers of it, and do endeavour to advance it above all other writings whatsoever, and that even in natural things, though never so accidentally or cursorily handled. Smith, Portraiture of Old Age, p. 254.

I shall speak cursorily of every thing but that which I had immediately from himself.
Burnet, Life of Ld. Rochester.

This power, and no other, Luther disowns, as any one that views the place but cursorily must needs see. Atterbury.

CU'RSORINESS. n. s. [from cursory.] Slight attention.

CU'RSORY. † adj. [from cursorius, Latin.]

1. Hasty; quick; inattentive; careless.

Some eminent instructive expressions of Holy Writ, which are not obvious to every cursory and superficial reader.
Smith, Portraiture of Old Age, p. 266.

The first, upon a cursory and superficial view, appeared like the head of another man. Addison.

2. Going about; not stationary.

Father Cresswell, legier jesuit in Spain; father Baldwin, legier in Flaunders, as parsons at Rome; besides their cursorie men, as Gerrard, &c.
Proceedings against Garnet, (1606,) sign. F.

CURST.† adj. [from To curse; which shews, as Archdeacon Nares has excellently observed, how much the disposition, to which this word was applied, was hated.] Froward; peevish; malignant; mischievous; malicious; snarling.

Mr. Mason, after his manner, was very merry with both parties, pleasantly playing both with the shrewd touches of many curst boys, and with the small discretion of many lewd schoolmasters.
Ascham, Schoolmaster.

Curst cows have short horns. Proverb.

I pray you, though you mock me, gentlemen,
Let her not hurt me: I was never curst;
I have no gift at all in shrewishness:
I am a right maid for my cowardice;
Let her not strike me. Shakspeare, Mids. N. Dr.

I'll go see if the bear be gone from the gentleman, and how much he hath eaten: they are never curst but when they are hungry.
Shakspeare, Wint. Tale.

Her only fault, and that is fault enough,
Is, that she is intolerably curst,
And shrewd and forward, so beyond all measure,
That, were my state far worser than it is,
I would not wed her for a mine of gold. Shaksp.

When I dissuaded him from his intent,
And found him pight to do it with curst speech,
I threaten'd to discover him. Shaksp. K. Lear.

And though his mind
Be ne'er so curst, his tongue is kind. Crashaw.

CU'RSTNESS. n. s. [from curst.] Peevishness; frowardness; malignity.

Then, noble partners,
Touch you the sourest points with sweetest terms,
Nor curstness grow to the matter.
Shakspeare, Ant. and Cleop.

Her mouth she writh'd, her forehead taught to frown,
Her eyes to sparkle fires to love unknown;
Her sallow cheeks her envious mind did shew,
And every feature spoke aloud the curstness of a shrew. Dryden.

CURT.† adj. [from curtus, Latin.] Short.

Such a latitude of years may hold a considerable corner in the general map of time; and a man may have a curt epitome of the whole course thereof in the days of his own life.
Brown, Chr. Mor. ii. 22.

Peck! His name is curt,
A monosyllable, but [he] commands the horse well. B. Jonson, New Inn.

To CU'RTAIL.† v. a. [curto, Latin. It was anciently written curtal, which perhaps is more proper; but dogs that had their tails cut, being called curtal dogs, the word was vulgarly conceived to mean originally to cut the tail, and was in time written according to that notion. So far Dr. Johnson. But the word is rather from the Fr. tailler court, and is applicable, as the examples shew, to any deficiency. Nor was curtal, as applied to dogs, always formerly written as he states; but also in a manner which points out the etymology of curt, short, and tail. "The curt-tail'd fox, in the fable, endeavoured to have all foxes cut-tailed." Junius, Sin Stigm. (1639,) p. 449. See CURTAIL Dog, and also CURTAL.]

1. To cut off; to cut short; to shorten.

I, that am curtail'd of all fair proportion,
Deform'd, unfinish'd, sent before my time
Into this breathing world. Shakspeare, Rich. III.

Then why should we ourselves abridge,
And curtail our own privilege? Hudibras.

This general employ, and expence of their time, would as assuredly curtail and retrench the ordinary means of knowledge and erudition, as it would shorten the opportunities of vice.
Woodward.

Perhaps this humour of speaking no more than we must, has so miserably curtailed some of our words; and, in familiar writings and conversations, they often lose all but their first syllables.
Addison, Spect.

2. It has of before the thing cut off.

The count assured the court, that Fact his antagonist had taken a wrong name, having curtailed it of three letters; for that his name was not Fact but Faction. Addison.

CU'RTAIL Dog. n. s. A dog lawed, or mutilated, according to the forest laws, whose tail is cut off, and who is therefore hindered in coursing. Perhaps this word may be the original of cur.

I, amazed, ran from her as a witch; and I think, if my breast had not been made of faith, and my heart of steel, she had transformed me to a curtail dog, and made me turn i'the wheel.
Shakspeare, Com. of Err.

CURTA'ILER.* n. s. [from curtail.] One who cuts off, or leaves out, any thing.

This conduct of theirs — served to shew that the Latins had not been interpolators of the Creed, but that the Greeks had been curtailers.
Waterland, on the Athan. Cr. x. § 21.

CURTA'ILING.* n. s. [from the verb.] Abbreviation.

Scribblers send us over their trash in prose and verse, with abominable curtailings, and quaint modernisms. Swift.

CU'RTAIN.† n. s. [old Fr. courtine. V. Lacombe, vol. ii. in voce; Lat. cortina. Our own word was sometimes anciently written cortine.]

1. A cloth contracted or expanded at pleasure, to admit or exclude the light; to conceal or discover any thing; to shade a bed; to darken a room.

Their curtains ought to be kept open, so as to renew the air. Arbuthnot on Diet.

So through white curtains shot a timorous ray,
And op'd those eyes that must eclipse the day.
Pope.

Thy hand, great Dulness! lets the curtain fall,
And universal darkness buries all. Pope.

2. To draw the CURTAIN. To close it so as to shut out the light, or conceal the object.

I must draw a curtain before the work for a while, and keep your patience a little in suspense. Burnet's Theory.

Once more I write to you, and this once will be the last: the curtain will soon be drawn between my friend and me, and nothing left but to wish you a long good night. Pope.

3. To open it so as to discern the object.

So soon as the all-cheering sun
Should in the farthest East begin to draw
The shady curtain from Aurora's bed.
Shakspeare, Rom. and Jul.

Let them sleep, let them sleep on,
Till this stormy night be gone;
And th' eternal morrow dawn,
Then the curtain will be drawn. Crashaw.

4. [In fortification.] That part of the wall or rampart that lies between two bastions. Military Dict.

The governour, not discouraged, suddenly of timber and boards raised up a curtain twelve foot high, at the back of his soldiers. Knolles.

CURTAIN-LECTURE. n. s. [from curtain and lecture.] A reproof given by a wife to her husband in bed.

What endless brawls by wives are bred?
The curtain-lecture makes a mournful bed.
Dryden, Juv.

She ought to exert the authority of the curtain-lecture, and if she finds him of a rebellious disposition, to tame him. Addison.

To CU'RTAIN. v. a. [from the noun.] To inclose or accommodate with curtains.

Now o'er one half the world
Nature seems dead, and wicked dreams abuse
The curtain'd sleep. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

The wand'ring prince and Dido,
When with a happy storm they were surpris'd,
And curtain'd with a counsel-keeping cave.
Tit. Andron.

But in her temple's last recess inclos'd,
On Dulness' lap the anointed head repos'd:
Him close she curtain'd round with vapours blue,
And soft besprinkled with cimmerian dew. Pope.

CU'RTAL.* n. s. [Fr. courtault.] A horse with a docked tail.

Hold my stirrup, my one lacquey; and look to my curtal the other. B. Jonson, Masques.

CU'RTAL. adj. [from curt.] Brief, or abridged.

Matters of this moment, as they were not to be decided there by those divines, so neither are they to be determined here by essays and curtal aphorisms, but by solid proofs of Scripture. Milton, Eiconoclastes.

CU'RTATE Distance. n. s. [In astronomy.] The distance of a planet's place from the sun, reduced to the ecliptick.

CURTA'TION. n. s. [from curto, to shorten, Latin.] The interval between a planet's distance from the sun and the curtate distance. Chambers.

CU'RTELASSE. } See CUTLASS.
CU'RTELAX. }

CU'RTILAGE.* n. s. [old Fr. courtillage, "petit jardin, cour d'une maison située à la campagne qui n'est point fermée de murs, mais de hayes." Lacombe. Low Lat. cortilagium, from cors, cortis.] A garden, yard, or field, or other piece of ground, lying near, or belonging to, a messuage. Cowel.

CU'RTLY.* adv. [from curt.] Briefly.

Here Mr. Licentiat shew'd his art; and hath so curtly, succinctly, and concisely — epitomiz'd the long story of the captive.
Gayton, Notes, on D. Quix. iv. 15.

CU'RTSY. See COURTESY.

CU'RVATED. adj. [curvatus, Latin.] Bent; crooked.

CURVA'TION.† n. s. [curvo, Latin.] The act of bending or crooking.

As for his session, we must not look upon it as determining any posture of his body, corresponding to the curvation of our limbs.
Pearson on the Creed, Art. 6.

CU'RVATURE.† n. s. [old Fr. curvature.] Crookedness; inflexion; manner of bending.

It is bent after the manner of the catenarian curve, by which it obtains that curvature that is safest for the included marrow. Cheyne, Phil. Prin.

Flaccid it was beyond the activity of the muscle, and curvature of the ossicles, to give it a due tension. Holder.

CURVE. adj. [curvus, Latin.] Crooked; bent; inflected; not straight.

Unless an intrinsick principle of gravity or attraction, may make it describe a curve line about the attracting body. Bentley.

CURVE. n. s. Any thing bent; a flexure or crookedness of any particular form.

And as you lead it round, in artful curve,
With eye intentive mark the springing game.
Thomson.

To CURVE. v. a. [curvo, Latin.] To bend; to crook; to inflect.

And the tongue is drawn back and curved.
Holder.

To CURVE'T. v. n. [corvettare, Italian.]

1. To leap; to bound.

Cry, holla! to thy tongue, I pr'ythee: it curvets unseasonably. Shakspeare, As you like it.

Himself he on an earwig set,
Yet scarce he on his back could get,
So oft and high he did curvet,
Ere he himself could settle. Drayton, Nimphid.

Seiz'd with unwonted pain, surpriz'd with fright,
The wounded steed curvets; and, rais'd upright,
Lights on his feet before: his hoofs behind
Spring up in air aloft, and lash the wind.
Dryden, Æn.

2. To frisk; to be licentious.

CU'RVET.† n. s. [from the verb.]

1. A leap; a bound.

The king — ran his curvets so openly, and made his turns and returns in the head of the army, that so fair a mark invited his enemies' arrows to hit him. Fuller, Holy War, p. 148.

2. A frolick; a prank.

CURVILI'NEAR. adj. [curvus and linea, Lat.]

1. Consisting of a crooked line.

The impulse continually draws the celestial body from its rectilinear motion, and forces it into a curvilinear orbit; so that it must be repeated every minute of time. Cheyne.

2. Composed of crooked lines.

CU'RVITY. n. s. [from curve.] Crookedness.

The joined ends of that bone and the incus receding, make a more acute angle at that joint, and give a greater curvity to the posture of the ossicles.
Holder on Speech.

CU'RULE.* adj. [Lat. curulis.] An epithet applied to the chair, in which the Roman magistrates had a right to sit; which our own poet, Butler, has playfully adopted, and also employed as signifying magisterial.

We that are wisely mounted higher
Than constables in curule wit. Hudibras.

These mounted on a chair curule,
Which moderns call a cucking-stool. Hudibras.

And Tully's curule chair, and Milton's golden lyre. Akenside.

CU'SHAT.* n. s. [Sax. curceate, from cure, chaste, because of the conjugal fidelity of the bird. Belg. kuysheyt, coo, shout. Craven Dialect, 1824.] The wild pigeon, or ring-dove. A northern word. Grose, and Brockett. It is also written cowshut.

CU'SHION. n. s. [kussen, Dutch; coussin, French.] A pillow for the seat; a soft pad placed upon a chair.

Call Claudius, and some other of my men;
I'll have them sleep on cushions in my tent.
Shakspeare, Jul. Cæs.

If you are learn'd,
Be not as common fools; if you are not,
Let them have cushions by you. Shaks. Coriol.

But ere they sat, officious Baucis lays
Two cushions stuff'd with straw, the seat to raise;
Coarse, but the best she had. Dryden, Fab.

An Eastern king put a judge to death for an iniquitous sentence; and ordered his hide to be stuffed into a cushion, and placed upon the tribunal, for the son to sit on. Swift.

CU'SHIONED. adj. [from cushion.] Seated on a cushion; supported by cushions.

Many, who are cushioned upon thrones, would have remained in obscurity. Dissertation on Parties.

CU'SHIONET.* n. s. [Fr. coussinet.] A little cushion; that which resembles a small cushion.

Upon these pretty cushionets did lie
Ten thousand beauties, and as many smiles,
Chaste blandishments, and genuine courtesie.

CUSP. n. s. [cuspis, Latin.] A term used to express the points or horns of the moon, or other luminary. Harris.

CU'SPATED. } adj. [from cuspis, Latin.]
CU'SPIDATED. } A word expressing the leaves of a flower ending in a point. Quincy.

CU'SPIDAL.* adj. [from the Lat. cuspis.] Sharp; ending in a point.

This enters and raiseth up into life and beauty the whole corporeal world, orders the lowest projection of life, viz. the real cuspis of the cone infinitely multiplied, awaking that immense mist of atoms into several energies, into fiery, watery, and earthly; and, placing her magick attractive points, sucks hither and thither to every centre a due proportion, and rightly disposed number of these cuspidal particles. More, Notes on Psych. p. 346.

To CU'SPIDATE.* v. a. [from the Lat. cuspido. Dr. Johnson notices, with cuspated, the adjective cuspidated; but knew not that the verb existed in our language.] To sharpen. Cockeram.

CU'SPIS. n. s. [Lat.] The sharp end of a thing. See CUSPIDAL.

The multiplied cuspis of the cone is nothing but the last projection of life from Psyche.
More, Notes on Psych. p. 425.

CU'STARD. n. s. [cwstard, Welsh.] A kind of sweetmeat made by boiling eggs with milk and sugar till the whole thickens into a mass. It is a food much used in city feasts.

He cram'd them till their guts did ake,
With caudle, custard, and plumb cake. Hudibras.
Now may'rs and shrieves all hush'd and satiate lay;
Yet eat, in dreams, the custard of the day. Pope.

CUSTO'DIAL.* adj. [from custody.] Relating to custody or guardianship.

Ecclesia commendata, so called in contradistinction to ecclesia titulata, is that church, which for the custodial charges and government thereof, is by a revocable collation concredited with some ecclesiastical person, in the nature of a trustee.
Lett. to the Bp. of Rochester, (1772,) p. 2.

CU'STODY. n. s. [custodia, Latin.]

1. Imprisonment; restraint of liberty.

The council remonstranced unto queen Elizabeth the conspiracies against her life, and therefore they advised her, that she should go less abroad weakly attended; but the queen answered, she had rather be dead than put in custody. Bacon.
For us enslav'd, is custody severe,
And stripes, and arbitrary punishment
Inflicted. Milton, P. L.

2. Care; guardianship; charge.

Under the custody and charge of the sons of Merari, shall be the boards of the tabernacle.
Num. iii. 36.

CU'STOM. n. s. [coustume, French.]

1. Habit; habitual practice.

Blood and destruction shall be so in use,
That mothers shall but smile, when they behold
Their infants quarter'd by the hands of war;
All pity choak'd with custom of fell deeds.
Shakspeare, Jul. Cæs.
Custom, a greater power than nature, seldom fails to make them worship. Locke.

2. Fashion; common way of acting.

And the priest's custom with the people was, that when any man offered sacrifice, the priest's servant came, while the flesh was in seething, with a flesh-hook of three teeth in his hands. 1 Samuel, ii.

3. Established manner.

According to the custom of the priest's office, his lot was to burn incense when he went into the temple of the Lord. St. Luke, i.

4. Practice of buying of certain persons.

You say he is assiduous in his calling, and is he not grown rich by it? Let him have your custom, but not your votes. Addison.

5. Application from buyers: as, this trader has good custom.

6. [In law.] A law or right, not written, which, being established by long use, and the consent of our ancestors, has been, and is, daily practised. We cannot say that this or that is a custom, except we can justify that it hath continued so one hundred years; yet, because that is hard to prove, it is enough for the proof of a custom, if two or more can depose that they heard their fathers say, that it was a custom all their time; and that their fathers heard their fathers also say, that it was likewise a custom in their time. If it is to be proved by record, the continuance of a hundred years will serve. Custom is either general or particular: general, that which is current through England; particular is that which belongs to this or that county; as gavelkind to Kent, or this or that lordship, city, or town. Custom differs from prescription; for custom is common to more, and prescription is particular to this or that man: prescription may be for a far shorter time than custom. Cowel.

7. Tribute; tax paid for goods imported, or exported.

The residue of these ordinary finances be casual or uncertain, as be the escheats and forfeitures, the customs, butlerage, and imposts. Bacon.
Those commodities may be dispersed, after having paid the customs, in England. Temple.
Customs to steal is such a trivial thing,
That 'tis their charter to defraud their king. Dryd.
Strabo tells you, that Britain bore heavy taxes, especially the customs on the importation of the Gallick trade. Arbuthnot.

To CU'STOM. v. a. [from the noun.] To pay the duty at the custom-house for goods exported or imported.

The ships are safe, riding in Malta road;
And all the merchants, with other merchandize,
Are safe arriv'd, and have sent me to know,
Whether yourself will come and custom them.
Marlow, Jew of Malta.

To CU'STOM.* v. n. To accustom, which see.

For on a bridge he custometh to fight.
Spenser, F. Q.

CU'STOM-HOUSE. n. s. The house where the taxes upon goods imported or exported are collected.

Some custom-house officers, birds of passage, and oppressive thrifty squires, are the only thriving people amongst us. Swift.

CU'STOMABLE.† adj. [old Fr. coustumable. Not a single example has hitherto been given of this useful word.] Common; habitual; frequent.

3. Usual; wonted.

Ev'n now I met him
With customary compliment, when he,
Wafting his eyes to the contrary, and falling
A lip of much contempt, speeds from me.
Shakspeare.

CU'STOMED.† adj. [from custom.] Usual; common; accustomed.

No natural exhalation in the sky,
No common wind, no customed event,
But they will pluck away its natural cause,
And call them meteors, prodigies, and signs.
Shakspeare, K. John.
To wring the widow from her custom'd right.
Shakspeare, K. Hen. VI. P. II.
Adam wak'd, so custom'd. Milton, P. L.
One morn I miss'd him on the custom'd hill.
Gray, Elegy.

CU'STOMER. n. s. [from custom.]

1. One who frequents any place of sale for the sake of purchasing.

One would think it Overdone's house; for here be many old customers.

2. A common woman. This sense is now obsolete.

I marry her! — What, a customer? Pr'ythee, bear some charity to my wit; do not think it so unwholesome. Shakspeare, Othello.

3. A toll-gatherer; a collector of customs. Barret and Sherwood. This sense also, unnoticed by Dr. Johnson, is now obsolete.

That memorable example of Zaccheus's conversion from his evil way of covetousness and extortion as a common customer.
Mountagu, App. to Cæs. p. 184.

CU'STREL.† n. s.

1. A buckler-bearer. [Fr. coustillier. This word is sometimes written coistrel.]
Every one had an archer, a demi-lance, and a custrel (as our history calls it, but being truly coustiller) or a kind of ambactus, or servant belonging to him, besides three great horses for his own use. Ld. Herbert, Hen. VIII. p. 9.
2. A vessel for holding wine. Ainsworth.

CU'STUMARY.* n. s. [Fr. coustumerie.] A book of laws and customs.
The old law of the Lombards gave first use, and the express words of the Norman custumary are, "Qu'ils ne puvent avoir autre instrument, &c." Selden's Duello, ch. 8.
It was drawn from the old Germanick or Gothick custumary; from the feudal institutions, which must be considered as an emanation from that custumary. Burke, on a Regicide Peace.

To CUT.† pret. cut; part. pass. cut. [probably from the Fr. couteau, a knife, Dr. Johnson says. Serenius, in the Appendix to his Su.-Dict. traces it to the West-Goth kota, to cut. Some have thought it may be referred to the Gr. κόπτω, to cut.]

1. To penetrate with an edged instrument; to divide any continuity by a sharp edge.
Ah, cut my lace asunder,
That my great heart may have some scope to beat,
Or else I swoon with this dead killing news.

Send her money, knight: if thou hast her not in the end, call me cut. Shakspeare, Tw. Night.

14. A horse; a gelding; and perhaps the preceding definition, which is Dr. Johnson's, should be merged in this. The commentators on Shakspeare say, that cut there means a horse.

You lustie youthes who nourish high desire,
Abase your plumes which make you look so big:
The collier's cut, the courtier's steed, will tire:
Even so the clarke the parson's grave doth dig.
Gascoigne, Parad. of Dainty Devices, 1592.

He'll buy me a white cut forth for to ride.
Beaum. and Fl. Two Noble Kinsmen.

15. CUT and long tail. A proverbial expression for men of all kinds; it is borrowed from dogs.

He will maintain you like a gentlewoman. —— Ay, that I will, come cut and long tail, under the degree of a squire. Shaks. M. W. of Windsor.

At quintin he,
In honour of this bridaltee,
Hath challeng'd either wide countee:
Come cut and long tail; for there be
Six bachelors as bold as he. B. Jonson, Underwood.

He dances very finely, and very comely,
And for a jig, come cut and long tail to him,
He turns ye like a top.
Beaum. and Fl. Two Noble Kinsmen.

CUTA'NEOUS, adj. [from cutis, Latin.] Relating to the skin.

This serous, nutritious mass is more readily circulated into the cutaneous or remotest parts of the body. Floyer on Humours.

Some sorts of cutaneous eruptions are occasioned by feeding much on acid unripe fruits and farinaceous substances. Arbuthnot.

CUTE.* adj. [generally supposed to be a vulgar contraction of acute, Lat. acutus; but it may be the Sax. cuð.] Clever; sharp. Still used in the north of England.

CU'TICLE. n. s. [cuticula, Latin.]

1. The first and outermost covering of the body, commonly called the scarf-skin. This is that soft skin which rises in a blister upon any burning, or the application of a blistering-plaister. It sticks close to the surface of the true skin, to which it is also tied by the vessels which nourish it, though they are so small as not to be seen. When the scarf-skin is examined with a microscope, it appears to be made up of several lays of exceeding small scales. Quincy.

In each of the very fingers there are bones and gristles, and ligaments and membranes, and muscles and tendons, and nerves and arteries, and veins and skin, and cuticle and nail. Bentley, Serm.

2. A thin skin formed on the surface of any liquor.

When any saline liquor is evaporated to cuticle, and let cool, the salt concretes in regular figures; which argues that the particles of the salt, before they concreted, floated in the liquor at equal distances in rank and file. Newton, Opt.

CUTI'CULAR. adj. [from cutis, Latin.] Belonging to the skin.

CUTH, signifies knowledge or skill. So Cuthwin is a knowing conquerour; Cuthred, a knowing counsellor; Cuthbert, famous for skill. Much of the same nature are Sophocles and Sophianus. Gibson's Camden.

CU'TLASS.† n. s. [coutelas, French. This word is written sometimes cutlace, sometimes cuttleax: in Spenser, curtaxe; in Shakspeare, curtleaxe; and in Pope, cutlash.] A broad cutting sword: the word is much in use among the seamen.

Were't not better
That I did suit me all points like a man?
A gallant curtleax upon my thigh,
A boar-spear in my hand. Shaks. As you like it.

To the lodgements of his herd he run,
Where the fat porkers slept beneath the sun;
Of two his cutlash launch'd the spouting blood,
These quarter'd, sing'd, and fix'd on forks of wood.
Pope.

Mores, in his curious dissertation on letter-founders, calls a cutlass, as it seems, a courtelass, among the antique typographick ornaments. Warton, Notes on Milton.

CU'TLER. n. s. [coutelier, French.] One who makes or sells knives.

A paultry ring
That she did give, whose poesy was
For all the world like cutler's poetry
Upon a knife; love me, and leave me not. Shaks.

In a bye cutler's shop he bought a tenpenny knife: so cheap was the instrument of this great attempt. Wotton.

He chose no other instrument than an ordinary knife, which he bought of a common cutler. Clarendon.

CU'TLERY.* n. s. [from cutler.] The ware or articles which are made by cutlers.

CU'TLET.* n. s. [Fr. cotelette, i. e. petite cote.] A steak; properly, a rib.

So mutton cutlets, prime of meat. Swift.

CU'TPURSE. n. s. [cut and purse.] One who steals by the method of cutting purses: a common practice when men wore their purses at their girdles, as was once the custom. A thief; a robber.

To have an open ear, a quick eye, and a nimble hand, is necessary for a cutpurse. Shaks. Wint. Tale.

A vice of kings,
A cutpurse of the empire and the rule,
That from a shelf the precious diadem stole,
And put it in his pocket. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

Was there no felony, no bawd,
Cutpurse, nor burglary abroad? Hudibras.

If we could imagine a whole nation to be cutpurses and robbers, would there then be kept that square dealing and equity in such a monstrous den of thieves. Bentley, Serm.

CU'TTER.† n. s. [from cut.]

1. An agent or instrument that cuts any thing; as, a stone-cutter.

Never saw I figures
So likely to report themselves; the cutter
Was, as another nature, dumb. Shaks. Cymb.

He who is called the cutter, or dissector, with an Ethiopick stone cuts away as much of the flesh as the law commands.

Greenhill, Art of Embalming, p. 243.

2. A nimble boat that cuts the water. [So the low Lat. cota, a kind of ship. V. Du Cange in COTA. See also COT.]

3. [Incisores.] The teeth that cut the meat.

The molares or grinders are behind, nearest the centre of motion, because there is a greater strength or force required to chew the meat than to bite a piece; and the cutters before, that they may be ready to cut off a morsel from any solid food, to be transmitted to the grinders. Ray on the Creation.

4. An officer in the Exchequer that provides wood for the tallies, and cuts the sum paid upon them; and then casts the same into the court to be written upon. Cowel.

5. A ruffian; a bravo; "one that goeth privily with a short sword; a murderer." Barret.

Another story came into my mind of a thief, or rather a cutter by the high way, infinitely more resolute than the former.

World of Wonders, 1608, p. 95.

6. CUTTER off. A destroyer.

Indeed, there is fortune too hard for nature; when fortune makes nature's natural the cutter off of nature's wit. Shakspeare, As you like it.

CU'T-THROAT. n. s. [cut and throat.] A ruffian; a murderer; a butcher of men; an assassin.

Will you then suffer these robbers, cut-throats, base people gathered out of all the corners of Christendom, to waste your countries, spoil your cities, murder your people, and trouble all your seas? Knolles.

Perhaps the cut-throat may rather take his copy from the Parisian massacre, one of the horridest instances of barbarous inhumanity that ever was known. South.

CU'T-THROAT. adj. Cruel; inhuman; barbarous.

If to take above fifty in the hundred be extremity, this in truth can be none other than cut-throat and abominable dealing. Carew, Surv. of Cornwall.

The ruffian robbers by no justice aw'd,
And unpaid cut-throat soldiers are abroad;
Those venal souls, who, harden'd in each ill,
To save complaints and prosecution, kill.
Dryden, Juv.

CU'TTING.† n. s. [from cut.]

1. A piece cut off; a chop.

The burning of the cuttings of vines, and casting them upon land, doth much good. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Many are propagated above ground by slips or cuttings. Ray.

2. Incision.

Ye shall not make any cuttings in your flesh for the dead, nor print any marks upon you. Levit. xix. 28.

3. Caper; curvet; [from To CUT a Caper.]

Some ladies make a better shew of their countenances in those dances, wherein are divers changes, cuttings, turnings, and agitations of the body, than in some dances of state and gravity.

Florio's Tr. of Montaigne's Essays, p. 228.

4. Division, as of a pack of cards. See the eleventh sense of CUT.

It is here said, there has been much shuffling and cutting in England, and we do not understand what, or who is turned up trump.

Hill's Lett. Lett. to him, 1659, p. 206.

CU'TTLE.† n. s. [Lat. sepia, Sax. cuvele.] A fish, which, when he is pursued by a fish of prey, throws out a black liquour, by which he darkens the water and escapes.

It is somewhat strange, that the blood of all birds and beasts, and fishes, should be of a red colour, and only the blood of the cuttle should be as black as ink. Bacon.

He that uses many words for the explaining any subject, doth, like the cuttle fish, hide himself for the most part in his own ink. Ray on the Creation.

CU'TTLE.† n. s. [from cuttle.

1. A foul-mouthed fellow; a fellow who blackens the character of others. Hanmer.

Away, you cutpurse rascal; you filthy bung, away: by this wine I'll thrust my knife in your mouldy chaps, if you play the saucy cuttle with me. Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

2. A knife. The commentators on Shakspeare say that this was the cant expression for the knife used by sharpers, in Shakspeare's time, to cut the bottoms of purses; and that the preceding eloquence might allude to this term. But they were not aware that cuttle is a serious term, in use long before Shakspeare wrote.

Dismembering himself with a sharp cuttle.

Bale, Eng. Vot. (1550,) B. ii. C. 2. b.

CU'TWORK.* n. s. [cut and work.] Work in embroidery.

It graz'd on my shoulder, takes me away six purls of an Italian cut-work-band I wore, cost me three pound in the exchange but three days before. B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour.

Then his band
May be disorder'd, and transform'd from lace
To cut-work. Beaum. and Fl. The Coronation.

CY'CLAMEN.* n. s. [French and Latin,] In botany, sow-bread.

Thirdly, a kind of cyclamen, or sow-bread. Sprat, Hist, R. S. p. 211.

Transplant autumnal cyclamens now, if you would change their place. Evelyn, Gardener's Kal.

CY'CLE. n. s. [cyclus, Lat.; κύκλος.]

1. A circle.

2. A round of time; a space in which the same revolutions begin again; a periodical space of time.

We do more commonly use these words, so as to style a lesser space a cycle, and a greater by the name of period; and you may not improperly call the beginning of a large period the epocha thereof. Holder on Time.

3. A method, or account of a method continued till the same course begins again.

We thought we should not attempt an unacceptable work, if here we endeavour to present our gardeners with a complete cycle of what is requisite to be done throughout every month of the year. Evelyn's Kalendar.

4. Imaginary orbs; a circle in the heavens.

How build, unbuild, contrive
To save appearances; how gird the sphere
With centrick and eccentrick, scribl'd o'er
Cycle and epicycle, orb in orb! Milton, P. L.

CY'CLOID.† n. s. [from κυκλοειδης, of κυκλος and εἶδος, shape.] A geometrical curve, of which the genesis may be conceived by imagining a nail in the circumference of a wheel: the line which the nail describes in the air, while the wheel revolves in a right line, is the cycloid.

A man may form to himself the notion of a parabola, or a cycloid, from the mathematical definition of those figures. Reid's Inquiry.

CYCLO'IDAL. adj. [from cycloid.] Relating to a cycloid; as, the cycloidal space, is the space contained between the cycloid and its substance. Chambers.

CYCLO'METRY.* n. s. [Gr. κύκλος, a circle, and μέτρω.] The art of measuring cycles or circles.

I must tell you, that Sir H. Savile had confuted Joseph Scaliger's cyclometry.

Wallis, Correct. of Hobbes, (1656,) p. 116.

CYCLOPÆ'DIA. n. s. [κύκλος and παιδεία.] A circle of knowledge; a course of the sciences.

CYCLOPE'AN.* adj. [from the Cyclopes, who are feigned to have assisted Vulcan in forming the thunderbolts of Jupiter.] Vast; terrifick. See CYCLOPICK.

The cyclopean furnace of all wicked fashions, the heart, calls my speech to it.

Bp. Hall, Serm. Fash. of the World.

CY'CLOPEDE.* n. s. The more modern term for cyclopædia, which see.

Heavy penalties were imposed on those academies, who relinquished the sacred text, to explain the tedious and unedifying commentaries on Peter Lombard's scholastic cyclopede of divinity, called the Sentences, which alone were sufficient to constitute a moderate library.

Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, ii. 450.

CYCLO'PICK.* adj. [from the Cyclopes. See CYCLOPEAN. The French have the adjective cyclopique, to denote furious, monstrous, or cruel.] Savage.

Sending a bill of defiance to all physicians, chirurgeons, and apothecaries, as so many bold giants, or cyclopick monsters who daily seek to fight against heaven by their rebellious drugs and doses! Bp. Taylor, Artif. Hands. p. 53.

He is no better than a savage beast, and hath a heart of iron and cyclopick breasts, that can invade heaven, and rob God, and put down the prerogatives of his king, and spoil mankind of all safety.

Bp. Williams, Char. of Tr. (1663,) p. 3.

CY'DER.* See CIDER.

CY'GNET. n. s. [from cycnus, Lat.] A young swan.

I am the cygnet to this pale faint swan,
Who chaunts a doleful hymn to his own death.
Shakspeare, K. John.

So doth the swan her downy cygnets save,
Keeping them pris'ners underneath her wings.
Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

Cygnets, from grey, turn white.
Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Young cygnets are good meat, if fatted with oats; but fed with weeds, they taste fishy.
Mortimer, Husbandry.

CY'LINDER. n. s. [κύλινδρος.] A body having two flat surfaces and one circular.

The quantity of water which every revolution does carry, according to any inclination of the cylinder, may be easily found. Wilkins.

The square will make you ready for all manner of compartments, bases, pedestals, plots, and buildings; your cylinder for vaulted turrets, and round buildings. Peacham.

CYLI'NDRICAL. } adj. [from cylinder.] Par-
CYLI'NDRICK. } taking of the nature of a cylinder; having the form of a cylinder.

Minera ferri stalactitia, when several of the cylindrick striæ are contiguous, and grow together into one sheaf, is called brushiron ore. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

Obstructions must be most incident to such parts of the body where the circulation and the elastick fibres are both smallest, and those are glands, which are the extremities of arteries formed into cylindrical canals. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

CYLI'NDROID.* n. s. [Gr. κύλινδρος, and εἶδος, form.] In geometry, a solid body, approaching to the figure of a cylinder, but differing from it in some respect; as, having its bases eliptical, but parallel, and equal. Chambers.

CYMA'R.† n. s. [properly written simar, Dr. Johnson says. Yet he cites Dryden, who so writes the word, as giving it cymar. But see particularly CHIMERE, and also SIMAR.] A slight covering; a scarf.

CYMA'TIUM. n. s. [Lat. from κυμάτιον, a little wave.] A member of architecture, whereof one half is convex, and the other concave. There are two sorts, of which one is hollow below, as the other is above. Harris.

In a cornice the gola, or cymatium of the corona, the coping, the modillions, or dentelli, make a noble show by their graceful projections. Spect.

CY'MBAL. n. s. [cymbalum, Lat.] A musical instrument.

The trumpets, sackbuts, psalteries and fifes,
Tabors and cymbals, and the shouting Romans,
Make the sun dance. Shakspeare, Coriol.

If mirth should fail, I'll busy her with cares,
Silence her clamorous voice with louder wars;
Trumpets and drums shall fright her from the throne,
As sounding cymbals aid the lab'ring moon.
Dryden, Aurengz.

CYNA'NTHROPY. n. s. [κύων κύνος, and ἄνθρωπος.] A species of madness in which men have the qualities of dogs.

CYNARCTO'MACHY. [κύων, ἀρκτος, μαχή.] A word coined by Butler, to denote bear-baiting with a dog.

That some occult design doth lye
In bloody cynarctomachy,
Isplain enough to him that knows,
How saints lead brothers by the nose. Hudibras.

CYNEGE'TICKS. n. s. [κυνεγητικα.] The art of hunting; the art of training and hunting with dogs.

There are extant in Greek, four books or cynegeticks, or venation. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CY'NICAL.† } adj. [κύνικος.] Having the CY'NICK. } qualities of a dog; currish; brutal; snarling; satirical.

'Tis possible for Diogenes his cynical slovenliness to trample on Plato's splendid garments with more pride than Plato wore them. Bp. Taylor, Artif. Hands. p. 104.

He doth believe that some new fangled wit (it is his cynical phrase) will some time or other find out his art. Wilkins.

A far wilder speech was that of the dog-philosopher, who termed women necessary evils: of this cynical sect, it seems, was he who would make "orcus" to be the anagram of "uxor." Howell, Lett. iv. 7.

CY'NICK. n. s. [κύνικος.] A philosopher of the snarling or currish sort; a follower of Diogenes; a rude man; a snarler; a misanthrope.

How vilely doth this cynick rhime? —
Get you hence, sirrah; saucy fellow, hence.
Shakspeare.

Without these precautions the man degenerates into a cynick, the woman into a coquette; the man grows sullen and morose, the woman impertinent and fantastical. Addison.

CY'NOSURE.† n. s. [from κύνος οὐρα.] The star near the North-pole, by which sailors steer.

Their compass also is defective; — nor is the magnet, till of late, known amongst them; having the cynosure and ursa minor for their best directors. Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 377.

For the guidance either of our caution, or liberty in matters of borrowing and lending, the only cynosure is our charity. Bp. Hall, Cases of Cons.

Towers and battlements it sees
Bosom'd high in tufted trees,
Where perhaps some beauty lies,
The cynosure of neighbouring eyes.
Milton, Il Pens.

CY'ON. See CION.

Gather syons for graffs before the buds sprout. Evelyn.

CY'PHER.* See CIPHER.

CY'PHERING.* n. s. [from cypher.] Skill in arithmetick.

[He] knows the law, and writes you six fair hands,
Is a fine clerk, and has his cyphering perfect.
B. Jonson, Alch.

CY'PRESS-TREE. [cupressus, Lat.]

1. The cypress is a tall straight tree, produced with great difficulty. Its fruit is of no use: its leaves are bitter, and the very smell and shade of it are dangerous. Hence the Romans looked upon it to be a fatal tree, and made use of it at funerals, and in mournful ceremonies. The cypress-tree is always green, and never either rots or is worm-eaten. Calmet.

In ivory coffers I have stuff'd my crowns;
In cypress chests my arras counterpanes. Shaksp.

He taketh the cypress and the oak, which he strengtheneth for himself among the trees of the forest. Is. xliv. 14.

Poplars and alders ever quivering play'd,
And nodding cypress form'd a fragrant shade.
Pope, Odyss.

2. Being anciently used in funerals, it is the emblem of mourning.

Poison be their drink,
Their sweetest shade a grove of cypress trees.
Shaksp. Hen. VI.

CY'PRUS.† n. s. [I suppose from the place where it was made; or corruptly from cypress, as being used in mourning. So far Dr. Johnson. It is most probably from Cyprus, where it was originally manufactured. It was a kind of lawn or gauze; and is said to have been also made use of to sift things to the finest powder. It is variously written cypres, cipres, and cyprus; and is of frequent occurrence in our old poetry. In Erondelle's French Garden, &c. 1605, the word is called crape: "Combien vendez vous cette piece de crespe? How sell you that piece of white cipresse?"] A thin transparent stuff.

Lawn as white as driven snow,
Cypress black as e'er was crow. Shaks. Wint. Tale.

A cyprus, not a bosom,
Hides my poor heart! Shaks. Twelfth Night.

Your picture — one half drawn
In solemn cyprus, th' other cobweb lawn.
B. Jonson, Epigrams.

All in a robe of darkest grain,
Flowing with majestic train,
And sable stole of Cyprus lawn,
Over thy decent shoulders drawn.
Milton, Il Pens.

Their ensigns wrapt in cypres.
Heath, Chron. of the Civ. Wars, p. 412.

CYPRUS *Wine. Wine made in the island of Cyprus.

The rich Cyprus wine, which is so much esteemed in all parts, is very dear.
Pococke, Observ. on Cyprus.

CYST. } n. s. [κύστις.] A bag contain-
CY'STIS. } ing some morbid matter.

In taking it out the cystis broke, and shewed itself by its matter to be a meliceris.
Wiseman, Surgery.

There may be a consumption, with a purulent spitting, when the vomica is contained in a cyst or bag; upon the breaking of which the patient is commonly suffocated. Arbuthnot on Diet.

CY'STICK. adj. [from cyst, a bag.] Contained in a bag.

The bile is of two sorts; the cystick, or that contained in the gall-bladder, a sort of repository for the gall; or the hepatick, or what flows immediately from the liver. Arbuthnot.

CYSTO'TOMY. n. s. [κύστις and τέμνω.] The act or practice of opening incysted tumours, or cutting the bag in which any morbid matter is contained.

CY'TISUS.* n. s. A shrub of which there are many varieties. See TREFOIL.

There tamarisks with thick-leav'd box are found;
And cytisus, and garden-pines abound. Congreve.

CZAR.† n. s. [a Sclavonian word, written more properly tzar.] The title of the emperour of Russia.

There were competitors, the czar of Muscovy's son, the duke of Newburg, and the prince of Lorraine. Brown, Trav. p. 153.

CZA'RISH.* adj. [from czar.] Relating to the czar.

His czarish majesty dispatched an express.
Tatler, No. 55.

CZARI'NA.† n. s. [from czar.] The empress of Russia.

When Catherine Alexowna was made empress of Russia, the women were in an actual state of bondage. — Assemblies were quite unknown among them; the czarina was satisfied with introducing them, for she found it impossible to render them polite. Goldsmith, Ess. 22.

D.

D, Is a consonant nearly approaching in sound to T, but formed by a stronger appulse of the tongue to the upper part of the mouth. The sound of D in English is uniform, and it is never mute.

D.* A note or key in musick.

D.* In abbreviation is common for doctor; as, D.D. doctor of divinity; M.D. doctor of medicine.

D.* A numeral letter, signifying five hundred.

DA CAPO. [Ital.] A term in musick, which signifying from the head or the beginning, means that the first part of the tune should be repeated at the conclusion.

To DAB. v. a. [dauber, Fr.] To strike gently with something soft or moist.

A sore should never be wiped by drawing a piece of tow or rag over it, but only by dabbing it with fine lint. Sharp.

DAB.† n. s. [from the verb.]

1. A small lump of any thing.
2. A blow with something moist or soft. Hence a dab-wash, Mr. Malone observes; a term used by women, when a number of small articles are washed, without the intermixture of large linen.
3. Something moist or slimy thrown upon one.
4. A kind of small flat fish.

Of flat fish there are rays, flowks, dabs, plaice. Carew.

DAB.* n. s. [Dr. Johnson consigns this word to low language, without any etymology or example; and says that it is not used in writing. It is a corruption of adept, which, as I have shewn, is derived from adab. See ADEPT.] An artist; a man expert at something.

One writer excels at a plan, or the title-page; another works away at the body of the book; and the third is a dab at an index. Goldsmith, Ess. I.

DA'BCHICK.† n. s. A small water-fowl; called likewise dobchick, and didapper, and dipchick. [from To DIP.] Colymbus. Ray.

She is a delicate dab-chick; I must have her. B. Jonson, Alchemist.

A dab-chick waddles through the copse,
On feet and wings, and flies, and wades, and hops. Pope.

To DA'BBLE.† v. a. [dabbelen, Dutch, from the Goth. daupjan, to besprinkle.] To smear; to daub; to spatter; to besprinkle; to wet.

A shadow like an angel, with bright hair
Dabbled in blood. Shaksp. Rich. III.

I scarified, and dabbled the wound with oil of turpentine. Wiseman, Surgery.

Mean while the South, rising with dabbled wings,
A sable cloud athwart the welkin flings. Swift.

To DA'BBLE. v. n.

1. To play in water; to move in water or mud.

Neither will a spirit, that dwells with stars, dabble in this impurer mud. Glanville, Apology.

The little one complained of her legs, that she could neither swim nor dabble with them. L'Estrange.

But when he found the boys at play,
And saw them dabbling in their clay,
He stood behind a stall to lurk,
And mark the progress of their work. Swift.

2. To do any thing in a slight, superficial, or shallow manner; to tamper.

Shakspeare shall be put into your hands, as clear and as fair as it came out of them; though you, I think, have been dabbling here and there with the text, I have had more reverence for the writer, and the printer, and left every thing standing. Atterbury to Pope.

DA'BBLER.† n. s. [from dabble.]

1. One that plays in water.

Good drinkers cannot drown:
We, puny dabblers, are as ill beset,
We, whose unliquor'd hides will turn no wet,
Cleaveland, Poems, &c. p. 17.

2. One that meddles without mastery; one that never goes to the bottom of an affair; a superficial meddler.

Every dabbler
In rhyme is thought the same. B. Jonson, Masques.

He dares not complain of the tooth-ach, lest our dabblers in politicks should be ready to swear against him for disaffection. Swift.

DACE. n. s. [of uncertain derivation: in most provinces called dare. Leuciscus.] A small river fish, resembling a roach, but less.

Let me live harmlessly, and near the brink
Of Trent or Avon have a dwelling place;
Where I may see my quill or cork down sink,
With eager bite of pearch, or bleak, or dace. Walton.

DA'CTYLE.† n. s. [δάκτυλος, a finger.] A poetical foot consisting of one long syllable and two short, like the joints of a finger; as, cāndĭdŭs.

What shall I name those current travases,
That on a triple dactyle-foot do run.
Sir J. Davies, Orchestra, (1599,) st. 69.

The lingering spondees, labouring to delay
The breathless dactyles with a sudden stay. Bp. Hall, Sat. i. 6.

The heroic foot—includes the spondee, the dactyle, and the anapæst. Harris, Phil. Inquiries.

DA'CTYLET.* n. s. Adopted by bishop Hall for dactyle, in a passage of admirable humour.

Whoever saw a colt, wanton and wild,
Yok'd with a slow-foot ox on fallow field,
Can right areed how handsomely befits
Dull spondees with the English dactylets!

If Jove speak English in a thundering cloud,
Thick thwack, and riff raff, roars he out aloud! Bp. Hall, Sat. i. 6.

DA'CTYLICK.* adj. [Fr. dactylique, from dactyle.] Relating to the dactyl.

This at least was the power of the spondaik and dactylick harmony; but our language can reach no eminent diversities of sound. Johnson, Rambler, No. 94.

DA'CTYLIST.* n. s. [from dactyle.] One who writes flowing verse.

Dr. Johnson prefers the Latin poetry of May and Cowley to that of Milton, and thinks May to be the first of the three. May is certainly a sonorous dactylist. Warton, Pref. to Milton's Sm. Poems.

DACTYLO'LOGY.* n. s. Fr. dactylologie, Gr. δάκτυλος, the finger, and λέγω, to discourse.] The art of conversing by the hands.

Cheirology, or dactylology, as the words import, is interpretation by the transient motions of the fingers; which, of all other wayes of interpretation, comes nearest to that of the tongue. Dalgarno, Deaf and Dumb Man's Tutor, (1680,) Introd.

DAD.† } n. s. [The child's way of ex-
D'ADDY. } pressing father. It is remarkable, that, in all parts of the world, the word for father, as first taught to children, is compounded of a and t, or the kindred letter d differently placed; as tad, Cimbr. Welsh, and Cornish; daid, Gael.; tat, Armorick; αττα, Greek; atta, Gothick; tata, Latin.] Father.

I was never so bethumpt with words,
Since first I call'd my brother's father dad. Shaks.

His loving mother left him to my care;
Fine child, as like his dad as he could stare! Gay.

To DA'DDLE.* v. n. To walk unsteadily like an old person or a child. It is yet used in the north of England; and seems allied to the Iceland. dudda, to be slow-footed. But see To WADDLE.

2. To saunter, or trifle; to do any thing imperfectly. Craven Dialect, and Brockett's N. C. Words.

DA'DDLE.* n. s. A colloquial expression in several parts of England for the hand.

To DADE. v. a. To hold up by a leading string.

The little children when they learn to go,
By painful mothers daded to and fro. Drayton.

DA'DO.* n. s. [Ital.] In architecture, the plain part between the base and cornice of a column; the die. Ash.

*DÆDAL.† adj. [dædalus, Latin, from the Gr. δαιδάλλειν, to form curiously or exquisitely, in allusion to Dædalus, the artist; whence we have the word dædalian, which see.]

1. Various; variegated.

Then doth the dædale earth throw forth to thee,
Out of her fruitful lap, abundant flowers.
Spenser, F. Q. iv. x. 44.

2. Skilful: this is not the true meaning, nor should be imitated, Dr. Johnson says, citing the solitary example of Philips. Yet it has not only as good authority as can be produced in our own language, but is supported also, in the same meaning, by Tasso, who has "man dedala," the dædal hand, Gier. Lib. xii. 94. T. Warton has also dared to adopt the word in this sense.

All were it Zeuxis or Praxiteles,
His dædale hand would faile and greatly faynt,
And her perfections with his error taynt.
Spenser, F. Q. iii. i. 2.

Nor hath
The dædal hand of nature only pour'd
Her gifts of outward grace. Philips.

DÆDA'LIAN.* adj. [Fr. dedalé, from Dædalus, who made the labyrinth of Crete.] Maze-like; resembling a labyrinth.
Cotgrave, and Sherwood.

DAFF, or DAFFE.* n. s. [Icel. dauf; Su. Goth. doef, stupid. See To DAFF.] A fool. Cockeram defines this word, a coward. In the north of England, daft is yet the common adjective applied to a blockish or foolish fellow.

And when this jape is tald another day,
I shal be halden a daffe or a cokenay.
Chaucer, Reve's Tale.

Thou dotest, daffe, quoth she; dull are thy wittes. Vis. of P. Pl. fol. 6. b.

To DAFF*. v. a. [Su. Goth. dofwa, to stupify.] To daunt. North of Eng. Grose.

To DAFF.* v. a. [perhaps from do and off; as doff, which see. Dr. Johnson has omitted this word, and given in its stead, To DAFT, which is, in fact, the pretertite of this word; overlooking, as Mr. Malone and Mr. Mason have observed, the present tense; and so coining the verb daft: to which he assigns an etymology, in support of it, viz. do aft, that is, to throw back, to throw off. But daft is clearly from daff.] To toss aside; to put away with contempt; to throw away slightly; to put off. Not now in use.

The nimble-footed mad-cap Prince of Wales,
And his comrades, that daff'd the world aside,
And bid it pass. Shaksp. K. Hen. IV. P. I.

I would she had bestowed this dotage on me; I would have daft all other respects, and made her half myself. Shakspeare, Much Ado, &c.

There my white stole of chastity I daff'd.
Shakspeare, Lovers Complaint.

DA'FFADIL.†
DA'FFADILLY.
DAFFADOWNDI'LLY.
DA'FFODIL.
DA'FFODILLY.
n. s. [Supposed by Skinner to be corrupted from asphodelus.]

This plant hath a lily-flower, consisting of one leaf, which is bell-shaped, and cut into six segments, which incircle its middle like a crown; but the empalement, which commonly rises out of a membranous vagina, turns to an oblong or roundish fruit, which is triangular, and gapes in three parts; is divided into three cells, and full of roundish seeds. Miller.

Strew me the ground with daffadowndillies,
And cowslips, and kingcups, and loved lilies.
Spenser, Shep. Cal.

Bid Amaranthus all his beauty shed,
And daffadillies fill their cups with tears,
To strew the laureat herse where Lycid lies.
Milton, Lycidas.

The daughters of the flood have search'd the mead
For violets pale, and cropp'd the poppy's head:
The short narcissus, and fair daffodil,
Pancies to please the sight, and cassia sweet to smell. Dryden.

To DA'FFLE.* v. n. [probably from daff.] To betray loss of memory and mental faculty. "Persons growing old, and in their dotage, are said to daffle, and to be dafflers." Brockett's N. C. Words.

DAFT.† See DAFF.

DAG.† n. s. [dague. French; old Fr. dagge, a small gun. Kelham.]

1. A dagger.
2. A handgun; a pistol: so called from serving the purposes of a dagger, being carried secretly, and doing mischief suddenly. It is in neither sense now used.

To catch wild birds and beasts; encompassing
The grove with dagges, and out of bushes firing.
Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 269.

D'ye call this gun a dag?
Beaum. and Fl. Martial Maid.

DAG.* n. s. [dag, Sax.] A slip, or shred; a latchet, cut of leather. Cockeram. Not now in use. But see To DAG.

Beggars with —
— high shewis knoppid with dagges.
Chaucer, Rom. of the R. 7212.

To DAG.† v. a. [from daggle.]

1. To daggle; to bemire; to let fall in the water: a low word. See DAGTAILED. Dagged is still used, in the north of England, for dirtied.
2. To cut into slips. See DAG. Obsolete.

If so be that they wolden yeve such swiche pounsoned and dagged clothing to the people.
Chaucer, Parson's Tale.

To DAG.* v. n. To drizzle. Brockett's N. C. Words.

DAG.* n. s. [dag, Dan. dew; Icel. dagg, a shower. See To DAGGLE.] Dew upon the grass; as dag-locks, locks of wool spoiled by the dag or dew.
Ray, and Grose, South and E. C. Words.

DA'GGER.† n. s. [old Fr. daggue, and daguette, i. e. dague, a dagger; Ital. dagga; Germ. dagen; Welsh, dagr. Perhaps from the Heb. dakar, to stab, to thrust through. Lacombe says it is Celtick.]

1. A short sword; a poniard.

She ran to her son's dagger, and struck herself a mortal wound. Sidney.

This sword a dagger had his page,
That was but little for his age;
And therefore waited on him so,
As dwarfs upon knights-errant do. Hudibras.

He strikes himself with his dagger; but being interrupted by one of his friends, he stabs him, and breaks the dagger on one of his ribs. Addison.

2. [In fencing schools.] A blunt blade of iron with a basket hilt, used for defence.
3. [With printers.] The obelus; a mark of reference in form of a dagger; as [†].

DA'GGERSDRAWING. n. s. [dagger and draw.] The act of drawing daggers; approach to open violence.

They always are at daggersdrawing,
And one another clapperclawing. Hudibras.

I have heard of a quarrel in a tavern, where all were at daggersdrawing, till one desired to know the subject of the quarrel. Swift.

To DA'GGLE.† v. a. [from dag, dew; a word, according to Lye, derived from the Danish; according to Skinner, from dag, sprinkled, or deagan, to dip. They are probably all of the same root, Dr. Johnson says. See DAG, dew. Hence, Ray says, "daggle-tail is spoken of a woman that hath dabbled her coats with dew, wet, or dirt." Some may think the word daggle allied to dag, a shred.] To dip negligently in mire or water; to bemire; to besprinkle.

To shops in crouds the daggled females fly,
Pretend to cheapen goods, but nothing buy.
Swift, City Shower.

A pettifogger is a kind of dirty daggled skirt or tail to the long robe. Butler's Rem. Characters.

To DA'GGLE. v. n. To be in the mire; to run through wet or dirt.

Nor like a puppy, daggled through the town,
To fetch and carry sing song up and down. Pope.

DA'GGLEDTAIL. adj. [daggle and tail.] Bemired; dipped in the water or mud; bespattered.

The gentlemen of wit and pleasure are apt to be choaked at the sight of so many daggledtail parsons that happen to fall in their way. Swift.

DA'GLOCK.* n. s. [dag and lock.] A phrase in many places for the befouled lock of a sheep's tail.

DA'GSWAIN.* n. s. [probably from dag, a shred.] A sort of carpet, which Huloet, in his old dictionary, translates into the Latin gausape; which Latin word is rendered by Ainsworth, "a carpet to lay on a table, such as we call Turkey work; a dagswain." Obsolete.

Our fathers, yea and we ourselves also, have lien full oft upon straw pallets, or rough mats, covered only with a sheet, under coverlits made of dagswain.
Harrison, Descr. of Eng. pref. to Holinshed's Chron.

DA'GTAILED.* n. s. [from dag and tail.] Dirtied.

Would it not vex thee, where thy sires did keep,
To see the dunged folds of dagtail'd sheep?
Bp. Hall, Sat. v. 1.

DA'ILY. adj. [dæglic, Sax.] Happening every day, or very frequently; done every day; quotidian.

Much are we bound to heaven
In daily thanks, that gave us such a prince.
Shakspeare.

Cease, man of woman born! to hope relief
From daily trouble, and continu'd grief. Prior.

DA'ILY. adv. Every day; very often.

Let that man with bitter sense advise,
That of the world least part to us is read;
And daily how through hardy enterprize,
Many great regions are discovered. Spenser, F. Q.

A man with whom I conversed almost daily, for years together. Dryden.

DAINT.* adj. [This is our ancient word for dainty, which is adopted from the French word dain, as observed by Skinner in respect to dainty, though Dr. Johnson says he could not find dain in any dictionary. It is, however, in that of Cotgrave, with the definition of dainty, fine, curious, &c. and is there called an old word. It is probably allied to the Goth. dauhts, a feast. We have the substantive daint in this sense. It is remarkable that all our lexicographers have overlooked daint, whether as a substantive or adjective; and that some editors of Spenser have printed daintiest, where the true reading is daintest, the superlative of daint, because they were ignorant of this our ancient adjective.] Delicate: elegant.

Ne poet's wit, that passeth painter farre
In picturing the parts of beauty daynt.
Spenser, F. Q. iii. Introd. st. 2.

In which whatever in this worldly state
Is sweete and pleasing unto living sense,
Or that may dayntest fantasy aggrate,
Was poured forth with plentiful dispence.
Spenser, F. Q. ii. xii. 42.

DAINT.* n. s. [from the adjective.] Something of exquisite taste; a dainty.

And you, fair troop, if Thirsil you disdain not,
Vouchsafe with me to take some short refection;
Excesse, or daints, my lowly roof maintain not.
P. Fletcher, Pisc. Ecl. vii. 37.

DA'INTILY.† adv. [from dainty.]

1. Elegantly; delicately.

Truth is a naked and open day-light, that doth not shew the masks and mummeries, and triumphs of the world, half so stately and daintily as candle-light. Bacon.

2. Deliciously; pleasantly.

There is no region on earth so daintily watered, with such great navigable rivers.
Howell, Voc. Forest.

Those young suitors had been accustomed to nothing but to sleep well and fare daintily.
Broome, View of Epick Poems.

3. Nicely; ceremoniously; scrupulously.

How upright he sits at the table! how daintily he carves!
B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour.

4. Squeamishly; fastidiously.

DA'INTINESS. n. s. [from dainty.]

1. Delicacy; softness.

What should yet thy palate please?
Daintiness and softer ease,
Sleeked limbs, and finest blood? B. Jonson.

Elegance; nicety.

The duke exceeded in the daintiness of his leg and foot, and the earl in the fine shape of his hands.
Wotton.

3. Delicacy; deliciousness.

It was more notorious for the daintiness of the provision which he served in it, than for the massiness of the dish. Hakewill on Providence.

4. Squeamishness; fastidiousness.

Of sand, and lime, and clay, Vitruvius hath discoursed without any daintiness. Wotton.

5. Ceremoniousness; scrupulosity.

DA'INTLY.* adv. [from daint.] Deliciously.

As on the which full daintly he would fare.
Sackville, Induct. Mir. for Mag.

DA'INTREL.* n. s. [from daint or dainty.] A delicacy. Not now in use.

Neither glut thyselfe with present delicates, nor long after deintrelles hard to be come by.
Transl. of Bullinger's Sermons, p. 249.

Well to fare with thy meat, if thou have any;
But by thy words, as I them smeled, thy daintrels be not many. Origin of the Eng. Drama, i. 185.

DA'INTY.† adj. [derived by Skinner from dain, an old French word for delicate; which yet I cannot find in dictionaries, Dr. Johnson says; but see DAINT.]

1. Pleasing to the palate; of exquisite taste; delicious.

Higher concoction is required for sweetness or pleasure of taste, and therefore all your dainty plumbs are a little dry. Bacon.

2. Delicate; of acute sensibility; nice; squeamish; soft; luxurious; tender.

This is the slowest, yet the daintiest sense
For ev'n the ears of such as have no skill,
Perceive a discord, and conceive offence;
And knowing not what's good, yet find the ill.
Davies.

They were a fine and dainty people; frugal and yet elegant, though not military. Bacon.

3. Scrupulous; ceremonious.

Which of you all
Will now deny to dance? She that makes dainty,
I'll swear hath corns. Shakspeare, Rom. and Jul.

Therefore to horse;
And let us not be dainty of leave taking,
But shift away. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

4. Elegant; tenderly, languishingly, or effeminately beautiful.

Ne once adown would lay
Her dainty limbs in her sad dreriment.
Spenser, F. Q. i. xi. 32.

My house, within the city,
Is richly furnished with plate and gold,
Basons and ewers to lave her dainty hands.
Shakspeare.

He was not of any delicate texture; his limbs were rather sturdy than dainty.
Wotton, Short Hist. of K. Will. I.

Why should ye be so cruel to yourself,
And to those dainty limbs, which nature lent
For gentle usage, and soft delicacy? Milton, Comus.

5. Nice; affectedly fine: in contempt.

Your dainty speakers have the curse,
To plead bad causes down to worse. Prior.

DA'INTY. n. s.

1. Something nice or delicate; a delicacy; something of exquisite taste.

Be not desirous of his dainties; for they are deceitful meat. Prov. xxiii. 3.

A worm breedeth in meal, of the shape of a large white maggot, which is given as a great dainty to nightingales. Bacon.

She then produc'd her dairy store,
And unbought dainties of the poor. Dryden.

The shepherd swains, with sure abundance blest,
On the fat flock, and rural dainties feast. Pope.

2. A word of fondness formerly in use.

Why, that's my dainty; I shall miss thee:
But yet thou shalt have freedom. Shaks. Tempest.

There is a fortune coming
Towards you, dainty, that will take thee thus,
And set thee aloft. B. Jonson.

DA'IRY.† n. s. [from dey, an old word for milk, says Lye; who further traces it to the Iceland. deggia, to give milk. The Swedish dia is to milk. Dey occurs in P. Plowman's Creed. A dey-house, in Gloucestershire, still signifies a dairy-house. Widegren gives the Swedish deja, a dairy-maid. Dayeria is the barbarous Latin term for our dairy. V. Kennet's Gloss. Paroch. Antiq. See also DAYWOMAN.]

1. The occupation or art of making various kinds of food from milk.

Grounds were turned much in England either to feeding or dairy; and this advanced the trade of English butter. Temple.

2. The place where milk is manufactured.

You have no more worth
Than the coarse and country fairy,
That doth haunt the hearth or dairy. B. Jonson.

What stores my dairies and my folds contain!
A thousand lambs that wander on the plain.
Dryden.

She in pens his flocks will fold,
And then produce her dairy store. Dryden.

3. Pasturage; milk farm; ground where milch cattle are kept.

Dairies, being well housewived, are exceeding commodious. Bacon.

Children in dairy countries do wax more tall than where they feed more upon bread and flesh.
Bacon.

DA'IRYMAID. n. s. [dairy and maid.] The woman servant whose business is to manage the milk.

The poorest of the sex have still an itch,
To know their fortunes equal to the rich:
The dairymaid enquires if she shall take
The trusty taylor, and the cook forsake. Dryden.

Come up quickly, or we shall conclude that thou art in love with one of Sir Roger's dairy-maids. Addison.

DA'ISIED.† adj. [from daisy. "There has of late arisen a practice," says Dr. Johnson, in his Life of Gray, "of giving to adjectives derived from substantives the termination of participles; such as the cultured plain, the daisied bank." But he there forgot the ancient usage; and would probably have withheld his criticism, if he had recollected Shakspeare, or had turned to Shakspeare's contemporary, Wm. Browne. Dr. Johnson has indeed noticed, in his Dictionary, the passage in Shakspeare under DAZIED, which bears some resemblance to daisy; but he has admitted it with hesitation.] Full of daisies; besprinkled with daisies.

Let us
Find out the prettiest daisied plot we can,
And make him with our pikes and partisans
A grave. Shakspeare, Cymb.

I therefore went unto these homely towns,
Sweetly environ'd with the daisied downs.
Browne, Brit. Past. i. 4.

DA'ISY. n. s. [ðæʒeȝeȝe, day's eye, Chaucer.] A Spring-flower.

It hath a perennial root: the stalks are naked, and never branch out: the cup of the flower is scaly and simple, divided into many segments to the foot-stalk. The flowers are radiated; and the heads, after the petals are fallen off, resemble obtuse cones. Miller.

When daisies pied, and violets blue,
And lady-smocks all silver-white,
And cuckoo-buds of yellow hue,
Do paint the meadows with delight. Shaksp.

As he passed, the woods put forth their blossoms, the earth her primroses, and day's eyes to behold him. Howell.

Now hawthorns blossom, now the daisies spring;
Now leaves the trees, and flowers adorn the ground.
Pope.

This will find thee picking of daisies, or smelling to a lock of hay. Addison.

Fair-handed Spring unbosoms every grace;
The daisy, primrose, violet. Thomson.

DALE.† n. s. [dalei, Gothick; dal, Dutch and German. The Goth. dal is a cavern or deep place.] A low place between hills; a vale; a valley.

Long tost with storms, and beat with bitter winds,
High over hills, and low adown the dale,
She wandered many a wood and measur'd many a vale. Spenser, F. Q.

Before the downfal of the fairy state
This dale, a pleasing region, not unblest,
This dale possess'd they, and had still possess'd.
Tickel.

He steals along the lonely dale.
Thomson, Spring.

DA'LLIANCE. n. s. [from dally.]

1. Interchange of caresses; acts of fondness.

Look thou be true: do not give dalliance
Too much the rein: the strongest oaths are straw
To th' fire i'th' blood. Shaksp. Tempest.

Nor gentle purpose nor endearing smiles
Wanted; nor youthful dalliance, as beseems
Fair couple, link'd in happy nuptial league,
Alone as they. Milton, P. L.

I'll head my people;
Then think of dalliance when the danger's o'er:
My warlike spirits work now another way,
And my soul's tuned to trumpets. Dryden.

2. Conjugal conversation.

The giant, self-dismayed with the sound,
Where he with his Duessa dalliance found,
In haste came rushing forth from inner bower.
Spenser, F. Q.

That bower not mystick, where the sapient king
Held dalliance with his fair Egyptian spouse.
Milton, P. L.

Thou claim'st me for thy sire,
And my fair son here show'st me, the dear pledge
Of dalliance had with thee in heav'n.
Milton, P. L.

3. Delay; procrastination.

Both wind and tide stay for this gentleman;
And I to blame, have held him here too long. —
— Good lord, you use this dalliance to excuse
Your breach of promise. Shaksp.

DA'LLIER.† n. s. [from dally.] A trifler; a fondler.

The daily dalliers with such pleasant words, with such smiling and secret countenances, with such signs, tokens, wagers, purposed to be lost before they were purposed to be made.
Ascham, Schoolmaster.

He [Lord Burghley] was no dallier, no abuser; but ever real and certain.
Bacon, Notes on Ld. Burghley.

Censures — are appointed for the reformation of such dalliers and dispensers with their own consciences and oaths. Const. and Can. Ecc. 118.

DA'LLOP.† n. s. [of unknown etymology.] A tuft, or clump: not in use, Dr. Johnson says; but Grose mentions it as an Essex and an Norfolk word.

Of barley the finest and greenest ye find,
Leave standing in dallops till time ye do bind.
Tusser.

To DA'LLY.† v. n. [dollen, Dutch, to trifle. Serenius refers it to the Iceland. dala, tedious trifling. Formerly written daly also by us. "M. Jewel dalieth still." Beware of M. Jewel, 1566. fol. 10. b.]

1. To trifle; to play the fool; to amuse one's self with idle play; to lose time in trifles; to procrastinate idly.

Take up thy master:
If thou shouldst dally half an hour, his life,
With thine, and all that offer to defend him,
Stand in assured loss. Shaksp. K. Lear.

He left his cur, and laying hold
Upon his arms with courage bold
Cried out, 'tis now no time to dally,
The enemy begin to rally. Hudibras.

We have trifled too long already: it is madness to dally any longer, when our souls are at stake.
Calamy, Sermons.

One hundred thousand pounds must be raised: for there is no dallying with hunger. Swift.

2. To exchange caresses; to play the wanton; to fondle.

He is not lolling on a lewd love bed,
But on his knees at meditation;
Not dallying with a brace of courtezans,
But meditating with two deep divines. Shaksp.

3. To sport; to play; to frolick.

She her airie buildeth in the cedar's top,
And dallies with the wind, and scorns the sun.
Shakspeare.

4. To delay.

They that would not be reformed by that correction, wherein he dallied with them, shall feel a judgment worthy of God. Wisd. xii. 26.

To DA'LLY. v. a. To put off; to delay; to amuse till a proper opportunity.

He set down to perform service; not by the hazard of one set battle, but by dallying off the time with often skirmishes. Knolles, History.

DAM. n. s. [from dame, which formerly signified mother. "Had Nero never been an emperour, shulde never his dame have been slaine." Chaucer.]

1. The mother: used of beasts, or other animals not human.

The dam runs lowing up and down,
Looking the way her harmless young one went,
And can do nought but wail her darling loss.
Shaksp.

Mother, says a sick kite, let me have your prayers: Alas, my child, says the dam, which of the gods shall I go to? L'Estrange.

Birds bring but one morsel of meat at a time, and have not fewer, it may be, than seven or eight young in the nest together, which, at the return of their dams, do all at once, with equal greediness, hold up their heads and gape. Ray.

2. A human mother: in contempt or detestation.

This brat is none of mine;
It is the issue of Polixena:
Hence with it, and, together with the dam,
Commit them to the fire. Shaksp. Wint. Tale.

DAM. n. s. [dam, Dutch, a mole or bank to confine water.

As when the sea breaks o'er its bounds,
And overflows the level grounds,
Those banks and dams, that like a skreen
Did keep it out, now keep it in. Hudibras.

Not with so fierce a rage the foaming flood
Roars, when he finds his rapid course withstood;
Bears down the dams with unresisting sway,
And sweeps the cattle and the cots away. Dryden.

Let loose the reins to all your wat'ry store,
Bear down the dams, and open every door.
Dryden.

The inside of the dam must be very smooth and streight; and if it is made very sloping on each side, it is the better. Mortimer, Husbandry.

To DAM. v. a. [bemman, ꝑonebemman, Sax. dammen, Dut.]

1. To confine, or shut up water by moles or dams.

I'll have the current in this place damm'd up;
And here the smug and silver Trent shall run
In a new channel, fair and evenly.
Shaksp. Henry VI.

Home I would go,
But that my doors are hateful to my eyes,
Fill'd and damm'd up with gaping creditors,
Watchful as fowlers when their game will spring.
Otway.

Boggy lands are fed by springs, pent by a weight of earth, that dams in the water, and causes it to spread. Mortimer.

'Tis you must drive that trouble from your soul;
As streams, when damm'd, forget their ancient current,
And wond'ring at their banks in other channels flow. Smith.

2. It is used by Shakspeare of fire, and by Milton of light.

The more thou damm'st it up, the more it burns.
Shakspeare.

Moon! — if your influence be quite damm'd up
With black usurping mists, some gentle taper,
Though a rush-candle from the wicker hole
Of some clay habitation, visit us
With thy long-levell'd rule of streaming light.
Milton, Comus.

DA'MAGE.† n. s. [domage, French, Dr. Johnson says; but it is from the old French damage. V. Cotgrave, Lacombe, and Roquefort.]

1. Mischief; hurt; detriment.

Gross errours and absurdities many commit for want of a friend to tell them of them, to the great damage both of their fame and fortune. Bacon.

Such as were sent from thence did commonly do more hurt and damage to the English subjects than to the Irish enemies, by their continual cess and extortion. Davies.

He repulsed the enemy very much to their damage. Clarendon.

2. Loss; mischief suffered.

Lest his heart exalt him in the harm
Already done, to have dispeopled heaven,
My damage fondly deem'd! Milton, P. L.

3. The value of mischief done.

They believed that they were not able, though they should be willing to sell all they have in Ireland, to pay the damages which had been sustained by the war. Clarendon.

4. Reparation of damage; retribution.

The bishop demanded restitution of the spoils taken by the Scots, or damages for the same.
Bacon.

Tell me whether, upon exhibiting the several particulars which I have related to you, I may not sue her for damages in a court of justice.?
Addison.

5. [In law.] Any hurt or hindrance that a man taketh in his estate. In the common law it particularly signifies a a part of what the jurors be to inquire of; for, after verdict given of the principal cause, they are likewise asked their consciences touching costs, which are the charges of suit, and damages, which contain the hindrance which the plaintiff or demandant hath suffered, by means of the wrong done him by the defendant or tenant. Cowel.

When the judge had awarded due damages to a person, into whose field a neighbour's oxen had broke, it is reported that he reversed his own sentence, when he heard that the oxen, which had done this mischief, were his own. Watts.

To DA'MAGE.† v. a. [old Fr. damager.] To mischief; to injure; to impair; to hurt; to harm.

I consider time as an immense ocean, into which many noble authors are entirely swallowed up, many very much shattered and damaged, some quite disjointed and broken into pieces. Addison.

To DA'MAGE. v. n. To take damage, or be damaged.

DA'MAGEABLE.† adj. [Fr. dommageable, Cotgrave. We had formerly the adjective damageous, for this word, in the sense of mischievous; as in Huloet's old dictionary.]

1. Susceptible of hurt; as, damageable goods.

2. Mischievous; pernicious.

Oaths have been lawfully urged and exacted of men, touching matters damageable, criminal, and penal to themselves.
Featley, Dipp. Dipt, (1645,) p. 173.

Obscene and immodest talk is offensive to the purity of God, damageable and infectious to the innocence of our neighbours, and most pernicious to ourselves. Government of the Tongue.

DA'MAGE-FE'ASANT.* adj. [from damage, and faisant, Fr. a law term.] Doing hurt or damage; as when a stranger's beasts are in another man's ground, without licence of the tenant of the ground, and there do feed, tread, and otherwise spoil the corn, grass, woods, and such like. Cowel.

If the stork be taken damagefeceant with the cranes, she is enwrapped in the same net, and cannot complain that she is surprised.

Junius, Sin Stigmatized, (1639,) p. 806.

DA'MASCENE. n. s. [damascenus, from Damascus.] A small plum. This and the damson are distinct sort of plums: the damascene is the larger of the two, and not at all bitter; the damson is smaller, and has a peculiar bitter or roughness.

In April follow the cherry tree in blossom, the damascene and plum trees in blossom, and the white thorn in leaf. Bacon.

In fruits the white commonly is meaner, as in pear plums and damascenes; and the choicest plums are black Bacon.

DA'MASK. n. s. [damasquin, Fr. damaschino, Ital. from Damascus.]

1. Linen or silk woven in a manner invented at Damascus, by which part, by a various direction of the threads, exhibits flowers or other forms.

Not any weaver which his work doth boast
In diaper, damask, or in lyne. Spenser.

Wipe your shoes, for want of a clout, with a damask-napkin. Swift, Rules to Servants.

2. It is used for red colour in Fairfax, from the damask rose.

And for some deale perplexed was her spirit;
Her damask late now chang'd to purest white.
Fairfax.

To DA'MASK. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To form flowers upon stuffs.
2. To variegate; to diversify.

They sat recline
On the soft downy bank, damask'd with flowers.
Milton, P. L.

Around him dance the rosy hours,
And damasking the ground with flow'rs,
With ambient sweets perfume the morn. Fenton.

3. To adorn steel-work with figures; practised, I suppose, first at Damascus.

DAMASK-PLUM. See PLUM.

DAMASK-ROSE. n. s. The rose of Damascus: a red rose. See ROSE.

Damask-roses have not been known in England above one hundred years, and now are so common. Bacon.

No gradual bloom is wanting from the bud,
Nor broad carnations, nor gay spotted pinks,
Nor, shower'd from every bush, the damask-rose.
Thomson.

DA'MASKENING. n. s. [from damasquiner, Fr.] The art or act of adorning iron or steel, by making incisions, and filling them up with gold or silver wire: used in enriching the blades of swords, and locks of pistols. Chambers.

DA'MASKIN.* n. s. [Fr. damasquine. See DAMASKENING.] A sabre; probably from being made at Damascus.

No old Toledo blades, or damaskins;
No pistols, or some rare-spring carabines.
Howell's Lett. Poem to K. Ch. I. 1641.

DAME. n. s. [dame, Fr. dama, Span.]

1. A lady; the old title of honour to women. The word dame originally signified a mistress of a family, who was a lady; and it is used still in the English law to signify a lady: but in common use, now-a-days, it represents a farmer's wife, or a mistress of a family of the lower rank in the country. Watts, Logick.

Bless you, fair dame! I am not to you known,
Though in your state of honour I am perfect.
Shakspeare.

Not all these lords do vex me half so much
As that proud dame, the lord protector's wife.
Shakspeare.

Shut your mouth, dame. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

Sov'reign of creatures, universal dame!
Milton, P. L.

2. It is still used in poetry for women of rank.

His father Faunus: a Laurentian dame
His mother, fair Marica was her name. Dryden.

Who would not repeat that bliss,
And frequent sight of such a dame
Buy with the hazard of his fame? Waller.

3. Mistress of a low family.

They killed the poor cock; for, say they, if it were not for his waking our dame, she would not wake us. L'Estrange.

4. Women in general.

We've willing dames enough; there cannot be
That vulture in you to devour so many,
As will to greatness dedicate themselves. Shaks.

DAMES-VIOLET. n. s. A plant, called also queen's gillyflower. Miller.

To DAMN.† v. a. [damno, Lat. old Fr. damner, to condemn.]

1. To doom to eternal torments in a future state.

It is most necessary, that the church, by doctrine and decree, do damn and send to hell for ever those facts and opinions. Bacon.

2. To procure or cause to be eternally condemned.

That which he continues ignorant of, having done the utmost lying in his power, that he might not be ignorant of it, shall not damn him. South, Serm.

3. To condemn.

The council of Basil damned the payment of annats. Bp. Barlow, Rem. p. 172.

He will not swear but will backbite and rail; he will not be drunk, but will damn a man for not being of his opinion. Glanville, Serm. p. 47.

To damn one room, though of special use, for the benefit and beauty of all the rest: The Italians call it "una stanza dannata."
Wotton, Elem. of Architecture.

His own impartial thought
Will damn, and conscience will record the fault.
Dryden.

4. To hoot or hiss any publick performance; to explode.

They damn themselves, nor will my muse descend
To clap with such who fools and knaves commend.
Dryden.

For the great dons of wit,
Phœbus gives them full privilege alone
To damn all others, and cry up their own. Dryd.

You are so good a critick, that it is the greatest happiness of the modern poets that you do not hear their works; and next, that you are not so arrant a critick as to damn them, like the rest without hearing. Pope.

DA'MNABLE.† adj. [old Fr. dampnable.]

1. Deserving damnation; justly doomed to never-ending punishment; censurable; condemnable.

It gives him occasion of labouring with greater earnestness elsewhere, to entangle unwary minds with the snares of his damnable opinion. Hooker.

He's a creature unprepar'd, unmeet for death;
And, to transport him in the mind he is,
Were damnable. Shakspeare, Meas. for Meas.

It is a damnable plausibility so to regard the vain approbation or censure of the beholders, as in the mean time to neglect the allowance or judgment of God. Bp. Hall, Contemplat. B. 4.

As he does not reckon every schism of a damnable nature, so he is far from closing with the new opinion of those who make it no crime. Swift.

2. It is sometimes indecently used in a low and ludicrous sense; odious; pernicious.

Oh thou damnable fellow! did not I pluck thee by the nose for thy speeches?
Shakspeare, Meas. for Meas.

DA'MNABLENESS.* n. s. [from damnable.] That which deserves condemnation.

The question being of the damnableness of error. Chillingworth, Rel. of Prot.

When a man shall be perplexed with endless scruples, and fears, and doubts of the danger and damnableness of such things as are manifestly the violation of no law.
Goodman, Wint. Ev. Conf. P. iii.

DA'MNABLY.† adv. [from damnable.]

1. In such a manner as to incur eternal punishment; so as to be excluded from mercy; in such a manner as to deserve condemnation.

Many —— shelter themselves in a willing jail, there living merrily upon their defrauded creditor, whom they might honestly satisfy by a well improved liberty. This case is damnably unjust.
Bp. Hall, Cases of Conscience.

As for evil things or actions, if men find a time, yet sure God allows no season: those are always damnably unseasonable abuses of times, and of ourselves. Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 155.

All of them [the heathen] damnably superstitious and idolatrous in their worship; damnably unclean in their lives. Hammond, Works, iv. 596.

We will propose the question, whether those who hold the fundamentals of faith may deny Christ damnably, in respect of those consequences that arise from them? South, Serm.

2. It is indecently used in a ludicrous sense; odiously; hatefully.

The more sweets they bestowed upon them, the more damnably their conserves stunk. Dennis.

3. It is used, no less indecently, for excessively.

I find I am damnably in love.
Congreve, Old Bachelor.

DAMNA'TION.† n. s. [old Fr. damnation.]

1. Exclusion from divine mercy: condemnation to eternal punishment.

He that hath been affrighted with the fears of hell, or remembers how often he hath been spared from an horrible damnation, will not be ready to strangle his brother for a trifle.
Bp. Taylor, Worthy Communicant.

Now mince the sin,
And mollify damnation with a phrase:
Say you consented not to Sancho's death,
But barely not forbade it. Dryden.

2. Condemnation.

The word [κρίμα,] which our translators render damnation, (1 Cor. xi. 29.) does not here signify eternal condemnation, but a temporal judgement and chastisement in order to the prevention of eternal condemnation.
Tillotson, Persuasive to Frequent Communion.

DA'MNATORY.† adj. [from damnatorius.] Containing a sentence of condemnation.

This damnatory decree of the most venerable congregation of cardinals, having taken pains to fly over the Alps. Manifestation of the Abp. of Spalato, 1616, L. i.

Mr. Chillingworth had for a while, 'tis owned, some scruples upon him about the fourth commandment as appertaining to Christians, and about the damnatory clauses in the Athanasian creed; and therefore refused to subscribe for a time. This was in the year 1635. But within three years after, upon more mature consideration, he happily got over his difficulties and subscribed.

Waterland, Hist. of the Athan. Creed.

DA'MNED. part. adj. [from damn.] Hateful; detestable; abhorred; abominable.
Not in the legions
Of horrid hell, can come a devil more damn'd
In evils to top Macbeth. Shakspeare, Macbeth.
Let not the royal bed of Denmark be
A couch for luxury and damned incest.
Shakspeare, Hamlet.
But, oh, what damned minutes tells he o'er,
Who doats, yet doubts; suspects, yet strongly loves. Shakspeare.
Dare not
To brand the spotless virtue of my prince
With falsehoods of most base and damn'd contrivance. Rowe.

DAMNI'FICK. adj. [from damnify.] Procuring loss; mischievous.

To DA'MNIFY.† v.a. [from damnifico, Latin, Dr. Johnson says. It is rather from the old Fr. dampnifier.] To endamage; to injure; to cause loss to any; to hurt; to impair.
When now he saw himself so freshly rear,
As if late fight had nought him damnify'd,
He was dismay'd, and gan his fate to fear.
Spenser, F. Q.
They more offend in too sparing diet, and are worse damnified than they that feed liberally.
Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 74.
That the commonwealth of learning be not damnified. Milton, Areopagitica.
He who has suffered the damage, has a right to demand in his own name, and he alone can remit, satisfaction: the damnified person has the power of appropriating the goods or service of the offender, by right of self-preservation. Locke.

DA'MNINGNESS. n. s. [from damning.] Tendency to procure damnation.
He may vow never to return to those sins which he hath had such experience of, for the emptiness and damningness of them, and so think himself a complete penitent. Hammond.

DAMP.† adj. [Teut. Dan. and Dutch, damp, dampff, vapour. Serenius deduces it from the ancient Scyth. daa, to evaporate. Su. dufwen, evaporated.]
1. Moist; inclining to wet; not completely dry; foggy.
She said no more: the trembling Trojans hear,
O'erspread with a damp sweat and holy fear.
Dryden.
2. Dejected; sunk; depressed.
All these and more came flocking, but with looks
Downcast and damp; yet such wherein appear'd
Obscure some glimpse of joy. Milton, P. L.

DAMP. n. s.
1. Fog; moist air; moisture.
Night; not now, as ere man fell,
Wholsom and cool, and mild; but with black air
Accompany'd, with damps and dreadful gloom.
Milton, P. L.
A rift there was, which from the mountain's height
Convey'd a glimmering and malignant light,
A breathing-place to draw the damps away,
A twilight of an intercepted day. Dryden.
2. A noxious vapour exhaled from the earth.
The heat of the sun in the hotter seasons, penetrating the exteriour parts of the earth, excites those mineral exhalations in subterraneous caverns, which are called damps: these seldom happen but in the summer-time, when the hotter the weather is, the more frequent are the damps. Woodward.
3. Dejection; depression of spirit; cloud of the mind.
Adam, by this from the cold sudden damp
Recov'ring and his scatter'd spirits return'd,
To Michael thus his humble words address'd.
Milton, P. L.
His name struck every where so great a damp,
As Archimedes through the Roman camp.
Roscommon.
Even now, while thus I stand blest in thy presence,
A secret damp of grief comes o'er my thoughts.
Addison.
An eternal state, he knows and confesses that he has made no provision for, that he is undone for ever: a prospect enough to cast a damp over his sprightliest hours. Rogers.
This commendable resentment against me, strikes a damp upon that spirit in all ranks and corporations of men. Swift.

To DAMP. v. a. [from the noun.]
1. To wet; to moisten; to make humid.
2. To depress; to deject; to chill; to dull.
The very loss of one pleasure is enough to damp the relish of another. L'Estrange.
Dread of death hangs over the mere natural man, and like the hand-writing on the wall, damps all his jollity. Atterbury.
It would be enough to damp their warmth in such pursuits, if they could once reflect, that in such course they will be sure to run upon the very rock they mean to avoid. Swift.
3. To weaken; to abate; to hebetate; to discourage.
A soft body dampeth the sound much more than a hard. Bacon.
4. To hebetate; to abate motion; to discourage; to dull.
Usury dulls and damps all industries, improvements, and new inventions, wherein money would be stirring, if it were not for this slug. Bacon.
Unless an age too late, or cold
Climate or years, damp my intended wing
Depress'd. Milton, P. L.

DA'MPISH.* adj. [from damp.] Moist; inclining to wet.
And as fierce fire, wrapt up in dampish cloud,
With violent force the sides thereof doth rend,
And with pale lightning thunder downe doth send.
Mir. for Mag. p. 826.
Caves and grots under ground, places dark and dampish. Bp. Andrewes, Answ. to Card. Perron, 1629, p. 18.
One mile in dampish shade.
More, Song of the Soul, ii. 62.

DA'MPISHNESS. n. s. [from damp.] Tendency to wetness; fogginess; moisture.
It hath been used by some with great success to make their walls thick; and to put a lay of chalk between the bricks to take away all dampishness.
Bacon.

DA'MPNESS. n. s. [from damp.] Moisture; fogginess.
Nor need they fear the dampness of the sky,
Should flag their wings, and hinder them to fly;
'Twas only water thrown on sails too dry.
Dryden.
By stacks they often have very great loss, by the dampness of the ground, which rots and spoils it.
Mortimer.

DA'MPY.† adj. [from damp.]
1. Moist; damp.
What is she but obscure? and her more dampy shade,
And covert, but a den for beasts of ravin made.
Drayton, Polyolb. S. 7.
2. Dejected; gloomy; sorrowful.
The lords did dispel dampy thoughts, which the remembrance of his uncle might raise, by applying him with exercises and disports. Haywood.

DA'MSEL.† n. s. [formerly the name of young persons of distinction of both sexes. Fr. dameisel, damoiseau, damoiselle. It is by us only now applied to females. Bas Bret. damesell; low Lat. domicella, domsella.]
1. A young gentlewoman; a young woman of distinction; now only used in verse.
Kneeling, I my servant's smiles implore,
And one mad damsel dares dispute my pow'r.
Prior.
2. An attendant of the better rank.
With her train of damsels she was gone.
In shady walks, the scorching heat to shun.
Dryden.
3. A wench; a country lass.
The clowns are whoremasters, and the damsels with child. Gay.

DA'MSON. n. s. [corruptly from damascene.] A small black plum. See DAMASCENE.
My wife desir'd some damsons,
And made me climb with danger of my life. Shaks.

DAN. n. s. [from dominus, as now don in Spanish, and donna, Italian, from domina.] The old term of honour for men; as we now say Master. I know not that it was ever used in prose, and imagine it to have been rather of ludicrous import.
Dan Chaucer, well of English undefiled.
Spenser, F. Q.
This whimpled, whining, purblind, wayward boy,
This signor Junio's giant dwarf, dan Cupid.
Shakspeare.
Dick, if this story pleaseth thee,
Pray thank dan Pope, who told it me.
Prior, Alma.

To DANCE. v. n. [danser, Fr. dançar, Span. as some think from tanza, Arabic, a dance; as Junius, who loves to derive from Greek, thinks, from δόνησις.] To move in measure; to move with steps correspondent to the sound of instruments.
What say you to young Mr. Fenton? He capers, he dances, he has eyes of youth, he writes verses. Shakspeare.

To DANCE Attendance. v. n. To wait with suppleness and obsequiousness.
Men are sooner weary to dance attendance at the gates of foreign lords, than to tarry the good leisure of their own magistrates. Ralegh, Essays.
It upbraids you
To let your father's friend, for three long months,
Thus dance attendance for a word of audience.
Dryden.

To DANCE. v. a. To make to dance; to put into a lively motion.
Thy grandsire lov'd thee well;
Many a time he danc'd thee on his knee. Shaksp.
That I see thee here,
Thou noble thing: more dances my rapt' heart,
Than when I first my wedded mistress saw
Bestride my threshold. Shakspeare, Coriol.
In pestilences the malignity of the infecting vapour danceth the principal spirts. Bacon.

DANCE. n. s. [from the verb.] A motion of one or many in concert, regulated by musick.
Our dance of custom, round about the oak
Of Herne the hunter.
Shakspeare, M. Wives of Windsor.
The honourablest part of talk is to give the occasion, and again to moderate and pass to somewhat else; for then a man leads the dance. Bacon.
But you perhaps expect a modish feast,
With am'rous songs and wanton dances grac'd.
Dryden.

DA'NCER. n. s. [from dance.] One that practises the art of dancing.

He at Philippi kept
His sword e'en like a dancer, while I strook
The lean and wrinkled Cassius. Shakspeare.

Musicians and dancers! take some truce
With these your pleasing labours; for great use
As much weariness as perfection brings. Donne.

The earl was so far from being a good dancer, that he was no graceful goer. Wotton.

It is a usual practice for our funambulours, or dancers on the rope, to attempt somewhat like to flying. Wilkins.

He, perfect dancer! climbs the rope,
And balances your fear and hope. Prior.

Nature, I thought, perform'd too mean a part,
Forming her movements to the rules of art:
And, vex'd, I found that the musician's hand
Had o'er the dancer's mind too great command.
Prior.

DA'NCING.* n. s. [from dance.] The act of moving with steps correspondent to musick.

Elders the gates, youth did their songs forbear;
Gone was our joy; our dancings mournings were.
Donne, Poems, p. 365.

DA'NCINGMASTER. n. s. [dance and master.] One who teaches the art of dancing.

The apes were taught their ape's tricks by a dancingmaster. L'Estrange.

The legs of a dancingmaster, and the fingers of a musician, fall, as it were, naturally, without thought or pains, into regular and admirable motions. Locke on Understanding.

DA'NCINGSCHOOL. n. s. [dancing and school.] The school where the art of dancing is taught.

They bid us to the English dancing schools,
And teach lavoltas high, and swift courantos;
Saying our grace is only in our heels.
Shakspeare, Hen. V.

A certain Egyptian king endowed a dancing-school for the institution of apes of quality.
L'Estrange.

DANDELI'ON. n. s. [dent de lion, French.] The name of a plant.

It agrees in all respects with the hawk-weed, but only in its having a single naked stalk, with one flower upon the top. Miller.

For cowslips sweet, let dandelions spread;
For Blouzelinda, blithsome maid, is dead!
Gay's Pastorals.

To DA'NDER.* v. n. To wander about. It is also used for to ramble in conversation, to talk incoherently. Wilbraham's Chesh. Gloss.

DA'NDIPRAT. n. s. [dandin, French, Dr. Johnson says; which means a fool. But our expression seems to be borrowed from a small coin of Henry the seventh's time. "King Henry the seventh stamped a small coin, called dandyprats; and first, as I read, coined shillings, whereas before it was a name of weight, rather than a coin." Camden on Money, in his Remains. Our old lexicography preserves this meaning: "Dandiprat, a small piece of money, long since out of use; also, a dwarf." Sherwood. And Barret has "a knave scarce worth a dandiprat." Skinner, however, derives it from the Dutch danten, to sport, and praet, trifles.] A little fellow; an urchin: a word used sometimes in fondness, sometimes in contempt.

One of her chaplaines, — a very dandiprat, and exceedingly deformed.
World of Wonders, (1608,) p. 178.

To DA'NDLE. v. a. [dandelin, Dutch.]

1. To shake a child on the knee, or in the hands, to please and quiet him.

Then shall ye suck, and shall be born upon her sides, and be dandled upon her knees. Isaiah.

Thy little brethren, which, like fairy sprights,
Oft skip into our chamber those sweet nights,
And, kiss'd and dandl'd on thy father's knee,
Were brib'd next day to tell what they did see.
Donne.

Courts are but superficial schools
To dandle fools. Bacon.

Sporting the lion ramp'd, and in his paw

Motion occasions sleep, as we find by the common use of rocking froward children in cradles, or dandling them in their nurses arms. Temple.

2. To fondle; to treat like a child.

Their child shall be advanc'd,
And be received for the emp'ror's heir;
And let the emperor dandle him for his own.
Shakspeare.

They have put me in a silk gown, and a gaudy fool's cap; I am ashamed to be dandled thus, and cannot look in the glass without blushing, to see myself turned into such a little pretty master.
Addison, Guardian.

3. To delay; to procrastinate; to protract by trifles; not in use.

Captains do so dandle their doings, and dally in the service, as if they would not have the enemy subdued. Spenser.

DA'NDLER.† n. s. [from dandle.] One that dandles or fondles children. Fr. mignardeur. Sherwood.

DA'NDRUFF. n. s. [often written dendriff, from ταν, the itch, and δρορ, sordid, filthy.] Scabs in the head; scurf at the roots of the hair.

DA'NDY.* n. s. The modern abbreviation of Jack-a-dandy; which see: a word used in ridicule or contempt.

DA'NDY-COCK or HEN.* n. s. Bantam fowls. A Cheshire expression, Mr. Wilbraham observes; and used, if I mistake not, in other counties.

DANE.* n. s. [The Danes are said to have their name after Dan, their first king, of whom the country of Denmark, a very ancient kingdom, did also take appellation. Verstegan. Dænar, Danes, Sax. Dæna laȝ, the Jurisdiction of the Danes.] A native of Denmark.

Upon the death of Hardi-Canutus, the last of their three kings, it was agreed upon and decreed by the chief lords and nobles of the realm [of England,] that no Dane from thenceforth should any more reign over them.
Verstegan, Rest. of Dec. Intell. ch. 6.

If the Saxons came, most of them, from Jutland and Anglen, a part of Denmark, as Danish writers affirm, and that Danes and Normans are the same; then, in this invasion, Danes drove out Danes, their own posterity. Milton, Hist. of Eng. B. 5.

DA'NEGELD.* n. s. [from Dane, and Sax. ȝelt, a debt. Hence perhaps the terms Danism and Danist for usury and an usurer, not disused in the seventeenth century. See Cockeram's Dictionary.] The tribute laid upon our ancestors, the Saxons, of twelve pence upon every hide of land through the realm by the Danes. Cowel.

He [Edward the Confessor] remitted the heavy imposition called Danegeld, amounting to 40,000 a year, which had been constantly collected after the occasion ceased.
Burke, Abridg. of Engl. Hist. ii. 5.

DA'NISH.* adj. [from Dane. Sax. Denirc.] Relating to the Danes.

Hardecanute thus dead, the English, rejoicing at this unexpected riddance from the Danish yoke, sent over to Elfred. Milton, Hist. of Eng. B. 6.

DANISM and DANIST.* See DANEGELD.

DA'NEWORT. n. s. A species of elder; called also dwarf-elder, or wall-wort.

DA'NGER.† n. s. [danger, Fr. of uncertain derivation. Skinner derives it from damnum, Menage from angaria, Minsheu from δάνος, death, to which Junius seems inclined. So far Dr. Johnson; who omits a derivation from damnum gerere, which is very probable, in the abbreviation of those words, and by the sense which they bear.]

1. Risque; hazard; peril.

They that sail on the sea, tell of the danger.
Ecclus. xliii. 24.

Our craft is in danger to be set at nought.
Acts, x. 27.

He hath writ this to feel my affection to your honour, and to no other pretence of danger.
Shakspeare.

More danger now from man alone we find,
Than from the rocks, the billows, and the wind.
Waller.

2. Custody. [old Fr. dangier; low Lat. dangerium.] Obsolete.

Narcissus was a bachilere,
That love had caught in his daungere.
Chaucer, Rom. R. 1470.

Through the blindnesse of princes, the Romish clergy have them fast yoked, and in their danger.
Bp. Jewel, Apol. Ch. Eng. P. 6. ch. 15.

You stand within his danger, do you not?
Shakspeare, Merch. of Venice.

To DA'NGER. v. a. [from the noun.] To put in hazard; to endanger.

Pompey's son stands up
For the main soldier; whose quality going on,
The sides o'th' world may danger. Shakspeare.

DA'NGERLESS. adj. [from danger.] Without hazard; without risque; exempt from danger.

He shewed no less magnanimity in dangerless despising, than others in dangerous affecting the multiplying of kingdoms. Sidney.

DA'NGEROUS.† adj. [old Fr. dangereux.] Hazardous; perilous; full of danger.

A man of an ill tongue is dangerous in his city.
Ecclus. ix.

All men counsel me to take away thy life, likely to bring forth nothing but dangerous and wicked effects. Sidney.

Already we have conquer'd half the war,
And the less dangerous part is left behind. Dryden.

DA'NGEROUSLY. adv. [from dangerous.] Hazardously; perilously; with danger.

But for your son, believe it, oh, believe it,
Most dang'rously you have with him prevail'd,
If not most mortal to him. Shakspeare, Coriol.

A sort of naughty persons
Have practis'd dangerously against your state,
Dealing with witches and with conjurers. Shaks.

It is just with God to permit those, which think they stand so surely, to fall most dangerously.
Hammond on Fundamentals.

Plutarch says, Telesilla, a noble lady, being dangerously sick, was advised to apply her mind to poetry. Peacham.

If it were so; which but to think were pride,
My constant love would dangerously be tried.
Dryden.

DA'NGEROUSNESS. n. s. [from dangerous] Danger; hazard; peril.

I shall not need to mind you of judging of the dangerousness of diseases, by the nobleness of the part affected. Boyle.

To DA'NGLE.† v. n. [from hang, according to Skinner; as, hang, hangle, dangle, Dr. Johnson says. But Skinner's exact etymology is ðun or ðune, Sax. down, and hangan; yet our word must be referred to the Swedish dangla or dingla, to dangle. V. Widegren.] To hang loose and quivering.

Go, bind thou up yond dangling apricocks. Shakspeare.

He'd rather on a gibbet dangle,
Than miss his dear delight to wrangle. Hudibras.

Codrus had but one bed; so short to boot,
That his short wife's short legs hung dangling out. Dryden.

With dangling hands he strokes th' imperial robe,
And with a cuckold's air commands the globe. Smith.

But have you not with thought beheld
The sword hang dangling o'er the shield. Prior.

2. To hang upon any one; to be an humble, useless, harmless follower.

The presbyterians, and other fanaticks that dangle after them, are well inclined to pull down the present establishment. Swift.

DA'NGLER. n. s. [from dangle.] A man that hangs about women only to waste time.

A dangler is of neither sex. Ralph.

DANK. adj. [from tuncken, Germ. Skinner, and Dr. Johnson. "Originally from the Runick. Dutch, doncker, cloudy; Su.-Goth. dunken." Craven Dialect.] Damp; humid; moist; wet.

He her the maiden sleeping found,
On the dank and dirty ground. Shakspeare.

Yet oft they quit
The dank, and, rising on stiff pinions, tour
The mid aerial sky. Milton, P. L.

Through each thicket, dank or dry
Like a black mist, low creeping, he held on
His midnight search. Milton, P. L.

Now that the fields are dank, and ways are mire,
Where shall we sometimes meet, and by the fire
Help waste a sullen day. Milton, Sonnet.

By the rushy-fringed bank,
Where grows the willow and the osier dank,
My sliding chariot stays. Milton, Comus.

Me, in my vow'd
Picture, the sacred wall declares t' have hung
My dank and dropping weeds
To the stern god of sea. Milton, Comus.

To wash the skins of beasts and fowls herewith, would keep them from growing dank in moist weather. Grew.

DANK.* n. s. Damp.

The rawish dank of clumsy winter ramps
The fluent summer's vein; and drizling sleet
Chilleth the wan bleak cheek of the numm'd earth. Marston, Ant. and Mell. P. ii. Prol.

DA'NKISH.† adj. Somewhat dank.

They bound me, bore me thence,
And in a dark and dankish vault at home,
There left me. Shakspeare.

She shew'd me all the dongeon where I sate,
The dankish walles, the darkes, and bade me smell,
And bide the savour if I lik'd it well. Mir. for Mag. p. 67.

The former gunpowder, so as aforesaid bestowed and placed there, was become dankish. Proceed. against Garnet, sign. C.

DA'NKISHNESS.* n. s. [from dankish.] Moisture; dampness. Sherwood.

To DAP or DAPE.† v. n. [corrupted from dip, Dr. Johnson says. It is also sometimes called dib, or dab; and signifies the playing of the fly, whether natural or artificial, on the surfuce of the water, by raising or sinking it. See To DIBBLE.] To let fall gently into the water: a word, I believe, only used by anglers.

I have taught him how to catch a chub, by dapping with a grasshopper. Walton.

The stone-fly we dape or dibble with, as with the drake. Cotton's Angler.

DAPA'TICAL.† adj. [from dapaticus, Lat.] Sumptuous in cheer. Dr. Johnson cites Bailey as his authority for this word; but it existed in our lexicography more than a century before Bailey's time.

Dapatical meats [are] dainty meats. Cockeram.

*DA'PIFER. n. s. [Lat. and found in the old French also. Literally, a dish-carrier.] One who brings meat to the table; a sewer.

Thou art all for inlandish meat, and outlandish sawces; thou art the dapifer to thy palate, or the cup-bearer to thy appetite. Reeve, God's Plea for Nineveh, 1657.

DA'PPER.† adj. [dapper, Dutch, Dr. Johnson says; which is valiant, strenuous. The Swedish tapper is the same. Our word is, therefore, an ironical derivation where it is used in contempt. But dapper has another meaning, unnoticed by Dr. Johnson.]

1. Little and active; lively without bulk. It is usually spoken in contempt.

And on the tawny sands and shelves,
Trip the pert fairies and the dapper elves. Milton, Comus.

A pert dapper spark of a magpye, fancied the birds would never be governed till himself should sit at the helm. L'Estrange.

2. Pretty; neat.

The dapper ditties, that I wont devise,
To feed youth's fancy. Spenser, Shep. Cal. Oct.

Tune thy reed to dapper virelays. Drayton Shep. Garl. p. 13.

DA'PPERLING. n. s. [from dapper.] A dwarf; a dandiprat. Ainsworth.

DA'PPLE. adj. [from apple; as pommelé.] Marked with various colours; variegated; streaked; imbricated: it is used chiefly of animals.

My country neighbours do not find it impossible to think of a lame horse, till they have run over all beings that are, and then pitch on dapple. Locke.

To DA'PPLE. v. a. [from the adjective.] To streak; to vary; to diversify with colours.

But under him a grey steed did he weild,
Whose sides with dappled circles were endight. Spenser.

The gentle day
Dapples the drowsy east with spots of grey. Shakspeare.

Horses that are dappled, turn white; and old squirrels turn grisly. Bacon.

The lark begins his flight,
From his watch-tower in the skies,
Till the dappl'd dawn doth rise. Milton, L'All.

The dappl'd pink, and blushing rose,
Deck my charming Cloe's hair. Prior.

The gods, to curse Pamela with her pray'rs,
Gave the gilt coach and dappled Flanders mares. Pope.

DAR. } n. s. A fish found in the Severn.
DART. } Bailey. Dart is the same with Dace.

DARD.* n. s. [dard, Fr. dardus, low Lat.] What throws out, or casts forward, as a dart is thrown. Not now in use.

Through the spikes of the trident are made three dards or spouts.
Dr. Harris's Descr. of the Palace at Loo, 1699, p. 31.

To DARE.† v. n. pret. I durst; the preterite I dared belongs to the active dare; part. I have dared. [þeappan, Saxon; derren, Dutch; from the Goth. daurstan.] To have courage for any purpose; not to be afraid; to adventure; to be adventurous.

Dar'st thou be as good as thy word now?—Why, Hal, thou know'st, as thou art but a man, I dare; but as thou art a prince, I fear thee. Shakspeare.

I dare do all that may become a man;
Who dares do more, is none. Shakspeare.

They are both hanged; and so would this be, if he durst steal any thing advent'rously. Shaksp.

Neither of them was of that temper as to dare any dangerous fact. Haywood.

The father bore it with undaunted soul,
Like one who durst his destiny controul. Dryden.

Deliberate and well-weighed courage knows both to be cautious and to dare, as occasion offers. Dryden.

We dare not build much upon such a notion or doctrine, till it be very fully examined. Watts.

To DARE.† v. a. pret. I dared, not I durst.

1. To challenge; to defy.

I never in my life
Did hear a challenge urg'd more modestly,
Unless a brother should a brother dare
To gentle exercise and proof of arms. Shakspeare.

Here she stands:
Take but possession of her with a touch;
I dare thee but to breathe upon my love. Shaksp.

He had many days come half seas over; and sometimes passing further, came and lay at the mouth of the harbour, daring them to fight. Knolles.

Masters of the arts of policy thought that they might even defy and dare Providence to the face. South.

All cold, but in her breast, I will despise;
And dare all heat but that in Celia's eyes. Roscommon.

Time! I dare thee to discover
Such a youth, and such a lover. Dryden.

Presumptuous wretch! with mortal art to dare
Immortal power, and brave the thunderer. Granville.

2. To frighten.

Those mad mischiefs
Would dare a woman. Beaum. and Fl. Maid's Tragedy.

To DARE Larks. To catch them by means of a looking-glass, or by keeping a bird of prey hovering aloft, which keeps them in amaze till caught; to amaze.

Shrimps are dipped up in shallow water with little round nets, not much unlike that which is used for daring larks. Carew.

As larks lie dar'd to shun the hobby's flight. Dryden.

DARE. n. s. [from the verb.] Defiance; challenge.

Sextus Pompeius
Hath given the dare to Cæsar, and command's
The empire of the sea. Shakspeare.

DARE. n. s. A small fish, the same with dace. Leuciscus.

DA'RER.* n. s. [from dare.] One who dares or defies.

Don Michael, Leon; another darer come. Beaum. and Fl. Rule a Wife.

DA'REFUL. adj. [dare and full.] Full of defiance: not in use.

We might have met them dareful, beard to beard,
And beat them backward home. Shakspeare.

DA'RING. adj. [from dare.] Bold; adventurous; fearless; courageous; intrepid; brave; stout.

The last Georgick has many metaphors, but not so daring as this; for human passions may be more naturally ascribed to a bee than to an inanimate plant Addison.

The song too daring, and the theme too great. Prior.

Grieve not, O daring prince! that noble heart. Pope.

DA'RINGLY. adv. [from daring.] Boldly; courageously; fearlessly; impudently; outrageously.

Some of the great principles of religion are every day openly and daringly attacked from the press. Atterbury.

Your brother, fir'd with his success,
Too daringly upon the foe did press. Halifax.

DA'RINGNESS.† n. s. [from daring.] Boldness.

That our hope be but commensurate to our sincerity; our daringness to our duty. Hammond's Works, iv. 554.

DARK.† adj. [Sax. beopc; Iceland. dorkur, black.]

1. Not light; wanting light.

Fleance, his son, who keeps him company,
Must embrace the fate of that dark hour. Shaksp.

While we converse with her, we mark
No want of day, nor think it dark. Waller.

2. Not of a showy or vivid colour.

If the plague be somewhat dark, and the plague spread not in the skin, the priest shall pronounce him clean. Leviticus.

In Muscovy the generality of the people are more inclined to have dark coloured hair than flaxen. Boyle.

3. Blind; without the enjoyment of light.

Thou wretched daughter of a dark old man,
Conduct my weary steps. Dryden and Lee, Œdipus.

4. Opake; not transparent: as, lead is a dark body.

5. Obscure; not perspicuous.

What may seem dark at the first, will afterwards be found more plain. Hooker.

Mean time we shall express our darker purpose. Shakspeare.

6. Not enlightened by knowledge; ignorant.

The age, wherein he liv'd, was dark; but he Could not want sight, who taught the world to see. Denham.

7. Gloomy; not cheerful.

All men of dark tempers, according to their degree of melancholy or enthusiasm, may find convents fitted to their humours. Addison, on Italy.

8. Secret.

Now, if you could wear a mind
Dark as your fortune is. Shakspeare, Cymb.

9. Unclean; foul.

His eye survey'd the dark idolatries
Of alienated Judah. Milton, P. L.

DARK.† n. s.

1. Darkness; obscurity; want of light.

Come, thick night,
And pall thee in the dunnest smoke of hell,
That my keen knife see not the wound it makes;
Nor heav'n peep through the blanket of the dark,
To cry hold, hold! Shakspeare, Macb.

Cloud and ever-during dark
Surrounds me! from the cheerful ways of men
Cut off. Milton.

Whereas seeing requires light, and a free medium, and a right line to the objects, we can hear in the dark immured, and by curve lines. Holder.

2. Obscurity; condition of one unknown.

All he says of himself is, that he is an obscure person; one, I suppose he means, that is in the dark. Atterbury.

3. Want of knowledge.

Till we ourselves perceive by our own understandings, we are as much in the dark, and as void of knowledge, as before. Locke.

4. A dark place; a prison.

She shew'd me all the dongeon where I sate,
The dankish walles, the darkes, and bade me smell,
And bide the savour if I lik't it well.
Mir. for Mag. p. 67.

5. A blot; a stain.

And had the poet not been brib'd to a modest
Expression of your antick gambols in it,
Some darks had been discover'd.
Shirley, Com. L. of Pleasure.

DARK-HOUSE.* n. s. Our old word for a madhouse.

Love is a madness, and deserves as well a dark-house, and a whip, as madmen do. Shaksp. As you like it.

Why have you suffered me to be imprisoned, kept in a dark-house? Shaksp. Twelfth N.

DARK-WORKING.* adj. Working in a dark or foul manner.

Dark-working sorcerers, that change the mind. Shakspeare, Com. of Err.

Foul ministers, dark-working by the force
Of secret-sapping gold. Thomson, Liberty, P. IV.

To DARK.† v. a. [from the noun.] To darken; to obscure: obsolete, Dr. Johnson says, citing only Spenser. It is one of our oldest verbs; for Wicliffe and Chaucer use it. Nor was it obsolete till after Milton's time.

Fair when that cloud of pride, which oft doth dark
Her goodly light, with smiles she drives away. Spenser.

The earth cumber'd, and the wing'd air dark'd with plumes, Milton, Comus.

The businesses and pleasures of life — will dark and deaden the heart to prayer. Bp. Hopkins, Exposit. 1692, p. 264.

To DA'RKEN.† v. a. [Sax. abeopcian, to darken.]

1. To make dark; to deprive of light.

I will darken the earth in the clear day. Amos, viii. 9.

Black with surrounding forests then it stood,
That hung above, and darken'd all the flood. Addison.

Whether the darken'd room to muse invite,
Or whiten'd wall provoke the skew'r to write. Pope.

2. To cloud; to perplex.

Such was his wisdom, that his confidence did seldom darken his foresight, especially in things near hand. Bacon.

3. To foul; to sully.

The lusts and passions of men do sully and darken their minds, even by a natural influence. Tillotson.

To DA'RKEN. v. n. To grow dark.

DA'RKENER.* n. s. [from darken.] That which darkens and confounds.

I know no disease of the soul but ignorance; not of the arts and sciences, but of itself: yet relating to those it is a pernicious evil, the darkener of man's life, the disturber of his reason, and common confounder of truth. B. Jonson, Discov.

Thus much for the first great darkener of men's minds, sensuality; and that, in both the branches of it; lust and intemperance. South, Serm. iii. 76.

DA'RKISH.* adj. [from dark.] Dusky; approaching to dark; not of a vivid colour.

Then the priest shall look; and behold, if the bright spots in the skin of their flesh be darkish white. Levit. xiii. 39.

The days more darkish are,
More short, cold, moist. Induct. Mir. for Mag.

Ha! I should know their shapes
Though it be darkish. Beaum. and Fl. The Capt.

The leaf was darkish, and had prickles on it. Milton, Comus.

DA'RKLING. [a participle, as it seems, from darkle, which yet I have never found; or perhaps a kind of diminutive from dark, as young, youngling.] Being in the dark; being without light: a word merely poetical.

O, wilt thou darkling leave me? do not so. Shakspeare.

Darkling stands
The varying shore o' the world. Shakspeare.

The wakeful bird
Sings darkling, and, in shadiest covert hid,
Tunes her nocturnal note. Milton, P. L.

Darkling they mourn their fate, whom Circe's pow'r,
With words and wicked herbs, from human kind
Had alter'd, and in brutal shapes confin'd. Dryden.

DA'RKLY.† adv. [from dark.] In a situation void of light; obscurely; blindly; gloomily; uncertainly; secretly.

For now we see through a glass darkly. 1 Cor. xiii. 12.

2d Lord. I will tell you a thing, but you shall let it dwell darkly with you.

1st Lord. When you have spoken it, 'tis dead; and I am the grave of it. Shaksp. All's Well.

For well you know, and can record alone,
What fame to future times conveys but darkly down. Dryden.

DA'RKNESS.† n. s. [from dark.]

1. Absence of light.

Darkness was upon the face of the deep. Genesis.

I go whence I shall not return, even to the land of darkness and the shadow of death. Job.

2. Opakeness; want of transparency.

3. Obscurity; want of perspicuity, difficultness to the understanding.

4. Infernal gloom; wickedness.

The instruments of darkness tell us truths;
Win us with honest trifles, to betray us
In deepest consequence. Shakspeare.

5. State of being intellectually clouded; ignorance; uncertainty.

All the light truth has, or can have, is from the clearness and validity of those proofs upon which it is received: to talk of any other light in the understanding, is to put ourselves in the dark, or in the power of the prince of darkness. Locke.

6. Secrecy. See the 8th sense of DARK.

Darkness, applied to the mind, is secrecy; applied to the fortune, is obscurity. Johnson, Notes on Shakspeare.

7. The empire of Satan, or the devil.

Who hath delivered us from the power of darkness, and translated us into the kingdom of his dear Son. Colossians.

DA'RKSOME. adj. [from dark.] Gloomy; obscure; not well enlightened; not luminous.

He brought him through a darksome narrow pass,
To a broad gate. Spenser.

And her fair eyes, like stars that dimmed were
With darksome cloud, now shew their goodly beams. Spenser.

You must not look to have an image in any thing lightsome; for even a face in iron, red-hot, will not be seen, the light confounding the small differences of lightsome and darksome which shew the figure. Bacon.

A darksome cloud of locusts, swarming down,
Must eat, and on the ground leave nothing green. Milton, P. L.

He here with us to be,
Forsook the courts of everlasting day,
And chose with us a darksome house of mortal clay. Milton, P. L.
Mistaken blessing, which old age they call,
'Tis a long, nasty, darksome hospital. Dryden.
The darksome pines that o'er yon rocks reclin'd,
Wave high, and murmur to the hollow wind. Pope.

DA'RLING. adj. [ðeorling, Sax. diminutive of dear.] Favourite; dear; beloved; regarded with great kindness and tenderness.

'Tis not for a generous prince to countenance oppression and injustice, even in his most darling favourites. L'Estrange.
Have a care lest some beloved notion or some darling science, too far prevail over your mind. Watts.

DA'RLING. n. s. A favourite; one much beloved.

Young Ferdinand they suppose is drown'd,
And his and my lov'd darling. Shakspeare.
In Thames, the ocean's darling, England's pride,
The pleasing emblem of his reign does glide. Halifax.
She became the darling of the princess. Addison.

To DARN.† v. a. [of uncertain original, Dr. Johnson says. It seems to be the same as dearn, which is the Sax. ðeapnan, or ðýrnan, to hide or conceal. Sherwood, in his old dictionary, has "to dearn up a rent." But others cite the Welsh darn, to patch. Craven Dial. and Brocket's N. C. Words.] To mend holes by imitating the texture of the stuff.

To darn up the rents of schism by calling a council. Milton, Reason of Ch. Gov. B. 1.
Will she thy linen wash, or hosen darn? Gay.
He spent every day ten hours in his closet, in darning his stockings, which he performed to admiration. Swift.

DA'RNEL. n. s. [Lolium.] A weed growing in the fields.

He was met ev'n now
Crown'd with rank fumiter and furrow-weeds,
Darnel, and all the idle weeds that grow
In our sustaining corn. Shakspeare.
Want ye corn for bread?
'Twas full of darnel; do you like the taste? Shakspeare.
No fruitful crop the sickly fields return;
But oats and darnel choak the rising corn. Dryden.

DA'RNICK.* See DORNICK.

DA'RNING.* n. s. [from darn.] The act of mending holes in apparel.

Now supposing those stockings of Sir John's endued with some degree of consciousness at every particular darning, they would have been sensible, that they were the same individual pair of stockings, both before and after the darning; and this sensation would have continued in them through all the succession of darnings! Arbuthnot and Pope, Mart. Scrib.

To DA'RRAIN.† v. a. [This word is by Junius referred to dare: it seems to me more probably deducible from arranger la battaille, Dr. Johnson says. Spenser often combines battle with arrange; and darrain, in the Mirour for Magistrates, is written in a manner, which may seem to countenance Dr. Johnson's etymology: "We—should d'araine battell," edit. 1610. p. 599. But the word may be from the old French desrener. See To DERAIGN.]

1. To prepare for battle; to range troops for battle.

The town-boys parted in twain, the one side calling themselves Pompeians, the other Cæsarians; and then darraining a kind of battle, but without arms, the Cæsarians got the over-hand. Carew, Surv. of Cornwall.
Comes Warwick, backing of the duke of York:
Darrain your battle; for they are at hand. Shaks.

2. To apply to the fight, of single combatants.

Therewith they 'gan to hurlen greedily,
Redoubted battle ready to darraine. Spenser.

DART.† n. s. [dard, French.]

1. A missile weapon thrown by the hand; a small lance.

Here one is wounded or slain with a piece of a rock or flint; there another with a dart, arrow, or lance. Peacham.
O'erwhelm'd with darts, which from afar they fling,
The weapons round his hollow temples ring. Dryden.

2. [In poetry.] Any missile weapon.

And from about her shot darts of desire
Into all eyes, to wish her still in sight. Milton, P. L.

To DART. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To throw offensively.

He whets his tusks, and turns, and dares the war;
Th' invaders dart their jav'lins from afar. Dryden.

2. To throw; to emit; as the sun darts his beams on the earth.

Pan came, and ask'd what magick caus'd my smart;
Or what ill eyes malignant glances dart. Pope.

To DART. v. n.

1. To fly as a dart.
2. To let fly with hostile intention.

Now, darting Parthia, art thou struck. Shaksp.

DA'RTER.* n. s. [from dart.] One who throws a dart. Sherwood.

The thunder darter
Made a bright sword the gate. Sylvester, Du Bart. 1621. p. 173.

To DASH.† v. a. [The etymology of this word, in any of its senses, is very doubtful, Dr. Johnson says. The Iceland. and Swedish daska, to which Serenius refers, is to inflict blows, to drub. In the sense of confound, or to make ashamed suddenly, it seems probable, that to daze or dase (for so it was anciently written) is the parent of it. See To DAZE. In other senses, the Gr. δάζομαι, to scatter, to divide has been offered. After all, the word is probably formed from the sound.]

1. To throw or strike any thing suddenly against something.

If you dash a stone against a stone in the bottom of the water, it maketh a sound. Bacon.
A man that cuts himself, and tears his own flesh, and dashes his head against the stones, does not act so unreasonably as the wicked man. Tillotson.

2. To break by collision.

They that stand high, have many blasts to shake them;
And, if they fall, they dash themselves to pieces. Shakspeare.
David's throne shall then be like a tree,
Spreading and overshadowing all the earth;
Or as a stone that shall to pieces dash
All monarchies besides throughout the world. Milton, P. L.

3. To throw water in flashes.

Dashing water on them may prove the best remedy. Mortimer.
Middling his head, and prone to earth his view,
With ears and chest that dash the morning dew. Tickell.

4. To bespatter; to besprinkle.

This tempest,
Dashing the garment of this peace, aboded
The sudden breach on't. Shaksp. Hen. VIII.

5. To agitate any liquid, so as to make the surface fly off.

At once the brushing oars and brazen prow
Dash up the sandy waves, and ope the depths below. Dryden.

6. To mingle; to adulterate; to change by some worse admixture.

Youre sermons dashed ful of sorrowful teares and depe sighings, to allure the people to the Romish waye.
Confut. of N. Shaxton, (1546,) sign. A. iii.
I must have liquor
Fit for the Mirmydons; no dashing now, child.
Beaum. and Fl. Love's Pilgrimage.
Whacum, bred to dash and draw,
Not wine, but more unwholesome law. Hudibras.
I take care to dash the character with such particular circumstances as may prevent ill-natured applications. Addison.
Several revealed truths are dashed and adulterated with a mixture of fables and human inventions. Spectator, No. 580.

7. To form or sketch in haste, carelessly.

Never was dash'd out, at one lucky hit,
A fool so just a copy of a wit. Pope.

8. To obliterate; to blot; to cross out.

To dash over this with a line, will deface the whole copy extremely, and to a degree that, I fear, may displease you. Pope.

9. To confound; to make ashamed suddenly; to surprise with shame or fear; to depress; to suppress.

When she the beams of her beauty displays,
O, how art thou dash'd. Spenser, Shep. Cal.
His tongue
Dropp'd manna, and could make the worse appear
The better reason, to perplex and dash
Maturest counsels. Milton, P. L.
Yearly enjoin'd, some say, to undergo
This annual, humbling certain number'd days,
To dash their pride and joy for man seduc'd. Milton, P. L.
An unknown hand still check'd my forward joy,
Dash'd me with blushes. Dryden and Lee, Œdipus.
To dash this cavil, read but the practice of Christian emperors. South.
After they had sufficiently blasted him in his personal capacity, they found it an easy work to dash and overthrow him in his political. South.
Nothing dashed the confidence of the mule like the braying of the ass, while he was dilating upon his genealogy. L'Estrange.
The nymph, when nothing could Narcissus move,
Still dash'd with blushes for her slighted love. Addison.
Some stronger pow'r eludes our sickly will;
Dashes our rising hope with certain ill. Prior.
Dash the proud gamester in his gilded car;
Bare the mean heart that lurks beneath a star. Pope.

To DASH.† v. n.

1. To fly off the surface, by a violent motion.

If the vessel be suddenly stopt in its motion, the liquor continues its motion, and dashes over the sides of the vessel. Cheyne.

2. To fly in flashes with a loud noise.

On each hand the gushing waters play,
And down the rough cascade, all dashing, fall. Thomson.

3. To rush through water so as to make it fly.

Doeg, though without knowing how or why,
Spurr'd boldly on, and dash'd through thick and thin,
Through sense and nonsense, never out or in.
Dryden.

4. To strike, as a ship upon a rock.

If a woman once dash upon this rock of reproach, she hardly ever recruits her credit.
Bp. Taylor, Artif. Hands. p. 151.

DASH.† n. s. [from the verb.]

1. Collision.

By the touch ethereal rous'd,
The dash of clouds, or irritating war,
Of fighting winds, while all its calm below
They furious spring. Thomson.

2. Infusion; something worse mingled in a small proportion.

The noise may seem to pretend to a dash and sprinkling of art.
Gregory's Posthuma, (1650,) p. 48.

There is nothing which one regards so much, with an eye of mirth and pity, as innocence, when it has in it a dash of folly. Addison.

3. A mark in writing; a line ——, to note a pause, or omission.

He is afraid of letters and characters, of notes and dashes, which, set together, do signify nothing.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

In modern wit all printed trash is Set off with num'rous breaks and dashes. Swift.

4. Sudden stroke; blow; act: ludicrous, Dr. Johnson says; but certainly not always so, in this sense.

Stand back, you lords, and give us leave awhile.
—— She takes upon her bravely at first dash.
Shakspeare.

As to that dash your law gives to this quickening of complexion, as if it were an infallible token of a vain mind.
Bp. Taylor, Artif. Hands. p. 84.

A flash of lightning, or a dash of affectionate rain. Bp. Taylor, Serm. 1651, p. 176.

5. To cut a DASH. In modern colloquial speech, to make a great shew; to cut a figure, as it is sometimes called. The Scots have a similar expression, "to cast a dash."

DASH. adv. An expression of the sound of water dashed.

Hark, hark, the waters fall;
And, with a murmuring sound,
Dash, dash, upon the ground,
To gentle slumbers call. Dryden.

DA'SHING.* adj. [from dash. See the third sense of To DASH, v. n.] Precipitate; rushing carelessly onward, in any respect. Of modern application.

Dashing Machiavelian politicians.
Burke, on the Fr. Revol.

DA'STARD. n. s. [from ꝺaꝛꝛꝑıȝan, to terrify, Sax.] A coward; a poltron; a man infamous for fear.

The cruelty and envy of the people,
Permitted by our dastard nobles,
And suffer'd me by the voice of slaves to be Whoop'd out of Rome. Shakspeare.

Who now my matchless valour dare oppose?
How long will Dares wait his dastard foes?
Dryden.

Dastard and drunkard, mean and insolent;
Tongue-valiant hero, vaunter of thy might,
In threats the foremost, but the last in fight.
Dryden.

Bugbear thoughts in the minds of children, make them dastards, and afraid of the shadow of darkness ever after. Locke.

Curse on their dastard souls, they stand astonish'd. Addison.

To DA'STARD. v. a. To terrify; to intimidate; to desert with cowardice; to dispirit.

I'm weary of this flesh which holds us here,
And dastards manly souls with hope and fear.
Dryden.

To DA'STARDISE.† v. a. [from dastard.] To intimidate; to deject with cowardice; to dispirit; to depress; to terrify; to make an habitual coward.

This their pusillanimity and courage, as well as their cunning and craft, may be imputed to their various thraldoms; which hath so cowed and dastardized their courage. Howell, Lett. i. vi. 14.

He had such things to urge against our marriage,
As, now declar'd, would blunt my sword in battle,
And dastardise my courage. Dryden.

How must it needs dastardize a soldier, if, when he is going into the battle, the near approach of danger should awaken such thoughts as these in his mind! Scott, Serm. before the Artill. Comp. 1680.

DA'STARDLINESS.* n. s. [from dastardly.] Cowardliness. Barret.

DA'STARDLY.† adj. [from dastard.] Cowardly; mean; timorous.

In peace the common people seem dastardly, but in war are found spirited.
Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 337.

Brawl and clamour is so arrant a mark of a dastardly wretch, that he does as good as call himself so that uses it. L'Estrange.

DA'STARDNESS.* n. s. [from dastard.] Timorousness; cowardliness. Huloet.

DA'STARDY.† n. s. [from dastard.] Cowardliness; timorousness.

Dastardy, and stupidity in a good cause, — is the extremity of all baseness.
Archdeacon Arnway's Tablet, 1661, p. 8.

*DA'TA. n. s. pl. [Lat.] Truths admitted. See also DATUM.

This then may, I think, be numbered among what the mathematicians called data; that is, confessed and granted truths.
Delany, Life of David, 1740, i. 81.

DA'TARY.† n. s. [datarius, Lat. from datum; Fr. dataire.]

1. An officer of the Chancery of Rome, through whose hands benefices pass; and who affixes to the papal bulls Datum Romæ.

Neither the popes themselves, nor those of the court, the secretaries and dataries, which pen their bulls and breves, have any use or exercise in Holy Scripture. Bp. Bedell, Letters, p. 356.

2. The employment or office of a datary.

Besides the temporal dominions, he [the pope] hath, in all the countries before-named, the datary or dispatching of bulls. Howell, Lett. i. i. 38.

DATE.† n. s. [datte, Fr. from datum, Latin.]

1. The time at which a letter is written, marked at the end or the beginning; or at which a legal instrument is signed.

Take the bonds along with you,
And have the dates in compt.
Shakspeare, Tim. of Athens.

The conclusion — mentions the execution or date of the deed, or the time of its being given or executed. Blackstone.

2. The time at which any event happened; the age of a thing.

The best rules for distinguishing the date of manuscripts are to be had in father Mabillon's learned treatise "de Re Diplomatica."
Bp. Nicolson to Ralph Thoresby, 1699.

Chronology fixes the dates and facts.
Lord Chesterfield.

3. The time stipulated when any thing shall be done.

His days and times are past,
And my reliance on his fracted dates
Has smit my credit. Shakspeare, Timon.

My father's promise ties me not to time;
And bonds, without a date, they say are void.
Dryden.

4. End; conclusion.

What time would spare, from steel receives its date;
And monuments, like men, submit to fate. Pope.

5. Duration; continuance.

Could the declining of this fate, O friend,
Our date to immortality extend? Denham.

Then raise,
From the conflagrant mass, purg'd, and refin'd,
New heav'ns, new earth, ages of endless date,
Founded in righeousness. Milton, P. L.

DATE. n. s. [from dactylus.] The fruit of the date-tree.

Hold, take these keys, and fetch more spices, nurse.
—— They call for dates and quinces in the pastry.
Shakspeare.

DATE-TREE. n. s. See PALM, of which it is a species.

To DATE. v. a. [from the noun.] To note with the time at which any thing is written or done.

To all their dated backs he turns you round;
These Aldus printed, those Du Süeil has bound.
Pope.

To DATE.* v. n. To reckon.

'Tis all one, in respect of eternal duration yet behind, whether we begin the world so many millions of ages ago, or date from the late æra of about six thousand years. Bentley.

DA'TELESS.† adj. [from date.] Without any fixed term.

The fly-slow hours shall not determinate
The dateless limit of thy dear exile. Shakspeare.
The daieless and irrevoluble circle of eternity.
Milton, of Ref. in England.

DA'TER.* n. s. [from date.] One who dates writings.

The dataire is more particularly the dater or dispatcher of the pope's bulls.
Cotgrave in V. Dataire.

1. [In grammar.] The epithet of the case that signifies the person to whom any thing is given.

2. [In law.] Those are termed dative executors who are appointed such by the judge's decree; as administrators with us here in England. Ayliffe.

3. [In law also.] Applied in contradistinction to what is hereditary, or to what is not removeable at pleasure.

Nobility native, and dative, issuing from the king with bond of service.
Archdeacon Arnway's Alarum, 1661, p. 208.

Any prior, be he perpetual, or dative, and removable at the will of his abbat.
Sir R. Twisden, Monast. Life, p. 40.

*DA'TUM. n. s. [Lat.] A truth granted and admitted. See DATA.

All the rules, relating to purchases, perpetually refer to this settled law of inheritance, as a datum or first principle. Blackstone.

To DAUB. v. a. [dabben, Dutch; dauber, French.]

1. To smear with something adhesive.

She took for him an ark of bulrushes, and daubed it with slime and with pitch. Exodus.

2. To paint coarsely.

Hasty daubing will but spoil the picture, and make it so unnatural as must want false light to set it off. Otway.

They snatched out of his hands a lame imperfect piece, rudely daubed over with two little reflection. Dryden.

If a picture is daubed with many bright and glaring colours, the vulgar admire it as an excellent piece. Watts.

3. To cover with something specious or gross, something that disguises what it lies upon.

So smooth he daub'd his vice with shew of virtue,
He liv'd from all attainder of suspect. Shaksp.

4. To lay on any thing gaudily or ostentatiously.

Since princes will have such things, it is better they should be graced with elegancy than daubed with cost. Bacon.

Let him be daub'd with lace, live high, and whore;
Sometimes be lousy, but be never poor. Dryden.

5. To flatter grossly.

Let every one, therefore, attend the sentence of his conscience; for, he may be sure, it will not daub nor flatter. South.

To DAUB. v. n. To play the hypocrite: this sense is not in use.

I cannot daub it further;
And yet I must. Shakspeare.

DAUB.* n. s. [from the verb.] Coarse painting; gross representation.

Riddles are not the daub of dulness; they are strictly and properly the play of wit.
Delany, Rem. on Orrery's Life of Swift, p. 222.

DA'UBER.† n. s. [from daub.]

1. One that daubs.

Yet this dauber would daub still with his untempered mortar. Milton, Anim. Rem. Defence.

2. A coarse low painter.

What they call'd his picture, had been drawn at length by the daubers of almost all nations, and still unlike him. Dryden.

Parts of different species jumbled together, according to the mad imagination of the dauber, to cause laughter. Dryden.

A sign-post dauber would disdain to paint
The one-ey'd hero on his elephant. Dryden.

The treacherous tapster, Thomas,
Hangs a new angel two doors from us,
As fine as daubers hands can make it. Swift.

3. A low flatterer.

DA'UBERLY. n. s. [from daub.] An old word for any thing artful.

She works by charms, by spells, and such dauberly as this is beyond our element. Shakspeare.

DA'UBING.* n. s. [from daub.]

1. Plaster; mortar.

Lo, when the wall is fallen, shall it not be said unto you, where is the daubing wherewith ye have daubed it? Ezek. xiii. 12.

2. Any thing adhesive; as paint, or a lotion.

Such gross and dangerous daubings of black, red, and white, as wholly change the very natural looks. Bp. Taylor, Artif. Hands. p. 115.

DA'UBY. adj. [from daub.] Viscous; glutinous; adhesive.

Not in vain th' industrious kind,
With dauby wax and flow'rs the chinks have lin'd.
Dryden.

Some the gall'd ropes with dauby marling bind,
Or sear-cloth masts with strong tarpawling coats.
Dryden.

To DA'VER.* v. a. As a northern word, to stun; to stupify; derived by Mr. Brockett from the Teut. daveren, to tremble. As a western word, to fade like a flower. Grose.

DA'UGHTER.† n. s. [dauhtar, Gothick; bohcep, Sax. dotter, Runick; dohter, German; dochter, Dutch: and also dochter, or daughter, Persian. V. Serenius, and Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 316. Gr. Θυγάτηρ.]

1. The female offspring of a man or woman.

Your wives, your daughters,
Your matrons, and your maids, could not fill up
The cistern of my lust. Shakspeare.

Now Aurora, daughter of the dawn,
With rosy lustre purpled o'er the lawn. Pope.

2. A daughter in law, or son's wife.

3. A woman.

Jacob went out to see the daughters of the land.
Genesis.

To DAUNT. v. a. [domter, French; domitare, Lat.] To discourage; to fright; to intimidate.

Fairfax, whose name in arms through Europe rings,
And fills all mouths with envy or with praise,
And all her jealous monarchs with amaze,
And rumours loud, which daunt remotest kings.
Milton, Sonnet.

Where the rude ax, with heaved stroke,
Was never heard the nymphs to daunt,
Or fright them from their hallow'd haunt.
Milton, Il Pens.

Some pretences daunt and discourage us, when others raise us to a brisk assurance. Glanville.

DA'UNTLESS. adj. [from daunt.] Fearless; not dejected; not discouraged.

Grow great by your example, and put on
The dauntless spirit of resolution. Shakspeare.

Dauntless he rose, and to the fight return'd:
With shame his glowing cheeks, his eyes with fury burn'd. Dryden, Virgil.

He, not by wants or woes opprest,
Stems the bold torrent with a dauntless breast.
Dryden.

The utmost weight of affliction from ministerial power and popular hatred, were almost worth bearing, for the glory of such a dauntless conduct as he has shewn under it. Pope.

DA'UNTLESSNESS. n. s. [from dauntless.] Fearlessness.

DA'UPHIN.* n. s. [Fr. daulphin, or dauphin, Cotgrave; from Dauphiny.] The heir apparent to the crown of France.

Look upon the years
Of Lewis the dauphin, and that lovely maid.
Shakspeare, K. John.

The dauphin prince Henry, who delighted in hunting, was fond of "Ainsi qu'on oit le cerf bruire," or, "Like as the hart desireth the waterbrooks;" which he constantly sung in going out to the chase. Warton, Hist. of Eng. P. iii. 163.

DA'UPHINESS.* n. s. The wife or widow of the dauphin of France.

It is now sixteen or seventeen years since I saw the queen of France, then the dauphiness, at Versailles; and surely never lighted on this orb, which she hardly seemed to touch, a more delightful vision. Burke on the Fr. Revolution.

DAW. n. s. [menedula, Lat. It is supposed by Skinner to be so named from its note; by Junius to be corrupted from dawl; the German tul, and dol, in the Bavarian dialect, having the same signification.] A bird.

I will wear my heart upon my sleeve,
For daws to peck it. Shakspeare, Othello.

If death do quench us quite, we have great wrong,
That daws, and trees, and rocks should last so long,
When we must in an instant pass to nought.
Davies.

The loud daw, his throat displaying, draws
The whole assembly of his fellow daws. Waller.

To DAW.* v. n. [Sax. ðazian, from ðæz, day.] To advance towards day; to dawn. In the north of England daw is still used actively in the sense of awaken. See To DAWN.

Tyll the day dawed these damosels daunced.

To DA'WDLE.* v. n. [a word of recent introduction into our language, and apparently allied to daddle. See To DADDLE.] To waste time; to trifle.

Come, some evening, and dawdle over a dish of tea with me. Johnson, Letters.

DA'WDLE, or DA'WDLER.* n. s. A trifler, a dallier; one who proceeds slowly or unskilfully in any business. A low word.

DA'WISH.* adj. [from daw.] Like a daw.

Such dawishe dodypols were the parents of him that was borne blinde, which would not confesse Christ to have healed their son, for fear of displeasinge the priests.
Bale, Yet a Course, &c. (1543,) fol. 59.

DAWK. n. s. A cant word among the workmen for a hollow, rupture, or incision, in their stuff.

Observe if any hollow or dawks be in the length.
Moxon.

To DAWK. v. a. To mark with an incision.

Should they apply that side of the tool the edge lies on, the swift coming about of the work would, where a small irregularity of the stuff should happen, jobb the edge into the stuff, and so dawk it.
Moxon.

To DAWN.† v. n. [supposed by the etymologists to have been originally to dayen, or advance towards day, Dr. Johnson says. Mr. Horne Tooke has observed, that it is the past participle of the Sax. ðazian, to grow light, Div. of Purley, ii. 75. where he introduces the examples also which I have given to daw. See To DAW.]

1. To grow luminous; to begin to grow light.

I have been troubled in my sleep this night;
But dawning day new comfort hath inspir'd.
Shakspeare.

As it began to dawn, towards the first day of the week came Mary Magdalene to see the sepulchre. St. Matthew.

All night I slept, oblivious of my pain;
Aurora dawn'd, and Phœbus shin'd in vain. Pope.

2. To glimmer obscurely.

A Romanist, from the very first dawning of any notions in his understanding, hath this principle constantly inculcated, that he must believe as the church. Locke.

3. To begin, yet faintly; to give some promises of lustre or eminence.

While we behold such dauntless worth appear
In dawning youth, and souls so void of fear. Dryden.

Thy hand strikes out some free design,
When life awakes and dawns at every line. Pope.

DAWN. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. The time between the first appearance of light and the sun's rise, reckoned from the time that the sun comes within eighteen degrees of the horizon.

Then on to-morrow's dawn your care employ,
To search the land, but give this day to joy. Dryden.

2. Beginning; first rise.

These tender circumstances diffuse a dawn of serenity over the soul. Pope.

Such their guiltless passion was,
As in the dawn of time inform'd the heart
Of innocence and undissembling truth. Thomson.

DA'WNING.* n. s. [Sax. ðaȝunȝ.] Break of day; morning. Diluculum. Huloet.

And so befell, that in a dawning,
As chaunteclere among his wives alle,
Sate on his perch. Chaucer, N. Pr. Tale.

Good dawning to thee, friend; art thou of the house? Shakspeare, K. Lear.

That dawning
May bare the raven's eye. Shakspeare, Cymb.

DAY.† n. s. [Sax. ðæȝ, or ðaȝ; Goth. dags; Icel. dagur, a day.]

1. The time between the rising and setting of the sun; called the artificial day.

Why stand ye here all the day idle? St. Matthew, xx. 6.

Of night impatient, we demand the day;
The day arrives, then for the night we pray:
The night and day successive come and go,
Our lasting pains no interruption know. Blackmore.

Or object new
Casual discourse draws on, which intermits
Our day's work. Milton, P. L.

2. The time from noon to noon, or from midnight to midnight called the natural day.

How many hours bring about the day?
How many days will finish up the year? Shaksp.

3. Light; sunshine.

Let us walk honestly, as in the day; not in rioting and drunkenness. Romans, xiii. 13.

The West yet glimmers with some streaks of day:
Now spurs the lated traveller apace,
To gain the timely inn. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

Around the fields did nimble lightning play,
Which offer'd us by fits, and snatch'd the day:
'Midst this was heard the shrill and tender cry
Of well-pleas'd ghosts, which in the storm did fly. Dryden.

Yet are we able only to survey
Dawnings of beams, and promises of day. Prior.

4. Any time specified and distinguished from other time; an age; the time. In this sense it is generally plural.

After him reigned Gutheline his heir,
The justest man, and truest, in his days. Spenser, F. Q.

I think, in these days, one honest man is obliged to acquaint another who are his friends. Pope.

We have, at this time of day, better and more certain means of information than they had. Woodward.

The day of vengeance is in mine heart, and the year of my redeemed is come. Isaiah, lxiii. 4.

6. Life: in this sense it is commonly plural. He never in his days broke his word; that is, in his whole life.

He was never at a loss in his days for a frequent answer. Carte, Life of Ormonde.

7. The day of contest; the contest; the battle.

His name struck fear, his conduct won the day;
He came, he saw, he seiz'd the struggling prey. Roscommon.

The noble thanes do bravely in the war;
The day almost itself professes yours,
And little is to do. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

Would you th' advantage of the fight delay,
If, striking first, you were to win the day. Dryden.

8. An appointed or fixed time.

Or if my debtors do not keep their day,
Deny their hands, and then refuse to pay,
I must with patience all the terms attend. Dryden.

He was so rough as to tell me, that a well-bred man would as soon call upon a lady who keeps a day, at midnight, as on any day but that on which she professes being at home. Tatler, No. 166.

9. A day appointed for some commemoration.

The field of Agincourt,
Fought on the day of Crispin Crispianus. Shaks.

10. Judgement. Not now in use. But see DAYSMAN.

As men for daybreak watch the eastern skies. Dryden.

DA'YDREAM.* n. s. [day and dream.] A vision or phantasm to the waking senses.

And when awake, thy soul but nods at best,
Daydreams and sickly thoughts revolving in thy breast. Dryden, Lucret.

The poet's daydream. Mason, Eng. Garden.

DA'YLABOUR. n. s. [day and labour.] Labour by the day; labour divided into daily tasks.

Doth God exact daylabour, light deny'd,
I fondly ask? Milton, P. L.

Daylabour was but an hard and a dry kind of livelihood to a man, that could get an estate with two or three strokes of his pen. South.

DAYLA'BOURER. n. s. [from daylabour.] One that works by the day.

In one night, ere glimpse of morn,
His shadowy flail had thresh'd the corn
That ten daylabourers could not end. Milton, Il Pens.

The daylabourer, in a country village, has commonly but a small pittance of courage. Locke.

DA'YLIGHT. n. s. [day and light.] The light of the day, as opposed to that of the moon, or a taper.

By this the drooping daylight 'gan to fade,
And yield his room to sad succeeding night. Spenser, F. Q.

Thou shalt buy this dear,
If ever I thy face by daylight see,
Now go thy way. Shakspeare.

They, by daylight passing through the Turks fleet, recovered the haven, to the joy of the besieged Christians. Knolles.

He stands in daylight, and disdains to hide
An act, to which by honour he is tied. Dryden.

Will you murder a man in plain daylight? Dryden.

Though rough bears in covert seek defence,
White foxes stay, with seeming innocence;
That crafty kind with daylight can dispense. Dryden.

If bodies be illuminated by the ordinary prismatick colours, they will appear neither of their own daylight colours, nor of the colour of the light cast on them, but of some middle colour between both. Newton, Opticks.

DA'Y-LILY. n. s. The same with ASPHODEL, which see.

DA'YSMAN.† n. s. [day and man. See the 10th sense of DAY. "Mannys dai," is Wicliffe's version of what is now "man's judgement," 1 Cor. iv. 3. where day is yet retained in the margin.] An old word for umpire, as Dr. Ainsworth observes; which Dr. Johnson, however, has questioned, and given surety in its stead, citing only the example of Spenser, where it is an arbitrator or judge; as it is elsewhere. Grose gives it as the northern word for arbitrator, or umpire.

For what art thou,
That mak'st thyself his daysman, to prolong
The vengeance prest? Spenser, F. Q.

He is not a man, as I am, that I should answer him, and we should come together in judgement. Neither is there any daysman betwixt us, [in the margin, umpire,] that might lay his hands upon us both. Job, ix. 32. 33.

DA'YSPRING.† n. s. [day and spring.] The rise of the day; the dawn; the first appearance of light.

Hast thou commanded the morning since thy days? and caused the dayspring to know his place. Job, xxxviii. 12.

So all ere dayspring, under conscious night,
Secret they finish'd, and in order set. Milton, P. L.

The breath of heav'n, fresh-blowing, pure and sweet,
With dayspring born, here leave me to respire. Milton, S. A.

DA'YSTAR.† n. s. [Sax. ðæȝreorþa.] The morning star.

Until the day dawn, and the daystar arise in your hearts. 2 Pet. i. 19.

I meant to make her fair, and free, and wise,
Of greatest blood, and yet more good than great;
I meant the daystar should not brighter rise,
Nor lend like influence from his lucent seat. B. Jonson.

Sunk though he be beneath the watry floor;
So sinks the daystar in the ocean bed,
And yet anon repairs his drooping head. Milton, Lycidas.

DA'YTIME.† n. s. [Sax. ðæȝtima.] The time in which there is light, opposed to night.

In the daytime Fame sitteth in a watch-tower, and flieth most by night; she mingleth things done with things not done, and is a terror to great cities. Bacon.

My ants never brought out their corn but in the night when the moon did shine, and kept it under ground in the daytime. Addison.

DAYWE'ARIED.* adj. [day and weary.] Wearied with the work of a day.

The old, feeble, and day-wearied sun. Shakspeare, K. John.

DA'YWOMAN.* n. s. [dey or day; a name by which a dairymaid has been called in our old statutes, and by the Scotch. The Swedish deja is the same. See DAIRY.] A dairymaid.

For this damsel I must keep her at the park; she is allowed for the day-woman. Shakspeare, L. Lab. Lost.

DA'YWORK. n. s. [day and work.] Work imposed by the day; day labour.

True labour in the vineyard of thy lord,
Ere prime thou hast th' imposed daywork done. Fairfax.

To DAZE.† v. a. [Dr. Johnson gives the Sax. ðpæꝛ, foolish, stupid, as the etymology. The Teut. dwaes and daes is also foolish, doting, insane; and the verb is daesen, to be mad, to be troubled with phantasms. V. Kilian. Perhaps from this verb our word is borrowed. See also To DAZZLE. In the north of England "a dazed look is such as persons have when frighted." Ray, N. C.Words.] To overpower with light; to strike with too strong lustre; to hinder the act of seeing by too much light suddenly introduced.

They smote the glistering armies as they stand,
With quiv'ring beams, which daz'd the wond'ring eye. Fairfax.

Poor human kind, all daz'd in open day,
Err after bliss, and blindly miss their way. Dryden.

DA'ZIED.† adj. Rather dasied. See DAISY, Dr. Johnson says; but see rather DAISIED.

To DA'ZZLE.† v. a. [See the etymology of daze. And thus dazzle was formerly written dasel. "These bright beams had been able to dasell the eyes of Mr. Neale himself," &c. Bp. Bramhall's Church of Eng. Def. 1659, p. 31.]

1. To overpower with light; to hinder the action of the sight by sudden lustre.

Fears used to be represented in such an imaginary fashion, as they rather dazzle men's eyes than open them. Bacon.

How is it that some wits are interrupted;
That now they dazzled are, now clearly see? Davies.

2. To strike or surprise with splendour.

Those heavenly shapes
Will dazzle now this earthly, with their blaze

The places that have either shining sentiments or manners; have no occasion for them: a dazzling expression rather damages them, and serves only to eclipse their beauty. Pope.

Ah, friend! to dazzle let the vain design;
To raise the thought, or touch the heart, be thine. Pope.

To DA'ZZLE. v. n. To be overpowered with light; to lose the power of sight.

Dazzle mine eyes? or do I see three suns? Shakspeare.

Come, boy, and go with me; thy sight is young,
And you shall read, when mine begins to dazzle. Shakspeare.

An overlight maketh the eyes dazzle, insomuch as perpetual looking against the sun would cause blindness. Bacon.

I dare not trust these eyes;
They dance in mists, and dazzle with surprise. Dryden.

DA'ZZLEMENT.* n. s. [from dazzle.] The power of dazzling.

It beat back the sight with a dazzlement.
Donne, Hist. of the Sept. (1633,) p. 55.

DA'ZZLINGLY.* adv. [from dazzling.] In a manner striking with splendour or surprise.

There are but few, whom fortune bathes in blisse,
But blinded are, and dazzelingly they looke.
Mir. for Mag. p. 56.

DE'ACON.† n. s. [ðeacon, Sax. diaconus, Lat.]

1. One of the lowest of the three orders of the clergy.

Likewise must the deacons be grave. 2 Tim. iii. 8.

The constitutions that the apostles made concerning deacons and widows, are very importunately urged. Bp. Sanderson.

2. [In Scotland.] An overseer of the poor.

3. And also the master of an incorporated company.

DE'ACONESS.† n. s. [from deacon.] A female officer in the ancient church.

The apostle would not have widows taken into the office of deaconesses, when they were young.
Bp. Patrick, Answ. to the Touchstone, &c. p. 230.

DE'ACONRY.† } n. s. [from deacon.] The DE'ACONSHIP.† } office or dignity of a deacon.

Suche as bee within these three degrees, that is to wete, of priesthode, deaconship, and subdeaconship.
Martin, Marr. of Priests, (1554,) sign. M. ii. b.

Now tract of time has clean worn out those first occasions, for which the deaconship was then most necessary. Hooker, Eccles. Pol. b. v.

DEAD.† adj. [Sax. ðeað; Teut. dood; from the Iceland. daud, death. See also Loescheri Liter. Celt. p. 99. "Dad, data; sic mortem vocârunt Frisii."]

1. Deprived of life; exanimate.

The queen, my lord, is dead:
—— She should have died hereafter. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

A brute or a man are another thing, when they are alive, from what they are when dead. Hale.

She either from her hopeless lover fled,
Or with disdainful glances shot him dead. Dryden.

2. With of before the cause of death.

This Indian told them, that, mistaking their course, the crew, all except himself, were dead of hunger. Arbuthnot.

3. Without life; inanimate.

All, all but truth, drops dead-born from the press,
Like the last gazette, or the last address. Pope.

4. Inanimate by nature.

Fayre sir, sayd he, if in that picture dead
Such life ye read, and vertue in vain shew;
What mote ye weene, if the true lively-head
Of that most glorious visage ye did vew!
Spenser, F. Q. ii. ix. 3.

5. Imitating death; senseless; motionless.

At thy rebuke, O God of Jacob, both the chariot and horse are cast into a dead sleep. Psalm lxxvi. 6.

Anointing of the forehead, neck, feet, and backbone, we know is used for procuring dead sleeps. Bacon.

6. Unactive; motionless.

The tin sold sometimes higher, and sometimes lower, according to the quick vent and abundance, or the dead sale and scarcity. Carew.

Nay, there's a time when ev'n the rolling year
Seems to stand still: dead calms are in the ocean,
When not a breath disturbs the drousy main. Lee.

They cannot bear the dead weight of unemployed time lying upon their hands, nor the uneasiness it is to do nothing at all. Locke.

7. Empty; vacant.

This colour often carries the mind away; yea, it deceiveth the sense, and it seemeth to the eye a shorter distance of way, if it be all dead and continued, than if it hath trees or buildings, or any other marks whereby the eye may divide it. Bacon.

Nought but a blank remains, a dead void space,
A step of life, that promis'd such a race. Dryden.

8. Useless; unprofitable.

The commodities of the kingdom they took, though they lay dead upon their hands for want of vent. Bacon.

Persuade a prince that he is irresistible, and he will take care not to let so glorious an attribute lie dead and useless by him. Addison.

9. Dull; gloomy; unemployed.

Travelling over Amanus, then covered with deep snow, they came in the dead winter to Aleppo. Knolles.

There is something unspeakably chearful in a spot of ground which is covered with trees, that smiles amidst all the rigours of winter, and gives us a view of the most gay season in the midst of that which is the most dead and melancholy. Addison.

10. Still; obscure.

Their flight was only deferred until they might cover their disorders by the dead darkness of the night. Hayward.

11. Having no resemblance of life.

At a second sitting, though I alter not the draught, I must touch the same features over again, and change the dead colouring of the whole. Dryden.

12. Obtuse; dull; not sprightly. Used of sounds.

We took a bell of about two inches in diameter at the bottom, which was supported, in the midst of the cavity of the receiver, by a bent stick, in which, when it was closed up, the bell seemed to sound more dead than it did when just before it sounded in the open air. Boyle.

13. Dull; frigid; not animated; not affecting.

How cold and dead does a prayer appear, that is composed in the most elegant forms of speech, when it is not heightened by solemnity of phrase from the sacred writings. Addison.

14. Tasteless; vapid; spiritless: used of liquors.

15. Uninhabited.

Somewhat is left under dead walls and dry ditches. Arbuthnot.

16. Without the natural force or efficacy; as, a dead fire.

17. Without the power of vegetation; as, a dead bough.

18. [In theology.] The state of spiritual death, lying under the power of sin.

You hath he quickened, who were dead in trespasses and sins. Ephes. ii. 1.

19. Unvaried.

In a dead plain the way seemeth the longer, because the eye hath preconceived it shorter than the truth. Bacon.

20. DEAD as a door nail. A proverbial expression, denoting any one completely dead. It is an allusion, as Mr. Steevens has observed, to the nail on which in ancient doors the knocker strikes; and so implies such an absolute death, as reiteration of strokes upon the head would naturally produce. A vulgarism.

If I do not leave you all as dead as a door nail, I pray God, I may never eat grass more.
Shakspeare, K. Hen. VI. P. II.

DEAD-PALSY.* See PALSY.

The DEAD. n. s. Dead men.

Jove saw from high with just disdain,
The dead inspir'd with vital life again. Dryden.

The ancient Romans generally buried their dead near the great roads. Addison.

That the dead shall rise and live again, is beyond the discovery of reason, and is purely a matter of faith. Locke.

The tow'ring bard had sung in nobler lays,
How the last trumpet wakes the lazy dead. Smith.

DEAD. n. s. Time in which there is remarkable stillness or gloom; as at midwinter, and midnight.

After this life, to hope for the favours of mercy then, is to expect an harvest in the dead of winter. South.

In the dead of the night, when the men and their dogs were all fast asleep. L'Estrange.

At length, in dead of night, the ghost appears
Of her unhappy lord. Dryden.

To DEAD. v. n. [from the noun.] To lose force, of whatever kind.

Iron, as soon as it is out of the fire, deadeth straitways. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

To DEAD. } v. a.
To DE'ADEN. }

1. To deprive of any kind of force or sensation.

That the sound may be extinguished or deaded by discharging the pent air, before it cometh to the mouth of the piece, and to the open air is not probable. Bacon.

It is requisite that the tympanum be tense and hard stretched, otherwise the laxness of that membrane will certainly dead and damp the sound. Holder.

This motion would be quickly deadened by counter-motions. Glanville, Scep. Scient.

We will not oppose any thing to them that is hard and stubborn, but by a soft answer deaden their force by degrees. Burnet, Theory.

Our dreams are great instances of that activity which is natural to the human soul, and which is not in the power of sleep to deaden or abate. Spectator.

Anodynes are such things as relax the tension of the affected nervous fibres, or destroy the particular acrimony which occasions the pain, or what deadens the sensation of the brain by procuring sleep. Arbuthnot on Diet.

2. To make vapid, or spiritless.

The beer and the wine, as well within water as above, have not been palled or deaded at all. Bacon.

DEAD-DOING. participial adj. [dead and do.] Destructive; killing; mischievous; having the power to make dead.

Hold, O dear lord, your dead-doing hand;
Then loud he cry'd, I am your humble thrall. Spenser.

They never care how many others
They kill, without regard of mothers,
Or wives or children, so they can
Make up some fierce dead-doing man. Hudibras.

DEAD-DRUNK.* part. adj. Formerly a serious expression; now used in low language only. So drunk, as to be motionless. See the 5th sense of DEAD.

Carowse of Lethe,——
Untill thou be dead-druncke.
Davies, Wit's Pilgrimage. sign. D. 2. b.

So dead-drunk with apathy, as to lye in a cart's way. Mannyngham's Discourses, p. 46.

DEAD-HEARTED.* adj. [dead and heart.] Having a faint heart; without fortitude.

There are dead-hearted patients, that grow mopish and stupid with too deep a sense of their sufferings. Bp. Hall, Select Th. § 63.

DEAD-HEARTEDNESS.* n. s. [from dead-hearted.] Pusillanimity; want of fortitude.

This meets with my dead-heartedness and security; this with my worldly-mindedness.
Bp. Hall, Dev. Soul, § 25.

DEAD-KILLING.* part. adj. [dead and kill.] Instantly killing; killing at once.

Here with a cockatrice dead-killing eye.
Shakspeare, Rape of Lucr.

I swoon with this dead-killing news.
Shakspeare, King Rich. III.

DEAD-LIFT. n. s. [dead and lift.] Hopeless exigence.

And have no power at all, nor shift,
To help itself at a dead-lift. Hudibras.

DEAD-RECKONING. n. s. [a sea term.] That estimation or conjecture which the seamen make of the place where a ship is, by keeping an account of her way by the log, by knowing the course they have steered by the compass, and by rectifying all with allowance for drift or lee-way; so that this reckoning is without any observation of the sun, moon, and stars, and is to be rectified as often as any good observation can be had.

DEAD-STRUCK.* part. adj. [dead and strike.] Confounded; struck with horrour.

Now, lest such frightful shews of fortune's fall,
And bloody tyrant's rage, should chance appall
The dead-struck audience, midst the silent rout,
Comes leaping in a self-misformed lout,
And laughs, and grins. Bp. Hall, Sat. i. 3.

To DE'ADEN. See To DEAD.

DE'ADISH.* adj. [from dead.] Resembling what is dead; dull.

The lips put on a deadish paleness.
Stafford's Niobe, P. II. (1611,) p. 186.

Poetry should be rather like a coranto, short, and nimbly lofty, than a dull lesson of a day long: Nor can it be but deadish, if too long.
Feltham, Res. i. 70.

DE'ADLIHOOD.* n. s. [from deadly.] The state of the dead.

It is certainly true that Christ, after expiration, was in the state or condition of the dead, in deadlihood. Pearson on the Creed, Art. 5.

DE'ADLINESS.* n. s. [Sax. ðeaðlinýr.] Danger which threatens death.

He that had formerly denied the deadliness of Lazarus his sickness, would not suddenly confess his death. Bp. Hall, Contempl. B. 4.

DE'ADLY.† adj. [Sax. ðeaðlic.]

1. Destructive; mortal; murderous.

She then on Romeo calls, as if that name,
Shot from the deadly level of a gun,
Did murther her. Shakspeare.

Dry mourning will decay more deadly bring,
As a North wind burns a too forward spring;
Give sorrow vent, and let the sluices go. Dryden.

2. Mortal; implacable.

Nicanor —— a man that bare deadly hate unto Israel. 1 Macc. vii. 26.

The Numidians, in number infinite, are deadly enemies unto the Turks. Knolles.

DE'ADLY.† adv. [Sax. ðeaðlice.]

1. In a manner resembling the dead.

Like dumb statues, or unbreathing stones,
Star'd each on other, and look'd deadly pale. Shaks.

Young Arcite heard, and up he ran with haste,
And ask'd him why he look'd so deadly wan?
Dryden.

2. Mortally.

I will break Pharaoh's arms, and he shall groan before him with the groanings of a deadly wounded man. Ez. xxx. 24.

3. Implacably; irreconcileably; destructively.

4. It is sometimes used in a ludicrous sense, only to enforce the signification of a word.

Mettled schoolboys set to cuff,
Will not confess that they have done enough,
Though deadly weary. Orrery.

John had got an impression, that Lewis was so deadly cunning a man, that he was afraid to venture himself alone with him. Arbuthnot.

DE'ADNESS.† n. s. [from dead.]

1. Frigidity; want of warmth; want of ardour; want of affection.

His grace removes the defect of inclination, by taking off our natural deadness and disaffection towards them. Rogers.

Atheism is equally unentertaining to the fancy, and to the rational faculty; disagreeable to our nature in every respect; beginning and ending in universal deadness. A. Baxter on the Soul, ii. 108.

2. Weakness of the vital powers; languor; faintness; inactivity of the spirits.

And being not weak in faith, he considered not his own body now dead, when he was about an hundred years old, neither yet the deadness of Sara's womb. Rom. iv. 19.

What hinders, that paleness, sadness, and deadness, may not be remedied?
Bp. Taylor, Artif. Handsomeness, p. 105.

Your gloomy eyes betray a deadness,
And inward languishing. Dryden and Lee, Œdipus.

3. Vapidness of liquors; loss of spirit.

Deadness or flatness in cyder is often occasioned by the too free admission of air into the vessels. Mortimer.

4. Loss of life.

Who can tell where swallows lie all winter, and how at the spring they have a resurrection from their seeming deadness? Fuller, Holy War, p. 150.

5. Want of circulation; inactivity.

We complain of the troubles of the world, the deadness of trade, the badness of the time.
Killingbeck's Serm. p. 201.

DE'ADNETTLE. n. s. A weed; the same with archangel.

DEAF.† adj. [Sax. ðeaf, Teut. doof. Our old lexicography has defined our word "Deaf, or doted; that which has no savour," Huloet. The Icel. daufr is both deaf and insipid. In the north of England deaf is still used for barren or blasted. Thus the Saxon expression, ðeaf copn, sterile corn.]

1. Wanting the sense of hearing.

Come on my right hand, for this ear is deaf.
Shakspeare.

Infected minds
To their deaf pillows will discharge their secrets.
Shakspeare.

The chief design here intended is to instruct such as are deaf and dumb, and dumb only by consequence of their want of hearing. Holder.

If any sins afflict our life
With that prime ill, a talking wife,
Till death shall bring the kind relief,
We must be patient, or be deaf. Prior.

Thus you may still be young to me,
While I can better hear than see:
Oh ne'er may fortune shew her spite,
To make me deaf and mend my sight. Swift.

2. It has to before the thing that ought to be heard.

I will be deaf to pleading and excuses;
Nor tears, nor prayers shall purchase out abuses.
Shakspeare.

Oh, that men's ears should be
To counsel deaf, but not to flattery! Shaksp.
Whilst virtue courts them: but alas, in vain:
Fly from her kind embracing arms,
Deaf to her fondest call, blind to her greatest charms. Roscommon.
Not so, for once indulg'd, they sweep the main;
Deaf to the call, or, hearing, hear in vain. Dryd.
Hope, too long with vain delusion fed,
Deaf to the rumour of fallacious fame,
Gives to the roll of death his glorious name.
Pope.

3. Deprived of the power of hearing.

Deaf with the noise, I took my hasty flight:
No mortal courage can support the fright.
Dryden.

4. Obscurely heard.

Thou notest the darkness of this night, the strange silence, the deaf and confused trembling of these trees. Shelton, Tr. of D. Quix. iii. 6.
Nor silence is within, nor voice express,
But a deaf noise of sounds that never cease;
Confus'd and chiding like the hollow roar
Of tides, receding from th' insulted shore. Dryd.
The rest were seiz'd with sullen discontent,
And a deaf murmur through the squadrons went.
Dryden.

5. Unprofitable. [See the etymology.] A deaf nut is a nut of which the kernel is decayed. North of England. Grose.

To DEAF.† v. a. [Sax. abeafian; Su. Goth. doefwa; Icel. deyfa.] To deprive of the power of hearing.

Hearing hath deaf'd our sailors; and if they Know how to hear, there's none know what to say. Donne, Poems, p. 143.
A swarm of their aerial shapes appears,
And, flutt'ring round his temples, deafs his ears.
Dryden.

To DE'AFEN. v. a. [from deaf.] To deprive of the power of hearing.

But Salius enters; and exclaiming loud,
For justice, deafens and disturbs the crowd.
Dryden.
From shouting men, and horns, and dogs, he flies,
Deafen'd and stunn'd with their promiscuous cries.
Addison.

DE'AFLY. adv. [from deaf.]

1. Without sense of sounds.
2. Obscurely to the ear.

DE'AFELY.* adj. Lonely; solitary; far from neighbours. Ray, North-Country Words. Cotgrave writes this old English word deavely in his translation of the French adjective DESOLE'.

DE'AFNESS. n. s. [from deaf.]

1. Want of the power of hearing; want of sense of sounds.

Those who are deaf and dumb, are dumb by consequence from their deafness. Holder.
The Dunciad had never been writ, but at his request, and for his deafness; for had he been able to converse with me, do you think I had amused my time so ill? Pope.

2. Unwillingness to hear.

I found such a deafness, that no declaration from the bishops could take place. King Charles.

DEAL.† n. s. [Goth. dails, a part or portion; Sax. bæl; Teut. deel; Ir. dail.]

1. Part.

And with the one lamb a tenth deal of flour mingled with the fourth part of an hin of beaten oil. Exod. xxix. 40.
A great deal of that which had been, was now to be removed out of the church. Hooker.

2. Quantity; degree of more or less. It was formerly joined with different words, to limit its meaning; as, some deal, in some degree, to some amount: we now either say, a great deal, or a deal, without an adjective; but this is commonly, if not always, ludicrous or contemptuous.

When men's affections do frame their opinions, they are in defence of errour more earnest a great deal, than, for the most part, sound believers in the maintenance of truth, apprehending according to the nature of that evidence which scripture yieldeth. Hooker.
There is, indeed, store of matters, fitter and better a great deal for teachers to spend time and labour in. Hooker.
To weep with them that weep, doth ease some deal;
But sorrow, flouted at, is double death. Shaks.
What a deal of cold business doth a man mispend the better part of life in! In scattering compliments, and tendering visits. B. Jonson.
The charge, some deal the haply honour may,
That noble Dudone had while here he liv'd.
Fairfax.
Possibly some never so much as doubted of the safety of their spiritual estate; and, if so, they have so much the more reason a great deal to doubt of it. South.
The author, who knew that such a design as this could not be carried on without a great deal of artifice and sophistry, has puzzled and perplexed his cause. Addison.

3. [From the verb to deal.] The art or practice of dealing cards.

How can the muse her aid support,
Unskill'd in all the terms of art!
Or in harmonious numbers put
The deal, the shuffle, and the cut. Swift.

4. [deyl, Dutch.] Firwood; or the wood of pines.

I have also found, that a piece of deal, far thicker than one would easily imagine, being purposely interposed betwixt my eye, placed in a room; and the clearer daylight was not only somewhat transparent, but appeared quite through a lovely red. Boyle on Colours.

To DEAL.† v. a. [M. Goth. dailjan; Icel. and old Goth. dela; Sax. bælan.]

1. To distribute; to dispose to different persons.

Deal thy bread to the hungry, and bring the poor that are cast out to thy house. Isa. lviii. 7.
One with a broken truncheon deals his blows.
Dryden.
His lifted arms around his head he throws,
And deals, in whistling air, his empty blows.
Dryden.
The business of mankind in this life, being rather to act than to know, their portion of knowledge is dealt them accordingly. Addison.
How Spain prepares her banners to unfold,
And Rome deals out her blessings and her gold.
Tickel.
Had the great men of antiquity been possessed of the art of printing, they would have made an advantage of it, in dealing out their lectures to the publick. Addison.
If you deal out great quantities of strong liquor to the mob, there will be many drunk. Watts.

2. To scatter; to throw about.

Keep me from the vengeance of thy darts,
Which Niobe's devoted issue felt,
When hissing through the skies, the feather'd deaths were dealt. Dryden.

3. To give gradually, or one after another.

The nightly mallet deals resounding blows. Gay.

4. To distribute the cards.

To DEAL. v. n.

1. To traffick; to transact business; to trade.

It is generally better to deal by speech than by letter; and by a man himself, than by the mediation of a third. Bacon.
This is to drive a wholesale trade, when all other petty merchants deal but for parcels.
Decay of Piety.
They buy and sell, they deal and traffick. South.
With the fond maids in palmistry he deals,
They tell the secret which he first reveals. Prior.

2. To act between two persons; to intervene.

Sometimes he that deals between man and man, raiseth his own credit with both, by pretending greater interest than he hath in either. Bacon.

3. To behave well or ill in any transaction.

I doubt not, if he will deal clearly and impartially, but that he will acknowledge all this to be true. Tillotson.

4. To act in any manner.

Two deep enemies,
Foes to my rest, and my sweet sleep's disturbers,
Are they that I would have thee deal upon.
Shakspeare.

5. To DEAL by. To treat well or ill. This seems a vitious use.

Such an one deals not fairly by his own mind, nor conducts his own understanding aright. Locke.

6. To DEAL in. To have to do with; to be engaged in; to practise.

Suiters are so distasted with delays and abuses, that plain-dealing, in denying to deal in suits at first, is grown not only honourable but also gracious. Bacon.
The Scripture forbids even the countenancing a poor man in his cause; which is a popular way of preventing justice, that some men have dealt in, though without that success which they proposed to themselves. Atterbury.
Among authors, none draw upon themselves more displeasure than those who deal in political matters. Addison.
True logick is not that noisy thing that deals all in dispute, to which the former ages had debased it. Watts, Logick.

7. To DEAL with. To treat in any manner; to use well or ill.

Neither can the Irish, nor yet the English lords, think themselves wronged, or hardly dealt with, to have that which is none of their own given to them. Spenser on Ireland.
Who then shall guide
His people? Who defend? Will they not deal
Worse with his followers, than with him they dealt?
Milton, P. L.
If a man would have his conscience deal clearly with him, he must deal severely with that.
South, Serm.
God did not only exercise his providence towards his own people, but he dealt thus also with other nations. Tillotson.
But I will deal the more civilly with his two poems, because nothing ill is to be spoken of the dead. Dryden.
You wrote to me with the freedom of a friend, dealing plainly with me in the matter of my own trifles. Pope.
Reflect on the merits of the cause, as well as of the men, who have been thus dealt with by their country. Swift.

8. To DEAL with. To contend with.

If she hated me, I should know what passion to deal with. Sidney.
Gentlemen were commanded to remain in the country, to govern the people, easy to be dealt with whilst they stand in fear. Hayward.
Then you upbraid me; I am pleas'd to see
You're not so perfect, but can fail like me:
I have no God to deal with. Dryden.

To DEALBATE.† v. a. [dealbo, Lat.] To whiten; to bleach. Cockeram.

DEALBA'TION.† n. s. [dealbatio, Latin.] The act of bleaching or whitening, rendering things white which were not so before: a word in little use.

All seed is white in viviparous animals, and such as have preparing vessels, wherein it receives a manifold dealbation. Brown, Vulg. Err.

I have been here time enough in conscience to pass all the degrees and effects of fire, as distillation, — dealbation, rubification, &c. Howell, Lett. ii. 42.

DE'ALER.† n. s. [Sax. dælepe.]

1. One that has to do with any thing.

I find it common with these small dealers in wit and learning, to give themselves a title from their first adventure. Swift.

2. A trader or trafficker.

The treacherous dealer dealeth treacherously. Isaiah, xxi. 2.

Where fraud is permitted and connived at, the honest dealer is always undone, and the knave gets the advantage. Gulliver's Travels.

3. A person who deals the cards.

DE'ALING.† n. s. [Sax. dælinȝ.]

1. Practice; action.

Concerning the dealings of men, who administer government, and unto whom the execution of that law belongeth, they have their judge, who sitteth in heaven. Hooker.

What these are!
Whose own hard dealings teach them to suspect
The thoughts of others. Shakspeare.

But this was neither one pope's fault, nor one prince's destiny: he must write a story of the empire, that means to tell of all their dealings in this kind. Ralegh.

2. Intercourse.

It were to be wished, that men would promote the happiness of one another, in all their private dealings, among those who lie within their influence. Addison.

3. Measure of treatment; mode in which one treats another.

God's gracious dealings with men, are the aids and auxiliaries necessary to us in the pursuit of piety. Hammond.

4. Traffick; business.

The doctor must needs die rich; he had great dealings in his way for many years. Swift.

To DEA'MBULATE.* v. n. [Lat. deambulo.] To walk abroad. Cockeram.

DEAMBULA'TION.† n. s. [Fr. dëambulation, promenade. Lacombe assigns the date of 1550 to the usage of this word, which is after the time that our own word had been introduced. Lat. deambulatio. Of our word Dr. Johnson has given neither example nor authority; and it may therefore seem as if he had introduced the expression into our language. But it is in the old vocabulary of Cockeram, and had been long before employed by Sir Thomas Elyot.] The act of walking abroad.

Such exercises as may be used within the house, or in the shadow, (as is the old manner of speaking,) as deambulations, or moderate walkings. Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 53.

DEA'MBULATORY.† adj. [Fr. deambulatoire. Cotgrave. The same remark applies to this old word, as to deambulation, with this addition, that Dr. Johnson has not completely defined the word.] Relating to the practice of walking abroad; removing from place to place. Bullokar.

The deambulatory actors use to have their quietus est, and to forego their employments for want of continuance more or less.
Bp. Morton, Episcop. Asserted, p. 142.

DEA'MBULATORY.* n. s. [from the adjective. See also AMBULATORY.] A place to walk in.

Cloisters, crowned with rich and lofty pinnacles, and fronted with tabernacular or open work, vaulted like the dormitory of a monastery, and called deambulatories, for the accommodation of the citizens in all weathers.
Warton, Hist. of Eng. P. ii. 93.

DEAN.† n. s. [old Fr. déan, déen, déin, pour doyen. Lacombe. Lat. decanus. From the Greek word δέκα; in English, ten; because he was anciently set over ten canons or prebendaries, at least in some cathedral churches. Ayliffe's Parergon.]

1. The second dignitary of a diocese.

As there are two foundations of cathedral churches in England, the old and the new, (the new are those which Henry VIII. upon suppression of abbeys, transformed from abbot or prior, and convent to dean and chapter,) so there are two means of creating these deans; for those of the old foundation are brought to their dignity much like bishops, the king first sending out his Congé d'élire to the chapter, the chapter then chusing and the bishop confirming them, and giving his mandate to instal them. Those of the new foundation are, by a shorter course, installed by virtue of the king's letters patents, without either election or confirmation.

This word is also applied to divers, that are chief of certain peculiar churches or chapels; as the dean of the king's chapel, the dean of the Arches, the dean of St. George's chapel at Windsor, and the dean of Bocking in Essex. Cowel.

The dean and canons, or prebends of cathedral churches, were of great use in the church: they were not only to be of counsel with the bishop for his revenue, but chiefly for government in causes ecclesiastical. Use your best means to prefer such to those places who are fit for that purpose. Bacon.

2. The name of an officer in each college, usually one of the fellows, both in Oxford and Cambridge.

Would some snug benefice but fall,
Ye feasts, ye dinners, farewell all!
To offices I'd bid adieu
Of dean, vice-præs. of bursar too.
T. Warton, Progress of Discontent.

DEAN.* A corrupt way of writing and pronouncing what means a valley, DEN.

DE'ANERY.† n. s. [old Fr. deanry, "chapitre, doyenné, 930." Lacombe.]

1. The office of a dean.

He could no longer keep the deanery of the chapel-royal. Clarendon.

2. The revenue of a dean.

Put both deans in one; or, if that's too much trouble,
Instead of the deans make the deanery double. Swift.

3. The house of a dean.

Take her by the hand, away with her to the deanery, and dispatch it quickly. Shaksp.

DE'ANSHIP.† n. s. [from dean.] The office and rank of a dean.

It was usual to write the chapter-acts in Latin; and a certain terseness and elegance of style, eminently distinguish those that were made during his [Dr. Bathurst's] deanship, from any memorials that have been inserted before or since in the register of that cathedral [Wells.]
Warton, Life of Bathurst, p. 214.

DEAR.† adj. [Sax. ðeop; Alem. diur, dear, beloved; Swedish, dyr, expensive, much valued; Icel. dar, highly grateful.]

1. Beloved; favourite; darling.

Your brother Glo'ster hates you.
— Oh, no, he loves me, and he holds me dear. Shakspeae.

The dear, dear name she bathes in flowing tears,
Hangs o'er the tomb. Addison, Ovid.

And the last joy was dearer than the rest. Pope.

2. Valuable; of a high price; costly.

What made directors cheat the South sea year,
To feed on ven'son when it sold so dear. Pope.

3. Scarce; not plentiful; as, a dear year.

4. It seems to be sometimes used in Shakspeare for sad; hateful; grievous. [Sax ðepe, hurt, from ðepian, to hurt; Teut. deeren. In the West of England deared is used for hurried or frightened. Exm. Dial. And in Lancashire, to dear or dere is to hurt.]

What foolish boldness brought thee to their mercies,
Whom thou in terms so bloody and so dear,
Hast made thine enemies? Shaksp. Tw. Night.

Let us return,
And strain what other means is left unto us
In our dear peril. Shakspeare, Timon.

Some dear cause
Will in concealment wrap me up a while:
When I am known aright, you shall not grieve
Lending me this acquaintance. Shaksp. K. Lear.

Would I had met my dearest foe in heav'n,
Or ever I had seen that day. Shaksp. Hamlet.

Thy other banish'd son, with his dear sight
Struck pale and bloodless. Titus Andronicus.

DEAR. n. s. A word of endearment; darling.

That kiss
I carried from thee, dear; and my true lip
Hath virgin'd it e'er since. Shaksp. Coriol.

Go, dear; each minute does new danger bring. Dryden.

See, my dear,
How lavish nature has adorn'd the year. Dryden.

To DEAR.* v. a. To make dear. Formerly in use: we now say endear.

Deprived of his deared conversation.
Shelton, Tr. of Don Quix. P. 4. ch. 6.

DE'ARBOUGHT. adj. [dear and bought.] Purchased at an high price.

O fleeting joys
Of Paradise, dearbought with lasting woe.
Milton, P. L.

1. With great fondness.

For the unquestionable virtues of her person and mind, he loved her dearly. Wotton.

2. At an high price.

It is rarely bought, and then also bought dearly enough with such a fine. Bacon.

Turnus shall dearly pay for faith forsworn;
And corps, and swords, and shields, on Tyber born. Dryden.

My father dotes, and let him still dote on;
He buys his mistress dearly with his throne. Dryden.

To DEARN.† v. a. [ðýrnan, Sax. to hide.] To mend clothes. See DARN. Sherwood.

DEARN.* adj. [Sax. ðeorn.] Lonely; melancholy; solitary; secret. It is yet used in the north of England.

By many a dearn and painful perch,
Of Pericles the careful search —
Is made. Shaksp. Pericles.

Of all thy joys the dearne and dismal end.
The Valiant Scot.

DE´ARNESS. n. s. [from dear.]

1. Fondness; kindness; love.

My brother holds you well, and in dearness of heart hath holp to effect your ensuing marriage. Shaksp.

The whole senate dedicated an altar to Friendship, as to a goddess, in respect of the great dearness of friendship between them two. Bacon.

He who hates his neighbour mortally and wisely too, must profess all the dearness and friendship, with readiness to serve him. South.

2. Scarcity; high price.

Landlords prohibit tenants from plowing, which is seen in the dearness of corn. Swift.

DE´ARNLY.† adv. [ðeapn, Sax.] Secretly; privately; unseen, Dr. Johnson says; but it is rather, mournfully, in the example. Obsolete.

At last, as chanc'd them by a forest side
To pass, for succour from the scorching ray,
They heard a rueful voice that dearnly cry'd
With piercing shrieks. Spenser, F. Q.

DEARTH.† n. s. [from dear, Dr. Johnson says; that is, dear in the sense of cost or hurt; dearth being the third person, as Mr. H. Tooke has observed, of the Sax. ðeþan, to injure.]

1. Scarcity which makes food dear.

In times of dearth it drained much coin out of the kingdom, to furnish us with corn from foreign parts. Bacon.

There have been terrible years dearths of corn, and every place is strewed with beggars; but dearths are common in better climates, and our evils here lie much deeper. Swift.

2. Want; need; famine.

Pity the dearth that I have pined in,
By longing for that food so long a time. Shaksp.

Of every tree that in the garden grows,
Eat freely with glad heart; fear here no dearth.
Milton, P. L.

3. Barrenness; sterility.

The French have brought on themselves that dearth of plot, and narrowness of imagination, which may be observed in all their plays. Dryden.

To DEARTI´CULATE. v. a. [de and articulus, Latin.] To disjoint; to dismember. Dict.

DE´ARY.* n. s. [from dear.] A phrase of connubial life, usually treated in writing with jocularity. In the north of England, it is applied to a child.

A hunting husband hallooes — and you hear him —
A drunken deary staggers — and you steer him.
A. Hill.

But to return to my deary. The evenings are the only time, when it is fine weather, that I am left to myself; for then she generally takes the child out to give it milk in the park.
Johnson, Rambler, No. 15.

DEATH.† n. s. Sax. ðeaþ; M. Goth. dauths; Su. Goth. doed; Icel. daud: Teut. dood. See also DEAD. The root is pronounced by Serenius to be the Scyth. daa, to be dissolved. The Goth. da is defect, fainting; and the Icel. daa, the same.]

1. The extinction of life; the departure of the soul from the body.

He is the mediator of the New Testament, that by means of death, for the redemption of the transgressions, they which are called might receive the promise of eternal inheritance.
Heb. ix. 15.

They say there is divinity in odd numbers, either in nativity or death. Shaksp.

Death, a necessary end,
Will come, when it will come.
Shaksp. Jul. Cæs.

He must his acts reveal,
From the first moment of his vital breath,
To his last hour of unrepenting death. Dryden.

2. Mortality; destruction.

How did you dare
To trade and traffic with Macbeth,
In riddles and affairs of death? Shakspeare.

3. The state of the dead.

In swinish sleep
Their drenched natures lie, as in a death. Shaksp.

4. The manner of dying.

Thou shalt die the deaths of them that are slain in the midst of the seas. Ezek. xxviii. 8.

5. The image of mortality represented by a skeleton.

I had rather be married to a death's head, with a bone in his mouth, than to either of these.
Shakspeare.

If I gaze now, 'tis but to see
What manner of death's head 'twill be,
When it is free
From that fresh upper skin;
The gazer's joy, and sin. Suckling.

6. Murder; the act of destroying life unlawfully.

As in manifesting the sweet influence of his mercy, on the severe stroke of his justice; so in this, not to suffer a man of death to live. Bacon.

7. Cause of death.

They cried out, and said, O thou man of God, there is death in the pot. 2 Kings, iv. 40.

He caught his death the last county-sessions, where he would go to see justice done to a poor widow woman. Addison.

8. Destroyer.

Broome, View of Epick Poetry.

9. [In poetry.] The instrument of death.

Deaths invisible come wing'd with fire;
They hear a dreadful noise, and straight expire.
Dryden.

Sounded at once the bow; and swiftly flies
The feather'd death, and hisses through the skies.
Dryden.

Oft, as in airy rings they skim the heath,
The clam'rous lapwings feel the leaden death.
Pope.

10. [In theology.] Damnation; eternal torments.

We pray that God will keep us from all sin and wickedness, from our ghostly enemy, and from everlasting death. Church Catechism.

DEATH-BED. n. s. [death and bed.] The bed to which a man is confined by mortal sickness.

Sweet soul, take heed, take heed of perjury;
Thou art on thy death-bed. Shakspeare, Othello.

Thy death-bed is no lesser than the land,
Wherein thou liest in reputation sick.
Shakspeare Rich. II.

These are such things as a man shall remember with joy upon his death-bed; such as shall chear and warm his heart, even in that last and bitter agony. South, Serm.

Then round our death-bed every friend should run,
And joy us of our conquest early won.
Dryden, Fables.

A death-bed figure is certainly the most humbling sight in the world.
Collier on the Value of Life.

A death-bed repentance ought not indeed to be neglected, because it is the last thing that we can do. Atterbury.

Fame can never make us lie down contentedly on a death-bed. Pope.

DEATH-BODING.* part. adj. [death and bode.] Portending death.

No noise but owls', and wolves' death-boding cries. Shakspeare, Rape of Lucrece.

Or Cheshire should prefer her sad death-boding lake. Drayton, Polyolb. S. 3.

Not a death-boding schrich-owl, but an harmless dove. Bp. Hall, Beauty and Unity of the Church.

DEATH-DARTING.* part. adj. [death and dart.] Inflicting death, as it were, with a dart.

The death-darting eye of cockatrice.

Death-darting Pestilence did seeme to slide.
Mir. for Mag. p. 777.

DE´ATHFUL. adj. [death and full.] Full of slaughter; destructive; murderous.

Your cruelty was such, as you would spare his life for many deathful torments. Sidney.

Time itself, under the deathful shade of whose wings all things wither, hath wasted that lively virtue of nature in man and beasts, and plants.
Ralegh.

Blood, death, and deathful deeds are in that noise,
Ruin, destruction at the utmost point.
Milton, S. A.

These eyes behold
The deathful scene; princes on princes roll'd.
Pope.

DE´ATHFULNESS.* n. s. [from deathful.] Appearance of death.

What hinders, while we are living and among the living, but that we may study to adorn our looks, so as may be most remote from a deathfulness, and most agreeable by their livelinesse to those with whom we live?
Bp. Taylor, Artif. Hand. p. 70.

DE´ATHLESS. adj. [from death.] Immortal; never-dying; everlasting.

God hath only immortality, though angels and human souls be deathless. Boyle.

Their temples wreath'd with leaves, that still renew;
For deathless laurel is the victor's due. Dryden.

Faith and hope themselves shall die,
While deathless charity remains. Prior.

DE´ATHLIKE.† adj. Sax. ðeaðlic. Dr. Johnson has unguardedly admitted into his dictionary a sublime passage in Milton, in order to illustrate the use of this adjective; where, in reality, there is no adjective. The words are these:

A death, like sleep,
A gentle wafting to immortal life.
Par. Lost. xii. 434.

The poet here intends death as a reference to temporal death, which he had just before mentioned, and calls it a death, like sleep, in allusion to 1 Cor. xv. 51. Fenton first converted the separate words into the mistaken adjective, and misled Dr. Johnson.] Resembling death; still; gloomy; motionless; placid; calm; peaceful; undisturbed; resembling either the horrours or the quietness of death.

Why dost thou let thy brave soul lie suppress
In deathlike slumbers, while thy dangers crave
A waking eye and hand? Crashaw.
On seas, on earth, and all that in them dwell,
A deathlike quiet and deep silence fell. Waller.
Black melancholy sits, and round her throws
A deathlike slumber, and a dread repose. Pope.

DEATH'S-DOOR. [death and door.] A near approach to death; the gates of death, πύλαι ἄδου. It is now a low phrase.

I myself knew a person of great sanctity, who was afflicted to death's-door with a vomiting. Bp. Taylor, Worthy Communicant.

There was a poor young woman that had brought herself even to death's-door with grief for her sick husband. L'Estrange.

DE'ATHSMAN. n. s. [death and man.] Executioner; hangman; headsman; he that ecutes the sentence of death.

He's dead; I'm only sorry
He had no other deathsman. Shakspeare.
As deathsmen, you have rid this sweet young prince. Shakspeare.

DE'ATH-SHADOWED.* adj. [death and shadow. A fine compound, in a fine passage, alluding to the "valley of the shadow of death."] Encompassed by the shades of death.

And ever and anon a doleful knill
Comes from the fatal owl; that in sad mood
With dreary sound doth pierce through the death-shadowed wood. More, Song of the Soul, i. iii. 21.

DE'ATH-TOKEN.* n. s. That which signifies approaching death.

He is so plaguy proud, that the death-tokens of it
Cry, No recovery. Shakspeare, Tr. and Cress.

DEBARKA'TION.* n. s. [from debark.] The act of disembarking.

To DEBA'SE.* v. a. [old Fr. debas or debase, under, below; as, "debase leur estate," beneath their estate. Kelham.]

1. To reduce from a higher to a lower state.

Homer intended to teach, that pleasure and sensuality debase men into beasts. Broome on the Odyssey.

As much as you raise silver, you debase gold; for they are in the condition of two things, put in opposite scales; as much as the one rises, the other falls. Locke.

2. To make mean; to sink into meanness; to make despicable; to degrade.

It is a kind of taking God's name in vain, to debase religion with such frivolous disputes. Hooker.

A man of large possessions has not leisure to consider of every slight expence, and will not debase himself to the management of every trifle. Dryden.

Restraining others, yet himself not free;
Made impotent by pow'r, debas'd by dignity. Dryden.

3. To sink; to vitiate with meanness.

He ought to be careful of not letting his subject debase his style, and betray him into a meanness of expression. Addison.

Hunting after arguments to make good one side of a question, and wholly to refuse those which favour the other, is so far from giving truth its due value, that it wholly debases it. Locke.

4. To adulterate; to lessen in value by base admixtures.

He reformed the coin, which was much adulterated and debased in the times and troubles of king Stephen. Hale.

Words so debas'd and hard, no stone
Was hard enough to touch them on. Hudibras.

DEBA'SEMENT. n. s. [from debase.] The act of debasing or degrading; degradation.

It is a wretched debasement of that sprightly faculty, the tongue, thus to be made the interpreter to a goat or boar. Government of the Tongue.

DEBA'SER.† n. s. [from debase.] One that debases; he that adulterates; he that degrades another; he that sinks the value of things, or destroys the dignity of persons. Sherwood.

DEBA'TABLE.† adj. [debatable, Fr. Cotgrave.] Disputable; subject to controversy.

The commissioners for the debatable of the Scotch side did deny to meet, except a certain castle or pile might be first rased. K. Ed. VI.'s Journal, Burnet's Hist. Ref. ii. App. p. 49.

The French requested, that the debatable ground, and the Scottish hostages, might be restored to the Scots. Hayward.

DEBA'TE. n. s. [debat, Fr.]

1. A personal dispute; a controversy.

A way that men ordinarily use, to force others to submit to their judgments, and receive their opinion in debate, is to require the adversary to admit what they allege as a proof, or to assign a better. Locke.

It is to diffuse a light over the understanding, in our enquiries after truth, and not to furnish the tongue with debate and controversy. Watts, Logick.

2. A quarrel; a contest: it is not now used of hostile contest.

Now, lords, if heav'n doth give successful end
To this debate that bleedeth at our doors,
We will our youth lead on to higher fields,
And draw no swords but what are sanctified. Shakspeare.

'Tis thine to ruin realms, o'erturn a state;
Betwixt the dearest friends to raise debate. Dryd.

To DEBA'TE.† v. a. [debatre, Fr.]

1. To controvert; to dispute; to contest.

He should the bearers put to sudden death.
Shakspeare, Hamlet.

Lest some may thus expostulate with me after this debatement. Milton, Apol. for Smectymn.

2. Battle; combat.

He with Pyrochles sharpe debatement made.
Spenser, F. Q. ii. vi. 39.

DEBA'TER.† n. s. [Fr. debateur.] A disputant; a controvertist: an arguer. Cotgrave, and Sherwood.

It is only knowledge and experience that can make a debater. Lord Chesterfield.

To DEBA'UCH.† v. a. [desbaucher, Fr. debacchari, Lat. The history of this word is curious; though Dr. Johnson takes no notice of its changes. Cotgrave renders the French word by debosh, which was a common way of writing this word. Debaush is Florio's word. It was also written deboish, and deboise; which see.]

1. To corrupt; to vitiate.

Young men, such as I imagine to be least debaushed and corrupted by ill examples.
Florio's Transl. of Montaigne, (1613,) p. 536.

In their whole fashion and gesture bewraying such lightness, as might be able to debauch a whole assembly. Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 247.

A man must have got his conscience thoroughly debauched and hardened, before he can arrive to the height of sin. South.

This it is to counsel things that are unjust; first, to debauch a king to break his laws, and then to seek protection. Dryden, Span. Friar.

2. To corrupt with lewdness.

Here do you keep a hundred knights and squires,
Men so disorder'd, so debauch'd and bold,
That this our court, infected with their manners,
Shews like a riotous inn. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

3. To corrupt by intemperance.

No man's reason did ever dictate to him, that it is reasonable for him to debauch himself by intemperance and brutish sensuality. Tillotson.

DEBA'UCH. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. A fit of intemperance.

He will for sometime contain himself within the bounds of sobriety: till within a little while he recovers his former debauch, and is well again, and then his appetite returns. Calamy.

2. Luxury; excess; lewdness.

The first physicians by debauch were made;
Excess began, and sloth sustains the trade. Dryd.

DEBA'UCHEDLY.* adv. [from the participle debauched.] In a profligate and licentious manner.

To live desperately with the bold, and debauchedly with the luxurious. Cowley.

DEBA'UCHEDNESS.* n. s. [from the participle debauched.] Intemperance; lewdness.

A strange kind of loose debauchedness hath possessed too many of the young gallants of our time. Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 45.

Why such debauchedness of life, which when it hath unsouled the man, buries the beast in excess and riot? Hewyt, Serm. p. 206.

DEBAUCHE'E.† n. s. [from desbauché, Fr.] A lecher; a drunkard; a man given to intemperance.

Could we but prevail with the greatest debauchees amongst us to change their lives, we should find it no very hard matter to change their judgements. South.

To the amazement of all that knew them, [they] turned open debauchees. Fell, Life of Hammond, § 2.

Such indeed was the case, while the rich alone could afford to be debauched; but when even beggars became debauchees the case was altered. Bp. Berkeley, Siris, § 106.

A glutton, a drunkard, a debauchee, a sluggard, are monsters in the Gospel system. Bp. Horne, Occas. Serm. p. 96.

DEBA'UCHER.† n. s. [from debauch.] One who seduces others to intemperance or lewdness; a corrupter.

DEBA'UCHERY. n. s. [from debauch.] The practice of excess; intemperance; lewdness.

Oppose vices by their contrary virtues, hypocrisy by sober piety, and debauchery by temperance. Sprat.

These magistrates, instead of lessening enormities, occasion just twice as much debauchery as there would be without them. Swift.

DEBA'UCHMENT.† n. s. [from debauch.] The act of debauching or vitiating; corruption.

They told them ancient stories of the ravishment of chaste maidens, or the debauchment of nations, or the extreme poverty of learned persons. Bp. Taylor, Rule of Living Holy.

Gyraldus guessed it to be the Floralia, with which indeed it can compare in obscenity and debauchment. Gregory's Works, p. 106.

DEBA'UCHNESS, or DEBA'UCHTNESS.* n. s. [from debauch.] Excess; debauchedness.

Their throats to drunkenness, gluttony, and debauchness; and their hearts and heads to plotting mischief. Archdeacon Arnway's Alarm, p. 115.

What hope can the city have of those youth, the debauchtness of whose lives hath not been prevented by good education. Scott's Essay on Drapery, p. 157.

To DEBE'L.† } v. a. [old Fr. debeller; Lat. debello.]
To DEBE'LLATE. }

To conquer; to overcome in war: not now in use.

It doth notably set forth the consent of all nations and ages, in the approbation of the extirpating and debellating of giants, monsters, and foreign tyrants, not only as lawful, but as meritorious even of divine honour. Bacon, Holy War.

Him long of old
Thou didst debel, and down from heaven cast
With all his army. Milton, P. R. iv. 605.

DEBELLA'TION. n. s. [from debellatio, Lat.] The act of conquering in war.

The debellation of Salem and Bizance. Sir Thomas More, (1533.)

DEBE'NTURE.† n. s. [debentur, Lat. from debeo. Our word at first had the Latin form of debentur, and retained it some time.]

1. A writ or note, by which a debt is claimed.

Once when the debentur is made; and again the second time, when the money is paid. Bacon, Speech to K. James, (old edit.)

Pilferings, hedge-robberies, debenturs at inns, and farriers' scores, for drenches for themselves and horses. Gayton, Notes on D. Quix. iii. 5.

You modern wits, should each man bring his claim,
Have desperate debentures on your fame;
And little would be left you, I'm afraid,
If all your debts to Greece and Rome were paid. Swift.

2. In commerce, allowance of custom to a merchant on the exportation of goods, which had before paid a duty.

DEBE'NTURED *Goods. Such goods as are entitled to a debenture.

DE'BILE.† adj. [old Fr. debile; Lat. debilis.] Weak; feeble; languid; faint; without strength; imbecile; impotent.

I have not wash'd my nose that bled,
Or foil'd some debile wretch, which without note
There's many else have done. Shakspeare.

To DEBI'LITATE. v. a. [debilito, Latin.] To weaken; to make faint; to enfeeble; to emasculate.

In the lust of the eye, the lust of the flesh, the pride of life, they seemed as weakly to fail as their debilitated posterity ever after. Brown, Vulg. Err.

The spirits being rendered languid, are incapable of purifying the blood, and debilitated in attracting nutriment. Harvey on Consumptions.

DEBILITA'TION. n. s. [debilitation, Fr. debilitatio, Lat.] The act of weakening.

The weakness cannot return any thing of strength, honour, or safety to the head, but a debilitation and ruin. K. Charles.

How often doth sickness prevent the debilitations of age, pulling the strongest man upon his knees! Bp. Hall, of Contentation, § 5.

DEBI'LITY.† n. s. [debilité, Fr. debilitas, Latin.] Weakness; feebleness; languor; faintness; imbecility.

Methinks I am partaker of thy passion,
And in thy case do glass mine own debility. Sidney.

Aliment too vaporous or perspirable will subject it to the inconveniencies of too strong a perspiration, which are debility, faintness, and sometimes sudden death. Arbuthnot.

DE'BIT.* n. s. [Fr. debit, or debite, trust. Cotgrave. "Debite, dette, 1020." Lacombe.] Money due for goods sold on credit.

DEBONA'IR.† adj. [Fr. debonnaire. We had also bonair once in use for this word. See BONAIR. The etymon indeed is the Fr. bon, or the Lat. bonus, good.] Elegant; civil; well-bred; gentle; complaisant.

Crying, let be that lady debonair,
Thou recreant knight, and soon thyself prepare
To battle; if thou mean her love to gain. Spenser, F. Q.

Zephyr met her once a-maying,
Fill'd her with thee, a daughter fair,
So buxom, blithe, and debonair. Milton, L'All.

The nature of the one is debonair and accostable; of the other, retired and supercilious; the one quick and sprightful, the other slow and saturnine. Howell, Voc. For.

And she that was not only passing fair,
But was withal discreet and debonair,
Resolv'd the passive doctrine to fulfil. Dryden.

DEBONA'IRITY.* n. s. [Fr. debonnaireté.] Graciousness; gentleness; elegance of manners.

By which you may understand the greatness of the affair, and the debonairity and facility of the king. Donne, Hist. of the Septuagint, 1633, p. 24.

There is not the least of the divine favours, which, if we consider the condescensive tenderness, the clear intention, the unreserved frankness, the cheerful debonairity expressed therein, has not dimensions larger than our comprehension, colours too fair, lineaments too comely for our weak sight thoroughly to discern, requiring therefore our highest and utmost thoughts. Barrow, Serm. i. 5. 8.

DEBONA'IRLY.† adv. [from debonair.] Elegantly; with a genteel air. Huloet.

DEBONA'IRNESS.* n. s. [from debonair. An old substantive revived by Sterne.] Civility; complaisance. Sherwood.

DEBT. n. s. [debitum, Lat. dette, Fr.]

1. That which one man owes to another.

There was one that died greatly in debt: Well, says one, if he be gone, then he hath carried five hundred ducats of mine with him into the other world. Bacon, Apophthegms.

The debt of ten thousand talents which the servant owed the king, was no slight ordinary sum. Duppa, Devotions.

To this great loss a sea of tears is due;
But the whole debt not to be paid by you. Waller.

Swift a thousand pounds in debt,
Takes horse, and in a mighty fret
Rides day and night. Swift.

2. That which any one is obliged to do or suffer.

Your son, my lord, has paid a soldier's debt;
He only liv'd but till he was a man,
But like a man he died. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

DE'BTLESS.* adj. [debt and less.] Without debt; free from debt. An old, forgotten, but very useful word.

Worthy to ben stewards of rent and lond,
Of any lord that is in Englond,
To maken him live by his propre good,
In honour detteless. Chaucer, C. T. Prol. 584.

DE'BTED. part. [from debt. To DEBT is not found.] Indebted; obliged to.

Which do amount to three odd ducats more
Than I stand debted to this gentleman. Shaksp.

DE'BTOR.† n. s. [debteur, Fr. Cotgrave; debitor, Lat.]

I am debtor both to the Greeks and to the barbarians, both to the wise and to the unwise. Rom. i. 14.

2. One that owes money.

I'll bring your latter hazard back again,
And thankfully rest debtor for the first. Shaksp.

If he his ample palm
Should haply on ill-fated shoulder lay
Of debtor, strait his body, to the touch
Obsequious, as whilom knights were wont,
To some enchanted castle is convey'd. Philips.

There dy'd my father, no man's debtor:
And there I'll die, nor worse nor better. Pope.

The case of debtors in Rome, for the four first centuries, was, after the set time for payment, no choice but either to pay, or be the creditor's slave. Swift.

3. One side of an account book.

When I look upon the debtor side, I find such innumerable articles, that I want arithmetick to cast them up; but when I look upon the creditor side, I find little more than blank paper. Addison.

The monarch oak
Three centuries he grows, and three he stays
Supreme in state, and in three more decays. Dryden.

The garlands fade, the vows are worn away;
So dies her love, and so my hopes decay. Pope.

To DECA'Y. v. a. To impair; to bring to decay.

Infirmity, that decays the wise, doth ever make better the fool. Shakspeare.

Cut off a stock of a tree, and lay that which you cut off to putrefy, to see whether it will decay the rest of the stock. Bacon.

He was of a very small and decayed fortune, and of no good education. Clarendon.

Decay'd by time and wars, they only prove
Their former beauty by your former love. Dryden.
In Spain, our springs like old men's children, be Decay'd and wither'd from their infancy. Dryden.
It it so ordered, that almost every thing which corrupts the soul decays the body. Addison.

DECA'Y. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. Decline from the state of perfection; state of depravation or diminution.
What comfort to this great decay may come,
Shall be applied. Shakspeare.
She has been a fine lady, and paints and hides
Her decays very well. B. Jonson.
And those decays, to speak the naked truth,
Through the defects of age, were crimes of youth. Denham.
By reason of the tenacity of fluids, and attrition of their parts, and the weakness of elasticity in solids, motion is much more apt to be lost than got, and is always upon the decay. Newton.
Each may feel encreases and decays,
And see now clearer and now darker days. Pope.
Taught half by reason, half by mere decay,
To welcome death, and calmly pass away. Pope.

2. The effects of diminution; the marks of decay.
They think that whatever is called old must have the decay of time upon it, and truth too were liable to mould and rottenness. Locke.

3. Declension from prosperity.
And if thy brother be waxen poor, and fallen in decay with thee, then thou shalt relieve him. Levit. xxv. 35.
I am the very man,
That, from your first of difference and decay
Have follow'd your sad steps. Shakspeare, K. L.

4. The cause of decline.
He that seeketh to be eminent amongst able men hath a great task; but that is ever good for the public: but he that plots to be the only figure among cyphers, is the decay of a whole age. Bacon.

DECA'YEDNESS.* n. s. [from the part. decayed.] Diminution or depravation.
A fourth duty to the parent is to assist and minister to them in all their wants, of what kind soever, whether weakness and sickness of body, decayedness of understanding, or poverty and lowness in estate.
Whole Duty of Man, Duty to Parents, S. xiv.

DECA'YER.† n. s. [from decay.] That which causes decay.
Your water is a sore decayer of your whoreson dead body. Shakspeare, Hamlet.
Poverty in wedlock is a great decayer of love and contentation. Feltham, Res. i. 85.

These indeed are not
So subject to decayings as the face.
Massinger, City Madam.

DECE'ASE.† n. s. [old Fr. deses, or deces; Lat. decessus. Our own old word was decess. "After her noble husband's late decesse," Spenser, F.Q. v. x. 11. And so the verb decessed for deceased, in 1592. See Ashmole's Berkshire, ii. 295.] Death; departure from life.
Lands are by human law, in some places, after the owner's decease, divided unto all his children; in some all descendeth to the eldest son. Hooker.

To DECE'ASE. v. n. [decedo, Latin.] To die; to depart from life.
He tells us Arthur is deceas'd to-night. Shaksp.
You shall die
Twice now, where others, that mortality
In her fair arms holds, shall but once decease.
Chapman.
His latest victories still thickest came,
As, near the centre, motion doth increase:
Till he press'd down by his own weighty name,
Did, like the vestal, under spoils decease. Dryden.

DECE'IT.† n. s. [old Fr. decepte; Lat. deceptio. Formerly our word was written deceipt.]

1. Fraud; a cheat; a fallacy; any practice by which falsehood is made to pass for truth.
My lips shall not speak wickedness, nor my tongue utter deceit. Job, xxvii. 4.
They that seek my hurt speak mischievous things, and imagine deceits all day long.
Psalm xxxviii. 12.

2. Stratagem; artifice.
His demand
Springs not from Edward's well-meant honest love,
But from deceit, bred by necessity. Shakspeare.

3. [In law.] A subtile wily shift or device; all manner of craft, subtilty, guile, fraud, wiliness, slightness, cunning, covin, collusion, practice and offence, used to deceive another man by any means, which hath no other proper or particular name but offence. Cowel.

DECE'ITFUL.† adj. [deceit and full.] Fraudulent; full of deceit.
The Lord will abhor the bloody and deceitful man. Psalm v. 6.
They return, but not to the Most High; they are like a deceitful bow. Hosea, vii. 16.
I grant him bloody,
Luxurious, avaricious, false, deceitful. Shaksp.
The lovely young Lavinia once had friends,
And fortune smil'd, deceitful, on her birth.
Thomson.

DECE'ITFULLY.† adv. [from deceitful.] Fraudulently; with deceit.
Nicanor — sent unto Judas and his brethren deceitfully with friendly words. 1 Macc. vii. 27.
Exercise of form may be deceitfully dispatched of course. Wotton.

DECE'ITFULNESS. n. s. [from deceitful.] The quality of being fraudulent; tendency to deceive.
The care of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches, choke the word, and he becometh unfruitful. St. Mat. xiii. 22.

DECE'ITLESS.* adj. [deceit and less.] Without deceit; not deceiving.
As if that were an epithet in favour, which is inended to aggravation! So he that should call Satan an unclean devil, should imply that some devil is not unclean; or deceivable lusts, some lusts deceitless! Bp. Hall, Old Rel. § 2.

DECE'IVABLE.† adj. [old Fr. decevable.]

1. Subject to fraud; exposed to imposture.
Man was not only deceivable in his integrity, but the angels of light in all their clarity.
Brown, Vulg. Err.
How would'st thou use me now, blind, and thereby
Deceivable, in most things as a child
Helpless? hence easily contemn'd and scorn'd,
And last neglected. Milton, S. A.

2. Subject to produce errour; deceitful.
It is good to consider of deformity, not as a sign, which is more deceivable, but as a cause which seldom faileth of the effect. Bacon.
He received nothing but fair promises, which proved deceivable. Hayward.
O everfailing trust
In mortal strength! And oh, what not in man
Deceivable and vain? Milton, S. A.

DECE'IVABLENESS.† n. s. [from deceivable.] Liableness to be deceived, or to deceive.
With all deceivableness of unrighteousness.
2 Thess. ii. 10.

The happy day aproach'd, nor are my hopes deceiv'd. Dryden.

4. To mock; to fail.
They rais'd a feeble cry with trembling notes,
But the weak voice deceiv'd their gasping throats.
Dryden.

5. To deprive by fraud or stealth.
Wine is to be forborne in consumptions, for that the spirits of the wine prey on the viscid juice of the body, intercommon with the spirits of the body, and so deceive and rob them of their nourishment. Bacon.
Plant fruit trees in large borders, and set therein fine flowers, but thin and sparingly, lest they deceive the trees. Bacon.

DECE'IVER. n. s. [from deceive.] One that leads another into errour; a cheat.
Sigh no more, ladies, sigh no more;
Men were deceivers ever:
One foot in sea, and one on shore;
To one thing constant never. Shakspeare.
As for Perkin's dismission out of France, they interpreted it not as if he were detected for a counterfeit deceiver. Bacon.
Those voices, actions or gestures, which men have not by any compact agreed to make the instruments of conveying their thoughts one to another, are not the proper instruments of deceiving, so as to denominate the person using them a lyar or deceiver. South.
It is to be admired how any deceiver can be so weak to foretel things near at hand, when a very few months must of necessity discover the imposture. Swift.
Adieu the heart-expanding bowl,
And all the kind deceivers of the soul. Pope.

DECE'IVING.* n. s. [from deceive.] The act of cheating, of carrying on imposture.
Spots they are and blemishes, sporting themselves with their own deceivings. 2 Pet. ii. 13.
Wanton women, in their eyes,
Men's deceivings do comprise.
Greene's Philomela, (1592,) Ode ii.

DECE'MBER. n. s. [december, Latin.] The last month of the year; but named december, or the tenth month, when the year began in March.
Men are April when they woo, and December when they wed. Shakspeare, As you like it.
What should we speak of,
When we are old as you? When we shall hear
The rain and wind beat dark December. Shaksp.

DECE'MPEDAL. adj. [from decempeda, Latin.] Ten feet in length. Dict.

DECE'MVIRAL.* adj. [decemviralis, Lat.] Belonging to a decemvirate or office of ten governours.
Nicholo and Girolamo Foscarini make haste to present a petition, in all opinion most equitable, to the decemviral tribunal. — The council of ten upon this petition did assemble early in the morning. Wotton, Rem. p. 309.

DECE'MVIRATE.† n. s. [decemviratus, Latin.] The dignity and office of the ten governours of Rome, who were appointed to rule the commonwealth instead of consuls. Their authority subsisted only two years. Any body of ten men.

The first beast is the Roman empire. — This beast is described, in the form of his body, to be like a leopard, for his various government, by kings, consuls, decemvirates, dictators, &c.

Shelford's Learned Discourses, p. 275.

*DECE'MVIRI. n. s. [Lat.] The ten governours of Rome.

It was agreed, that ten men out of the chief senators should be elected; that their power should be equal to that of the kings, or consuls, for a whole year; and that in the mean time all other offices should cease. The decemviri, having now taken the government upon them, agreed, &c.

Kennet, Rom. Antiq. ii. 11.

DE'CENCE. } n. s. [decence, French; de-
DE'CENCY. } cet, Latin.]

1. Propriety of form; proper formality; becoming ceremony: decence is seldom used.

Those thousand decencies, that daily flow
From all her words and actions. Milton, P.L.

In good works there may be goodness in the general; but decence and gracefulness can be only in the particulars in doing the good. Sprat.

Were the offices of religion stript of all the external decencies of worship, they would not make a due impression on the minds of those who assist at them. Atterbury.

She speaks, behaves, and acts just as she ought;
But never, never reach'd one gen'rous thought:
Virtue she finds too painful an endeavour,
Content to dwell in decencies for ever. Pope.

2. Suitableness to character; propriety.

And must I own, she said, my secret smart?
What with more decence were in silence kept.
Dryden.

The consideration immediately subsequent to the being of a thing, is what agrees or disagrees with that thing; what is suitable or unsuitable to it; and from this springs the notion of decency or indecency, that which becomes or misbecomes.
South.

Sentiments which raise laughter, can very seldom be admitted with any decency into an heroick poem. Addison.

3. Modesty; not ribaldry; not obscenity.

Immodest words admit of no defence;
For want of decency is want of sense. Roscommon.

DECE'NNIAL.† adj. [from decennium. Lat.] What continues for the space of ten years. Bullokar.

DECE'NNOVAL. } adj. [decem and novem,
DECE'NNOVARY. } Latin.] Relating to the number nineteen.

Meton, of old, in the time of the Peloponesian war, constituted a decennoval circle, or of nineteen years; the same which we now call the golden number. Holder.

Seven months are retrenched in this whole decennovary progress of the epacts, to reduce the accounts of her motion and place to those of the sun. Holder.

DE'CENT.† adj. [decent, old Fr. decens, Lat.]

1. Becoming; fit; suitable.

Since there must be ornaments both in painting and poetry, if they are not necessary, they must at least be decent; that is, in their due place, and but moderately used. Dryden.

2. Grave; not gaudy; not ostentatious.

Come, pensive nun, devout and pure,
Sober, stedfast, and demure,
All in a robe of darkest grain
Flowing with majestick train,
And sable stole of Cyprus lawn
Over thy decent shoulders drawn. Milton, Il Pens.

3. Not wanton; not immodest.

DE'CENTLY.† adv. [from decent.]

1. In a proper manner; with suitable behaviour; without meanness or ostentation.

Perform'd what friendship, justice, truth require;
What could he more, but decently retire? Swift.

2. Without immodesty.

Let us walk honestly [in the margin, decently] as in the day, not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness. Rom. xiii. 13.

Past hope of safety, 'twas his latest care,
Like falling Cæsar decently to die. Dryden.

DE'CENTNESS.* n. s. [from decent.] Becoming ceremony; due formality.

Shall they be carried forth without any decentnesse, as we be wont to carry forth dead horses or dead swine?

Hunting of Purgatory, (1561,) fol. 37.

DECEPTIBI'LITY. n. s. [from deceit.] Liableness to be deceived.

Some errours are so fleshed in us, that they maintain their interest upon the deceptibility of our decayed natures. Glanville.

DECE'PTIBLE. adj. [from deceit.] Liable to be deceived; open to imposture; subject to fraud.

The first and father cause of common errour, is the common infirmity of human nature; of whose deceptible condition, perhaps, there should not need any other eviction than the frequent errours we shall ourselves commit. Brown.

DECE'PTION.† n. s. [deception, old Fr. deceptio, Lat.]

1. The act or means of deceiving; cheat; fraud; fallacy.

Being thus divided from truth in themselves, they are yet further removed by advenient deception. Brown.

All deception is a misapplying of those signs, which, by a compact or institution, were made the means of men's signifying or conveying their thoughts. South.

2. The state of being deceived.

Reason, not impossibly, may meet
Some specious object by the foe suborn'd,
And fall into deception unaware. Milton.

DECE'PTIOUS. adj. [from deceipt.] Deceitful; apt to deceive.

Yet there is a credence in my heart,
That doth invert th' attest of eyes and ears;
As if those organs had deceptious functions,
Created only to calumniate. Shakspeare.

DECE'PTIVE.† adj. [old Fr. deceptif.] Having the power of deceiving.
Cotgrave, and Sherwood.

To DECE'RN.* v. a. [old Fr. decerner, Lat. decerno.] To judge; to estimate; to discern. Huloet, Barret, and Sherwood.

Harvey.

DECI'DABLE.* adj. [from decide.] Capable of being determined.

The principles of Protestants prove the uniform loyalty of the heart to Christ, as the right sovereign. — The British church knows the Scriptures to be God's Word. — Our controversies about things indifferent are decidable by these principles.

Jones, Rome No Mother Church, (1678,) § 1.

To DECI'DE. v. a. [decido, Lat.] To fix the event of; to determine.

The day approach'd when fortune should decide
The important enterprize, and give the bride.
Dryden.

To DECI'DE.† v. n. To determine.

In council oft, and oft in battle tried,
Betwixt thy master and the world decide. Granv.

Who shall decide when doctors disagree,
And soundest casuists doubt? Pope.

DECI'DEDLY.* adv. [from the part. decided.] In a determined manner.

Among those, who are denominated Christians, some most decidedly believe what others as strenuously deny. Burgess on Christ's Div. p. 5.

DE'CIDENCE. n. s. [decidentia, Lat.]

1. The quality of being shed, or of falling off.

2. The act of falling away.

Men observing the decidence of their horn, do fall upon the conceit that it annually rotteth away, and successively reneweth again.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

DECI'DER.† n. s. [from decide.]

1. One who determines causes.

I cannot think that a jester or a monkey, a droll or a puppet, can be proper judges or deciders of controversy. Watts.

DE'CIMAL.† adj. [decimal, old Fr. decimus, Lat.] Numbered by ten; multiplied by ten.

In the way we take now to name numbers by millions of millions of millions, it is hard to go beyond eighteen, or, at most, four and twenty decimal progressions, without confusion. Locke.

To DE'CIMATE.† v. a. [decimus, Lat.]

1. To tithe; to take the tenth.
2. To select by lot every tenth soldier, in a general mutiny, for punishment.

He decimated certain troops that ran away, renewing a piece of the Roman discipline. Wotton, Parall. D. of Buck. and E. of Essex.

DECIMA'TION.† n. s. [from decimate.]

1. A tithing; a selection of every tenth by lot or otherwise.

The instating the tithes upon them, was demonstratively as large a revenue to them, as, supposing an equal division, the remainder could be to any other tribe; yea, and larger too; as much as the twelve tenth parts which they received exceeded the nine that remained to each tribe after the decimation. Hammond's Works, iv. 545.

2. A selection by lot of every tenth soldier, in a general mutiny, for punishment.

By decimation and a tithed death,
Take thou the destin'd tenth. Shakspeare.
A decimation I will strictly make
Of all who my Charinus did forsake;
And of each legion each centurion shall die. Dryden.

DE'CIMATOR.* n. s. [from decimate.] One who selects every tenth person for punishment.

We have complained of armies, committees, sequestrators, triers, and decimators. South, Serm. Jan. 30.

*DE'CIMO-SEXTO. n. s. [Lat.] A book is said to be in decimo-sexto, when a sheet is folded into sixteen leaves. This diminutive size gave rise to a contemptuous term.

Inventions which seek to give an advantage of procerity and comeliness to our stature, which, if sunk to a dwarfishness and epitomized to a decimo-sexto, make the persons of men and women to be as little in the eyes and esteem of others, as they are in their own inches or size. Bp. Taylor, Artif. Handsom. p. 75.

Proceed my little wit
In decimo-sexto. Massinger, Unnat. Combat.
Here is one
Bound up in decimo-sexto. Massinger, Maid of Honour.

To DECI'PHER. v.a. [dechiffrer, Fr.]

1. To explain that which is written in ciphers: this is the common use.

Zelmane, that had the same character in her heart, could easily decipher it. Sidney.
Assurance is writ in a private character, not to be read, nor understood, but by the conscience, to which the spirit of God has vouchsafed to decipher it. South.

2. To write out; to mark down in characters.

Could I give you a lively representation of guilt and horrour on this hand, and paint out eternal wrath, and decipher eternal vengeance on the other, then might I shew you the condition of a sinner hearing himself denied by Christ. South.
Then were laws of necessity invented, that so every particular subject might find his principal pleasure deciphered unto him, in the tables of his laws. Locke.

3. To stamp; to characterise; to mark.

You are both decipher'd
For villains mark'd with rape. Shakspeare.

4. To unfold; to unravel; to explain; as, to decipher an ambiguous speech.

DECI'PHERER.† n. s. [from decipher.] One who explains writings in cipher.

There are a sort of these narrow-eyed decipherers, I confess, that will extort strange and abstruse meanings out of any subject, be it never so conspicuous and innocently delivered. B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour.

DECI'SION.† n. s. [old Fr. decision.]

1. Determination of a difference, or of a doubt.

The time approaches,
That will with due decision make us know
What we shall say we have, and what we owe. Shakspeare.
Pleasure and revenge
Have ears more deaf than adders, to the voice
Of any true decision. Shakspeare.
The number of the undertakers, the worth of some of them, and their zeal to bring the matter to a decision, are sure arguments of the dignity and importance of it. Woodward.
War is a direct appeal to God for the decision of some dispute, which can by no other means be determined. Atterbury.

2. Determination of an event.

Their arms are to the last decision bent,
And fortune labours with the vast event. Dryden.

3. It is used in Scotland for narrative, or reports of the proceedings of the court of session there.

DECI'SION.* n. s. [Lat. decisio, a cutting off.] The act of separation; division.

The essence of God is incorporeal, spiritual, and indivisable; and therefore his nature is really communicated, not by derivation, or decision, but by a total and plenary communication. Pearson on the Creed, Art. 2.

DECI'SIVE.† adj. [old Fr. decisif.]

1. Having the power of determining any difference; conclusive.

Such a reflection, though it carries nothing perfectly decisive in it, yet creates a mighty confidence in his breast, and strengthens him much in his opinion. Atterbury.
This they are ready to look upon as a determination on their side, and decisive of the controversy between vice and virtue. Rogers.

2. Having the power of settling any event.

For on th' event,
Decisive of this bloody day, depends
The fate of kingdoms. Philips.

DECI'SIVELY.† adv. [from decisive.] In a conclusive manner.

You will have full two years good, but no more, to form your character in the world decisively. Lord Chesterfield.

DECI'SIVENESS. n. s. [from decisive.] The power of argument or evidence to terminate any difference, or settle an event.

DECI'SORY.† adj. [old Fr. decisoire.] Able to determine or decide. Sherwood.

To DECK.† v. a. [Sax. ðecan, or ðecan, to cover; Dutch, decken; Alem. thecan; Lat. tego.]

1. To cover; to overspread.

He has brave utensils,
Which, when he has a house, he'll deck withal. Shakspeare, Tempest.
Ye mists and exhalations, that now rise
From hill or steeming lake, dusky or grey,
In honour to the world's great Author, rise!
Whether to deck with clouds th' uncolour'd sky,
Or wet the thirsty earth with falling showers,
Rising or falling, still advance his praise. Milton, P. L.

2. To dress; to array.

She decked herself with her ear-rings and her jewels. Hosea, ii. 13.
Sweet ornament! that decks a thing divine. Shakspeare.
Long may'st thou live to wail thy children's loss;
And see another, as I see thee now,
Deck'd in thy rights, as thou art stall'd in mine. Shakspeare.
She sets to work millions of spinning worms,
That in their green shops weave the smooth-hair'd silk,
To deck her sons. Milton, Comus.

3. To adorn; to embellish.

But direful, deadly black, both leaf and bloom,
Fit to adorn the dead, and deck the dreary tomb. Spenser.
I have decked my bed with coverings of tapestry, with carved work, with fine linen of Egypt. Prov. vii. 16.
The dew with spangles deck'd the ground,
A sweeter spot of earth was never found. Dryden.
The god shall to his vot'ries tell
Each conscious tear, each blushing grace,
That deck'd dear Eloisa's face. Prior.

DECK. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. The floor of a ship.

Her keel plows hell,
And deck knocks heaven. B. Jonson.
We have also raised our second decks, and given more vent thereby to our ordinance, trying on our nether overloop. Ralegh.
If any, born and bred under deck, had no other information but what sense affords, he would be of opinion that the ship was as stable as a house. Glanville.
On high rais'd decks the haughty Belgians ride,
Beneath whose shade our humble frigates go. Dryden.
At sun-set to their ship they make return,
And snore secure on decks till rosy morn. Dryden, Iliad.

2. Pack of cards piled regularly on each other.

Besides gems, many other sorts of stones are regularly figured: the Amianthus, of parallel threads, as in the pile of velvet: and the Selenites, of parallel plates, as in a deck of cards. Grew.

DE'CKER.† n. s. [from deck.]

1. A dresser; one that apparels or adorns; a coverer; as a table-decker; "a woman decker of brides." Sherwood.
2. Spoken of a ship; as, a two-decker; that is, having two decks.

DE'CKING.* n. s. [from deck.] Ornament.

Such glorious deckings of the temple. Homilies, B. ii. Against Idolatry.
What would she do then
In woman's helps, in ornaments apt for her,
And deckings to her delicacy? Beaum. and Fl. Love's Pilgrimage.

To DECLA'IM.† v. n. [declamo, Lat. declamer, Fr. Formerly written declame, and peculiarly applied to the eloquence of the bar: "To declame, to moot; s'exerciter à plaider causes." See the old dictionaries of Huloet and Barret. See also the active sense of declaim, which escaped Dr. Johnson's notice.] To harangue; to speak to the passions; to rhetoricate; to speak set orations.

What are his mischiefs, consul? You declaim
Against his manners, and corrupt your own. B. Jonson.
It is usual for masters to make their boys declaim on both sides of an argument. Swift.
Dress up all the virtues in the beauties of oratory, and declaim aloud on the praise of goodness Watts

To DECLA'IM.* v. a. To advocate; to speak in favour of.

Whosoever strives to beget, or foment in his heart, such [malignant] persuasions concerning God, makes himself the devil's orator, and declaims his cause. South, Serm. viii. 82.

DECLA'IMER.† n. s. [from declaim.] One who makes speeches with intent to move the passions.

Tully [was] a good orator, yet no good poet; Sallust, a good historiographer, but no good declaimer. Fotherby, Atheom, p. 192.

He must have civil prudence and eloquence, and that whole, not taken up by snatches, or pieces, in sentences, or remnants when he will handle business or carry counsels, as if he came then out of the declaimer's gallery. B. Jonson, Discoveries.

Your Salamander is a perpetual declaimer against jealousy. Addison.

DECLA'IMING.* n. s. [from declaim.] An harangue; an appeal to the passions.

Using not the sharp two-edged sword of God's Word, but the blunt foils of human fallacies and declaimings. Bp. Taylor, Artif. Handsom. p. 95.

The splendid declaimings of novices and men of heat. South.

DECLAMA'TION. n. s. [declamatio, Lat.] A discourse addressed to the passions; an harangue; a set speech; a piece of rhetorick.

The cause why declamations prevail so greatly, is, for that men suffer themselves to be deluded. Hooker.

Thou mayst forgive his anger, while thou makest use of the plainness of his declamation. Bp. Taylor.

DE'CLAMATOR.† n. s. [Latin.] A declaimer; an orator; a rhetorician: seldom used, Dr. Johnson says, citing the solitary instance in the Tatler.

They which onely teache rhetorick —— ought to be named rhetoricians, declamators, artificial speakers. Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 41. b.

Who could, I say, hear this generous declamator, without being fired at his noble zeal? Tatler, No. 55.

Was ever any declamator's case so extravagantly put? Bentley on Phalaris, Introd.

DECLA'MATORY. adj. [declamatorius, Lat.]

1. Relating to the practice of declaiming; pertaining to declamation; treated in the manner of a rhetorician.

This a while suspended his interment, and became a declamatory theme amongst the religious men of that age. Wotton.

2. Appealing to the passions.

He has run himself into his own declamatory way, and almost forgotten that he was now setting up for a moral poet. Dryden.

DECLA'RABLE. adj. [from declare.] Capable of proof.

This is declarable from the best writers. Brown.

DECLARA'TION. n. s. [from declare.]

1. A proclamation or affirmation; open expression; publication.

His promises are nothing else but declarations, what God will do for the good of men. Hooker.

Though wit and learning are certain and habitual perfections of the mind, yet the declaration of them, which alone brings the repute, is subject to a thousand hazards. South.

There are no where so plain and full declarations of mercy and love to the sons of men, as are made in the gospel. Tillotson.

2. An explanation of something doubtful. Obsolete.

3. [In law.] Declaration (declaratio) is properly the shewing forth, or laying out, of an action personal in any suit, though it is used sometimes for both personal and real actions. Cowel.

DECLA'RATIVE. adj. [from declare.]

1. Making declaration; explanatory.

The names of things should be always taken from something observably declarative of their form or nature. Grew.

2. Making proclamation.

To this we may add the vox populi, so declarative on the same side. Swift.

DECLA'RATORILY.† adv. [from declaratory.] In the form of a declaration; not in a decretory form.

Andreas Alciatus the civilian, and Franciscus de Cordua, have both declaratorily confirmed the same. Brown, Vulg. Err.

In my judgement, this is the doctrine of the church of England; not delivered according unto private opinion in ordinary tracts and lectures, but delivered publickly, positively, and declaratorily in authentical records.

Mountagu, App. to Cæs. p. 36.

This pretended power of the people must, as all others, either be directly, or else declaratorily by approbation, given by God.

K. Charles to A. Henderson, p. 38.

DECLA'RATORY.† adj. [from declare.] Affirmative; expressive; not decretory; not promissory, but expressing something before promised or decreed. Thus, a declaratory law, is a new act confirming a former law.

These blessings are not only declaratory of the good pleasure and intention of God towards them, but likewise of the natural tendency of the thing. Tillotson.

All human laws, properly speaking, are only declaratory; they may alter the mode and application, but have no power over the substance of original justice. Burke on the Popery Laws.

To DECLA'RE. v. a. [declaro, Lat.]

1. To clear; to free from obscurity: not in use.

To declare this a little, we must assume that the surfaces of such bodies are exactly smooth. Boyle.

2. To make known; to tell evidently and openly.

It hath been declared unto me of you, that there are contentions among you. 1 Cor. i. 11.

The sun by certain signs declares,
Both when the South projects a stormy day,
And when the clearing North will puff the clouds away. Dryden, Virg.

3. To publish; to proclaim.

Declare his glory among the heathen. 1 Chron. xvi. 24.

4. To shew in open view; to shew an opinion in plain terms.

In Cæsar's army somewhat the soldiers would have had, yet they would not declare themselves it, but only demanded a discharge. Bacon.

We are a considerable body, who, upon a proper occasion, would not fail to declare ourselves. Addison.

To DECLA'RE. v. n. To make a declaration; to proclaim some resolution or opinion; or favour or opposition: with for or against.

The internal faculties of will and understanding, decreeing and declaring against them. Bp. Taylor.

God is said not to have left himself without witness in the world, there being something fixed in the nature of men that will be sure to testify and declare for him. South, Serm.

Like fawning courtiers, for success they wait;
And then come smiling, and declare for fate. Dryden.

DECLA'REDLY.* adv. [from the participle declared.] Avowedly; without disguise.

Those, who have yet either undiscernibly as some, or suspectedly as others, or declaredly as many, according to the general custom of countries, used such additaments to their faces, as they thought most advanced the beauty or comeliness of their looks. Bp. Taylor, Artif. Handsom. p. 93.

DECLA'REMENT. n. s. [from declare.] Discovery; declaration; testimony.

Crystal will calefy into electricity; that is, into a power to attract straws, or light bodies, and convert the needle freely placed, which is a declarement of very different parts. Brown.

DECLA'RER.† n. s. [from declare.] A proclaimer; one that makes any thing known.

The true dispensers [of the gospel] are appointed to be true and faithful declarers.

Fulke against Allen, (1586,) p. 112.

The one must be helped by an infallible commentary, and the other supplied by an authentical declarer of tradition. Burnet on the Articles, Art. 20.

DECLA'RING.* n. s. [from declare.] Publication; declaration; exposition.

Now will we come to the declaring of the matter in few words. 2 Macc. vi. 17.

DECLE'NSION. n. s. [declinatio, Lat.]

1. Tendency from a greater to a less degree of excellence.

A beauty-waining and distressed widow,
Ev'n in the afternoon of her best days,
Seduc'd the pitch and height of all his thoughts
To base declension. Shakspeare, Rich. III.

Take the picture of a man in the greenness and vivacity of his youth, and in the latter date and declensions of his drooping years, and you will scarce know it to belong to the same person. South, Serm.

2. Declination; descent.

We may reasonably allow as much for the declension of the land from that place to the sea, as for the immediate height of the mountain. Burnet, Theory.

3. Inflexion; manner of changing nouns.

Declension is only the variation or change of the termination of a noun, whilst it continues to signify the same thing. Clarke's Latin Grammar.

DECLI'NABLE.† adj. [from decline.] Having variety of terminations; as, a declinable noun.

Howe the other declynable partes form their plurall numbers out of their singulars.

Palsgrave, Fr. Gram. 1530. B. 3.

The numbers, cases, modes, times, and other inflexions of the declinable parts of speech are also marked. Tyrwhitt on Chaucer.

DECLINA'TION.† n. s. [declinatio, Lat.]

1. Descent; change from a better to a worse state; diminution of vigour; decay.

The queen, hearing of the declination of the monarchy, took it so ill, as she would never after hear of his suit. Bacon.

Two general motions all animations have, that is, their beginning and encrease; and two more, that is, their state and declination. Brown, Vulg. Err.

Hope waits upon the flow'ry prime;
And summer, though it be less gay,
Yet is not look'd on as a time
Of declination or decay. Waller.

2. The act of bending down; as, a declination of the head.

3. Variation from rectitude; oblique motion; obliquity.

Supposing there were a declination of atoms, yet will it not effect what they intend; for then they do all decline, and so there will be no more concourse than if they did perpendicularly descend. Ray.

This declination of atoms in their descent, was itself either necessary or voluntary. Bentley.

4. Deviation from moral rectitude.

That a peccant creature should disapprove and repent of every declination and violation of the rules of just and honest, this right reason discoursing upon the stock of its own principles could not but infer. South, Serm.

5. Variation from a fixed point.

There is no declination of latitude, nor variation of the elevation of the pole, notwithstanding what some have asserted. Woodward.

6. The act of shunning.

They must be separated from us, we must be separated from them; they from us, by just censures; or, if that be neglected, we from them by a voluntary declination of their familiar conversation. Bp. Hall, Contempl. B. 4.

7. [In navigation.] The variation of the needle from the direction to North and South.

8. [In astronomy.] The declination of a star we call its shortest distance from the equator. Brown.

Ptolemy thought the sun's greatest declination immutable. Dr. Bainbridge, in Hakewill's Apology, p. 101.

9. [In grammar.] The declension or inflection of a noun through its various terminations.

10. DECLINATION of a Plane [in dialing], is an arch of the horizon, comprehended either between the plane and the prime vertical circle, if accounted from the East or West; or else between the meridian and the plane, if accounted from the North or South. Harris.

DE'CLINATOR.† } n. s. [from decline.]
DECLI'NATORY. }

1. An instrument in dialing, by which the declination, reclination, and inclination of planes are determined. Chambers.

There are several ways to know the several planes; but the readiest is by an instrument called a declinatory, fitted to the variation of your place. Moxon.

2. One who declines to agree with another.

The votes of the declinators could not be heard for the noise. Hacket's Life of Abp. Williams, P. II. p. 65.

To DECLI'NE.† v. n. [decliner, old Fr. declino, Lat.]

1. To lean downward.

And then with kind embracements, tempting kisses,
And with declining head into his bosom,
Bid him shed tears, as being overjoy'd. Shaksp.

2. To deviate; to run into obliquities.

Neither shalt thou speak in a cause to decline after many, to wrest judgment. Exod. xxiii. 2.

3. To shun: to avoid to do any thing.

4. To sink; to be impaired; to decay. Opposed to improvement or exaltation.

Sons at perfect age, and fathers declining, the father should be as a ward to the son. Shakspeare.

They'll be by th' fire, and presume to know
What's done i' th' capitol; who's like to rise,
Who thrives, and who declines. Shakspeare.

Sometimes nations will decline so low
From virtue, which is reason, that no wrong,
But justice, and some fatal curse annex'd,
Deprives them of their outward liberty.
Milton, P. L.

That empire must decline,
Whose chief support and sinews are of coin.
Waller.

And nature, which all acts of life designs,
Not like ill poets, in the last declines. Denham.

Thus then my lov'd Euryalus appears;
He looks the prop of my declining years. Dryden.

Autumnal warmth declines;
E'er heat is quite decay'd, or cold begun. Dryd.

God, in his wisdom, hath been pleased to load our declining years with many sufferings, with diseases, and decays of nature. Swift.

To DECLI'NE.† v. a.

1. To bend downward; to bring down.

And now fair Phœbus 'gan decline in haste,
His weary waggon to the western vale. Spenser.

He is such a volunteer sinner, that he hath neither the wit nor the excuse of declining his conscience in complement to his senses.
Boyle, on the Style of H. Script. p. 195.

And leaves the semblance of a lover, fixt
In melancholy deep, with head declin'd,
And love-dejected eyes. Thomson.

2. To shun; to avoid; to refuse; to be cautious of.

He had wisely declined that argument, though in their common sermons they gave it. Clarendon.

Since the muses do invoke my power,
I shall no more decline that sacred bower,
Where Gloriana, their great mistress, lies. Waller.

Though I the business did decline,
Yet I contriv'd the whole design,
And sent them their petition. Denham.

If it should be said that minute bodies are indissoluble, because it is their nature to be so, that would not be to render a reason of the thing proposed, but, in effect, to decline rendering any.
Boyle.

Could Caroline have been captivated with the glories of this world, she had them all laid before her; but she generously declined them, because she saw the acceptance of them was inconsistent with religion. Addison.

Whatever they judged to be most agreeable or disagreeable, they would pursue or decline.
Atterbury.

3. To decay; to sink.

I dare him therefore
To lay his gay caparisons apart,
And answer me declin'd. Shaksp. Ant. and Cleop.

Faith and morality are declined among us. Swift.

4. To turn off from any course or direction; to divert. Not now in use.

You decline your life
Far from the maze of custom, error, strife.
B. Jonson, Forest.

5. To modify a word by various terminations; to inflect.

You decline musa, and construe Latin, by the help of a tutor, or with some English translation. Watts.

DECLI'NE. n. s. [from the verb.] The state of tendency to the less or the worse; diminution; decay. Contrary to increase, improvement or elevation.

Thy rise of fortune did I only wed;
From its decline, determin'd to recede. Prior.

Those fathers lived in the decline of literature.
Swift.

DECLI'VITY.† n. s. [old Fr. declivité, from the Lat. declivis.] Inclination or obliquity reckoned downwards; gradual descent; not precipitous or perpendicular: the contrary to acclivity.

Rivers will not flow unless upon declivity, and their sources be raised above the earth's ordinary surface, so that they may run upon a descent.
Woodward.

I found myself within my depth; and the declivity was so small, that I walked near a mile before I got to the shore. Gulliver's Travels.

DECLI'VOUS. adj. [declivis, Lat.] Gradually descending; not precipitous; not perpendicularly sinking: the contrary to acclivous; moderately steep.

To DECO'CT. v. a. [decoquo, decoctum, Lat.]

1. To prepare by boiling for any use; to digest in hot water.

Sena loseth its windiness by decocting, and subtile or windy spirits are taken off by incension or evaporation. Bacon.

2. To digest by the heat of the stomach.

There she decocts, and doth the food prepare;
There she distributes it to ev'ry vein,
There she expels what she may fitly spare. Davies.

3. To boil in water, so as to draw the strength or virtue of any thing.

The longer malt or herbs are decocted in liquor, the clearer it is. Bacon.

4. To boil up to a consistence; to strengthen or invigorate by boiling: this is no proper use.

Can sodden water, their barley-broth,
Decoct their cold blood to such valiant heat?
Shakspeare.

DECO'CTIBLE. adj. [from decoct.] That may be boiled, or prepared by boiling. Dict.

DECO'CTION. n. s. [decoctum, Lat.]

1. The act of boiling any thing, to extract its virtues.

In infusion the longer it is, the greater is the part of the gross body that goeth into the liquor; but in decoction, though more goeth forth, yet it either purgeth at the top, or settleth at the bottom. Bacon.

The lineaments of a white lily will remain after the strongest decoction. Arbuthnot.

2. A preparation made by boiling water.

They distil their husbands land
In decoctions! and are mann'd
With ten emp'rics, in their chamber
Lying for the spirit of amber. B. Jonson.

If the plant be boiled in water, the strained liquor is called the decoction of the plant. Arbuthnot.

DECO'CTURE. n. s. [from decoct.] A substance drawn by decoction.

To DECO'LLATE.* v. a. [decollo, Lat. decoller, Fr.] To behead.

He brought forth a statue with three heads: two of them were quite beat off, and the third was much bruised, but not decollated.
Heywood's Hierarch. of Angels, 1635, p. 474.

A fine piece of a decollated head of St. John the Baptist was shewn to a Turkish emperour: he praised many things, but he observed one defect; he observed that the skin did not shrink from the wounded part of the neck.
Burke on the Sublime and Beautiful, Introd.

DECOLLA'TION.† n. s. [old Fr. decollation; Lat. decollatio. The word is also old in our language. Skelton mentions "sainct John's decollacion," Poems, p. 113.] The act of beheading.

He, by a decollation of all hope, annihilated his mercy: this, by an immoderancy thereof, destroyed his justice. Brown.

DECOLORA'TION.* n. s. [Lat. decoloratio.] Absence of colour.

Paleness — is the proper colour and badge of love: but by the way it is to be noted, that we must not understand by this word pale a simple decoloratim, or whiteness of the skin.
Ferrand, Love Melancholy, (1640,) p. 121.

To DECOMPO'SE.* v. a. [Fr. decomposer.]

1. To decompound; to compound a second time.

The analytical legislators, and constitution-venders, are quite as busy in their trade of decomposing organization, in forming his grace's vassals into primary assemblies, national guards, &c.
Burke, Lett. to a Noble Lord.

2. To dissolve. A chymical expression, adopted from the French.

That portion of this earth, which is by water introduced into the plant, is decomposed, and its air set loose by the vegetable acids of the plant.
Kirwan on Manures, p. 49.

DECOMPO'SITE. adj. [decompositus, Lat.] Compounded a second time; compounded with things already composite.

Decomposites of three metals, or more, are too long to inquire of, except there be some compositions of them already observed. Bacon.

DECOMPOSI'TION.† n. s. [decompositus, Lat.]

1. The act of compounding things already compounded.

The English, as Sir P. Sidney observeth, hath an elegant way of expressing them, [epithets] much beyond the Latin, in a dextrous decomposition of two or three words together; as, taste-pleasing fruits, high-erected thoughts.

Instruct. for Oratory, (Ox. 1682,) p. 52.

2. Resolution or separation of parts.

The chief use of tartar vitriolate seems to be, that it promotes the decomposition, as Mr. Sennebier has observed. Kirwan on Manures, p. 53.

We consider what happens in the compositions and decompositions of saline particles. Boyle.

To DECOMPO'UND. v. a. [decompono, Lat.]

1. To compose of things already cmpounded; to compound a second time; to form by a second composition.

Nature herself doth in the bowels of the earth make decompounded bodies, as we see in vitriol, cinnabar, and even in sulphur itself. Boyle.

When a word stands for a very complex idea, that is compounded and decompounded, it is not easy for men to form and retain that idea exactly. Locke.

If the violet, blue, and green be intercepted, the remaining yellow, orange, and red, will compound upon the paper an orange: and then, if the intercepted colours be let pass, they will fall upon this compounded orange, and, together with it, decompound a white. Newton.

2. To resolve a compound into simple parts. This is a sense that has of late crept irregularly into chymical books.

DECOMPO'UND. adj. [from the verb.] Composed of things or words already compounded; compounded a second time.

The pretended salts and sulphur are so far from being elementary parts extracted out of the body of mercury, that they are rather, to borrow a term of the grammarians, decompound bodies, made up of the whole metal and the menstruum, or other additaments employed to disguise it. Boyle.

No body should use any compound or decompound of the substantial verbs.

Arbuthnot and Pope.

DECOMPO'UNDABLE.* adj. [from To decompound.] Liable to be dissolved.

It is impossible but speculative and devout minds, who are acquainted with the efficiency ascribed to the fluids of water, air, fire, and living spirits, in the sacred Scriptures and other writings of antiquity, must be struck with the modern and recent discoveries of chemistry, which shew the universal dominion of air of different kinds, and that all nature seems to be decompoundable into fluidity. Brit. Crit. ix. 58.

DE'CORAMENT.† n. s. [from decorate, Dr. Johnson says; referring only to some dictionary for the existence of *decoramen*t. But the old word is decorement; and even decoring is used for decorating, in Heylin's Life of Abp. Laud, p. 71.] Ornament; embellishment.

Those decorements which beautify and adorn her. Heywood's Descr. of a Ship, &c. 1637, p. 29.

To DE'CORATE.† v. a. [decoro, Lat. decorer, Fr. This word is mentioned by Cotgrave in his translation of decorer, and is given in Sherwood's old English and French Dictionary, though, in that of Dr. Johnson, it is without authority, and without example.] To adorn; to embellish; to beautify.

This essay is not decorated with many comparisons. Dr. Warton on Pope.

DECORA'TION.† n. s. [old Fr. decoration.] Ornament; embellishment; added beauty.

The ensigns of virtues contribute to the ornament of figures; such as the decorations belonging to the liberal arts, and to war. Dryden.

This helm and heavy buckler I can spare,
As only decorations of the war:
So Mars is arm'd for glory, not for need. Dryd.

DE'CORATOR. n. s. [from decorate.] An adorner; an embellisher. Dict.

DECO'ROUS. adj. [decorus, Lat.] Decent; suitable to a character; becoming; proper; befitting; seemly.

It not is so decorous, in respect of God, that he should immediately do all the meanest and trifling-est things himself, without any inferiour or subordinate minister. Ray.

DECO'ROUSLY.* adv. [from decorous.] In a becoming or proper manner.

To DECO'RTICATE.† v. a. [decortico, Lat.] To divest of the bark or husk; to husk; to peel; to strip.

He discovers his falsehoods and methods, and can decorticate him for a devil of darkness.

Waterhouse, Apol. for Learn. 1653, p. 27.

Take great barley, dried and decorticated, after it is well washed, and boil it in water.

Arbuthnot on Coins.

DECORTICA'TION.† n. s. [from decorticate.] The act of stripping the bark or husk. Cockeram.

DECO'RUM. n. s. [Latin.] Decency; behaviour contrary to licentiousness, contrary to levity; seemliness.

If your master
Would have a queen his beggar, you must tell him,
That majesty, to keep decorum, must
No less beg than a kingdom. Shakspeare.

I am far from suspecting simplicity, which is bold to trespass in points of decorum. Wotton.

Beyond the fix'd and settled rules
Of vice and virtue in the schools,
The better sort shall set before 'em
A grace, a manner, a decorum: Prior.

Gentlemen of the army should be, at least, obliged to external decorum: a profligate life and character should not be a means of advancement. Swift.

He kept with princes due decorum;
Yet never stood in awe before 'em. Swift.

To DECO'Y. v. a. [from koey, Dutch, a cage; to lure into a cage; to intrap; to draw into a snare.

A fowler had taken a partridge, who offered to decoy her companions into the snare. L'Estrange.

Decoy'd by the fantastick blaze,
Now lost, and now renew'd, he sinks absorpt
Rider and horse. Thomson.

DECO'Y. n. s. [from the verb.] Allurement to mischiefs; temptation.

The devil could never have had such numbers, had he not used some as decoys to ensnare others. Gov. of the Tongue.

These exuberant productions of the earth became a continual decoy and snare: they only excited and fomented lusts. Woodward.

An old dramdrinker is the devil's decoy. Berkley.

DECO'YDUCK. n. s. A duck that lures others.

There is a sort of ducks, called decoyducks, that will bring whole flights of fowl to their retirements, where are conveniences made for catching them. Mortimer.

To DECRE'ASE. v. n. [decresco, Lat.] To grow less; to be diminished.

From the moon is the sign of feasts, a ligh that decreaseth in her perfection. Ecclus. xliii. 7.

Unto fifty years, as they said, the heart annually increaseth the weight of one drachm; after which, in the same proportion, it decreaseth.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

When the sun comes to his tropicks, days increase and decrease but a very little for a great while together. Newton.

To DECRE'ASE. v. a. To make less; to diminish.

He did dishonourable find
Those articles, which did our state decrease.

Daniel.

Nor cherish'd they relations poor,
That might decrease their present store. Prior.

Heat increases the fluidity of tenacious liquids, as of oil, balsam, and honey; and thereby decreases their resistance. Newton.

DECRE'ASE. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. The state of growing less; decay.

By weak'ning toil, and hoary age o'ercome,
See thy decrease, and hasten to thy tomb. Prior.

2. The wain; the time when the visible face of the moon grows less.

See in what time the seeds, set in the increase of the moon, come to a certain height, and how they differ from those that are set in the decrease of the moon. Bacon.

To DECRE'E.† v. n. [old Fr. decrez, decreis, decret, and decreter; Lat. decerno, decretum. Our own word at first was decrete: "Through their decretes and judgements," Chaucer, Boeth. i. pros. 4.] To make an edict: to appoint by edict; to establish by law; to determine; to resolve.

They shall see the end of the wise, and shall not understand what God in his counsel hath decreed of him. Wisd. iv.

Father eternal! Thine is to decree;
Mine, both in heav'n and earth, to do thy will.

Milton, P. L.

Had heav'n decreed that I should life enjoy,
Heav'n had decreed to save unhappy Troy. Dryd.

To DECRE'E. v. a. To doom or assign by a decree.

Thou shalt also decree a thing and it shall be established. Job.

The king their father,
On just and weighty reasons has decreed
His sceptre to the younger. Rowe.

DECRE'E. n. s. [decretum, Lat.]

1. An edict; a law.

If you deny me, fie upon your law!
There is no force in the decrees of Venice. Shaks.

There went a decree from Cæsar Augustus, that all the world should be taxed. Luke, ii. 1.

Are we condemn'd by fate's unjust decree,
No more our houses and our homes to see?

Dryden.

The Supreme Being is sovereignly good; he rewards the just, and punishes the unjust: and the folly of man, and not the decree of Heaven, is the cause of human calamity. Broome.

2. An established rule.

When he made a decree for the rain, and a way for the lightning of the thunder. Job, xxviii. 26.

3. A determination of a suit, or litigated cause.

4. [In canon law.] An ordinance, which is enacted by the pope himself, by and with the advice of his cardinals in council assembled, without being consulted by any one thereon. Ayliffe's Parergon.

DE'CREMENT. n. s. [decrementum, Latin.] Decrease; the state of growing less; the quantity lost by decreasing.

Upon the tropick, and first descension from our solstice, we are scarce sensible of declination; but declining farther, our decrement accelerates: we set apace, and in our last days precipitate into our graves. Brown, Vulg. Err.

Rocks, mountains, and the other elevations of the earth, suffer a continual decrement, and grow lower and lower. Woodward.

DECRE'PIT. adj. [Fr. decrepite; Lat. decrepitus. This word is often written, inaccurately, decrepid; as by Dryden, in one of his Letters, "How can you be so good to an old decrepid man?" Malone's Life of Dryden, vol. i. P. ii. p. 66. This should not be imitated.] Wasted and worn out with age; in the last stage of decay.

Decrepit miser! base, ignoble wretch. Shaksp.

Of men's lives in this decrepit age of the world, many exceed fourscore, and some an hundred years. Ralegh.

This pope is decrepit, and the bell goeth for him: take order that there be chosen a pope of fresh years. Bacon.

Decrepit superstition, and such as had their nativity in times beyond all history, are fresh in the observation of many heads. Brown, Vulg. Err.

And from the North to call
Decrepid Winter. Milton, P.L.

Who this observes, may in his body find
Decrepit age, but never in his mind. Denham.

Propp'd on his staff, and stooping as he goes,
A painted mitre shades his furrow'd brows;
The god, in the decrepit form array'd,
The gardens enter'd, and the fruits survey'd.
Pope.

The charge of witchcraft inspires people with a malevolence towards those poor decrepit parts of our species, in whom human nature is defaced by infirmity and dotage. Addison.

To DECRE'PITATE. v. a. [decrepo, Lat.] To calcine salt till it has ceased to crackle in the fire.

So will it come to pass in a pot of salt, although decrepitated. Brown, Vulg. Err.

DECREPITA'TION. n. s. [from decrepitate.] The crackling noise which salt makes, when put over the fire in a crucible. Quincy.

DECRE'PITNESS.† } n. s. [from decrepit.
DECRE'PITUDE. } French also, décrépitude.] The last stage of decay; the last effects of old age.

Decrepitude is a solitary quality.
Florio, Trans. of Montaigne, 1613, p. 554.

Mother earth, in this her barrenness and decrepitness of age, can procreate such swarms of curious engines. Bentley, Serm. iv.

Many seem to pass on from youth to decrepitude without any reflection on the end of life.
Johnson, Rambler, No. 78.

DECRE'SCENT. adj. [from decrescens, Lat.] Growing less; being in a state of decrease.

DE'CRETAL.† adj. [decretum, Latin.] Appertaining to a decree; containing a decree.

A decretal epistle is that which the pope decrees either by himself, or else by the advice of his cardinals; and this must be on his being consulted by some particular person or persons thereon.
Ayliffe's Parergon.

Rather before a decretal epistle of pope Innocent the third. Milton, Means to remove Hirelings out of the Church.

DE'CRETAL. n. s. [from the adjective.]

1. A book of decrees or edicts; a body of laws.

The second room, whose walls
Were painted fair with memorable gests,
Of magistrates, of courts, of tribunals,
Of laws, of judgements, and of decretals.
Spenser.

2. The collection of the pope's decrees.

Traditions and decretals were made of equal force, and as authentical as the sacred charter itself. Howel, Voc. Forest.

DECRE'TION.* n. s. [from the Lat. decresco.] The state of growing less.

Nor can we now perceive that the world becomes more or less than it was, by which decretion we might guess at a former increase, and from a tendency to conception collect its original generation. Pearson, on the Creed, Art. 1.

DE'CRETIST. n. s. [from decree.] One that studies or professes the knowledge of the decretal.

The decretists had their rise and beginning under the reign of the emperor Frederick Barbarossa.
Ayliffe, Parergon.

DE'CRETORILY.* adv. [from decretory.] In a definitive manner.

Deal concisely and decretorily, that I may be brought as compendiously as may be to the point you drive at. Goodman, Wint. Ev. Conf. P. iii.

DE'CRETORY.† adj. [from decree.]

1. Judicial; definitive.

The Son of Man is thus constantly represented as making the great decretory separation, and the last judicatory distinction between man and man; as an husbandman separating the wheat, sometime from the chaff, sometime from the tares.
Pearson on the Creed, Art. 7.

There are other lenitives that friendship will apply, before it will be brought to the decretory rigours of a condemning sentence.
South, Serm. ii. 58.

2. Critical; in which there is some definitive event.

The motions of the moon, supposed to be measured by sevens, and the critical or decretory days, depend on that number. Brown, Vulg. Err.

The day of judgement is truly and most literally the critical, the decretory dry.
Donne, Devot. p. 359.

To DECRE'W.* v. n. [Fr. decru, from decroitre. Lat decresco.] To decrease. Not now in use.

Sir Arthegal renewed
His strength still more, but she still more decrewed. Spenser, F. Q. iv. vi. 18.

DECRI'AL.† n. s. [from decry.] Clamorous censure; hasty or noisy condemnation; concurrence in censuring any thing.

Who would exempt themselves from criticism, and save their ill-acquired reputation, by the decrial of an art, on which the cause and interest of wit and letters absolutely depend.
Shaftesbury, Miscell. V. ch. 1.

DECRI'ER.† n. s. [from decry.] One who censures hastily, or clamorously.

I cannot but reflect upon the brutish folly, and absurd impudence, of the late fanatick decriers of the necessity of human learning.
South, Serm. vii. 37.

To DECRO'WN.* v. a. [de, Lat. and crown.] deprive of a crown.

Dethroning and decrowning princes with his foot as pleaseth him, [the pope.]
Dr. Hakewill, Answ. to Dr. Carier, 1616, p. 37.

DECRO'WNING.* n. s. The act of depriving of a crown.

He holds it no more sin the decrowning of kings, than our puritans do the suppression of bishops. Overbury's Characters.

DECRUSTA'TION.* n. s. [Fr. decrustation.] An uncrusting; a paring away of the uppermost part or outmost rind.
Cotgrave, and Sherwood.

To DECRY'. v. a. [decrier, French. Neither our own nor the French word can boast any great antiquity. Mr. Malone observes, that Cowley, and Sir W. Waller, the parliamentary general, are the earliest users of it which he has observed. The French, I believe, was introduced, in the sense of blame, by the Sieur d'Ablancourt.] To censure; to blame clamorously; to clamour against.

Malice in criticks reigns so high,
That for small errours they whole plays decry.
Dryden.

Those measures which are extolled by one half of the kingdom, are naturally decried by the other.
Addison.

They applied themselves to lessen their authority, decryed them as hard and unnecessary restraints. Rogers.

Quacks and impostors are still cautioning us to beware of counterfeits, and decry others cheats only to make more way for their own. Swift.

DECUBA'TION.* n. s. [from decubo, low Latin.] The act of lying down.

At this decubation upon boughs the satirist seems to hint. Evelyn, iv. § 7.

DECU'MBENCE. } n. s. [decumbo, Lat.]
DECU'MBENCY. } The act of lying down; the posture of lying down.

This must come to pass, if we hold opinion they lie not down, and enjoy no decumbence at all; for station is properly no rest, but one kind of motion. Brown, Vulg. Err.

Not considering the ancient manner of decumbency, he imputed this gesture of the beloved disciple into rusticity, or an act of incivility.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

DECU'MBENT.* adj. [Lat. decumbens.]

1. Lying, or leaning; recumbent.

Underneath is the decumbent portraiture of a woman, resting on a death's head.
Ashmole's Berk. i. p. 2.

2. Lying in the bed of sickness. See DECUMBITURE.

To know how to deal aright with the consciences of decumbent dying sinners, is a task that cannot be advantageously performed but by a man blessed with a serious and pious frame of spirit.
Atterbury.

DECU'MBITURE.† n. s. [from decumbo, Latin.]

1. The time at which a man takes to his bed in a disease.

During his decumbiture, he was visited by his most dear friend, the bishop of Gloucester.
Life of Firmin, (1698,) p. 82.

2. [In astrology.] A scheme of the heavens erected for that time, by which the prognosticks of recovery or death are discovered.

If but a mile she travel out of town,
The planetary hour must first be known,
And lucky moment: if her eye but akes,
Or itches, its decumbiture she takes. Dryd. Juv. vi.

DE'CUPLE. adj. [decuplus, Latin.] Tenfold; the same number ten times repeated.

Man's length, that is, a perpendicular from the vertex unto the sole of the foot, is decuple unto his profundity; that is, a direct line between the breast and the spine. Brown, Vulg. Err.

Supposing there be a thousand sorts of insects in this island, if the same proportion holds between the insects of England and of the world, as between plants domestick and exotick, that is, near a decuple, the species of insects will amount to ten thousand. Ray.

DECU'RION. n. s. [decurio, Latin.] A commander over ten; an officer subordinate to the centurion.

He instituted decurions through both these colonies, that is, one over every ten families. Temple.

DECU'RSION.† n. s. [decursus, Latin.] The act of running down.

What is decayed by that decursion of waters, is supplied by the terrene fæces which water brings. Hale.

The decursions of our corruption and mortality — tend to the grave, as the rivers into the sea. Hewyt, Serm. (1658,) p. 226.

To DECU'RT.* v. a. [Lat. decurto.] To abridge; to shorten.

When thou see'st
The candid stole thrown o'er the pious priest,
With reverend curtsies come, and to him bring
Thy free, and not decurted, offering.
Herrick, Hesperides, p. 339.

DECURTA'TION. n. s. [decurtatio, Latin.] The act of cutting short, or shortening.

To DECU'SSATE. v. a. [decusso, Latin.] To intersect at acute angles.

This it performs by the action of a notable muscle on each side, having the form of the letter X, made up of many fibres, decussating one another longways. Ray.

DECUSSA'TION. n. s. [from decussate.] The act of crossing; state of being crossed at unequal angles.

Though there be decussation of the rays in the pupil of the eye, and so the image of the object in the retina, or bottom of the eye, be inverted; yet doth not the object appear inverted, but in its right or natural posture. Ray.

To DEDE'CORATE. v. a. [dedecoro, Lat.] To disgrace; to bring a reproach upon. Dict.

DEDECORA'TION. n. s. [from dedecorate.] The act of disgracing; disgrace. Dict.

DEDE'COROUS. adj. [dedecus, Latin.] Disgraceful; reproachful; shameful. Dict.

DEDENTI'TION. n. s. [de and dentitio, Lat.] Loss or shedding of the teeth.

Solon divided life into ten septenaries, because in every one thereof a man received some sensible mutation: in the first is dedentition or falling of teeth. Brown, Vulg. Err.

To DE'DICATE. v. a. [dedico, Lat.]

1. To devote to some divine power; to consecrate and set apart to sacred uses.

A pleasant grove
Was shot up high, full of the stately tree
That dedicated is to Olympick Jove,
And to his son Alcides. Spenser.

The princes offered for dedicating the altar, in the day that it was anointed. Num. vii. 10.

Warn'd by the seer, to her offended name
We rais'd, and dedicate this wond'rous frame.
Dryden.

2. To appropriate solemnly to any person or purpose.

There cannot be
That vulture in you to devour so many,
As will to greatness dedicate themselves. Shaks.

Ladies, a gen'ral welcome from his grace
Salutes you all: this night he dedicates
To fair content and you. Shakspeare.

He went to learn the profession of a soldier, to which he had dedicated himself. Clarendon.

Bid her instant wed,
And quiet dedicate her remnant life
To the just duties of an humble wife. Prior.

3. To inscribe to a patron.

He compiled ten elegant books, and dedicated them to the lord Burghley. Peacham.

DE'DICATE. adj. [from the verb.] Consecrate; devote; dedicated; appropriate.

Prayer from preserved souls,
From fasting maids, whose names are dedicate
To nothing temporal. Shakspeare.

This tenth part, or tithe, being thus assigned unto him, leaveth now to be of the nature of the other nine parts, which are given us for our worldly necessities, and becometh as a thing dedicate and appropriate unto God. Spelman.

DEDICA'TION. n. s. [dedicatio, Lat.]

1. The act of dedicating to any being or purpose; consecration; solemn appropriation.

It cannot be laid to many men's charge, that they have been so curious as to trouble bishops with placing the first stone in the churches; or so scrupulous as, after the erection of them, to make any great ado for their dedication. Hooker.

Among publick solemnities there is none so glorious as that under the reign of king Solomon, at the dedication of the temple. Addison.

2. An address to a patron.

Proud as Apollo on his forked hill,
Sat full blown Bufo, puff'd by ev'ry quill;
Fed by soft dedication all day long,
Horace and he went hand in hand in song. Pope.

DE'DICATOR.† n. s. [from dedicate.] One who inscribes his work to a patron with compliment and servility.

An ill-timed or extravagant commendation would not pass upon you; but you would keep off such a dedicator at arms' end, and send him back with his encomiums to this lord, or that lady, who stood in need of such trifling merchandise. Dryden, Dedic. of Tr. and Cress. to Ld. Sunderland.

Leave dangerous truths to unsuccessful satyrs,
And flattery to fulsome dedicators. Pope.

Certain impostors had mixed themselves amongst the learned. These were a kind of parasites, who, like their ancestor in Terence, were for refining upon their profession; and, from nature's designation of simple buffoons, had improved themselves into dedicators. Yet this coalition was not thought altogether monstrous; the parasite having as noble an original, and suffering as base a degeneracy, as the dedicator. For the parasite, as the dedicator, was, at first, a name of honour. Warburton on Prodigies, Dedic. to Sir R. Sutton.

DE'DICATORY.† adj. [Fr. dedicatoire.] Composing a dedication; complimental; adulatory.

Thus I should begin my epistle, if it were a dedicatory one; but it is a friendly letter. Pope.

DEDI'TION. n. s. [deditio, Lat.] The act of yielding up any thing; surrendry.

It was not a complete conquest, but rather a dedition upon terms and capitulations agreed between the conqueror and the conquered. Hale.

DE'DOLENT.* adj. [from the Lat. dedoleo, in the sense of "To grieve no more, to give over grieving."] Feeling no sorrow or compunction. A very expressive word, in a very fine and forcible remark.

When once the criterion, or perceptive faculty, has lost its tenderness and sensibility, and the mind becomes reprobate, then darkness and light, good and evil, bitter and sweet, are all one. Then — men are dedolent and past feeling; and, having no other law but that of the corporeal life, become insatiable in impiety, and work wickedness with greediness.
Hallywell, Saving of Souls, (1677,) p. 114.

To DEDU'CE.† v. a. [deduco, Latin.]

1. To draw in a regular connected series, from one time or one event to another.

I will deduce him from his cradle, through the deep and lubrick waves of state and court, till he was swallowed in the gulph of fatality.
Wotton, Life of D. of Buck.

O goddess, say, shall I deduce my rhimes
From the dire nation in its early times! Pope.

2. To form a regular chain of consequential propositions.

Reason is nothing but the faculty of deducing unknown truths from principles already known. Locke.

3. To lay down in regular order, so as that the following shall naturally rise from the foregoing.

Lend me your song, ye nightingales! Oh pour
The mazy-running soul of melody
Into my varied verse! while I deduce
From the first note the hollow cuckoo sings,
The symphony of Spring. Thomson.

4. To substract; to deduct.

A matter of four hundred
To be deduc'd upon the payment.
B. Jonson, Magn. Lady.

5. To transplant; to lead forth. A Latinism.

Advising him he should hither deduce a colony.
Selden, on Drayton's Polyolb. S. 17.

DEDU'CEMENT.† n. s. [from deduce.] The thing deduced; the collection of reason; consequential proposition.

Other deducements or analogies are cited out of St. Paul. Milton, Reason of Ch. Gov. B. i.

Praise and prayer are his due worship, and the rest of those deducements, which I am confident are the remote effects of revelation. Dryden.

DEDU'CIBLE. adj. [from deduce.] Collectible by reason; consequential; discoverable from principles laid down.

The condition, although deducible from many grounds, yet shall we evidence it but from few.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

The general character of the new earth is paradisaical, and the particular character that it hath no sea; and both are apparently deducible from its formation. Burnet.

So far, therefore, as conscience reports any thing agreeable to, or deducible from these, it is to be hearkened to. South.

All properties of a triangle depend on, and are deducible from, the complex idea of three lines, including a space. Locke.

DEDU'CIVE. adj. [from deduce. Performing the act of deduction. Dict.

To DEDU'CT.† v. a. [deduco, Lat.]

1. To substract; to take away; to cut off; to defalcate.

We deduct, from the computation of our years, that part of our time which is spent in incogitancy of infancy. Norris.

2. To separate; to dispart; to divide. Now not in use.

Having yet, in his deducted spright,
Some sparks remaining of that heavenly fire.
Spenser.

3. To reduce; to bring down.

Do not deduct it to days; 'twill be the more tedious; and to measure it by hourglasses were intolerable. Massinger, Old Law.

DEDU'CTION. n. s. [deductio, Lat.]

1. Consequential collection; consequence; proposition drawn from principles premised.

Out of scripture such duties may be deduced, by some kind of consequence, as by long circuit of deduction it may be that even all truth, out of any truth, may be concluded. Hooker.

Set before you the moral law of God, with such deductions from it as our Saviour hath drawn, or our own reason, well informed, can make.
Duppa.

That by diversity of motions we should spell out things not resembled by them, we must attribute to some secret deduction; but what this deduction should be, or by what mediums this knowledge is advanced, is as dark as ignorance. Glanville.

You have laid the experiments together in such a way, and made such deductions from them, as I have not hitherto met with. Boyle.

All cross and distasteful humours are either expressly, or by clear consequence and deduction, forbidden in the New Testament. Tillotson.

A reflection so obvious, that natural instinct seems to have suggested it even to those who never much attended to deductions of reason. Rogers.

2. That which is deducted; defalcation.

Bring then these blessings to a strict account;
Make fair deductions, see to what they mount
Pope.

DEDU'CTIVE. adj. [from deduct.] Deducible; that which is or may be deduced from a position premised.

All knowledge of causes is deductive; for we know none by simple intuition, but through the mediation of their effects. Glanville.

DEDU'CTIVELY. adv. [from deductive.] Consequentially; by regular deduction; by a regular train of ratiocination.

There is scarce a popular errour passant in our days, which is not either directly expressed, or deductively contained in this work.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

DEED.† n. s. [ðæð, Saxon; daed, Dutch; dedins, Goth. See also Loescheri Liter. Celt. p. 99. "Deda, dede, et teta, Otfrido aliisque est facere."]

1. Action, whether good or bad; thing done.

From lowest place when virtuous things proceed,
The place is dignified by th' doer's deed. Shaks.

The monster nought reply'd; for words were vain,
And deeds could only deeds unjust maintain.
Dryden.

The same had not consented to the counsel and deed. Luke.

We are not secluded from the expectation of reward for our charitable deeds.
Smalridge's Sermons.

2. Exploit; performance.

I, on the other side,
Us'd no ambition to commend my deeds;
The deeds themselves, though mute, spoke loud the doer. Milton, S. A.

Thousands were there in darker fame that dwelt,
Whose deeds some nobler poem shall adorn.
Dryden.

3. Power of action; agency.

Nor knew I not
To be with will and deed created free. Milton, P. L.

4. Act declaratory of an opinion.

They desire, with strange absurdity, that to the same senate it should belong to give full judgment in matter of excommunication, and to absolve whom it pleased them, clean contrary to their own former deeds and oaths. Hooker.

5. Written evidence of any legal act.

The solicitor gave an evidence for a deed, which was impeached to be fraudulent. Bacon.

He builds his house upon the sand, and writes the deeds, by which he holds his estate, upon the face of a river. South.

6. Fact; reality; the contrary to fiction: whence the word indeed.

And in very deed for this cause have I raised thee up, for to shew in thee my power.
Exodus, ix. 16.

O that, as oft I have at Athens seen
The stage arise, and the big clouds descend;
So now in very deed I might behold
The pond'rous earth, and all yon marble roof,
Meet like the hands of Jove. Lee's Œdipus.

DEE'DLESS adj. [from deed.] Unactive; without action; without exploits.

Speaking in deeds, and deedless in his tongue.
Shakspeare.

Instant, he cry'd, your female discord end,
Ye deedless boasters! and the song attend. Pope.

DEE'DY.* adj. [from deed.] Active; industrious. A word yet in use in Berkshire; and is not improper, as an opposite to DEEDLESS.

To DEEM.† v. n. part. dempt, or deemed. [ðeman, Sax. doemen, Teut. domjan, M. Goth. doma, Su. Goth. Dr. Johnson has intermixed the verb active with the neuter, and taken no notice of the former.]

1. To judge; to conclude upon consideration; to think; to opine; to determine.

The shipmen deemed that they drew near to some country. Acts, xxvii. 27.

So natural is the union of religion with justice, that we may boldly deem there is neither, where both are not. Hooker.

2. To estimate; to make estimate of: this sense is now disused.

But they that skill not of so heavenly matter,
All that they know not, envy or admire,
Rather than envy, let them wonder at her,
But not to deem of her desert aspire. Spenser.

To DEEM.* v. a.

1. To judge; to determine.

Here eke that famous apple grew,—
For which th' Idean ladies disagreed,
Till partial Paris dempt it Venus' due.
Spenser, F. Q.

2. To imagine; to suppose.

Neither by considering the works did they acknowledge the work-master; but deemed either fire, or wind, or the swift air, or the circle of the stars, or the violent water, or the lights of heaven, to be the gods which govern the world. Wisdom, xiii. 2.

He who, to be deem'd
A god, leap'd fondly into Ætna's flames.
Milton, P. L.

These blessings, friend, a deity bestow'd;
For never can I deem him less than god. Dryden.

Nature, disturb'd,
Is deem'd vindictive to have chang'd her course.
Thomson.

DEEM. n. s. [from the verb.] Judgement; surmise; opinion. Not now in use.

Hear me, my love, be thou but true of heart.
—I true! how now? what wicked deem is this?
Shakspeare, Tr. and Cres.

DEE'MSTER.† n. s. [Sax. ðæma, a judge; and also, ðemepe. The word is pronounced, and sometimes written, dempster.] A judge: a word yet in use in Jersey and the Isle of Man.

DEEP.† adj. [Sax. ðeop, which Mr. Horne Tooke says, "is merely the past participle of ðippan, to dip, to dive;" as if, in his estimation, no such words had before existed as the Goth. and Su. diup, and the Icel. dyp, all signifying deep or profound. Serenius traces the expression to the Teut. diep, and Goth. dy, deep, gulfy.]

1. Having length downwards; descending far; profound: opposed to shallow.

All trees in high and sandy grounds are to be set deep, and in watery grounds more shallow.
Bacon.

The gaping gulph low to the centre lies,
And twice as deep as earth is distant from the skies. Dryden.

2. Low in situation; not high.

3. Measured from the surface downward.

Mr. Halley, in diving deep into the sea, in a diving vessel, found, in a clear sun-shine day, that when he was sunk many fathoms deep into the water, the upper part of his hand, on which the sun shone directly, appeared of a red colour.
Newton.

4. Entering far; piercing a great way.

This avarice
Strikes deeper; grows with more pernicious root.
Shakspeare.

For, even in that season of the year, the ways in that vale were very deep. Clarendon.

Thou hast not strength such labours to sustain:
Drink hellebore, my boy! drink deep, and scour thy brain. Dryden.

5. Far from the outer part.

So the false spider, when her nets are spread,
Deep ambush'd in her silent den does lie. Dryden.

6. Not superficial; not obvious.

If the matter be knotty, and the sense lies deep, the mind must stop and buckle to it, and stick upon it with labour and thought, and close contemplation. Locke.

7. Sagacious; penetrating; having the power to enter far into a subject.

Who hath not heard it spoken,
How deep you were within the books of heav'n!
Shakspeare.

The spirit of deep prophecy she hath. Shaksp.

He's meditating with two deep divines. Shaksp.

He in my ear
Vented much policy and projects deep
Of enemies, of aids, battles and leagues,
Plausible to the world, to me worth nought.
Milton, P. R.

I do not discover the helps which this great man of deep thought mentions. Locke.

8. Full of contrivance; politick; insidious.

When I have most need to employ a friend,
Deep, hollow, treacherous, and full of guile,
Be he to me. Shakspeare, Rich. III.

9. Grave; solemn.

O God! if my deep prayers cannot appease thee,
But thou wilt be avenged on my misdeeds,
Yet execute thy wrath on me alone.
Shakspeare, Rich. III.

Nor awful Phœbus was on Pindus heard
With deeper silence, or with more regard. Dryden.

10. Dark coloured.

With deeper brown the grove was overspread.
Dryden.

11. Having a great degree of stillness, or gloom, or sadness.

And the Lord God caused a deep sleep to fall upon Adam. Gen. ii. 21.

Their deep poverty abounded into the riches of their liberality. 2 Cor. viii. 2.

13. Bass; grave in sound.

The sounds made by buckets in a well, are deeper and fuller than if the like percussion were made in the open air. Bacon.

DEEP. n. s. [from the adjective.]

1. The sea; the main; the abyss of waters; the ocean.

Yet we did lift up our hearts and voices to God above, who sheweth his wonders in the deep.
Bacon.

What earth in her dark bowels could not keep
From greedy man, lies safer in the deep. Waller.

Whoe'er thou art, whom fortune brings to keep
These rites of Neptune, monarch of the deep.
Pope.

2. The most solemn or still part.

There want not many that do fear,
In deep of night, to walk by this Herne's oak.
Shakspeare.

The deep of night is crept upon our talk. Shaks.

Virgin face divine,
Attracts the hapless youth through storms and waves,
Alone in deep of night. Philips.

DEEP.* [used adverbially, by itself, as well as in composition; as, deep-felt, deep-fetched, deep-rooted, deep-vaulted, and the like; where the meaning is obvious. Compare the examples from Dryden in Dr. Johnson's fourth and fifth senses of the adjective.] Deeply; to a great depth.

The deep wound more deep engor'd her heart. Spenser.
Where wounds of deadly hate have pierc'd so deep. Milton.
Drink deep, or taste not the Pierian spring. Pope.

DEEP-DRAWING.* adj. [deep and draw.] Sinking deep into the water.

The deep-drawing barks do there disgorge
Their warlike fraughtage. Shakspeare, Tr. and Cr. Prol.

DEEP-MOUTHED. adj. [deep and mouth.] Having a hoarse and loud voice.

Huntsman, I charge thee, tender well my hounds;
And couple Clowder with the deep-mouth'd brach. Shakspeare.
Behold the English beach
Pales in the flood with men, with wives and boys,
Whose shouts and claps outvoice that deep-mouth'd sea. Shakspeare.
Then toils for beasts, and lime for birds were found,
And deep-mouth'd dogs did forest walks surround. Dryden.
Hills, dales, and forests far behind remain,
While the warm scent draws on the deep-mouth'd train. Gay.

DEEP-MUSING. adj. [deep and muse.] Contemplative; lost in thought.

But he deep-musing o'er the mountains stray'd,
Through mazy thickets of the woodland shade. Pope.

DEEP-READ.* adj. [deep and read.] Profoundly versed.

We are all of us dealers in politicks, great writers, and deep-read men in the maxims of state and government! L'Estrange, Transl. of Quevedo's Vis. p. 232.

To DEE'PEN. v. a. [from deep.]

1. To make deep; to sink far below the surface.

The city of Rome would receive a great advantage from the undertaking, as it would raise the banks and deepen the bed of the Tiber. Addison.

2. To darken; to cloud; to make dark.

You must deepen your colours so, that the orpiment may be the highest. Peacham.

3. To make sad or gloomy. See DEEP. adj.

Her gloomy presence saddens all the scene,
Shades ev'ry flow'r, and darkens ev'ry green,
Deepens the murmurs of the falling floods,
And breathes a browner horror on the woods. Pope.

To DEE'PEN.* v. n.

1. To descend gradually.

Follows the loosen'd aggravated roar,
Enlarging, deepening, mingling. Thomson, Summer.

2. To grow deep.

The thick and troubled stream of superstition, which flowed so plentifully in the classick ages, has been constantly deepening and darkening by the confluence of those supplies, which ignorance and corrupted religion have poured in upon it. Hurd on Chivalry, Lett. 6.

DEE'PLY.† adv. [Sax. ðeoplice.]

1. To a great depth; far below the surface.

Fear is a passion that is most deeply rooted in our natures, and flows immediately from the principle of self-preservation. Tillotson.
Those impressions were made when the brain was more susceptive of them: they have been deeply engraven at the proper season, and therefore they remain. Watts.

2. With great study or sagacity; not superficially; not carelessly; profoundly.

They that be called industrious, do most craftily and deeply understand, in all affairs what is expedient. Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 73. b.

3. Sorrowfully; solemnly; with a great degree of seriousness or sadness.

He sighed deeply in his spirit. St. Mark, viii. 12.
Klockins so deeply hath sworn ne'er more to come
In bawdy-house, that he dares not go home. Donne.
Upon the deck our careful general stood,
And deeply mus'd on the succeeding day. Dryden.

4. With a tendency to darkness of colour.

Having taken of the deeply red juice of buckthorn berries, I let it drop upon white paper. Boyle.

5. In a high degree.

To keep his promise with him, he had deeply offended both his nobles and people. Bacon, Hen. VII.

DEE'PNESS.† n. s. [Sax. ðeopnýꝛe.]

1. Entrance far below the surface; profundity; depth.

Cazzianer set forward with great toil, by reason of the deepness of the way and heaviness of the great ordnance. Knolles.
Some fell upon stony places, and they withered, because they had no deepness of earth. St. Matt. xiii. 5.

2. Sagacity. See the seventh sense of DEEP.

No, no, the man was never of such deepness
To make conceit his master. Beaum. and Fl. Two Noble Gent.

3. Insidiousness; craft.

The greatest deepness of Satan. Gregory, Notes on Scripture, ch. xxvi.

DEER.† n. s. [Sax. ðeop; M. Goth. daihr, an animal, a beast; old Goth. and Icel. dyr, thyr, and Swedish diur, the same: Teut. thier; Gr. θήρ. We use our word alike both for the singular and plural number.] That class of animals which is hunted for venison, containing many subordinate species; as the stag or red deer, the buck or fallow deer, the roebuck, and others.

You have beaten my men, killed my deer, and broke open my lodge. Shakspeare.
The pale that held my lovely deer. Waller.

DE'ESS.* n. s. [Fr. deese.] A goddess.

He does so much magnifie Nature and her actings in all this material world, as he gives just cause of suspicion that he hath made her a kind of joint deess with God in the affairs thereof. Bp. H. Croft on Burnet's Theory, 1685, Pref. a. 7.

To DEFA'CE.† v. a. [defaire, French, Dr. Johnson says. But it is probably from the Norm. Fr. deface, which is defeat.] To destroy; to raze; to ruin; to disfigure.

Give me leave to speak as earnestly in truly commending it, as you have done in untruly and unkindly defacing and slandering it. Abp. Whitgift.
Fatal this marriage,
Defacing monuments of conquer'd France,
Undoing all. Shakspeare.
Pay him six thousand, and deface the bond. Shakspeare.
Whose statues freezes, columns broken lie,
And, though defac'd, the wonder of the eye. Dryden.
One noble wretch can only rise,
'Tis he whose fury shall deface
The stoick's image in this piece. Prior.

DEFA'CEMENT. n. s. [from deface.] Violation; injury; rasure; abolition; destruction.

But what is this image, and how is it defaced? The poor men of Lyons will tell you, that the image of God is purity; and the defacement sin. Bacon.

DEFA'CER.† n. s. [from deface.] Destroyer; abolisher; violater.

That foul defacer of God's handywork,
Thy womb let loose, to chase us to our graves. Shakspeare.
Now on these Romans,
Despisers of thy power, of us defacers,
Revenge thyself. Beaum. and Fl. Bonduca.

DEFA'ILANCE.† n. s. [defaillance, French.] Failure; miscarriage: a word not in use, Dr. Johnson says. Yet it is authorised by one of the finest writers of our country.

When great prelates are living, their authority is depressed by their personal defaillances, and the contrary interests of their contemporaries; which disband, when they are dead, and leave their credit entire upon the reputation of those excellent books and monuments of learning and piety, which are left behind them. Bp. Taylor, Liberty of Prophesying.
The affections were the authors of that unhappy defailance. Glanville.

To DEFA'LCATE.† v. a. [defalquer, Fr. defalco, Lat. from falx, falcis, a sickle.] To cut off; to lop; to take away part of a pension or salary. It is generally used of money, Dr. Johnson says. Our old lexicography introduces the word only in the common acceptation of "to diminish, take away, or cut off." Bullokar, and Cockeram. See To DEFALK.

DEFALCA'TION.† n. s. [from defalcate.] Diminution; abatement; excision of any part of a customary allowance.

To defray this charge of wars, as also of all other public defalcations, expences, fees, pensions, &c. Burton, Anat. of Mel. To the Reader.
If we be still our old selves, no changelings at all, the same men that we came into the world, without defalcation of our corruptions, without addition of grace and sanctification, surely we must seek us another Father; we are not yet the sons of God. Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 145.
The tea table is set forth with its customary bill of fare, and without any defalcation. Addison.

To DEFA'LK.† v. a. [Fr. defalquer. See To DEFALCATE.] To cut off; to lop away.

We are sure to receive rewards for what we have given, and vengeance for what we have defalked. Bp. Hall, Contempl. b. 4.
You are content with the ten thousand pound, Defalking the four hundred garnish money? B. Jonson, Magn. Lady.
What he defalks from some insipid sin, is but to make some other more gustful. Decay of Piety.

DEFAMA'TION. n. s. [from defame.] The act of defaming or bringing infamy upon another; calumny; reproach; censure; detraction.

Defamation is the uttering of contumelious language of any one, with an intent of raising an ill fame of the party, and this extends to writing, as by defamatory libels; and to deeds, as reproachful postures, signs, and gestures. Ayliffe.

Be silent, and beware, if such you see;
'Tis defamation but to say, that's he. Dryden.

Many dark and intricate motives there are to detraction and defamation, and many malicious spies are searching into the actions of a great man. Addison.

DEFA'MATORY.† adj. [Fr. defamatoire.] Calumnious; tending to defame; unjustly censorious; libellous; falsely satirical.

I have seen many defamatory and libellous things of this nature. Wotton, Letters, Rem. p. 549.

The most eminent sin is the spreading of defamatory reports. Government of the Tongue.

Augustus, conscious to himself of many crimes, made an edict against lampoons and satires, and defamatory writings. Dryden.

To DEFA'ME.† v. a. [old Fr. defamer; from de and fama, Lat. This is one of our oldest words. Chaucer uses it in the sense of "to make infamous."] To make infamous; to censure falsely in publick; to deprive of honour; to dishonour by reports to libel; to calumniate; to destroy reputation by either acts or words.

It is a sinne, and eke a great folie,
To appairen any man, or him defame.
Chaucer, Miller's Prologue.

They live as if they professed Christianity merely in spite, to defame it. Decay of Piety.

My guilt thy growing virtues did defame;
My blackness blotted thy unblemish'd name.
Dryden.

DEFA'ME.† n. s. [from the verb.] Disgrace; dishonour: not in use, Dr. Johnson says, citing only the example from Spenser.

Many doughty knights he in his days
Had done to death, ———
And hung their conquer'd arms for more defame
On gallowtrees. Spenser.

Those pious tears,
Thou daily shower'st upon my father's monument,
(When in the Persian expedition
He fell unfortunately by a stroke of thunder,)
Made thy defame and sins.
Beaum. and Fletch. The Prophetess.

Thy chastity and virtue hath infus'd
Another soul in me, red with defame,
For in my blushing cheeks is seen my shame.
London Prodigal, v. i.

For this with them my father was destroy'd,
And buried in the dunghill of defame.
Mir. for Mag. p. 310.

DEFA'MER. n. s. [from defame.] One that injures the reputation of another; a detracter; a calumniator.

It may be a useful trial of the patience of the defamed, yet the defamer has not the less crime. Government of the Tongue.

DEFA'MING.* n. s. [from defame.] Defamation; the act of reproaching others.

I heard the defaming of many. Jer. xx. 10.

They draw a nourishment
Out of defamings, grow upon disgraces,
And when they see a virtue fortified
Strongly above the battery of their tongues;
Oh, bow they cast to sink it.
Beaum. and Fl. Philaster.

DEFA'TIGABLE.* adj. [Lat. defatigo.] Liable to be weary, or to be tired.

We were made on set purpose defatigable, that so all degrees of life might have their exercise. Glanville Pre-exist. of Souls, p. 116.

To DEFA'TIGATE.† v. a. [defatigo, Lat.] To weary; to tire. Huloet.

Up which defatigating hill nevertheless we crambled, but with difficulty.
Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 200.

The power of these men's industries, never defatigated, hath been great. Dr. Maine.

DEFATIGA'TION.† n. s. [defatigatio, Lat.] Weariness; fatigue.

I soon find an unavoidable defatigation in all things. Bp. Hall, Soliloq. 80.

DEFA'ULT.† n. s. [old Fr. defaulte, from the old verb deffaillir, deffauldroit, whence deffault, default, defailte, defaut, V. Cotgrave and Roquefort.]

1. Omission of that which we ought to do; neglect.
2. Crime; failure; fault.

Sedition tumbled into England more by the default of governours than the people. Haywood.

We that know what 'tis to fast and pray,
Are penitent for your default to-day. Shakspeare.

Let me not rashly call in doubt
Divine prediction: what if all foretold
Had been fulfill'd but through mine own default,
Whom have I to complain of, but myself?
Milton, S. A.

Partial judges we are of our own excellencies; and other men's defaults. Swift.

3 Defect; want.

In default of the king's pay, the forces were laid upon the subject. Davies.

Cooks could make artificial birds and fishes, in default of the real ones. Arbuthnot on Coins.

4. [In law.] Non-appearance in court at a day assigned. Cowel.

To DEFA'ULT.† v. a. [from the noun.] To fail in performing any contract or stipulation; to forfeit by breaking a contract.

We shall not need dispute, whether they have deposed him, or what they have defaulted towards him. Milton, Ten. of Kings and Magistrates.

To DEFA'ULT.* v. n. To offend.

And pardon crav'd —
That he 'gainst courtesie so foully did default.
Spenser, F. Q. vi. iii. 21.

DEFA'ULTED.* adj. [from default.] Having defect.

The old defaulted building being rid out of the way. Knight, Trial of Truth, (1580,) fol. 63.

DEFA'ULTER.† n. s. [from the verb.] One that makes default.

That very law annulled the defaulter's right of inheritance, as a condign punishment for a recreancy so shameful. Hist. of Duelling, Introd.

DEFE'ASANCE.† n. s. [defaisance, French, from defaire, to make void.

1. The act of annulling or abrogating any contract or stipulation.

The true ground and principle, upon which the Revolution proceeded, was entirely a new case in politicks, which had never before happened in our history; the abdication of the reigning monarch, and the vacancy of the throne thereupon. It was not a defeasance of the right of succession, and a new limitation of the crown. Guthrie, England.

2. Defeasance is a condition annexed to an act; as to an obligation, a recognizance, or statute, which performed by the obligee, or the cognizee, the act is disabled and made void, as if it had never been done. Cowel.

3. The writing in which a defeasance is contained.

A defeasance is a collateral deed, made at the same time with a feoffment or other conveyance, containing certain conditions, upon the performance of which it may be defeated, or totally undone. Blackstone.

4. A defeat; conquest; the act of conquering; the state of being conquered. Obsolete.

That hoary king, with all his train,
Being arrived, where the champion stout,
After his foe's defeasance, did remain,
Him goodly greets, and fair does entertain.
Spenser, F. Q.

DEFE'ASIBLE.† adj. [old Fr. defeasible, "qui peut être anéanti. 980." Lacombe.] That may be annulled or abrogated.

He came to the crown by a defeasible title, so was never well settled. Davies.

DEFE'AT.† n. s. [old Fr. defeat, "dechu, anéanti. 950." Lacombe; from defaire.]

1. The overthrow of an army.

End Marlb'rough work, and finish the defeat.
Addison.

2. Act of destruction; deprivation.

A king, upon whose life
A damn'd defeat was made. Shakspeare.

To DEFE'AT.† v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To overthrow; to undo.

Ye gods, ye make the weak most strong;
Therein, ye gods, ye tyrants do defeat. Shakspeare.

They invaded Ireland, and were defeated by the lord Mountjoy. Bacon.

2. To frustrate.

To his accusations
He pleaded still not guilty, and alleg'd
Many sharp reasons to defeat the law. Shakspeare.

Death,
Then due by sentence when thou did'st transgress,
Defeated of his seizure, many days,

Discover'd and defeated of your prey,
You skulk'd. Dryden.

He finds himself naturally to dread a superior Being, that can defeat all his designs, and disappoint all his hopes. Tillotson.

3. To abolish; to undo; to change; to alter. See the first sense of DEFEATURE. I have brought the following example from the first definition, where it was placed by Dr. Johnson; because "defeat thy favour" or countenance, which is the meaning of the passage, can be explained only by alter or disguise. See also Minsheu in DEFEAT.

Put money in thy purse; follow these wars; defeat thy favour with an usurped beard. Shaks. Oth.

DEFE'ATURE.† n. s. [from de and feature.]

1. Change of feature; alteration of countenance: not in use, Dr. Johnson says, citing only the first example from Shakspeare, and giving only the first definition.

Grief hath chang'd me,
And careful hours, with time's deformed hand,
Hath written strange defeatures in my face. Shaks.

To cross the curious workmanship of nature,
To mingle beauty with infirmities,
And pure perfection with impure defeature.
Shakspeare, Ven. and Adon.

2. Overthrow; defeat.

The king of Parthia,
(Famous in his defeature of the Crassi,)
Offer'd him his protection.
Beaum. and Fl. False One.

Have you acquainted her with the defeature
Of the Carthaginians? Massinger, Bondman.

We are miserable both in successful issues, and in defeatures. Glanville, Serm. p. 272.

To DE'FECATE.† v. a. [defequer, Fr. Cotgrave; defæco, Lat.]

1. To purge liquors from lees or foulness; to purify; to cleanse.

To defecate impure blood with the infusion of senna. Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 402.

The blood is not sufficiently defecated or clarified, but remains muddy. Harvey.

Provide a brazen tube
Inflext: self-taught and voluntary flies
The defecated liquor, through the vent
Ascending; then, by downward tract convey'd,
Spouts into subject vessels lovely clear. Philips.

2. To purify from any extraneous or noxious mixture; to clear; to brighten.

The soul hath a freer and more defecated operation. Wotton, Survey of Education.

We defecate the notion from materiality, and abstract quantity, place, and all kind of corporeity from it. Glanville.

DE'FECATE. adj. [from the verb.] Purged from lees or foulness.

We are puzzled with contradictions, which are no absurdities to defecate faculties. Glanville.

This liquor was very defecate, and of a pleasing golden colour. Boyle.

DEFECA'TION. n. s. [defæcatio, Lat.] Purification; the act of clearing or purifying.

The greatest depuration and defecation, and consequently the highest exaltation of the blood and vital spirits is performed herein.
Smith, Portr. of Old Age, p. 218.

The spleen and liver are obstructed in their offices of defecation, whence vicious and dreggish blood. Harvey.

DEFE'CT. n. s. [defectus, Lat.]

1. Want; absence of something necessary; insufficiency; the fault opposed to superfluity.

Errours have been corrected, and defects supplied. Davies.

Had this strange energy been less,
Defect had been as fatal as success. Blackmore.

2. Failing imperfection.

Oft 'tis seen
Our mean secures us, and our mere defects
Prove our commodities, Shakspeare.

3. A fault; mistake; error.

We had rather follow the perfections of them whom we like not, than in defects resemble them whom we love. Hooker.

You praise yourself,
By laying defects of judgment to me. Shaksp.

Trust not yourself; but your defects to know,
Make use of ev'ry friend — and ev'ry foe. Pope.

4. Any natural imperfection; a blemish; a failure; without direct implication of any thing too little.

Men, through some defect in the organs, want words, yet fail not to express their universal ideas by signs. Locke.

To DEFE'CT. v. n. [from the noun.] To be deficient; to fall short of; to fail. Obsolete.

Some lost themselves in attempts above humanity, yet the enquiries of most defected by the way, and tired within the sober circumference of knowledge. Brown, Vulg. Err.

DEFECTIBI'LITY. n. s. [from defectible.] The state of failing; deficiency; imperfection.

The perfection and sufficiency of scripture has been shewn, as also the defectibility of that particular tradition. Lord Digby to Sir Ken. Digby.

The corruption of things corruptible depends upon the intrinsical defectibility of the connection or union of the parts of things corporeal.
Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

DEFE'CTIBLE.† adj. [from defect.]

1. Imperfect; deficient; wanting.

The extraordinary persons, thus highly favoured, were for a great part of their lives in a defectible condition. Hale.

2. Liable to defect.

Though other spirits, which were created, be either actually now unholy, or of defectible sanctity at the first. Pearson on the Creed, Art. 8.

DEFE'CTION. n. s. [defectio, Lat.]

1. Want; failure.

2. A falling away; apostacy.

This defection and falling away from God was first found in angels, and afterwards in men. Ral.

If we fall away after tasting of the good word of God, how criminal must such a defection be? Atterbury.

There is more evil owing to our original defection from God, and the foolish and evil dispositions that are found in fallen man. Watts.

3. An abandoning of a king, or state; revolt.

He was diverted and drawn from hence by the general defection of the whole realm. Davies.

Neither can this be meant of evil governours or tyrants, but of some perverseness and defection in the very nation itself. Bacon.

DEF'ECTIVE.† adj. [old Fr. defectif; from defectivus, Lat.]

1. Wanting the just quantity.

Nor will polished amber, although it send forth a gross and corporeal exhalement, be found a long time defective upon the exactest scales.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

2. Full of defects; imperfect; not sufficient; not adequate to the purpose.

It subjects them to all the diseases depending upon a defective projectile motion of the blood.
Arbuthnot on Aliments.

If it renders us perfect in one accomplishment, it generally leaves us defective in another. Addison.

3. Faulty; vicious; blamable.

All, except David, and Ezekias, and Josias, were defective; for they forsook the law of the Most High. Ecclus. xlix. 4.

Our tragedy writers have been notoriously defective in giving proper sentiments to the persons they introduce. Addison.

DEFE'CTIVE or deficient Nouns [in grammar.] Indeclinable nouns, or such as want a number, or some particular case.

DEFE'CTIVE Verb [in grammar.] A verb which wants some of its tenses.

DEFE'CTIVELY.* adv. [from defective.] In a manner wanting the just quantity.

The poets use to express it sometimes defectively, and sometimes more fully.
Abp. Usher, Answer to the Jesuit Malone, p. 299.

DEFE'CTIVENESS.† n. s. [from defective.] Want; the state of being imperfect; faultiness.

The defectiveness of the said survey does most plainly appear, by the instance of the short return there as to the diocese of London.
Bp. Barlow, Rem. p. 322.

This defectiveness of giving testimony of ancient times, by these nations, will further appear.
Stilling fleet, Orig. Sac.

The lowness often opens the building in breadth, or the defectiveness of some other particular, makes any single part appear in perfection. Addison.

DEFE'CTUOUS.* adj. [Fr. defectueux, Cotgrave.] Full of defects; not sufficient.

Sometimes there are many useful things buried in the unpublished manuscripts of worthy men, which are represented as imperfect and defectuous by those that would hereby excuse themselves from that labour and pains, which the works of their deceased friends might justly challenge.
Worthington to Hartlib, Ep. 14.

Nothing in nature or in providence, that is scant or defectuous, can be stable or lasting.
Barrow, Serm. ii. 15.

DEFECTUO'SITY.* n. s. [Fr. defectuosité, Cotgrave.] Imperfection; faultiness.

Those acts, wherein man conceives some perfection, are in the sight of God defectuosities.
W. Montagu, Dev. Ess. ii. 135.

DEFEDA'TION.* See DEFOEDATION.

DEFE'NCE.† n. s. [old Fr. defens, citadelle, place forte. V. Roq. Lat. defensio.]

1. Guard; protection; security.

Rehoboam dwelt in Jerusalem, and built cities for defence in Judah. 2 Chron. ii. 5.

Acts, xix. 33.

The youthful prince
With scorn replied, and made this bold defence.
Dryden.

3. Prohibition: this is a sense merely French.

Severe defences may be made against wearing any linen under a certain breadth. Temple.

4. Resistance.

Nor tempt the danger of my true defence.
Shakspeare, K. John.

5. [In law.] The defendant's reply after declaration produced.

Defence, in its true legal sense, signifies merely an opposing or denial (from the French verb defendre) of the truth or validity of the complaint. Blackstone.

6. [In fortification.] The part that flanks another work.

7. The science of defence; military skill; thus, a fencing-master, or a prize-fighter, was formerly called "a master of defence."

He is, said he, a man of great defence,
Expert in battels, and in deedes of arms.
Spenser, F. Q. v. ii. 5.

He made confession of you,
And gave you such a masterly report,
For art and exercise in your defence,
And for your rapier most especial. Shaksp. Ham.

To DEFE'NCE.† v. a. [defensus, Lat.] To defend by fortification: not in use, Dr. Johnson says, citing only the example from Fairfax. Yet it often occurs in our present version of the Bible; and is found elsewhere.

The city itself he strongly fortifies
Three sides by six it well defenced has. Fairfax.

Sennacherib, king of Assyria, came up against all the defenced cities of Judah, and took them.
Isaiah, xxxvi. 1.

Let us go into the defenced cities. Jerem. iv. 5.

There shall be nothing to make up a kingdom
Mighty, and flourishing, defenc'd, and fear'd,
Equal to be commanded, and obey'd,
But through the travels of my life, I'll find it,
And tie it to this country.
Beaum. and Fl. Philaster.

DEFE'NCELESS. adj. [from defence.]

1. Naked; unarmed; unguarded; not provided with defence; unprepared.

Captain or colonel, or knight in arms,
Whose chance on these defenceless doors may seize,—
Guard them, and him within protect from harms.
Milton, Sonnet.

My sister is not so defenceless left
As you imagine; she has a hidden strength
Which you remember not. Milton, Comus.

Ah me! that fear
Comes thund'ring back with dreadful revolution
On my defenceless head. Milton, P. L.

On a slave disarm'd,
Defenceless and submitted to my rage,
A base revenge is vengeance on myself. Dryden.

2. Impotent; unable to make resistance.

Shakspeare.

DEFE'NDANT. n. s. [from the adjective.]

1. He that defends against assailants.

Those high towers, out of which the Romans might more conveniently fight with the defendants on the wall, those also were broken by Archimedes' engines. Wilkins, Math. Magick.

2. [In law.] The person accused or sued.

This is the day appointed for the combat,
And ready are th' appellant and defendant. Shaksp.

Plaintiff dog, and bear defendant. Hudibras.

DEFE'NDER.† n. s. [old French deffender, defender, defendor.]

1. One that defends; a champion.

Banish your defenders, till at length
Your ignorance deliver you,
As most abated captives, to some nation
That won you without blows. Shakspeare.

Dost thou not mourn our pow'r employ'd in vain,
And the defenders of our city slain? Dryden.

2. An asserter; a vindicator.

Undoubtedly there is no way so effectual to betray the truth, as to procure it a weak defender.
South.

3. [In law.] An advocate; one that defends another in a court of justice.

DEFE'NSATIVE. n. s. [from defence.]

1. Guard; defence.

A very unsafe defensative it is against the fury of the lion, and surely no better than virginity, or blood royal, which Pliny doth place in cock-broth.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

If the bishop has no other defensatives but excommunication, no other power but that of the keys, he may surrender up his pastoral staff. South.

2. [In surgery.] A bandage, plaster, or the like, used to secure a wound from outward violence.

DEFE'NSIBLE.† adj. [old Fr. defensable.]

1. That may be defended.

A field,
Which nothing but the sound of Hotspur's name,
Did seem to take defensible. Shakspeare.

They must make themselves defensible, both against the natives and against strangers. Bacon.

Having often heard Venice represented as one of the most defensible cities in the world, I informed myself in what its strength consists.
Addison.

2. Justifiable; right; capable of vindication.

I conceive it very defensible to disarm an adversary, and disable him from doing mischief. Collier.

DEFE'NSIVE. adj. [defensif, Fr. from defendens, Lat.

1. That serves to defend; proper for defence; not offensive.

He would not be persuaded by danger to offer any offence, but only to stand upon the best defensive guard he could. Sidney.

My unpreparedness for war, testifies for me, that I am set on the defensive part. King Charles.

Defensive arms lay by, as useless here,
Where massy balls the neighbouring rocks do tear.
Waller.

2. In a state or posture of defence.

What stood, recoil'd,
Defensive scarce, or, with pale fear surpriz'd,
Fled ignominious. Milton, P. L.

DEFE'NSIVE. n. s. [from the adjective.]

1. Safeguard.

Wars preventive upon just fears, are true defensives, as well as on actual invasions. Bacon.

2. State of defence.

His majesty, not all dismayed, resolved to stand upon the defensive only. Clarendon.

DEFE'NSIVELY.† adv. [from defensive.] In a defensive manner.

Camalodunum, where the Romans had seated themselves to dwell pleasantly rather than defensively, was not fortified. Milton, Hist. of Eng. B. 2.

DEFE'NST. part. pass. [from defence.] Defended.

Stout men of arms, and with their guide of power,
Like Troy's old town, defenst with Illion's towr.
Fairfax.

To DEFE'R.† v. n.

1. To put off; to delay to act. [from differo, Lat.]

God—will not long defer,
To vindicate the glory of his Name
Against all competition, nor will long
Endure it, doubtful whether God be Lord.
Milton, S. A.

Inure thyself by times to the love and practice of good deeds; for the longer thou deferrest to be acquainted with them, the less every day thou wilt find thyself disposed to them. Atterbury.

2. To pay deference or regard to another's opinion. This sense was in use before Pope's time. Lord Clarendon, I think, has somewhere used it. However, the following is an earlier example of it, than that from Pope. [Fr. déférer, accorder.]

They not only deferred to his counsels in publick assemblies, but he was moreover the umpire of domestick matters. Spence, Tr. of Varillas's Hist. of the H. of Medicis, (1686,) p. 306.

Herodotus—who is as fabulous as Homer when he defers to the common reports of countries.
Pope, Ess. on Homer.

To DEFE'R.† v. a.

1. To withhold; to delay.

When Felix heard these things, having a more perfect knowledge of that way, he deferred them.
Acts, xxiv. 22.

Defer the promis'd boon, the goddess cries.
Pope.

Neither is this a matter to be deferred till a more convenient time of peace and leisure. Swift.

2. To refer to; to leave to another's judgement and determination.

The commissioners deferred the matter unto the earl of Northumberland, who was the principal man of authority in those parts. Bacon.

3. To offer; to give. [Lat. defero.]

Of the worship deferred to the Virgin, and all the blessings expected from this worship.
Brevint, Saul and Sam. at Endor, (1674,) p. 99.

DE'FERENCE. n. s. [deference, Fr.]

1. Regard; respect.

Virgil could have excelled Varius in tragedy, and Horace in lyrick poetry, but out of deference to his friends he attempted neither. Dryden.

He may be convinced that he is in an error, by observing those persons, for whose wisdom and goodness he has the greatest deference, to be of a contrary sentiment. Swift.

2. Complaisance; condescension.

A natural roughness makes a man uncomplaisant to others; so that he has no deference for their inclinations, tempers, or conditions. Locke.

3. Submission.

Most of our fellow-subjects are guided either by the prejudice of education, or by a deference to the judgement of those who, perhaps, in their own hearts, disapprove the opinions which they industriously spread among the multitude. Addison.

DE'FERENT. adj. [from deferens, of defero, Lat.] That carries up and down.

The figures of pipes or concaves, through which sounds pass, or of other bodies deferent, conduce to the variety and alteration of the sound. Bacon.

DE'FERENT. n. s. [from the adjective.]

That which carries; that which conveys.

It is certain, however, it crosses the received opinion, that sounds may be created without air, though air be the most favourable deferent of sounds. Bacon.

DE'FERENTS. [In surgery.] Certain vessels in the human body, appointed for the conveyance of humours from one place to another. Chambers.

DEFE'RMENT.* n. s. [from defer.] Delay.

But, sir, my grief, join'd with the instant business,
Begs a deferment. Sir J. Suckling.

DEFE'RRER.* n. s. [from defer.] A delayer; a putter off. Huloet.

A great deferrer, long in hope, grown numb
With sloth, yet greedy still of what's to come.
B. Jonson, Hor. Art of Poetry.

DE'FFLY.* adv. See DEFLY. Finely; nimbly. E. K. on Spenser's Shepherds' Calendar. Spenser writes it deffly.

DEFI'ANCE.† n. s. [old Fr. deffiance, defiance. See To DEFY.]

1. A challenge; an invitation to fight.

The fiery Tybalt, with his sword prepar'd,
Which, as he breath'd defiance to my ears,
He swung about his head. Shakspeare.

Nor is it just to bring
A war, without a just defiance made. Dryden.

2. A challenge to make any impeachment good.

3. Expression of abhorrence or contempt.

The Novation heresy was very apt to attract well-meaning souls, who, seeing it bade such express defiance to apostacy, could not suspect that it was itself any defection from the faith.
Decay of Piety.

No body will so openly bid defiance to common sense, as to affirm visible and direct contradictions. Locke.

DEFI'ATORY.* adj. [from defy.] Bearing defiance, or a challenge.

The first, of speaking great things and blasphemies, is verified in the letters defiatory of Achmet to Sigismund the Third.
Shelford's Learned Discourses, p. 276.

DEFI'CIENCE. }
DEFI'CIENCY. } n. s. [from deficio, Lat.]

1. Want: something less than is necessary.

What is to be considered in this case, is chiefly, if there be a sufficient fulness or deficiency of blood, for different methods are to be taken.
Arbuthnot on Diet.

There is no burden laid upon our posterity, nor any deficiency to be hereafter made up by ourselves, which has been our case in so many other subsidies. Addison.

2. Defect; failing; imperfection.

Scaliger, finding a defect in the reason of Aristotle, introduceth one of no less deficiency himself.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

Thou in thyself art perfect, and in thee
Is no deficience found. Milton, P. L.

We find, in our own natures, too great evidence of intellectual deficience, and deplorable confessions of human ignorance. Glanville.

What great deficience is it, if we come short of others? Sprat.

The characters of comedy and tragedy are never to be made perfect, but always to be drawn with some specks of frailty and deficience, such as they have been described to us in history. Dryden.

DEFI'CIENT. adj. [deficiens, from deficio, Lat.] Failing; wanting; defective; imperfect.

Figures are either simple or mixed; the simple be either circular or angular; and of circular, either complete, as circles, or deficient, as ovals.
Wolton on Architecture.

O woman! best of all things as the will
Of God ordain'd them: his creating hand
Nothing imperfect or deficient left. Milton, P. L.

Neither Virgil nor Homer were deficient in any of the former beauties, Dryden.

Several thoughts of the mind, for which we have either none, or very deficient names, are diligently to be studied. Locke.

DEFI'CIENT Numbers [in arithmetick] are those numbers whose parts, added together, make less than the integer, whose parts they are. Chambers.

DEFI'CIENTLY.* adv. [from deficient.] In a defective manner.

*DEFI'CIT. n. s. [Lat. deficio, deficit.] Want; deficiency. A word of very modern introduction.

The corn he has imported, betrays his deficit in grains. Ld. Auckland, Consid. P. i. p. 42.

DEFI'ER.† n. s. [old Fr. deffieur.] A challenger; a contemner; one that dares and defies.

He was ever
A loose and strong defier of all order.
Beaum. and Fl. Wild-goose-chase.

Is it not then high time that the laws should provide, by the most prudent and effectual means, to curb those bold and insolent defiers of Heaven?
Tillotson.

DEFIGURA'TION.* n. s. [de, Lat. and figuration.] A change of a better form to a worse.

These traditions are defigurations and deformations of Christ exhibited. Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 30.

To DEFI'GURE.* v. a. [from de, Lat. and figure.] To delineate.

On the pavement of the said chapel be these two stones as they are here defigured.
Weever, Funer. Mon. p. 844.

To DEFI'LE.† v. a. [Sax. afylan, gefylan, to pollute; Teut. vuylen; Goth. fuls, nasty or foul. Spenser repeatedly writes this word defoul. Wicliffe had long before authorised him.]

1. To make foul or impure; to make nasty or filthy; to dirty.

There is a thing, Harry, known to many in our land by the name of pitch; this pitch, as antient writers do report, doth defile. Shakspeare.

He is justly reckoned among the greatest prelates of this age, however his character may be defiled by mean and dirty hands. Swift.

2. To pollute; to make legally or ritually impure.

That which dieth of itself he shall not eat, to defile himself therewith. Lev. xxii 8.

Neither shall he defile himself for his father.
Lev. xxi. 11.

3. To corrupt chastity; to violate.

Ev'ry object his offence revil'd,
The husband murder'd and the wife defil'd. Prior.

4. To taint; to corrupt; to vitiate; to make guilty.

Forgetfulness of good turns, defiling of souls, adultery, and shameless uncleanness. Wisd. xiv. 26.

God requires rather that we should die than defile ourselves with impieties. Stilling fleet.

Let not any instances of sin defile your requests.
Wake.

To DEFI'LE. v. n. [deffiler, Fr.] To march; to go off file by file.

DEFI'LE. n. s. [deffile, Fr. from file, a line of soldiers, which is derived from filum, a thread.] A narrow passage; a long narrow pass; a lane.

There is in Oxford a narrow defile, to use the military term, where the partisans used to encounter. Addison.

DEFI'LEMENT. n. s. [from defile.] The state of being defiled; the act of defiling; nastiness; pollution; corruption; defedation.

Lust,
By unchaste looks, loose gestures, and foul talk,
Lets in defilement to the inward parts.
Milton, Comus.

The unchaste are provoked to see their vice exposed, and the chaste cannot rake into such filth without danger of defilement. Spectator.

DEFI'LER. n. s. [from defile.] One that defiles; a corrupter; a violater.

At the last tremendous day, I shall hold forth in my arms my much wronged child, and call aloud for vengeance on her defiler. Addison.

DEFI'NABLE. adj. [from define.]

1. That may be defined; capable of definition.

The Supreme Nature we cannot otherwise define, than by saying it is infinite, as if infinite were definable, or infinity a subject for our narrow understanding. Dryden.

2. That may be ascertained.

Concerning the time of the end of the world, the question is, whether that time be definable or no. Burnet, Theory.

To DEFI'NE.† v. a. [definio, Lat. definir, Fr.]

1. To give the definition; to explain a thing by its qualities and circumstances.

Whose loss can'st thou mean,
That do'st so well their miseries define? Sidney.

Though defining be thought the proper way to make known the proper signification, yet there are some words that will not be defined. Locke.

2. To circumscribe; to mark the limit; to bound.

When the rings appeared only black and white, they were very distinct and well defined, and the blackness seemed as intense as that of the central spot. Newton.

3. To decide; to determine. Cotgrave.

These warlike champions, all in armour shine,
Assembled were in field the chalenge to define.
Spenser, F. Q. iv. iii. 3.

To DEFI'NE. v. n. To determine; to decide; to decree.

The unjust judge is the capital remover of landmarks, when he defineth amiss of lands and properties. Bacon.

DEFI'NER. n. s. [from define.] One that explains; one that describes a thing by its qualities.

Your God, forsooth, is found
Incomprehensible and infinite;
But is he therefore found? Vain searcher! no:
Let your imperfect definition show,
That nothing you, the weak definer, know. Prior.

DE'FINITE. adj. [from definitus, Lat.]

1. Certain; limited; bounded.

Hither to your arbour divers times he repaired, and here, by your means, had the sight of the goddess, who in a definite compass can set forth infinite beauty. Sidney.

2. Exact; precise.

Ideots, in this case of favour, would
Be wisely definite. Shakspeare.

In a charge of adultery, the accuser ought to set forth, in the accusatory libel or inquisition, which succeeds in the place of accusation, some certain and definite time. Ayliffe, Parergon.

DE'FINITE. n. s. [from the adjective.] Thing explained or defined.

Special bastardy is nothing else but the definition of the general; and the general, again, is nothing else but a definite of the special. Ayliffe.

DE'FINITENESS. n. s. [from definite.] Certainty; limitedness. Dict.

DEFINI'TION. n.s. [definitio, Lat. definition, Fr.]

1. A short description of a thing by its properties.

I drew my definition of poetical wit from my particular consideration of him; for propriety of thoughts and words are only to be found in him. Dryden.

2. Decision: determination.

3. [In logick.] The explication of the essence of a thing by its kind and difference.

What is man? Not a reasonable animal merely; for that is not an adequate and distinguishing definition. Bentley.

DEFI'NITIVE. adj. [definitif, Fr. definitivus, Lat.] Determinate; positive; express.

Other authors write often dubiously, even in matters wherein is expected a strict and definite truth. Brown, Vulg. Err.

I make haste to the casting and comparting of the whole work, it being indeed the very definitive sum of this art, to distribute usefully and gracefully a well chosen plot. Wotton.

DEFI'NITIVE.* n.s. [from the adjective.] That which ascertains or defines.

As to words, which are only significant as accessories, they acquire a signification either from being associated to one word, or else to many. If to one word alone, then, as they can do no more than in some manner define or determine, they may justly for that reason be called definitives. Harris, Hermes, i. 8.

If any of these names seem new and unusual, we may introduce others more usual, by calling the substantives, nouns; the attributes, verbs; the definitives, articles; and the connectives, conjunctions. Ibid.

DEFI'NITIVELY. adv. [from definitive.] Positively; decisively; expressly.

Definitively thus I answer you:
Your love deserves my thanks; but my desert,
Unmeritable, shuns your high request. Shaks.

Bellarmine saith, because we think that the body of Christ may be in many places at once, locally and visibly; therefore we say and hold, that the same body may be circumscriptively and definitively in more places at once. Bp. Hall.

That Methuselah was the longest lived of all the children of Adam, we need not grant; nor is it definitively set down by Moses. Brown, Vulg. Err.

DEFI'NITIVENESS. n.s. [from definitive.] Decisiveness. Dict.

To DEFI'X.* v.a. [Lat. defigo, defixum.] To fasten with nails; figuratively, to fix earnestly.

The country parson is generally sad, because he knows nothing but the cross of Christ, his mind being defixed on, and with those nails wherewith his Master was. Herbert, Country Parson, ch. 27.

DEFLAGRABI'LITY. n.s. [from deflagro, Lat.] Combustibility; the quality of taking fire, and burning totally away.

We have spent more time than the opinion of the ready deflagrability, if I may so speak, of saltpetre did permit us to imagine. Boyle.

DEFLA'GRABLE. adj. [from deflagro, Lat.] Having the quality of wasting away wholly in fire, without any remains.

Our chymical oils, supposing that they were exactly pure, yet they would be, as the best spirit of wine is, but the more inflammable and deflagrable. Boyle.

To DE'FLAGRATE.* v.a. [deflagro, Lat.] To set fire to. A term of modern chymistry.

DEFLAGRA'TION.† n.s. [deflagratio, Lat.]

1. A term frequently made use of in chymistry, for setting fire to several things in their preparation; as in making Æthiops with fire, with sal prunellæ, and many others. Quincy.

The true reason why paper is not burned by the flame that plays about it, seems to be, that the aqueous part of the spirit of wine, being imbibed by the paper, keeps it so moist, that the flame of the sulphureous parts of the same spirit cannot fasten on it; and therefore, when the deflagration is over, you shall always find the paper moist. Boyle.

2. Destruction by fire without remains. Not peculiar to chymistry, as Dr. Johnson has considered the word.

Because it was evident to them that there was no way to solve the eternity or antiquity of the world, than by supposing innumerable deluges and deflagrations. Pearson on the Creed, Art. 1.

To DEFLE'CT.† v.n. [deflecto, Lat.] To turn aside; to deviate from a true course, or right line.

At some parts of the Azores the needle deflecteth not, but lieth in the true meridian: on the other side of the Azores, and this side of the Equator, the North point of the needle wheeleth to the West. Brown, Vulg. Err.

Those actions which deflect and err from the order of this end, are unnatural and inordinate. Bp. Taylor, Life of Christ, Pref. § 8.

For did not some from a strait course deflect,
They could not meet, they could no world erect. Blackmore.

To DEFLE'CT.* v.a. To bend.

Sitting with their knees deflected under them, to shew their fear and reverence. Lord's Discov. of the Banians, 1630, p. 72.

DEFLE'CTION.† n.s. [from deflecto, Lat.]

1. Deviation; the act of turning aside.

Needles incline to the South on the other side of the Equator; and, at the very line or middle circle, stand without deflection. Brown, Vulg. Err.

The censure of Catullus, with a little deflexion, might very fitly be applied unto him. Fotherby, Atheom. p. 191.

2. A turning aside, or out of the way.

King David found this deflection and indirectness in our minds. W. Montagu, Dev. Ess. P. i. p. 112.

3. [In navigation.] The departure of a ship from its true course.

DEFLE'XURE. n.s. [from deflecto, Lat.] A bending down; a turning aside, or out of the way. Dict.

DEFLORA'TION.† n.s. [defloration, Fr. from defloratus, Lat.]

1. The act of deflouring; the taking away of a woman's virginity.

By this lawe also that kinde of whoredome is prohibited, which consisteth in the defloration of virgins. Transl. of Bullinger's Sermons, p. 235.

2. A selection of that which is most valuable.

The laws of Normandy are, in a great measure, the defloration of the English laws, and a transcript of them. Hale.

The common printed chronicle — is indeed but an epitome or defloration made by Robert of Lorraine. Selden on Drayton's Polyolb. To the Reader.

To DEFLO'UR.† v.a. [deflorer, Fr. Spenser has once exactly followed the French original in writing the word deflore for stain or sully; but evidently for the sake of the rhyme. Hymn in Hon. of Beauty, ver. 39.]

1. To ravish; to take away a woman's virginity.

As is the lust of an eunuch to deflour a virgin, so is he that executeth judgement with violence. Ecclus. xx. 4.

Now will I hence to seek my lovely Moor,
And let my spleenful sons this trull deflour. Shaks.

3. To take away the beauty and grace of any thing.

How on a sudden lost,
Defac'd, deflour'd, and now to death devote! Milton, P. L.

If he died young, he died innocent, and before the sweetness of his soul was defloured and ravished from him by the flames and follies of a froward age. Bp. Taylor.

Grief — cloudeth the countenance, deflioureth the beauty. Bp. Reynolds on the Passions, ch. 22.

3. Literally, to deprive of flowers; a sense hitherto unnoticed, but the primary sense of the word.

An earthquake rending the cedars, deflouring the gardens. W. Montagu, Dev. Ess. P. i. p. 361.

DEFLO'URER.† n.s. [from deflour.] A ravisher; one that takes away virginity.

The second daughter to drunkenness is whoring; the deflourer of many a virgin, and defiler of many a wife. Stafford's Niobe, (1611,) p. 38.

I have often wondered, that those deflourers of innocence, though dead to all the sentiments of virtue and honour, are not restrained by humanity. Addison.

To DEFLO'W.* v.n. [old Fr. défluer; Lat. defluo.] To flow, or run, as water.

Superfluous matter deflows from the body unto their proper emunctories. Brown, Vulg. Err.

DEFLU'OUS. adj. [defluus, Lat.]

1. That flows down.

2. That falls off.

DEFLU'X. n.s. [defluxus, Lat.] Downward flow.

Both bodies are clammy, and bridle the deflux of humours without penning them in too much. Bacon.

DEFLU'XION. n.s. [defluxio, Lat.] The flow of humours downward.

We see that taking cold moveth looseness, by contraction of the skin and outward parts; and so doth cold likewise cause rheums and defluxions from the head. Bacon.

DE'FLY. adv. [from deft.] Dexterously; skilfully. Obsolete. Properly deftly.

Lo, how finely the graces can it foot
To the instrument;
They dauncen defly, [deftly,] and singen soote,
In their merriment. Spenser.

DEFOEDA'TION.† n.s. [French, defedation, a soiling, Cotgrave; from defœdus, Lat.] The act of making filthy; pollution. This is no English word; at least, to make it English, it should be written defedation. This would correspond with the French word, which is older than our own; of which, however, Dr. Johnson had overlooked the existence. He himself uses defedation in his explanation of defilement.

What native, unextinguishable beauty must be impressed and instincted through the whole, which the defædation of so many parts by a bad printer, and a worse editor, could not hinder from shining forth! Bentley.

To DEFO'RCE.* v.a. [old Fr. deforcer.] To keep out of the possession of land by deforcement.

Deforcement may be grounded on the disability of the party deforced. Blackstone.

DEFO'RCEMENT.† n.s. [from force.] A with-holding of lands and tenements by force from the right owner. See an example of the word in DEFORCE.

To DEFO´RM.† v. a. [deformer, Fr. deformo, Lat.]

1. To disfigure; to make ugly; to spoil the form of any thing.

I that am curtail'd of this fair proportion,
Cheated of feature by dissembling nature,
Deform'd, unfinish'd, sent before my time
Into this breathing world, scarce half made up.
Shakspeare.

Zopyrus and Pisistratus wounded, mangled, deformed themselves, that they might thereby insinuate and gain their ends.
Bp. Reynolds on the Passions, ch. 17.

Wintry blasts
Deform the year delightless. Thomson.

2. To dishonour; to make ungraceful.

Old men with dust deform'd their hoary hair.
Dryden.

DEFO´RM.† adj. [deformis, Lat.] Ugly; disfigured; of an irregular form.

I did proclaim,
That whoso kill'd that monster most deform,
Should have mine only daughter to his dame.
Spenser, F. Q.

Men, whose lives and doings were more deformed than the foul deform body of Thersites.
Stapleton, Fortr. of Faith, (1565,) fol. 83.

So spake the griesly terror; and in shape,
So speaking and so threatning, grew tenfold
More dreadful and deform. Milton, P. L.

Sight so deform, what heart of rock could long
Dry-ey'd behold? Milton, P. L.

DEFORMA´TION.† n. s. [deformation, Fr. Cotgrave; deformatio, Lat.] A defacing; a disfiguring.

The visitation tended not to any reformation so much as to the deformation of the universal order.
Bright, Abridg. of Foxe's Acts, (1589,) p. 209.

They continue in the woful deformation of their bestial corruptions.
Bp. Hall, Serm. St. Paul's Combat.

DEFO´RMED.† participial adj.

1. Ugly; wanting natural beauty.

A deformed or ill-favoured woman. Huloet.

When deformed persons appear together, it doubles the ridicule, because of the similitude; as it does, when they are seen with very large persons, because of the contrast. Let them therefore call Minerva to their aid in both cases.
Hay, Essay on Deformity.

2. Base; disgraceful.

From the rod or ferule I would have them free, as from the menace of them, for it is both deformed and vile. B. Jonson, Discoveries.

DEFO´RMEDLY.† adv. [from deform.] In an ugly manner.

An enemy to all saving light; so deformedly black, that he is ashamed to shew his face.
Bp. Ganden, Hieraspistes, 1653, p. 464.

DEFO´RMEDNESS. n. s. [from deformed.] Ugliness; a disagreeable form.

DEFO´RMER.* n. s. [from deform.] One who defaces or deforms.

They are now to be removed, because they have been the most certain deformers and ruiners of the church. Milton, Animadv. Rem. Defence.

DEFO´RMITY. n. s. [deformitas, Lat.]

1. Ugliness; ill-favouredness.

I, in this weak piping time of peace,
Have no delight to pass away the time,
Unless to spy my shadow in the sun,
And descant on mine own deformity. Shakspeare.

Proper deformity seems not in the fiend
So horrid as in woman. Shakspeare.

Where sits deformity to mock my body,
To shape my legs of an unequal size;
To disproportion me in every part. Shakspeare.

Why should not man,
Retaining still divine similitude
In part, from such deformities be free,
And for his maker's image sake, exempt?
Milton, P. L.

2. Ridiculousness; the quality of something worthy to be laughed at, or censured.

In comedy there is somewhat more of the worse likeness to be taken, because it is often to produce laughter, which is occasioned by the sight of some deformity. Dryden.

3. Irregularity; inordinateness.

No glory is more to be envied than that of due reforming either church or state, when deformities are such, that the perturbation and novelty are not like to exceed the benefit of reforming. K. Charles.

DEFO´RSOR. n. s. [from forceur, Fr.] One that overcomes and casteth out by force. A law term. Blount.

To DEFO´UL.* To defile. Obsolete. See To DEFILE.

That no man go beyond and defraud his brother in any matter, because that the Lord is the avenger of all such, as we also have forewarned you and testified. Thes. iv. 6.

My son, defraud not the poor of his living, and make not the needy eyes to wait long. Ecclus. iv. 1.

Churches seem injured and defrauded of their right, when places, not sanctified as they are, prevent them unnecessarily in that pre-eminence and honour. Hooker.

There they, who brothers better claim disown,
Expel their parents, and usurp the throne;
Defraud their clients, and, to lucre sold,
Sit brooding on unprofitable gold. Dryden.

But now he seiz'd Briseis' heav'nly charms,
And of my valour's prize defrauds my arms. Pope.

There is a portion of our lives which every wise man may justly reserve for his own particular use, without defrauding his native country. Dryden.

DEFRA´UDATION. n. s. [defraudo, Lat.] Privation by fraud.

Their impostures are worse than any other, deluding not only into pecuniary defraudations, but the irreparable deceit of death. Brown, Vulg. Err.

DEFRA´UDER. n. s. [from defraud.] A deceiver; one that cheats.

The profligate in morals grow severe,
Defrauders just, and sycophants sincere.
Blackmore.

DEFRA´UDMENT.* n. s. [Fr. defraudement, Cotgrave.] Privation by deceit or fraud.

I grant infirmities, but not outrages, not perpetual defraudments of truest conjugal society.
Milton, Doct. and Disc. of Divorce.

To DEFRA´Y.† v. a. [defrayer, Fr.]

1. To bear the charges of; to discharge expences.

He would, out of his own revenue, defray the charges belonging to the sacrifices. 2 Mac. ix. 16.

It is easy to lay a charge upon any town; but to foresee how the same may be answered and defrayed, is the chief part of good advisement.
Spenser, State of Ireland.

It is long since any stranger arrived in this part, and therefore take ye no care; the state will defray you all the time you stay; neither shall you stay one day the less for that. Bacon.

2. To satisfy.

For, aye the more that she the same reherst,
The more it gauld and griev'd him night and day,
That nought but dire revenge his anger might defray. Spenser, F. Q. iv. v. 31.

DEFRA´YER.† n. s. [defrayeur, old Fr.] One that discharges expences.

DEFRA´YMENT.† n. s. [from defray.] The payment of expences; compensation; satisfaction.

Let the traitor pay, with his life's defrayment, that which he attempted with so lascivious a desire.
Shelton, Tr. of D. Quix. iv. 7.

DEFT.† adj. [dæpt, Sax.]

1. Neat; handsome; spruce. Cockeram.

Deft mistress! whiter than the cheese new prest,
Smoother than cream, and softer than the curds!
B. Jonson, Sad Shepherd.

He said, I were a deft lass.
Broome, Northern Lass.

2. Proper; fitting. [This is the Saxon meaning.]

You go not the way to examine: you must call the watch that are their accusers. —— —— Yea, marry, that's the deftest way. Shakspeare.

3. Ready; dexterous.

Loud fits of laughter seiz'd the guests, to see
The limping god so deft at his new ministry.
Dryden.

The wanton calf may skip with many a bound,
And my cur, Tray, play deftest feats around. Gay.

DE´FTLY. adv. [from deft.]

1. Neatly; dexterously.

Come, high or low,
Thyself and office deftly show. Shaksp. Macbeth.

2. In a skilful manner.

Young Colin Clout, a lad of peerly meed,
Full well could dance, and deftly tune the reed.
Gay.

DE´FTNESS.* n. s. [from deft.] Neatness; beauty.

Two little Isles, her handmaids; which compar'd
With those within the Poole, for deftness not outdar'd. Drayton, Polyolb. S. 2.

DEFU´NCT.† adj. [old Fr. defunct; "un defunct, a deceased or dead person." Cotgrave. From the Lat. defunctus, "that hath gone through with a business." See the substantive.] Dead; deceased.

I therefore beg it not,
To please the palate of my appetite;
Nor to comply with heat, the young affects,
In me defunct, and proper satisfaction. Shaksp.

Here entity and quiddity,
The souls of defunct bodies fly. Hudibras.

DEFU´NCT.† n. s. [from the adjective.] One that is deceased; a dead man, or woman.

Nature doth abhor to make his couch
With the defunct, or sleep upon the dead. Shaksp.

In many cases, the searchers are able to report the opinion of the physician who was with the patient, as they receive the same from the friends of the defunct. Graunt.

DEFU´NCTION. n. s. [from defunct.] Death.

Nor did the French possess the Salique land,
Until four hundred one and twenty years
After defunction of king Pharamond. Shaksp.

To DEFY´.† v. a. [deffier, Fr. from de fide decedere, or some like phrase, to fall from allegiance to rebellion, contempt, or insult. So far Dr. Johnson. The like phrase, which he suspects, is the low Lat. diffidare. The first and feudal sense of the word is, not merely to fall from allegiance to rebellion, but in general to declare, on either part, the dissolution of the faith reciprocally pledged between the lord and vassal. See Lord Lyttelton's Hist. of Hen. II. Dr. Johnson has also omitted a very expressive usage of this word.]

1. To call to combat; to challenge.

I once again,
Defy thee to the trial of mortal fight.
Milton, S. A.

Where seek retreat, now innocence is fled!
Safe in that guard, I durst even hell defy;
Without it, tremble now, when heav'n is nigh.
Dryden.

Agis, the Lycian, stepping forth with pride,
To single fight the boldest foe defy'd. Dryden.

2. To treat with contempt; to slight.

As many fools that stand in better place,
Garnish'd like him, that for a tricksy word
Defy the matter. Shakspeare.

3. To disdain; to deny; to renounce.

Fool, said the Pagan, I thy gift defy.
Spenser, F. Q.

All studies here I solemnly defy,
Save how to gall and pinch this Bolingbroke.
Shakspeare, K. Hen. IV. P. I.

Neither can it be otherwise, whiles we are ready to impute to the contrary-minded not only those things which they profess to hold, but those which we conceive to be consequent to their opinions, how vehemently soever disclaimed or defyed by the authors. Bp. Hall, The Peacemaker.

DEFY'. n. s. [from the verb.] A challenge; an invitation to fight; this is now hardly used.

At this the challenger, with fierce defy,
His trumpet sounds; the challeng'd makes reply:
With clangour rings the field, resounds the vaulted sky. Dryden.

DEFY'ER. n. s. [from defy.] A challenger; one that invites to fight: more properly defier.

God may revenge the affronts put upon them by such impudent defyers of both, as neither believe a God, nor ought to be believed by man. South.

To DEG.* v. a. [beazan, Sax. deigr. Ital. dagga, Sw.] To sprinkle. Craven Dialect. A Westmoreland word also, and in other parts of the North. See Grose and Brockett.

To DEGE'NDER.* v. n. [Lat. degenero.] To degenerate; which see. Obsolete.

So that next offspring of the Maker's love,
Next to Himself in glorious degree,
Degendering to hate, fell from above
Through pride. Spenser, Hymn. of Heav. Love.

DEGE'NDERED.* adj. [This is the true word of Spenser, which in some editions is printed degenered, and which Mr. Mason has adopted in his Supplement to Dr. Johnson's Dictionary. But degenered, in reality, exists not in Spenser. Even, in his State of Ireland, where the printed copies read degenerated, the best manuscripts read degendered.] Degenerated.

And if than those may any worse be read,
They into that ere long will be degendered.
Spenser, F. Q. v. 2. Introd.

DEGE'NERACY.† n. s. [from degeneratio, Lat.]

1. A departure from the virtue of our ancestors.

Describing no fewer, after the grandfather, than three successions of degeneracy.
Harris, Philog. Inquiries.

2. A desertion of that which is good.

'Tis true, we have contracted a great deal of weakness and impotency by our wilful degeneracy from goodness; but that grace, which the gospel offers to us for our assistance, is sufficient for us. Tillotson.

The ruin of a state is generally preceded by an universal degeneracy of manners, and contempt of religion, which is entirely our case at present. Swift.

3. Meanness.

There is a kind of sluggish resignation, as well as poorness and degeneracy of spirit, in a state of slavery. Addison.

To DEGE'NERATE.† v. n. [degenerare, Lat degenerer, Fr. degenerar, Spanish.]

1. To fall from the virtue of ancestors.

What would the Romans have been, had they degenerated in this proportion for five or six generations more. Harris, Phil. Inquiries.

After such whipping, they have been forced to make deep incisions, which, degenerating into ulcers, render these unhappy wretches incapable of working for a long time.
H. Wharton, Inquis. of Goa, ch. 35.

DEGE'NERATE. adj. [from the verb.]

1. Unlike his ancestors; fallen from the virtue and merit of his ancestors.

Thou art like enough
To fight against me under Piercy's pay;
To dog his heels, and curt'sy at his frowns,
To show how much thou art degenerate. Shaksp.

Yet thou hast greater cause to be
Asham'd of them, than they of thee;
Degenerate from their ancient brood,
Since first the court allow'd them food. Swift.

2. Unworthy; base; departing from its kind or nature.

So all shall turn degenerate, all deprav'd;
Justice and temperance, truth, and faith forgot!
One man except. Milton, P. L.

When a man so far becomes degenerate as to quit the principles of human nature, and to be a noxious creature, there is commonly an injury done some person or other. Locke.

DEGE'NERATELY.* adv. [from degenerate.] In an unworthy or base manner.

Leaving the Mahometans, let us take a short view of Rome Christian, though apostatized and degenerately Christian.
Worthington, Miscell. p. 29.

That blindness worse than this,
That saw not how degenerately I serv'd.
Milton, S. A.

The liver should continually separate the choler from the blood, and empty it into the intestines, where there is good use for it, not only to provoke dejection, but also to attenuate the chyle.
Ray on the Creation.

4. The act of throwing down. Neither this nor the following sense is noticed by Dr Johnson.

Upon this foul revolt and apostasy of theirs [the angels'] from their primeval glory, followed their punishment; which was their dejection and detrusion into the caliginous regions of the air.
Hallywell, Melampr. (1681,) p. 13.

5. A casting down, in sign of reverence.

Adoration implies submission and dejection; so that while we worship, we cast down ourselves.
Pearson on the Creed, Art. 1.

DEJE'CTLY.* adv. [from deject.] In a downcast, pensive manner. Sherwood.

DEJE'CTORY.* adj. [from deject.] Having the power to promote evacuation by stool.

It [melancholy] may be the more easily wrought upon and evacuated by the dejectory medicines.
Ferrand on Love Melancholy, (1640,) p. 346.

DEJE'CTURE. n. s. [from deject.] The excrement.

A disease opposite to spissitude is too great fluidity, the symptoms of which are excess of animal secretions; as of perspiration, sweat, urine, liquid dejectures, leanness, weakness, and thirst.
Arbuthnot on Aliments.

To DE'JERATE.* v. a. [Lat. dejero.] To swear deeply. Cockeram.

DEJERA'TION. n. s. [from dejero, Lat.] A taking of a solemn oath. Dict.

DEJE'UNE. n. s. [Fr. desjuner, "a breakfast, a morning's repast." Cotgrave.] A sort of breakfast.

Take a dejeune of muskadel and eggs.
B. Jonson, New Inn.

DEI'FICAL.* adj. [old Fr. deific, from the Lat. Deus.] Making divine.

The ancient catholick fathers — were not afraid to call this Supper, some of them, the slave of immortality, and sovereign preservative against death; other, a deifical communion.
Homilies, Serm. i. on the Sacrament.

DEIFICA'TION.† n. s. [deification, Fr.] The act of deifying, or making a god.

There is a little mollification used to reduce the forenamed apotheosis and deification within the compass of this sense.
Fotherby, Atheom. (1622,) p. 290.

[He] ran into deifications of my person, pure flames, constant love, eternal raptures, and a thousand other phrases drawn from the images we have of heaven, which all men use for the service of hell, when run over with uncommon vehemence.
Tatler, No. 33.

His [Cicero's] mighty genius could add nothing to what every Pagan knew, talks of the deification of Romulus, the eternity of the soul, from the old but false argument of its being the principle of motion and a self-mover.
Ellis, Knowledge of Divine Things, p. 33.

DE'IFIER.* n. s. [from To deify.] One who makes a man a god; an idolater.

One would have hoped, that the memory of so signal an interposition of Heaven [the Flood] against the first deifiers of men, should have given an effectual check to the practice for some considerable time in the succeeding world.
Coventry, Phil. to Hyd. Conv. 3.

DE'IFORM.† adj. [from deus and forma, Lat.] Of a godlike form.

But if the final consummation
Of all things make the creature deiform,
As Plato's school doth phrase it; there is none,
That thence need fear to come to any harm.
More, Song of the Soul, P. iv. st. 25.

He [Whichcot] studied to raise those who conversed with him to a nobler set of thoughts, and to consider religion as a seed of a deiform nature; to use one of his own phrases.
Burnet, Hist of his Own Times.

When our minds shall perceive what a pure imitation of God its life is, and how exactly deiform all its motions and actions are, with what ravishing pleasure will they even review their own motions, which being immediately copied from the nature of God, will be such as its severest reason will be always forced to command.
Scott, Christ. Life, i. ch. 3.

DEIFO'RMITY.* n. s. [from deiform.] Resemblance of deity.

Thus the soul's numerous plurality
I've prov'd, and shew'd she is not very God;
But yet a decent deiformity
Have given her. More, Song of the Soul, P. iv. st. 27.

The short and secure way to divine union and deiformity being faithfully performed, discreetly practised, and carefully accompanied with profound humility.
Spiritual Conquest, (1651,) P. iv. p. 36.

To DE'IFY. v. a. [deifier, French; of deus and fio, Lat.]

1. To make a god of; to adore as god; to transfer into the number of the divinities.

Daphnis, the fields' delight, the shepherds' love,
Renown'd on earth, and deify'd above. Dryden.

The seals of Julius Cæsar, which we know to be antique, have the star of Venus over them, though they were all graven after his death, as a note that he was deified. Dryden.

Persuade the covetous man not to deify his money, and the proud man not to adore himself.
South.

Half of thee
Is deify'd before thy death. Prior.

2. To praise excesssively; to extol one as if he were a god.

He did again so extol and deify the pope, as made all that he had said in praise of his master and mistress seem temperate and passable. Bacon.

To DEIGN. v. n. [from daigner, Fr. of dignor, Lat.] To vouchsafe; to think worthy.

Deign to descend now lower, and relate
What may no less perhaps avail us known.
Milton, P. L.

Oh deign to visit our forsaken seats,
The mossy fountains, and the green retreats. Pope.

To DEIGN.† v. a.

1. To grant; to permit; to allow.

Now Sweno, Norway's king, craves composition;
Nor would we deign him burial of his men,
Till he disburs'd ten thousand dollars. Shaksp.

2. To consider worth notice; in opposition to the verb disdain.

Thou hast estrang'd thyself, and deignest not our land. Bryskett, Mourn. Muse of Thestylis.

Thy palate then did deign
The roughest berry on the rudest hedge.
Shakspeare, Ant. and Cleop.

DEI'GNING. n. s. [from deign.] A vouchsafing; a thinking worthy.

To DEI'NTEGRATE. v. a. [from de and integro, Lat.] To take from the whole; to spoil; to diminish. Dict.

DEI'PAROUS. adj. [deiparus, Latin.] That brings forth a God; the epithet applied to the blessed Virgin. Dict.

DE'ISM.† n. s. [deisme, French.] The opinion of those that only acknowledge one God, without the reception of any revealed religion. See DEIST.

Deism, or the principles of natural worship, are only the faint remnants or dying flames of revealed religion in the posterity of Noah. Dryden.

Deism seems to have sprung up abroad about the middle of the sixteenth century.
Waterland, Christ. vind. against Infidelity, p. 4.

DE'IST.† n. s. [deiste, French.] A man who follows no particular religion, but only acknowledges the existence of God, without any other article of faith.

In the second epistle of St. Peter, certain deists, as they seem to have been, laughed at the prophecy of the day of judgement. Burnet.

The word deist, or theist, in its original signification, implies merely the belief of a God, being opposed to atheist; and so there may be deists of various kinds, according to their respective religions which they receive, over and above that prime article. There may be Pagan deists, and Jewish deists, and Mahometan deists, and Christian deists; meaning such persons as respectively embrace those several religions, above the belief of a God. But those that reject all traditional religions, and yet profess to believe in God, are merely deists, or emphatically such, without any additional epithet to distinguish them: or, if an epithet must be added, they should be styled Epicurean deists, or Infidel deists, or something of like kind. To call them Christian deists is a great abuse of language; unless Christians were to be distributed into two sorts, Christians and No-Christians, or Christians and Anti-Christians.

Waterland, Christ. vind. against Inf. p. 62.

DEI'STICAL. adj. [from deist.] Belonging to the heresy of the deists.

Weakness does not fall only to the share of Christian writers, but to some who have taken the pen in hand to support the deistical or antichristian scheme of our days. Watts.

DE'ITATE.* adj. [from deity.] Made God. Adopted by Archbishop Cranmer, to express the Godhead of Christ; in contradistinction to incarnate.

One person and one Christ, who is God incarnate, and man deitate, as Gregory Nazianzen saith, without mutation.
Abp. Cranmer to Bp. Gardiner, p. 350.

DE'ITY. n. s. [deité, French, from deitas, Latin.]

1. Divinity; the nature and essence of God.

Some things he doth as God, because his deity alone is the spring from which they flow; some things as man, because they issue from his mere human nature; some things jointly as both God and man, because both natures concur as principles thereunto. Hooker.

With what arms
We mean to hold, what anciently we claim
Of deity, or empire. Milton, P. L.

2. A fabulous god; a term applied to the heathen gods and goddesses.

Will you suffer a temple, how poorly built soever, but yet a temple of your deity, to be razed? Sidney.

Give the gods a thankful sacrifice when it pleaseth their deities to take the wife of a man from him. Shakspeare.

3. The supposed divinity of a heathen god; divine qualities.

They on their former journey forward pass,
With pains far passing that long wandering Greek,
That for his love refused deity. Spenser, F. Q.

Heard you not what an humble suppliant
Lord Hastings was to her for his delivery?
—Who humbly complaining to her deity,
Got my lord chamberlain his liberty. Shaks.

By what reason could the same deity be denied unto Laurentia and Flora, which was given to Venus. Ralegh.

DELACERA'TION. n. s. [from delacero, Lat.] A tearing in pieces. Dict.

DELACRYMA'TION. n. s. [delacrymatio, Lat.] A falling down of the humours; the waterishness of the eyes; or a weeping much. Dict.

DELACTA'TION. n. s. [delactatio, Latin.] A weaning from the breast. Dict.

DELA'PSED. adj. [from delapsus, Latin.] With physicians. Bearing or falling down. It is used in speaking of the womb, and the like. Dict.

To DELA'TE.† v. a. [from delatus, Lat.]

1. To carry; to convey.

Try exactly the time wherein sound is delated. Bacon.

2. To accuse; to inform against. [low Latin delatare.]

What they snatch up and devour at one table [they] utter at another; and grow suspected of the master, hated of the servants, while they enquire, and reprehend, and compound, and delate business of the house they have nothing to do with. B. Jonson, Discoveries.

DELA'TION† n. s. [delatio, Latin.]

1. A carriage; conveyance.

In delation of sounds, the inclosure of them preserveth them, and causeth them to be heard further. Bacon.

It is certain that the delation of light is in an instant. Bacon.

There is a plain delation of the sound from the teeth to the instrument of hearing. Bacon.

2. An accusation; an impeachment.

Three gentlemen of the gravest and severest natures, who receive all secret delations in matter of practice against the republick.
Wotton, Rem. p. 307.

DELA'TOR. n. s. [delator, Latin.] An accuser; an informer.

What were these harpies but flatterers, delators, and inexpleably covetous. Sandys, Travels.

Men have proved their own delators, and discovered their own most important secrets.
Gov. of the Tongue.

No sooner was that small colony, wherewith the depopulated earth was to be replanted, come forth of the ark, but we meet with Cham, a delator to his own father, inviting his brethren to that execrable spectacle of their parent's nakedness.
Gov. of the Tongue.

To DELA'Y.† v.a. [from delayer, French.]

1. To defer; to put off.

And when the people saw that Moses delayed to come down out of the mount, the people gathered themselves together unto Aaron. Exod. xxxii. 1.

Cyrus he found, on him his force essay'd;
For Hector was to the tenth year delay'd. Dryden.

2. To hinder; to frustrate; to keep suspended.

I am but sorry, not afear'd; delay'd,
But nothing alter'd. Shakspeare, Wint. Tale.

3. To detain, stop, or retard the course of.

Thyrsis, whose artful strains have oft delay'd
The huddling brook to hear his madrigal.
Milton, Comus.

She flies the town, and mixing with the throng
Of madding matrons, bears the bride along:
Wand'ring through woods and wilds, and devious ways,
And with these arts the Trojan match delays.
Dryden.

Be mindful, goddess, of thy promise made;
Must sad Ulysses ever be delay'd? Pope.

4. To allay; to soften; to temper.

Till time the tempest do thereof delay
With sufferance soft. Spenser, F. Q. iv. viii. 1.

Sweet-breathing Zephirus did softly play
A gentle spirit, that lightly did delay
Hot Titan's beams. Spenser, Prothalamion.

To DELA'Y. v. n. To stop; to cease from action.

There seem to be certain bounds to the quickness and slowness of the succession of those ideas one to another in our minds, beyond which they can neither delay nor hasten. Locke.

DELA'Y. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. A deferring; procrastination; lingering inactivity.

I have learn'd that fearful commenting
Is leaden servitor to full delay;
Delay leads impotent and snail-pac'd beggary.
Shakspeare, Rich. III.

The conduct of our lives, and the management of our great concerns, will not bear delay. Locke.

2. Stay; stop.

The keeper charm'd, the chief without delay
Pass'd on, and took th' irremeable way. Dryden.

DELA'YER.† n. s. [from delay.] One that defers; a putter off.

He is oftentimes called of them Fabius Cunctator, that is to say, the tarrier and delaier.
Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 75.

Oppressor of nobles, sullen, and a delayer of justice. Swift, Character of Hen. II.

DELA'YMENT.* n. s. [from delay. An old word, but entitled, as well as allayment, to notice.] Hinderance; procrastination. Obsolete.

The jeweller anon forth fette
The golde, and made his payement;
Thereof was no delaiement.
Gower, Conf. Am. B. 5.

DE'LEBLE.* adj. [Lat. delebilis.] Capable of being effaced.

If any make it a light matter, that God himself, or the Word himself, is not hurt, let him consider, that he that can find of his heart to destroy the deleble image of God, would, if it lay in his power, destroy God himself.
More, Notes upon Psychoz. p. 368.

DELE'CTABLE.† adj. [delectable, old Fr. delectabilis, Lat.] Pleasing; delightful.

In Chaucer I am sped,
His tales I have red;
His matter is delectable,
Solacious and commendable.
Skelton, Poems, p. 237.

Their delectable things shall not profit.
Isaiah, xliv. 9.

Ev'ning now approach;
For we have also our evening, and our morn;
We ours for change delectable, not need.
Milton, P. L.

He brought thee into this delicious grove,
This garden; planted with the trees of God;
Delectable, both to behold and taste! Milton, P. L.

Some of his attributes, and the manifestations thereof, are not only highly delectable to the intellective faculty, but are suitably and easily conceptible by us, because apparent in his works; as his goodness, beneficence, wisdom, and power. Hale.

The apple's outward form,
Delectable, the witless swain beguiles;
Till that with writhen mouth, and spattering noise,
He tastes the bitter morsel. Philips.

DELE'CTABLENESS.† n. s. [from delectable.] Delightfulness; pleasantness.

Full of delectableness and pleasantness. Barret.

Bp. Taylor, Holy Dying, § 5. ch. 3.

When we please to walk abroad,
For our recreation;
In the fields is our abode,
Full of delectation. Walton's Angler, ch. 16.

DE'LEGACY* n. s. [from delegate.] A certain number of persons deputed to act for, or to represent, a publick body.

I hope the delegacy will so order the statutes which they have in hand, as that the degree of a master of arts shall be better esteemed in that place.
Abp. Laud, Hist. of his Chanc. of Oxford, p. 11.

The delegacy for printing books met between 8 and 9 in the morning. Life of A. Wood, p. 226.

To DE'LEGATE.† v. a. [delego, Latin.]

1. To send away.
2. To send upon an embassy.
3. To intrust; to commit to another's power and jurisdiction.

As God hath imprinted his authority in several parts upon several estates of men, as princes, parents, spiritual guides; so he hath also delegated and committed part of his care and providence unto them. Bp. Taylor.

As God is the universal monarch, so we have all the relation of fellow-subjects to him; and can pretend no farther jurisdiction over each other than what he has delegated to us. Decay of Piety.

Why does he wake the correspondent moon,
And fill her willing lamp with liquid light,
Commanding her with delegated pow'rs,
To beautify the world, and bless the night? Prior.

4. To appoint judges to hear and determine a particular cause.

[Commissioners] delegated or appointed by the king's commission, to sit upon an appeal to him in the court of Chancery. Acts of Parl. 26 Hen. 8. ch. 19.

DE'LEGATE. n. s. [delegatus, Latin.] A deputy; a commissioner; a vicar; any one that is sent to act for, or represent another.

DE'LETERY adj. [deleterius, Lat.] Destructive; deadly; poisonous.

Nor doctor epidemick,
Though stor'd with deletery med'cines,
Which whosoever took is dead since,
E'er sent so vast a colony
To both the under worlds as he. Hudibras.

DELE'TION.† n. s. [deletio, Lat.]

1. Act of rasing or blotting out. Cockeram.

2. A destruction.

Tending not only to the hurt — but even the deletion of our whole name and nation.
Proceed. against Garnet, (1606,) D. 3. b.

Indeed, if there be a total deletion of every person of the opposing party or country, then the victory is complete, because none remains to call it in question. Hale.

DE'LETORY.* n. s. [Lat. deletus.] That which blots out.

Confession — was most certainly intended as a deletory of sin, and might do its first intention, if it were equally managed.
Bp. Taylor, Diss. from Popery, ch. 2. § 2.

DELF. } n. s. [from delpan, Saxon, to DELFE. } dig.]

1. A mine; a quarry; a pit dug.

Yet could not such mines, without great pains and charges, if at all, be wrought: the delfs would be so flown with waters, that no gins or machines could suffice to lay and keep them dry. Ray on the Creation.

2. Earthen ware; counterfeit China ware, made at Delft.

Thus, barter honour for a piece of delf?
No, not for China's wide domain itself. Smart.

Bp. Berkely, Siris, § 214.

To DELI'BERATE. v. n. [delibero, Lat.] To think, in order to choice; to hesitate.

A conscious, wise, reflecting cause,
Which freely moves and acts by reason's laws;
That can deliberate means elect, and find
Their due connection with the end design'd
Blackmore.

When love once pleads admission to our hearts,
In spite of all the virtue we can boast,
The woman that deliberates is lost. Addison.

To DELI'BERATE.* v. a. To balance in the mind; to weigh; to consider.

Be full of counsel, and then resolute to act it; else, if you shall not be firm to deliberated counsels, they which are bound to serve you, may seek and find opportunities to serve themselves upon you.
Abp. Laud's Sermons, p. 226.

DELI'BERATE. adj. [deliberatus, Lat.]

1. Circumspect; wary; advised; discreet.

Most Grave-belly was deliberate,
Not rash, like his accusers. Shakspeare, Coriol.

2. Slow; tedious; not sudden; gradual.

Commonly it is for virtuous considerations, that wisdom so far prevaileth with men as to make them desirous of slow and deliberate death, against the stream of their sensual inclination. Hooker.

Echoes are some more sudden, and chop again as soon as the voice is delivered; others are more deliberate, that is, give more space between the voice and the echo, which is caused by the local nearness or distance. Bacon.

DELI'BERATELY.† adv. [from deliberate.]

1. Circumspectly; advisedly; warily.

He judges to a hair of little indecencies; knows better than any man what is not to be written; and never hazards himself so far as to fall; but plods on deliberately, and, as a grave man ought, is sure to put his staff before him. Dryden.

2. Slowly; gradually.

Here we sauntered together for some time, either praising the beauty of such as were handsome, or the dresses of such as had nothing else to recommend them. We had gone thus deliberately forward for some time. Goldsmith, Ess. 10.

DELI'BERATENESS. n. s. [from deliberate.] Circumspection; wariness; coolness; caution.

They would not stay the fair production of acts, in the order, gravity, and deliberateness befitting a parliament. King Charles.

DELIBERA'TION. n. s. [deliberatio, Lat.] The act of deliberating; thought in order to choice.

If mankind had no power to avoid ill or chuse good by free deliberation, it should never be guilty of any thing that was done.
Hammond's Fundamentals.

DELI'BERATIVE.† adj. [deliberatif, Fr. deliberativus, Lat.] Pertaining to deliberation; apt to consider.

The will of man — either as a natural appetite, or a deliberative faculty.
Bp. Barlow, Rem. p. 500.

DELI'BERATIVE. n. s. [from the adjective.] The discourse in which a question is deliberated.

In deliberatives, the point is, what is evil; and of good, what is greater; and of evil, what is less. Bacon.

DELI'BERATIVELY.* adv. [from deliberative.] In a deliberative manner.

None but the thanes or nobility were considered as necessary constituent parts of this assembly, [the wittenagemote;] at least whilst it acted deliberatively. Burke, Abridg. of Eng. Hist. ii. 7.

DE'LICACY.† n. s. [delicatesse, Fr. of deliciæ, Lat.]

On hospitable thoughts intent,
What choice to chuse for delicacy best. Milton, P. L.

2. Nicety in the choice of food.

Be not troublesome to thyself or others in the choice of thy meats, or the delicacy of thy sauces. Bp. Taylor.

I afterwards passed my eye over several hashes, — and, hearing that they were delicacies, did not think fit to meddle with them. Tatler, No. 148.

3. Any thing highly pleasing to the senses.

These delicacies
I mean of taste, sight, smell, herbs, fruits and flow'rs,
Walks, and the melody of birds. Milton, P. L.

4. Softness; elegant or feminine beauty.

A man of goodly presence, in whom strong making took not away delicacy nor beauty fierceness. Sidney.

5. Nicety; minute accuracy.

Van Dyck has even excelled him in the delicacy of his colouring, and in his cabinet pieces. Dryd.

You may see into the spirit of them all, and form your pen from those general notions and delicacy of thoughts and happy words. Felton.

6. Neatness; elegance of dress.

7. Politeness of manners; contrary to grossness.

False delicacy is affectation, not politeness.
Spectator, No. 286.

8. Indulgence; gentle treatment.

Persons born of families noble and rich, derive a weakness of constitution from the ease and luxury of their ancestors, and the delicacy of their own education. Temple.

9. Tenderness; scrupulousness.

The state of marriage hath in it the labour of love, and the delicacies of friendship, the blessing of society and the union of hands and hearts.
Bp. Taylor, Serm. on Marriage.

True delicacy, as I take it, consists in exactness of judgement and dignity of sentiment; or, if you will, purity of affection. Spectator, No. 286.

Any zealous for promoting the interest of his country, must conquer all that tenderness and delicacy, which may make him afraid of being spoken ill of. Addison.

10. Weakness of constitution.

11. Smallness; tenuity.

DE'LICATE.† adj. [delicat, Fr.]

1. Nice; pleasing to the taste; of an agreeable flavour.

The chusing of a delicate before a more ordinary dish, is to be done as other human actions are, in which there are no degrees and precise natural limits described. Bp. Taylor.

2. Dainty; desirous of curious meats.

Mutton has likewise been in great repute among our valiant countrymen; but was formerly observed to be the food rather of men of nice and delicate appetites, than those of strong and robust constitutions. Tatler, No. 148.

3. Choice; select; excellent.

4. Pleasing to the senses.

5. Fine; not coarse; consisting of small parts.

As much blood passeth through the lungs as through all the body; the circulation is quicker, and heat greater, and their texture is extremely delicate. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

6. Of polite manners; not gross, or coarse.

7. Soft; effeminate; unable to bear hardships.

Witness this army of such mass and charge,
Led by a delicate and tender prince. Shakspeare.

Tender and delicate persons must needs be oft angry, they have so many things to trouble them, which more robust natures have little sense of. Bacon.

8. Pure; clear.

Where they most breed and haunt, I have observ'd
The air is delicate. Shakspeare.

DE'LICATE.* n. s. One that is very nice in the choice of food, or fond of dainties. See also DELICATES.

The rules among these false delicates are to be as contradictory as they can be to nature. Tatler, No. 148.

DE'LICATELY.† adv. [from delicate.]

1. Beautifully; with soft elegance.

That which will distinguish his style from all other poets, is the elegance of his words and the numerousness of his verse: there is nothing so delicately turned in all the Roman language. Dryden.

Ladies, like variegated tulips, show,
'Tis to their changes half their charms we owe;
Such happy spots the nice admirer take,
Fine by defect, and delicately weak. Pope.

2. Finely; not coarsely.

But let not chief the nightingale lament,
Her ruin'd care, too delicately form'd
To brook the harsh confinement of the cage. Thomson, Spring.

3. Daintily.

They that did feed delicately are desolate in the streets. Lament. iv. 5.

Eat not delicately, or nicely; that is, be not troublesome to thyself or others in the choice of thy meats, or the delicacy of thy sauces. Bp. Taylor.

4. Choicely.

5. Politely; not rudely.

And Agag came unto him delicately. 1 Sam. xv. 32.

6. Effeminately.

DE'LICATENESS.† n. s. [from delicate. In our old translations of the Bible, what the present version renders delicateness, is softness.] The state of being delicate; tenderness; softness; effeminacy.

Who, I pray you, may be thought to be a worse citizen than he, that being accustomed to ease and delicateness, and of a sudden by some mishap or else by prodigal riotousness being deprived of them both, and driven to extreme poverty, is compelled perforce to seek out unlawful shifts to get more wealth again? Transl. of Bullinger's Sermons, (15 ,) p. 161.

The delicate woman among you would not adventure to set the sole of her foot upon the ground, for delicateness and tenderness. Deut. xxviii. 56.

DE'LICATES.† n. s. plur. [from delicate.] Niceties; rareties; that which is choice and dainty

He hath filled his belly with my delicates. Jerem. li. 34.

Delicates poured upon a mouth shut up, are as messes of meat set upon a grave. Ecclus. xxx. 18.

The shepherd's homely curds,
His cold thin drink out of his leather bottle,—
All which secure and sweetly he enjoys,
Is far beyond a prince's delicates. Shakspeare.

Contentment alone can turn honest friezes into rich velvets, pulse into delicates, and can make one attendant many officers. Bp. Hall, Balm of Gilead.

They their appetites not only feed
With delicates of leaves and marshy weed;
But with thy sickle reap the rankest land. Dryd.

With abstinence all delicates he sees,
And can regale himself with toast and cheese. King's Cookery.

DE'LICES.† n. s. pl. [deliciæ, Lat.] Pleasures. This word is merely French, Dr. Johnson says, citing only the first example from Spenser. Our old poet Gower uses the word for delicates or dainties, in which sense also Cotgrave renders the French word délices. Our word, in modern times, has been adopted in Spenser's general sense of pleasure.

Delices
For all the meats, and all the spices. Gower, Conf. Am. B. 6.

And now he has pour'd out his idle mind
In dainty delices and lavish joys,
Having his warlike weapons cast behind,
And flowers in pleasures vain and pleasing toys. Spenser, F. Q.

And it was seated in an island strong,
Abounding all with delices most rare. Spenser, F. Q.

Zehra, with all its delices, is erased from the face of the earth. Swinburne, Trav. through Spain, L. 34.

To DELI'CIATE.* v. n. [low Lat. delicior.] To take delight; to feast.

When Flora is disposed to deliciate with her minions, the rose is her Adonis. Partheneia Sacra, (1633,) p. 18.

These evil demons did, as it were, deliciate and epicurize in them. Hallywell, Melampr. p. 101.

DELI'CIOUS.† adj. [delicieux, French; bas Bret. delicius; low Lat. deliciosus, from delicium.] Sweet; delicate; that affords delight; agreeable; charming; grateful to the sense or mind.

It is highly probable, that upon Adam's disobedience Almighty God chased him out of paradise, the fairest and most delicious part of the earth, into some other the most barren and unpleasant. Woodward.

In his last hours his easy wit display;
Like the rich fruit he sings, delicious in decay. Smith.

Still on that breast enamour'd let me lie,
Still drink delicious poison from thy eye. Pope.

DELI'CIOUSLY.† adv. [from delicious.] Sweetly; pleasantly; delightfully; daintily.

How much she hath glorified herself and lived deliciously, so much torment and sorrow give her. Rev. xviii. 7.

Swarming next appear'd
The female bee, that feeds her husband drone
Deliciously. Milton, P. L.

Who fed deliciously, now sit forlorn. Sandys, Lament. ch. 4.

Plynillimon's dear child, deliciously array'd. Drayton, Polyolb. S. 6.

Men began to adorn themselves sumptuously to shew their pride,—and fared deliciously to surfeiting and drunkenness. Hammond's Works, i. 654.

DELI'CIOUSNESS. n. s. [from delicious.] Delight; pleasure; joy. Not often found in the plural number.

The sweetest honey
Is loathsome in its own deliciousness,
And in the taste confounds the appetite. Shaksp.

Let no man judge of himself, or of the blessings and efficacy of the sacrament itself, by any sensible relish, by the gust and deliciousness, which he sometimes perceives, and other times does not perceive. Bp. Taylor.

The pleasures and first deliciousnesses of religion. Bp. Taylor, Serm. 1651, p. 155.

DELIGA'TION. n. s. [deligatio, Latin.] A binding up in chirurgery.

The third intention is deligation, or retaining the parts so joined together. Wiseman, Surg.

DELI'GHT.† n. s. [old French, delit; from delector, Lat. Our own word was formerly written delite.]

1. Joy; content; satisfaction.

Saul commanded his servants, saying, commune with David secretly, and say, Behold the king hath delight in thee, and all his servants love thee. 1 Sam. xviii. 22.

2. That which gives delight.

Come, sisters, chear we up his sprights,
And shew the best of our delights:
We'll charm the air to give a sound,
While you perform your antick round. Shaksp.

Titus Vespasian was not more the delight of human kind: the universal empire made him only more known, and more powerful, but could not make him more beloved. Dryden.

She was his care, his hope, and his delight;
Most in his thoughts and ever in his sight. Dryd.

To DELI'GHT.† v. a. [here again, the hitherto disregarded old French offers itself; deliter, "se plaire, delectari." Lacombe. See DELIGHT.] To please; to content; to satisfy; to afford pleasure.

The princes delighting their conceits with confirming their knowledge, seeing wherein the sea-discipline differed from the land-service, had pleasing entertainment. Sidney.

Delight thyself also in the Lord, and he shall give thee the desires of thine heart. Psalm xxxvii. 4.

Poor insects, whereof some are bees, delighted with flowers, and their sweetness; others beetles, delighted with other kinds of viands. Locke.

He heard, he took, and pouring down his throat,
Delighted, swill'd the large luxurious draught. Pope.

To DELI'GHT. v. n. To have delight or pleasure in. It is followed by in.

Doth my lord, the king, delight in this thing. 2 Sam. xxiv.

Blessed is the man that feareth the Lord, that delighteth greatly in his commandments. Psalm cxii. 1.

DELI'GHTER.* n. s. [from delight.] One who has delight or pleasure in a thing.

We should, concerning the author of the report, consider whether he be not ill humoured, or a delighter in telling bad stories. Barrow, Serm. i. 250.

DELI'GHTFUL. adj. [from delight and full.] Pleasant; charming; full of delight.

He was given to sparing in so immeasurable sort, that he did not only bar himself from the delightful, but almost from the necessary use thereof. Sidney.

No Spring nor Summer on the mountain seen,
Smiles with gay fruits, or with delightful green.
Addison.

DELI'GHTFULLY. adv. Pleasantly; charmingly; with delight.

O voice! once heard
Delightfully, Increase and multiply;
Now death to hear. Milton, P. L.

DELI'GHTFULNESS. n. s. [from delight.] Pleasure; comfort; satisfaction.

But our desires' tyrannical extortion
Doth force us there to set our chief delightfulness,
Where but a baiting-place is all our portion.
Sidney.

This indeed shews the excellency of the object, but doth not altogether take away the delightfulness of the knowledge. Tillotson.

DELI'GHTLESS.* adj. [from delight.] Wanting delight; being without any thing to cheer the mind.

Winter oft at eve resumes the breeze,
Chills the pale morn, and bids his driving sheets
Deform the day delightless. Thomson, Spring.

DELI'GHTSOME. adj. [from delight.] Pleasant; delightful.

The words themselves being so ancient, the knitting of them so short and intricate, and the whole periods and compass of his speech so delightsome for the roundness, and so grave for the strangeness. Spenser, on Ireland.

God has furnished every one with the same means of exchanging hunger and thirst for delightsome vigour. Grew.

DELI'GHTSOMELY.† adv. [from delightsome.] Pleasantly; in a delightful manner. Sherwood.

DELI'GHTSOMENESS.† n. s. [from delightsome.] Pleasantness; delightfulness.

The delightsomeness of our dwellings shall not be envied. Wheatly's Schools of the Proph. Serm. Oxf. 1721, p. 38.

DELI'NEAMENT.* n. s. [from the Lat. delineo.] Painting; representation by delineation.

Princes, being supreme judges of honour and nobility, may arbitrarily change their arms in name and nature: — and it seems, it hath been taken indifferently, whether you call them the one or other, both for similitude of delineaments and composture. Selden on Drayton's Polyolb. S. 11.

The sun's a type of that eternal light
Which we call God, a fair delineament
Of that which Good in Plato's school is hight.
More, Song of the Soul, iii. 11.

To DELI'NEATE. v. a. [delineo, Lat.]

1. To make the first draught of a thing; to design; to sketch.
2. To paint; to represent a true likeness in a picture.

The licentia pictoria is very large: with the same reason they may delineate old Nestor like Adonis, Hecuba with Helen's face, and Time with Absalom's head. Brown.

3. To describe; to set forth in a lively manner.

It followeth to delineate the region, in which God first planted his delightful garden. Ralegh.

I have not here time to delineate to you the glories of God's heavenly kingdom; nor indeed, could I tell you, if I had, what the happiness of that place and portion is. Wake.

DELINEA'TION. n. s. [delineatio, Lat.] The first draught of a thing.

In the orthographical schemes there should be a true delineation, and the just dimensions. Mortimer.

DELI'NEATURE.* n. s. [Fr. delineature.] Delineation. Cotgrave, and Sherwood.

DELI'NIMENT. n. s. [delinimentum, Lat.] A mitigating, or assuaging. Dict.

DELI'NQUENCY. n. s. [delinquentia, Lat.] A fault; a failure in duty; a misdeed.

They never punish the greatest and most intolerable delinquency of the tumults, and their exciters. King Charles.

Can
Thy years determine like the age of man,
That thou should'st my delinquencies exquire,
And with variety of tortures tire?
Sandy, Paraphr. of Job.

A delinquent ought to be cited in the place or jurisdiction where the delinquency was committed by him. Ayliffe.

DELI'NQUENT. n. s. [from delinquens, Lat.] An offender; one that has committed a crime or fault.

Such an envious state,
That sooner will accuse the magistrate
Than the delinquent; and will rather grieve
The treason is not acted, than believe. B. Jonson.

All ruined, not by war, or any other disaster, but by justice and sentence, as delinquents and criminals. Bacon.

He had, upon frivolous surmises, been sent for as a delinquent, and been brought upon his knees. Dryden.

To DE'LIQUATE. v. n. [deliqueo, Lat.] To melt; to be dissolved.

It will be resolved into a liquor very analogous to that which the chymists make of salt of tartar, left in moist cellars to deliquate. Boyle.

To DE'LIQUATE.* v. a. To dissolve.

Such an ebullition as we see made by the mixture of some chymical liquors; as oil of vitriol, and deliquated salt of tartar. Cudworth.

Not because urine discharges and abrades colours, as the lixivia of tartar, or the deliquated salts of tartar do. Sir W. Petty, in Sprat's Hist. R.S. p. 292.

DELIQUA'TION. n. s. [deliquatio, Lat.] A melting; a dissolving.

DELI'QUIUM.† n. s. [Latin.]

1. A chymical term. A distillation by dissolving any calcined matter, by hanging it up in moist cellars, into a lixivious humour. Dict.

When salt of tartar flows per deliquium, it is visible that the particles of water floating in the air are moved towards the particles of salt, and joined with them. Bp. Berkeley, Siris, § 235.

2. A fainting, or swooning. This common acceptation of the word in our language, from the Latin, is wholly unnoticed by Dr. Johnson.

If he be locked in a close room, he is afraid of being stifled for want of air; and still carries bisket, aquavitæ, or some strong waters, about him, for fear of deliquiums, or being sick. Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 181.

Their conscience was not stark dead, but under a kind of spiritual apoplexy, or deliquium. South, Serm. ii. 454.

3. Defect; loss. This meaning also has escaped Dr. Johnson's observation.

All-idolizing worms, that thus could crowd
And urge their sun into thy cloud;
Forcing his sometimes eclips'd face to be
A long deliquium to the light of thee.
Crashaw, Poems, p. 156.

With these must be reckoned some sudden intercisions of the light of the sun, occasioned not by the veil of an eclipse cast before it, but some unaccountable passion of the luminous body itself. Such a deliquium we read of immediately subsequent to the death of Cæsar. Spenser on Prodigies, p. 234.

DELI'RAMENT.† n. s. [deliramentum, Lat.] A doting or foolish fancy. Written also delirement.

Of whose delirements (Mahomet's) further I proceed. Heywood's Hierarch. of Angels, 1635, p. 285.

DELI'RANCY. n. s. [delirans, Lat.] Folly; dotage.

Extasies of delirancy and dotage, that bring men first to strange fancies; — then to vent either nonsense or blasphemous and scurrilous extravagancies. Bp. Ganden, Serm. at the Funeral of Bp. Brownrig, 8vo. 1660, p. 57.

To DELI'RATE.† v. n. [deliro, Lat.] To dote; to rave; to talk or act idly. Cockeram.

DELIRA'TION.† n. s. [deliratio, Lat.] Dotage; folly; madness. Cockeram.

The masters of physick tell us of two kinds of deliration or alienation of the understanding. Mede, Disc. 1642, p. 122.

DELI'RIOUS. adj. [delirius, Latin.] Light-headed; raving; doting.

The people about him said he had been some hours delirious; but when I saw him he had his understanding as well as ever I knew. Swift.

On bed
Delirious flung, sleep from his pillow flies.
Thomson.

DELI'RIOUSNESS.* n. s. [from delirious.] The state of one raving, or light-headed.

Bolingbroke sometimes wept over him in this state of helpless decay; and being told by Spence, that Pope, at the intermission of his deliriousness, was always saying something kind either of his present or absent friends, and that his humanity seemed to have survived his understanding, answered, "It has so." Johnson, Life of Pope.

DELI'RIUM. n. s. [Latin.] Alienation of mind; dotage.

Too great alacrity and promptness in answering, especially in persons naturally of another temper, is the sign of an approaching delirium; and in a feverish delirium there is a small inflammation of the brain. Arbuthnot on Diet.

DELITE'SCENCE.* n. s. [old French delitescence, which Lacombe defines "une retraite, solitude;" and which Cotgrave renders, "a lurking or lying hidden." Lat. delitescentia. Delitescence has found no place in our vocabularies, but it has been observed to me, has been adopted by our great lexicographer himself.] Retirement; obscurity.

Every man has those about him, who wish to sooth him into inactivity and delitescence. Johnson.

To DELI'TIGATE.* v. a. [Lat. delitigo.] To scold; to chide vehemently. Cockeram.

DELITIGA'TION.† n. s. [from To delitigate.] A striving; a chiding; a contending. Dict.

To DELI'VER. v. a. [delivrer, Fr.]

1. To set free; to release.

Thus she the captive did deliver;
The captive thus gave up his quiver. Prior.

2. To save; to rescue.

Deliver me, O my God, out of the hand of the wicked, out of the hand of the unrighteous and cruel man. Psalm lxxi. 4.

I was like to be apprehended for the witch of Brainford: but that my admirable dexterity of wit, counterfeiting the action of an old woman, delivered me. Shakspeare.

3. To surrender; to put into one's hands; to resign; to give up; to yield.

In any case thou shalt deliver him the pledge again when the sun goeth down. Deut. xxiv. 12.

And David said to him, canst thou bring me down to this company? And he said, swear unto me by God, that thou wilt neither kill me, nor deliver me into the hands of my master, and I will bring thee down to this company. 1 Sam.

They obeyed not thy commandments, wherefore thou hast delivered us for a spoil, and unto captivity. Tob. iii. 4.

4. To give; to offer; to present.

Now therefore receive no more money of your acquaintance, but deliver it for the breaches of the house. 2 Kings.

Thou shalt deliver Pharaoh's cup into his hand, after the former manner, when thou wast his butler. Gen. xl. 13.

It was no wonder that they, who at such a time could be corrupted to frame and deliver such a petition, would not be reformed by such an answer. Dryden.

5. To cast away; to throw off.

Charm'd with that virtuous draught, th' exalted mind
All sense of woe delivers to the wind. Pope.

6. To disburden a woman of a child.

On her fright and fears
She is something before her time deliver'd. Shaks.

Tully was long ere he could be delivered of a few verses, and those poor ones too. Peacham.

7. To speak; to tell; to relate; to utter; to pronounce.

A mirth-moving jest,
Which his fair tongue, conceit's expositor,
Delivers in such apt and gracious words,
That aged ears play truant at his tales. Shakspeare.

Tell me your highness' pleasure;
What from your grace I shall deliver to him. Shakspeare.

I knew a clergyman who appeared to deliver his sermon without looking into his notes. Swift.

8. To exert in motion. Not in use.

Procles seemed so to overrun his age in strength, that Musidorus could not perform any action on horse or foot more strongly, or deliver that strength more nimbly. Sidney.

To DELI'VER over. v. a.

1. To put into another's hands; to leave to the discretion of another.

Deliver me not over unto the will of mine enemies; for false witnesses are risen up against me, and such as breathe out cruelty. Ps. xxvii. 12.

The constables have delivered her over to me, and she shall have whipping enough, I warrant her. Shakspeare.

2. To give from hand to hand; to transmit.

If a true account may be expected by future ages from the present, your lordship will be delivered over to posterity in a fairer character than I have given. Dryden.

To DELI'VER up. v. a. To surrender; to give up.

He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not, with him also, freely give us all things? Rom. viii. 32.

Are the cities that I got with wounds,
Deliver'd up again with peaceful words? Shaksp.

Happy having such a son,
That would deliver up his greatness so
Into the hand of justice. Shakspeare.

DELI'VER.* adj. [old French, delivre, from the Lat. liber.] Nimble; free; active. Perhaps the parent of our word clever. See CLEVER. This word, with the adverb deliverly and the substantive deliverness formed from it, and found in our old poetry, has ceased to be in use since the time of Spenser.

Of his stature he was of even length,
And wonderly deliver, and grete of strength. Chaucer, C. T. Prol.

"He was so wimble and wight,
"From bough to bough he lepped light" —
Wimble and wight, quicke and deliver. E. K. on Spenser's Shep. Cal. March.

DELI'VERLY.* adv. Nimbly. See DELIVER.

DELI'VERNESS.* n. s. Agility. See DELIVER. What we now term delivery. See the 5th sense of DELIVERY.

DELI'VERANCE. n. s. [delivrance, Fr.]

1. The act of freeing from captivity, slavery, or any oppression; rescue.

He hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty those that are bound. Luke, iv. 18.

O God, command deliverances for Jacob. Ps. xliv. 4.

Whate'er befalls, your life shall be my care;
One death or one deliv'rance we will share. Dryden.

2. The act of delivering a thing to another: now commonly called delivery.

3. The act of bringing children.

Ne'er mother
Rejoic'd deliverance more. Shakspeare.

People have a superstitious belief, that in the labour of women it helpeth to the easy deliverance. Bacon.

4. The act of speaking; utterance; pronunciation: now commonly delivery.

If seriously I may convey my thoughts
In this my light deliverance, I have spoke
With one, that in her sex, her years profession,
Wisdom and constancy, hath amaz'd me more
Than I dare blame my weakness.
Shakspeare, All's well that ends well.

DELI'VERER.† n. s. [Fr. delivreur.]

1. A saver; a rescuer; a preserver; a releaser.

It doth notably set forth the consent of all nations and ages, in the approbation of the extirpating and debellating of giants, monsters and foreign tyrants, not only as lawful, but as meritorious even of divine honour; and this, although the deliverer came from the one end of the world unto the other. Bacon.

By that seed
Is meant thy great Deliverer, who shall bruise
The serpent's head. Milton, P. L.

Andrew Doria has a statue erected to him at the entrance of the doge's palace, with the glorious title of deliverer of the commonwealth. Addison.

Him their deliverer Europe does confess,
All tongues extol him, all religions bless. Halifax.

2. A relater; one that communicates something by speech or writing.

Divers chymical experiments, delivered by sober authors, have been believed false, only because the menstruum were not as highly rectified, or exquisitely depurated, as those that were used by the deliverers of those experiments. Boyle.

What we call the Irish brogue, is no sooner discovered, than it makes the deliverer, in the last degree, ridiculous and despised; and from such a mouth an Englishman expects nothing but bulls, blunders, and follies. Swift on Barb. Denom. in Irel.

DELI'VERY. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. The act of delivery.

2. Release; rescue; saving.

He swore with sobs,
That he would labour my delivery. Shakspeare.

3. A surrender; act of giving up.

After the delivery of your royal father's person into the hands of the army, I undertaking to the queen mother, that I would find some means to get access to him, she was pleased to send me. Denham.

Nor did he in any degree contribute to the delivery of his house, which was at first imagined, because it was so ill, or not at all defended. Clarend.

4. Utterance; pronunciation; speech.

We allege what the scripture themselves do usually speak, for the saving force of the word of God, not with restraint to any certain kind of delivery, but howsoever the same shall chance to be made known. Hooker.

I was charmed with the gracefulness of his figure and delivery, as well as with his discourses. Addison.

5. Use of the limbs; activity.

Musidorus could not perform any action on horse or foot more strongly, or deliver that strength more nimbly, or become the delivery more gracefully, or employ all more virtuously. Sidney.

The earl was a pretty deal the taller, and much the stronger; — but the Duke had the neater limbs, and freer delivery. Wotton, of the E. of Essex.

6. Childbirth.

Like as a woman with child, that draweth near the time of her delivery, is in pain and crieth out. Isa. xxvi. 7.

DELL.† n. s. [from dal, Dutch. See DALE.] A pit; a hole in the ground; any cavity in the earth, wider than a ditch and narrower than a valley. Obsolete, Dr. Johnson says. But this is not the case, for dell is yet used in the north of England for a little dale.

The while, the same unhappy ewe,
Whose clouted leg her hurt doth shew,
Fell headlong into a dell. Spenser.

No more the company of fresh fair maids
And wanton shepheards be to me delightful,
Nor the shrill pleasing sound of merry pipes
Under some shady dell, when the cool wind
Plays on the leaves. Fletcher, Faithful Shepherdess.

I know each lane and every alley green,
Dingle or bushy dell of this wild wood.
Milton, Comus.

But foes to sun-shine, most they took delight
In dells and dales, conceal'd from human sight.
Tickell.

DELPH. n. s. [from Delft, the name of the capital of Delftland.] A fine sort of earthenware. See DELF.

A supper worthy of herself;
Five nothings in five plates of delph. Swift.

DE'LTOIDE. adj. [from delta, the fourth letter of the Greek alphabet; so called by reason of its resembling this letter.] An epithet applied to a triangular muscle arising from the clavicula, and from the process of the same, whose action is to raise the arm upward.

Cut still more of the deltoide muscle, and carry the arm backward. Sharp's Surgery.

DELU'DABLE. adj. [from delude.] Liable to be deceived; that is easily imposed on: rather deludible.

Not well understanding omniscience, he is not so ready to deceive himself as to falsify unto him whose cogitation is no ways deludable. Brown, Vulg. Err.

To DELU'DE.† v. a. [deludo, Lat.]

1. To beguile; to cheat; to deceive; to impose on.

O, give me leave, I have deluded you;
'Twas neither Charles, nor yet the duke.
Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

Let not the Trojans, with a feign'd pretence
Of proffer'd peace, delude the Latian prince.
Dryden.

2. To disappoint; to frustrate.

Many and sundry waies I have sought,
To have the Word of God deluded utterly;
Oh, for sorrow! yet it will not be.
Old Morality of Lusty Juventus.

DELU'DER. n. s. [from delude.] A be-guiler; a deceiver; an impostor; a cheat; a false pretender.

Say, flatterer, say, all fair deluder speak;
Answer me this, ere yet my heart does break.
Granville.

And thus the sweet deluders tune their song.
Pope.

DELU'DING.* n. s. [from delude.] Collusion; falsehood.

Annanias and Sapphira's dainty deludings with a smooth lie. Bp. Prideaux, Euch. p. 228.

To DELVE.† v. a. [belpan, Sax. delven, Dut. perhaps from δελφαξ, a hog. Junius. So far Dr. Johnson. The Sax. bebelpan is to bury; and therefore Serenius's references to the Goth. dalf, a subterranean place, is preferable.]

1. To dig; to open the ground with a spade.

It shall go hard
But I will delve one yard below the mines,
And blow them at the moon. Shakspeare.

I may, in digging and delving after it, mix earth, and dirt, and rubbish, with silver and gold, and precious stones.
Smith, Portr. of Old Age, p. 250.

Delve of convenient depth your threshing floor;
With temper'd clay, then fill and face it o'er.
Dryden.

The filthy swine, with delving snout
The rooted forest undermine. Phillips.

2. To fathom; to sift; to sound one's opinion. Figuratively.

What's his name and birth?
— I cannot delve him to the root: his father
Was call'd Sicillius. Shakspeare.

DELVE. n. s. [from the verb.] A ditch; a pit; a pitful; a den; a cave.

He by and by
His feeble feet directed to the cry;
Which to that shady delve him brought at last,
Where Mammon erst did sun his treasury.
Spenser, F. Q.

Such a light and metall'd dance
Saw you never yet in France;
And by leadmen, for the nonce,
That turn round like grindle-stones,
Which they dig out fro' the delves,
For the bairns bread, wives and selves. B. Jonson.

DELVE of Coals. A certain quantity of coals dug in the mine or pit. Dict.

DE'LVER.† n. s. [Sax. belpere.] A digger; one that opens the ground with a spade.

Delvers and ditchers. Vis. of P. Plowman.

The delver, bound and clogg'd in clouted buskin, sings;
By untaught tunes his heavier task to easier pass he brings. Fotherby, Atheom. p. 334.

DE'LUGE. n. s. [deluge, Fr. from diluvium, Lat.]

1. A general inundation; laying entirely under water.

The apostle doth plainly intimate, that the old world was subject to perish by a deluge, as this is subject to perish by conflagration. Burnet, Theory.

2. An overflowing of the natural bounds of a river.

But if with bays and dams they strive to force
His channel to a new or narrow course,
No longer then within his banks he dwells,
First to a torrent, then a deluge swells. Denham.

3. Any sudden and resistless calamity.

To DE'LUGE. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To drown; to lay totally under water.

The restless flood the land would overflow,
By which the delug'd earth would useless grow.
Blackmore.

Still the battering waves rush in
Implacable, till delug'd by the foam
The ship sinks, found'ring in the vast abyss.
Philips.

2. To overwhelm; to cause to sink under the weight of any calamity.

At length corruption, like a general flood,
Shall deluge all. Pope.

To DE'LUGE.* v. n. To become a deluge.

I'd weep the world to such a strain,
That it should deluge once again.
Marq. of Montrose on the Death of K. Ch. I.

DELU'SION.† n. s. [delusio, Lat.]

1. The act of deluding; a cheat; guile; deceit; treachery; fraud; collusion; falsehood.

And for this cause God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie.
2 Thess. ii. 11.

Give thy fond arts, and thy delusions o'er.
Rowe, Jane Shore.

2. The state of one deluded.

3. A false representation; illusion; errour; a chimerical thought.

Who therefore seeks in these
True wisdom, finds her not, or by delusion,
Far worse, her false resemblance only meets.
Milton, P. R.

I waking, view'd with grief the rising sun,
And fondly mourn'd the dear delusion gone. Prior.

DELU'SIVE. adj. [from delusus, Lat.] Apt to deceive; beguiling; imposing on.

When, fir'd with passion, we attack the fair,
Delusive sighs and brittle vows we bear. Prior.

The happy whimsey you pursue,
Till you at length believe it true;
Caught by your own delusive art,
You fancy first, and then assert. Prior.

While the base and groveling multitude were listening to the delusive deities, those of a more erect aspect and exalted spirit separated themselves from the rest. Tatler, No. 81.

Phænomena so delusive, that it is very hard to escape imposition and mistake. Woodward.

DELU'SORY.† adj. [from delusus, Lat.] Apt to deceive.

Such intercession is delusory and hypocritical.
Bp. Barlow, Rem. p. 187.

This confidence is founded on no better foundation than a delusory prejudice. Glanville.

He thinks all the world besides are cheated with other delusory ideas.
Baxter, Enq. into the Nature of the Soul, ii. 271.

DE'MAGOGUE.† n. s. [Gr. δημαγωγός, from δῆμος, the people, and ἀγωγὸς, a leader; Fr. demagogue. But neither our own nor the French word can be said to be of any great age. Demagogue is not in the edition of Cotgrave in 1632. Milton, in his Eiconoclastes, as Mr. Malone observes with me, speaks of our word as being first introduced in the Eicon Basiliké; and suspects from its introduction, I know not why, that the work was not written by K. Charles.] A ringleader of the rabble; a popular and factious orator.

Who were the chief demagogues and patrons of tumults, to send for them, to flatter and embolden them. King Charles.

A plausible, insignificant word, in the mouth of an expert demagogue, is a dangerous and dreadful weapon. South, Serm. ii. 333.

Demosthenes and Cicero, though each of them a leader, or, as the Greeks called it, a demagogue, in a popular state, yet seem to differ in their practice. Swift.

DEMA'IN.† DEME'AN. DEME'SNE. } n. s. [domaine, French, Dr. Johnson says. Our own word, I may add, is properly, perhaps, domain. The other methods of spelling may have been adopted from the old Fr. demesne, demaigne, and demaine. Perhaps the third meaning should be always written demesne, from mesnie, old Fr. derived from the Lat. mansio.

1. That land which a man holds originally of himself, called dominium by the civilians, and opposed to feodum, or fee, which signifies those that are held of a superior lord. It is sometimes used also for a distinction between those lands that the lord of the manor has in his own hands, or in the hands of his lessee, demised or let upon a rent for a term of years or life, and such other lands appertaining to the said manor as belong to free or copyholders. Philips.

2. Estate in land.

Having now provided
A gentleman of noble parentage,
Of fair demesnes, youthful, and nobly allied. Shaks.

That earldom indeed had a royal jurisdiction and seigniory, though the lands of that county in demesne were possessed for the most part by the ancient inheritors. Davies.

3. Land adjoining to the mansion, kept in the lord's own hand.

Those acts for planting forest-trees have hitherto been wholly ineffectual, except about the demesnes of a few gentlemen; and even there, in general, very unskilfully made. Swift.

To DEMA'ND. v. a. [demander, Fr.]

1. To claim; to ask for with authority.

The pound of flesh, which I demand of him,
Is dearly bought, 'tis mine, and I will have it.
Shakspeare.

2. To question; to interrogate.

And when Uriah was come unto him, David demanded of him how Joab did, and how the people did, and how the war prospered? 2 Sam. xi. 7.

If any friend of Cæsar's demand why Brutus rose against Cæsar, this is my answer: Not that I loved Cæsar less, but that I loved Rome more.
Shakspeare.

Young one,
Inform us of thy fortunes; for it seems,
They crave to be demanded. Shakspeare.

The oracle of Apollo being demanded, when the war and misery of Greece should have an end, reply'd, When they would double the altar in Delos, which was of a cubick form.
Peacham on Geometry.

3. [In law.] To prosecute in a real action.

DEMA'ND.† n. s. [demande, French.]

1. A claim; a challenging; the asking of any thing with authority.

This matter is by the decree of the watchers, and the demand by the word of the holy ones.
Dan. iv. 17.

Giving vent, gives life and strength to our appetites; and he that has the confidence to turn his wishes into demands, will be but a little way from thinking he ought to obtain them. Locke.

2. A question; an interrogation.

I perceive, by this demand, you are not altogether of his counsel. Shakspeare, All's Well.

3. The calling for a thing in order to purchase it.

My bookseller tells me, the demand for those my papers, increases daily. Addison.

4. [In law.] The asking of what is due. It hath also a proper signification distinguished from plaint; for all civil actions are pursued either by demands or plaints, and the pursuer is called demandant or plaintiff. There are two manners of demands, the one of deed, the other in law: in deed, as in every præcipe, there is express demand: in law, as every entry in land-distress for rent, taking or seising of goods, and such like acts, which may be done without any words, are demands in law. Blount.

DEMA'NDABLE. adj. [from demand.] That may be demanded; requested; asked for.

All sums demandable, for licence of alienation to be made of lands holden in chief, have been stayed in the way to the hanaper. Bacon.

DEMA'NDANT. n. s. [from demand.]

1. One who is actor or plaintiff in a real action, because he demandeth lands. Coke.
2. A plaintiff; one that demands redress.

One of the witnesses deposed that dining on a Sunday with the demandant, whose wife had sat below the squire's lady at church, she the said wife dropped some expressions, as if she thought her husband ought to be knighted. Spectator.

DEMA'NDER.† n. s. [demandeur, Fr.]

1. One that requires a thing with authority.
2. One that asks a question.

Yet to so fair and courteous a demander,
That promises compassion, at worst pity,
I will relate a little of my story.
Beaum. and Fl. The Captain.

3. One that asks for a thing in order to purchase it.

They grow very fast and fat, which also bettereth their taste, and delivereth them to the demanders ready use at all seasons. Carew.

4. A dunner; one that demands a debt.

DEMA'NDERESS.* n. s. [Fr. demanderesse.] A woman that is a plaintiff or petitioner. Cotgrave.

*DEMARCA'TION. n. s. [French; but modern in that and our own language.] Division; separation of territory.

The speculative line of demarcation, where obedience ought to end, and resistance must begin, is faint, obscure, and not easily definable. Burke on the Fr. Revolution.

DEMA'RCH.* n. s. [old Fr. demarche.] Gait; march; walk.

Reason checks fancy in its most extravagant sallies, and imagination enlivens reason in its most solemn demarches. Collect. of Letters in the Lond. Journ. 1721. No. x.

DEME'AN.† n. s. [from the verb. Spenser sometimes writes the word, for the sake of the rhyme, demayne, as in the passage which Dr. Johnson had cited, without remarking it. But he copied from an inaccurate edition. I have therefore supplied the place of his imperfect example with one correct.] A mien; presence; carriage; demeanour; deportment.

The prince —
Pursu'd him streight; in mynd to ben ywroken
Of all the vile demeane and usage bad,
With which he had those two so ill bestad.
Spenser F. Q. vi. vi. 18.

To DEME'AN.† v. a. [Norm. French, demesner; "demesnez, demeaned themselves well." Kelham. Hence perhaps menager and demanager; whence our manage, that is, conduct, carriage, demeanour. See MANAGE.]

1. To behave; to carry one's self.

Those plain and legible lines of duty requiring us to demean ourselves to God humbly and devoutly, to our governours obediently, and to our neighbours justly, and to ourselves soberly and temperately. South.

A man cannot doubt but that there is a God; and that, according as he demeans himself towards him, he will make him happy or miserable for ever. Tillotson.

Strephon had long perplex'd his brains,
How with so high a nymph he might
Demean himself the wedding-night. Swift.

How shall we value and demean ourselves, if we know not ourselves? Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 38.

2. Not necessarily connected with self, as Dr. Johnson's preceding definition seems to confine the word; to behave.

Alas, good monsieur!
A' was a proper man, and fair demean'd,
A person worthy of a better temper.
Beaum. and Fl. Two Noble Gent.

A man is reasonably to be presumed to have in him a sufficient stock of self-love to serve the ends of his nature and creation; and that is, that man demean and use his own body in that decorum which is most orderly and proportionate to his perfective end of a happy life. Bp. Taylor, Life of Christ, Pref. § 12.

3. To lessen; to debase; to undervalue. The sense of the word in the passage from Shakspeare, which Dr. Johnson cites as a solitary example of it as used according to this definition, is dubious. But the word was certainly used in the time of Shakspeare, as it has been since by an excellent writer, in this sense.

Now, out of doubt, Antipholis is mad;
Else he would never so demean himself. Shaksp.

According to his manhood, the son of king David; but yet, in his birth and life and death, far demeaned beneath all kingly state. Dr. Abbot, of the Kingdom of Christ, 1601. p. 5.

Peter was so affected at his condescending to perform such a mean office, that he says to him, Lord, dost thou go about to wash my feet? It is a thousand times fitter, that I should wash thine; nor can I bear to see thee demean thyself thus. Doddridge, Fam. Expos. § 169.

4. To treat; to use in a bad manner. Obsolete.

That mighty man did her demeane
With all the evil terms, and cruell meane,
That he could make. Spenser, F. Q. vi. vii. 39.

DEME'ANOUR.† n. s. [from To demean. Formerly written also demeanure.] Carriage; behaviour.

Of so insupportable a pride he was, that where his deeds might well stir envy, his demeanour did rather breed disdain. Sidney.

Angels best like us, when we are most like unto them in all parts of decent demeanour. Hooker.

Giving order for the decent demeanure of the Corinthian women in the congregation. Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 105.

His gestures fierce
He mark'd, and mad demeanour, then alone,
As he suppos'd, all unobserv'd, unseen. Milton, P. L.

Thus Eve, with sad demeanour meek,
Ill worthy I. Milton, P. L.

He was of a courage not to be daunted, which was manifested in all his actions, especially in his whole demeanour at Rhee, both at the landing, and upon the retreat. Clarendon.

DEME'ANS. n. s. pl. properly demesnes. An estate in lands; that which a man possesses in his own right.

DEME'ANURE.* n. s. Behaviour. See DEMEANOUR. Barret.

DE'MENCY.* n. s. [old Fr. demence, Lat. dementia.] Madness. Cockeram.

The kyng his clemency
Dispenseth with his demency. Skelton, Poems, p. 161.

To DEME'NTATE.† v. a. [old Fr. dementer, "tomber en demence," Lacombe; Lat. demento.] To make mad.

This mystery of iniquity began to work even in the apostles' time; many antichrists and hereticks were abroad; many sprung up since; many now present, and will be, to the world's end, to dementate men's minds, to seduce and captivate their souls. Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 673.

DEME'NTATE.* adj. [from the verb.] Infatuated; insane.

Arise, thou dementate sinner, and come to judgment! Hammond, Works, iv. 522.

DEMENTA'TION.† n. s. [dementatio, Lat.] Making mad, or frantick.

Supposing the distemper under command from breaking out into any other sins besides its own dementation or stupidity. Whitlock, Mann. of the English, p. 512.

DEME'RIT. n. s. [demérite, Fr. from demeritus, of demereor, Latin.]

1. The opposite to merit; ill-deserving; what makes one worthy of blame or punishment.

They should not be able once to stir, or to murmur, but it should be known, and they shortened according to their demerits. Spenser on Ireland.

Thou liv'st by me; to me thy breath resign;
Mine is the merit, the demerit thine. Dryden.

Whatever they acquire by their industry or ingenuity should be secure, unless forfeited by any demerit or offence against the custom of the family. Temple.

2. Anciently the same with merit; desert.

I fetch my life and being
From men of royal siege; and my demerits
May speak, unbonnetting, to as proud a fortune
As this that I have reach'd. Shakspeare, Othello.

To DEME'RIT.† v. a. [demeriter, Fr.] To depreciate; to deprive of merit; to blame.

Faith by her own dignity and worthiness doth not demerit justice and righteousness. Bp. Woolton's Christ. Manual, § 1576. sign. c. iv.

DEME'RSED. adj. [from demersus, of demergo, Lat.] Plunged; drowned. Dict.

DEME'RSION. n. s. [demersio, Lat.]

1. A drowning.
2. [In chymistry.] The putting any medicine in a dissolving liquor. Dict.

DEME'SNE. See DEMAIN.

DE'MI.† inseparable particle. [demi, Fr. dimidium, Lat.] Half; one of two equal parts. This word is only used in composition; as demigod, that is, half human, half divine, Dr. Johnson says. But Demy has been adopted, without the aid of composition. See DEMY.

DEMI-CANNON. n. s. [demi and cannon.]

DEMI-CANNON Lowest. A great gun that carries a ball of thirty pounds weight and six inches in diameter. The diameter of the bore is six inches two eighth parts. Dict.

DEMI-CANNON Ordinary. A great gun six inches four eights diameter in the bore, twelve foot long. It carries a shot six inches one sixth diameter, and thirty-two pounds weight. Dict.

DEMI-CANNON of the greatest Size. A gun six inches and six eighth parts diameter in the bore, twelve foot long. It carries a ball of six inches five eights diameter, and thirty-six pounds weight. Dict.

What! this a sleeve? 'tis like a demi-cannon. Shakspeare.

Ten engines, that shall be of equal force either to a cannon or demi-cannon, culverin or demi-culverin, may be framed at the same price that one of these will amount to. Wilkins.

DEMI-CULVERIN. n. s. [demi and culverin.]

DEMI-CULVERIN of the lowest Size. A gun four inches two eights diameter in the bore, and ten foot long. It carries a ball four inches diameter, and nine pounds weight. Dict.

DEMI-CULVERIN Ordinary. A gun four inches four eights diameter in the bore, ten foot long. It carries a ball four inches two eights diameter, and ten pounds eleven ounces weight.

DEMI-CULVERIN, Elder Sort. A gun four inches and six eights diameter in the bore, ten foot one third in length. It carries a ball four inches four eight parts diameter, and twelve pounds eleven ounces weight. Milit. Dict.

They continue a perpetual volley of demi-culverins. Ralegh.

The army left two demi-culverins, and two other good guns. Clarendon.

DEMI-DEVIL. n. s. [demi and devil.] Partaking of infernal nature; half a devil.

Will you, I pray, demand that demi-devil,
Why he hath thus ensnar'd my soul and body?
Shakspeare, Othello.

DEMI-GOD. n. s. [demi and god.] Partaking of divine nature; half a god; an hero produced by the cohabitation of divinities with mortals.

He took his leave of them, whose eyes bade him farewel with tears, making temples to him as to a demi-god. Sidney.

Be gods, or angels, demi-gods. Milton, P. L.

Transported demi-gods stood round,
And men grew heroes at the sound,
Enflam'd with glory's charms. Pope.

Nay, half in heaven, except (what's mighty odd)
A fit of vapours clouds this demi-god. Pope.

DEMI-LANCE. n. s. [demi and lance.] A light lance; a short spear; a half-pike.

On their steel'd heads, their demi-lances wore
Small pennons, which their ladies' colours bore.
Dryden.

Light demi-lances from afar they throw,
Fasten'd with leathern thongs to gall the foe.
Dryden.

DEMI-MAN. n. s. [demi and man.] Half a man. A term of reproach.

We must adventure this battle, lest we perish by the complaints of this barking demi-man. Knolles.

DEMI-NATURED.* adj. [demi and nature.] Partaking half the nature of another animal.

I have seen myself, and serv'd against, the French,
And they can well on horseback: but this gallant
Had witchcraft in't; he grew unto his seat;
And to such wond'rous doing brought his horse,
As he had been incorps'd and demi-natur'd
With the brave beast. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

DEMI-PREMISES.* n. s. plur. [demi and premises.] Half premises.

They judge conclusions by demi-premises and half principles; they lay them in the balance, stript from those necessary material circumstances, which should give them weight, and by shew of falling uneven with the scale of most universal and abstracted rules, they pronounce that too high, which is not if they had the skill to weigh it. Hooker, Ecc. Pol. v. § 81.

DEMI-REP.* n. s. [demi, and an abbreviation of reputation.] A woman with half a reputation; suspected of unchastity, but not convicted.

The Sirens, those celebrated songstresses of Sicily, who were ranked among the demi-gods, as well as demi-reps of antiquity. Burney, Hist. of Mus. i. 306.

DEMI-WOLF. n. s. [demi and wolf.] Half a wolf; a mongrel dog between a dog and wolf. Lycisca.

Spaniels, curs,
Showghs, water-rugs, and demi-wolves, are 'cleped
All by the name of dogs. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

To DE'MIGRATE.* v. a. [Lat demigro. Our old word for emigrate.] To move from one place to another. Cockeram

DEMIGRA'TION.* n. s. [Lat. demigratio.] Change of habitation; emigration. Cockeram.

DEMI'SE.† n. s. [from demetre, demis, demise, Fr.] Death; decease. It is seldom used but in formal and ceremonious language, Dr. Johnson says. In fact, it is used only, as Mr. Mason also has observed, of a crowned head, or of the crown itself, which suffers a demise or transfer by the death of the wearer of it.

About a month before the demise of queen Anne, the author retired. Swift.

When we say the demise of the crown, we mean only, that in consequence of the disunion of the king's body natural from his body politick, the kingdom is transferred or demised to his successor. Blackstone.

To DEMI'SE. v. a. [demis, demise, Fr.] To grant at one's death; to grant by will; to bequeath.

My executors shall not have power to demise my lands to be purchased. Swift's Last Will.

DEMI'SS.* adj. [Lat. demissus.] Humble.

He downe descended, like a most demisse
And abject thrall, in fleshës frail attyre.
Spenser, Hymn of Heavenly Love.

DEMI'SSION.† n. s. [demissio, Lat.] Degradation; diminution of dignity; depression.

Depressions and demissions of the same mind. Partheneia Sacra, 1633, p. 12.

Inexorable rigour is worse than a lasche demission of sovereign authority. L'Estrange.

DEMI'SSIVE.* adj. [from demiss.] Submissive; humble.

They pray with demissive eyelids, and sitting with their knees deflected under them, to shew their fear and reverence. Lord's Discov. of the Banians, 1630, p. 72.

DEMI'SSLY.* adv. [from demiss.] In an humble manner. Sherwood.

DE'MISSORY.* See DIMISSORY.

To DEMI'T.† v. a. [demitto, Lat.]

1. To depress; to hang down; to let fall.

When they are in their pride, that is, advancing their train, if they decline their neck to the ground, they presently demit and let fall the same. Brown, Vulg. Err.

2. To submit; to humble.

Nature has taught her [the soul] to sneak, when she, being heaven-born, demits herself to such earthly drudgery. Norris, Lett. to More.

DEMO'CRACY. n. s. [δημοκρατία.] One of the three forms of government; that in which the sovereign power is neither lodged in one man, nor in the nobles, but in the collective body of the people.

While many of the servants, by industry and virtue, arrive at riches and esteem, then the nature of the government inclines to a democracy. Temple.

The majority having the whole power of the community, may employ all that power in making laws; and executing those laws; and there the form of the government is a perfect democracy. Locke.

DE'MOCRAT.* } n. s. [from democraty.
DEMO'CRATIST. } Words introduced into our language, soon after the democratical French revolution.] One devoted to democracy.

He endeavours to crush the aristocratick party, and to nourish one in avowed connexion with the most furious democratists in France. Burke, Thoughts on French Affairs.

I would say to the most violent democrat in the kingdom, — Suppose the business done: after seas of blood have been shed, millions of lives lost, towns plundered, villages burned, the royal family exterminated, and unutterable calamity has been endured by persons of all ranks; — after all this has been done, what advantages will you have obtained beyond what you now possess? Bp. Llandaff, (Watson,) Charge in 1798, p. 19.

DEMOCRA'TICAL.† } adj. [Fr. democratique,
DEMOCRA'TICK. } Cotgrave.] Pertaining to a popular government; popular.

They are still within the line of vulgarity, and are democratical enemies to truth. Brown, Vulg. Err.

As the government of England has a mixture of democratical in it, so the right is partly in the people. Arbuthnot.

Here be it thine to calm and guide
The swelling democratick tide. Akenside.

It is a mere democratick body, unconnected with the crown or the kingdom. Burke on the Fr. Revolution.

DEMOCRA'TICALLY.* adv. [from democratical.] In a democratical manner.

This democratical embassy was democratically received. Alg. Sidney.

DEMO'CRATY.* n. s. [Gr. δημοκρατία, Fr. democratie. This is our old word for democracy, which Mr. Mason has asserted to be of Milton's coinage. But it existed long before Milton wrote, and is used by many good writers, though wholly unnoticed by Dr. Johnson, and confined to Milton by Mr. Mason. It is also in our old lexicography.] Democracy.

Forms of commonwealths, monarchies, aristocraties, democraties. Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 37.

A democraty is, where all the people have power authority sovereign. Ralegh, Arts of Empire, ch. 1.

Thence to the famous orators repair,
Those ancient, whose resistless eloquence
Wielded at will that fierce democratie.
Milton, P. R. iv. 269.

At this rate, Phalaris could not have spoken any dialect of the Greek tongue; for every one of them was the language of a democraty, some where or other. Boyle on Bentley's Diss. on Phalaris, p. 50.

To DEMO'LISH. v. a. [demolir, Fr. demolior, Lat.] To throw down buildings; to raze; to destroy.

I expected the fabrick of my book would long since have been demolished, and laid even with the ground. Tillotson.

Red lightning play'd along the firmament,
And their demolish'd works to pieces rent. Dryden.

DEMO'LISHER.† n. s. [from demolish.] One that throws down buildings; a destroyer; a layer waste.

Nor are these masters such batterers and demolishers of stately and elegant buildings.
Bp. Taylor, Artif. Hands. p. 185.

The builders too often prove the unhappy demolishers. Clem. Ellis, Serm. May 29. 1661, p. 11.

DEMO'LISHMENT.* n. s. [from demolish.] Ruin; destruction.

Look on his honour, sister,
That bears no stamp of time, no wrinkles on it,
No sad demolishment; nor death can reach it.
Beaum. and Fl. Mad Lover.

Though the outward lights of the soul may be closed up by the interposure of the body's ruins; that is, the capacity of discourse and expressions much darkened; yet those very demolishments may, as I may say, break out new lights upward.
W. Montagu, Ess. P. ii. p. 196.

DEMOLI'TION.† n. s. [Fr. demolition.] The act of overthrowing or demolishing buildings; destruction.

This man defies 'em still, threatens destruction
And demolition of their arms and worship.
Beaum. and Fl. Island Princess.

The devastation of our fruitful and pleasant villages; the demolition of our magnificent structures. Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 158.

Two gentlemen should have the direction in the demolition of Dunkirk. Swift.

DE'MON.† n. s. [dæmon, Lat. δαίμων, Gr. demon, Fr.] A spirit; generally an evil spirit; a devil. See DEMONSHIP.

Their Baalim were nothing else but demons, or deified ghosts of men deceased.
Mede, Apost. of Latter Times, p. 31.

I felt him strike, and now I see him fly:
Curs'd demon! O for ever broken lie
Those fatal shafts, by which I inward bleed. Prior.

DE'MONESS.* n. s. [from demon.] A pretended female divinity.

The Sichemites — had a goddess or demoness under the name of Jephthah's daughter.
Mede, Apost. of Latter Times, p. 31.

DEMONI'ACAL.† } adj. [Fr. demoniaque.]
DEMO'NIACK. }

1. Belonging to the devil; devilish.

He, all unarm'd,
Shall chase thee with the terror of his voice
From thy demoniack holds, possession foul.
Milton, P. R.

2. Influenced by the devil; produced by diabolical possession.

Demoniack phrensy, moping melancholy.
Milton, P. L.

Inchanted by some evil spirit, or demoniack water-nymph. Bp. Taylor, Artif. Handsom. p. 54.

This learned person gives a notable instance of demoniacal possession out of Fernelius, a very experienced physician, who was an eye-witness thereof. Hallywell, Melampr. p. 78.

DEMO'NIACK.† n. s. [from the adjective. One of our oldest substantives. "I hold him certain a demoniake." Chaucer, Sompn. Tale.] One possessed by the devil; one whose mind is disturbed and agitated by the power of wicked and unclean spirits.

Those lunaticks and demoniacks that were restored to their right mind, were such as sought after him, and believed in him. Bentley.

DEMO'NIAN. adj. [from demon.] Devilish; of the nature of devils.

Demonian spirits now, from the element
Each of his reign allotted, rightlier called Powers of fire, air, water. Milton, P. R.

DEMONO'CRACY. n. s. [δαίμων and κρατέω.] The power of the devil. Dict.

DEMONO'LATRY.† n. s. [Fr. demonolatrie, Gr. δαίμων and λάτρεια.] The worship of the devil. Dict.

Nicholaus Remigius, a man both pious and learned, in his books of demonolatrie, doth profess, within the space of sixteen years, to have had the examination of near 2000, whereof 900 were condemned to death.
Mer. Casaubon, of Credulity, p. 38.

DEMONO'LOGY.† n. s. [δαίμων and λόγος.] Discourse of the nature of devils. Thus King James entitled his book concerning witches.

I return you the manuscript you lent me of demonology. Howell, Lett. iii. 33.

This inchanter is of no note, nor do I find his name in any famous authors of demonology.
Gayton, Notes on D. Quix. i. 7.

DEMO'NOMIST.* n. s. [from demonomy.] One living in subjection to the rule or dominion of the devil.

Celebes — well peopled, but with bad people; no place engendering greater demonomists, or till of late worse savages. Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 368.

DEMO'NOMY.* n. s. [δαίμων and νόμος, a rule or law.] The dominion of the devil.

These Javans are drunk in demonomy, and the more earnestly embrace it by how much their corrupt natures abhor honesty; whence it happens, that they trade in murder, adultery, theft, rapine, deceit, and all other wickedness.
Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 365.

DE'MONSHIP.* n. s. [from demon.] The state of a demon.

Plutarch doth acquaint us with this pretty conceit — that the souls of men took degrees after death; first they commenced heroes, who were as probationers to a demonship; then, after a time sufficient, demons!
Mede, Apost. of Latter Times, p. 18.

DEMO'NSTRABLE. adj. [demonstrabilis, Lat.] That may be proved beyond doubt or contradiction; that which may be made not only probable, but evident.

The grand articles of our belief are as demonstrable as geometry. Glanville.

DEMO'NSTRABLENESS.* n. s. [from demonstrable.] Capability of demonstration.

Notwithstanding the natural demonstrableness both of the obligations and motives of morality, yet considering the manifest corruptness of the present estate which human nature is in, the generality of men must not by any means be left wholly to the workings of their own minds, to the use of their natural faculties, and to the bare convictions of their own reason; but must be particularly taught and instructed in their duty, must have the motives of it frequently and strongly pressed and inculcated upon them with great weight and authority, and must have many extraordinary assistancies afforded them; to keep them effectually in the practice of the great and plainest duties of religion.
Clarke, Evid. of Nat. and Rev. Religion.

DEMO'NSTRABLY. adv. [from demonstrable.] In such a manner as admits of certain proof; evidently; beyond possibility of contradiction.

He should have compelled his ministers to execute the law, in cases that demonstrably concerned the publick peace. Clarendon.

To DEMO'NSTRATE. v. a. [demonstro, Lat.] To prove with the highest degree of certainty; to prove in such a manner as reduces the contrary position to evident absurdity.

We cannot demonstrate these things so, as to shew that the contrary often involves a contradiction. Tillotson.

DEMONSTRA'TION. n. s. [demonstratio, Lat.]

1. The highest degree of deducible or argumental evidence; the strongest degree of proof; such proof as not only evinces the position proved to be true, but shews the contrary position to be absurd and impossible.

What appeareth to be true by strong and invincible demonstration, such as wherein it is not by any way possible to be deceived, thereunto the mind doth necessarily yield. Hooker.

Where the agreement or disagreement of any thing is plainly and clearly perceived, it is called demonstration. Locke.

2. Indubitable evidence of the senses or reason.

Which way soever we turn ourselves, we are encountered with clear evidences and sensible demonstrations of a Deity. Tillotson.

DEMO'NSTRATIVE. adj. [demonstrativus, Lat.]

1. Having the power of demonstration; invincibly conclusive; certain.

An argument necesssary and demonstrative, is such as, being proposed unto any man, and understood, the man cannot chuse but inwardly yield.
Hooker.

2. Having the power of expressing clearly and certainly.

Painting is necessary to all other arts, because of the need which they have of demonstrative figures, which often give more light to the understanding than the clearest discourses. Dryden.

DEMO'NSTRATIVELY. adv. [from demonstrative.]

1. With evidence not to be opposed or doubted.

No man, in matters of this life, requires an assurance either of the good which he designs, or of the evil which he avoids, from arguments demonstratively certain. South.

First, I demonstratively prove,
That feet were only made to move. Prior.

2. Clearly; plainly; with certain knowledge.

Demonstratively understanding the simplicity of perfection, it was not in the power of earth to work them from it. Brown.

DE'MONSTRATOR.† n. s. [Lat. demonstrator, Fr. demonstrateur.] One that proves; one that teaches; one that demonstrates.

If we well consider the true nature of progressive motion, and firm station on the ground, we shall soon conclude, that the instruments of them both are the best demonstrators of human strength.
Smith, Portraiture of Old Age, p. 66.

Whether an algebraist, fluxionist, geometrician, or demonstrator of any kind, can expect indulgence for obscure principles or incorrect reasonings? Bp. Berkeley, Analyst, Qu. 43.

DEMO'NSTRATORY. adj. [from demonstrate.] Having the tendency to demonstrate.

DEMORALIZA'TION.* n. s. [from To demoralize.] Destruction of morals. Of very recent usage only.

The cause [of the crimes of the Creoles] is to be found in the existence of slavery; and the inevitable demoralization, which this accursed practice produces, is not checked by any system of religious instruction. Quarterly Rev. Nov. 1810.

To DEMO'RALIZE.* v. a. This verb is of late introduction into our language. It may be defined the opposite to our old word moralize; which, however, has not hitherto been explained agreeably to its usage by the excellent author of the Christian Life. "Those laws and circumstances which do moralize human actions, and render them reasonable, and holy, and good." Scott's Works, fol. ii. 129. To demoralize is to render them unreasonable, unholy, unjust. See To MORALIZE.

The pernicious influence of their demoralizing creed. Crit. Rev. Aug. 1808.

To DEMU'LCE.* v. a. [Lat. demulceo. See DEMULCENT.] To soothe; to pacify. Not now in use.

Wherewith Saturn was demulced and appeased. Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 64.

Arguments improved with the Earl's demulcing and well-languaged phrases. Hacket's Life of Abp. Williams, p. 70.

DEMU'LCENT. adj. [demulcens, Latin.] Softening; mollifying; assuasive.

Pease, being deprived of any aromatick parts, are mild and demulcent in the highest degree; but being full of aerial particles, are flatulent, when dissolved by digestion. Arbuthnot.

To DEMU'R. v. n. [demeurer, Fr. dimorare, Ital. demorari, Lat.]

1. To delay a process in law by doubts and objections. See DEMURRER.

To this plea the plaintiff demurred. Walton, Angler.

2. To pause in uncertainty; to suspend determination; to hesitate; to delay the conclusion of an affair.

Upon this rub the English ambassadours thought fit to demur, and so sent into England to receive directions from the lords of the council. Hayward.

Running into demands, they expect from us a sudden resolution in things, wherein the devil of Delphos would demur. Brown, Vulg. Err.

He must be of a very sluggish or querulous humour, that shall demur upon setting out, or demand higher encouragements than the hope of heaven. Decay of Piety.

News of my death from rumour he receiv'd,
And what he wish'd, he easily believ'd;
But long demurr'd, though from my hand he knew
I liv'd, so loth he was to think it true. Dryden.

3. To doubt; to have scruples or difficulties; to deliberate.

There is something in our composition, that thinks and apprehends, and reflects and deliberates, determines and doubts, consents and denies; that wills and demurs, and resolves and chooses, and rejects. Bentley.

To DEMU'R. v. a. To doubt of.

The latter I demur; for in their looks
Much reason, and in their actions, oft appears. Milton, P. L.

DEMU'R.† n. s. [old Fr. demor; Lat. demoratio. Our own old word is demour.] Doubt; hesitation; suspense of opinion.

I thanke you for this demour; for I myselfe could have chosen no better for the purpose. Abp. Cranmer to Bp. Gardiner, p. 77.

O progeny of heaven, empyreal thrones!
With reason hath deep silence and demur
Seiz'd us, though undismay'd. Milton, P. L.

Certainly the highest and dearest concerns of a temporal life are infinitely less valuable than those of an eternal; and consequently ought, without any demur at all, to be sacrificed to them, whensoever they come in competition with them. South.

All my demurs but double his attacks;
At last he whispers, Do, and we go snacks. Pope.

DEMU'RE. adj. [des mœurs, Fr.]

1. Sober; decent.

Lo! two most lovely virgins came in place,
With countenance demure, and modest grace. Spenser, F. Q.

Come, pensive nun, devout and pure,
Sober, stedfast, and demure. Milton, Il Pens.

2. Grave; affectedly modest: it is now generally taken in a sense of contempt.

After a demure travel of regard, I tell them I know my place, as I would they should do theirs. Shakspeare.

There be many wise men, that have secret hearts and transparent countenances; yet this would be done with a demure abasing of your eye sometimes. Bacon.

A cat lay and looked so demure as if there had been neither life nor soul in her. L'Estrange.

So cat, transform'd, sat gravely and demure,
Till mouse appear'd, and thought himself secure. Dryden.

Jove sent and found, far in a country scene,
Truth, innocence, good-nature, look serene;
From which ingredients, first, the dext'rous boy
Pick'd the demure, the awkward, and the coy. Swift.

To DEMU'RE.† v. n. [from the noun.] To look with an affected modesty: not used.

Your wife Octavia, with her modest eyes,
And still conclusion shall acquire no honour,
Demuring upon me. Shakspeare.

Zeal mad, and voice demur'd with godly paint. Bp. Henshaw's Thoughts, ed. 1651, p. 187.

DEMU'RELY. adv. [from demure.]

1. With affected modesty; solemnly; with pretended gravity.

Put on a sober habit,
Talk with respect, and swear but now and then,
Wear prayer-books in my pocket, look demurely. Shakspeare.

Esop's damsel, turn'd from a cat to a woman, sat very demurely at the board's end, till a mouse ran before her. Bacon.

Next stood hypocrisy with holy leer,
Soft smiling, and demurely looking down;
But hid the dagger underneath the gown. Dryden.

2. In the following line it is the same with solemnly. Warburton.

Hark, how the drums demurely wake the sleepers! Shakspeare.

DEMU'RENESS.† n. s. [from demure.]

1. Modesty; soberness; gravity of aspect.

Her eyes having in them such a cheerfulness, as nature seemed to smile in them; though her mouth and cheeks obeyed to that pretty demureness, which the more one marked, the more one would judge the poor soul apt to believe. Sidney.

2. Affected modesty; pretended gravity.

It is easy for him — to raise the operations of melancholy to the semblance of a mortified demureness and humiliation. South, Serm. v. 110.

The wanton and cunning woman — wipeth her mouth with great demureness and sobriety. Bp. Taylor, Artif. Handsom. p. 28.

DEMU'RRAGE. n. s. [from demur.] An allowance made by merchants to masters of ships, for their stay in a port beyond the time appointed.

DEMU'RRER.† n. s. [demeurer, French; i. e. manere in aliquo loco vel morari.]

1. A kind of pause upon a point of difficulty in an action; for, in every action, the controversy consists either in the fact, or in the law: if in the fact, that is tried by the jury; if in law, then is the case plain to the judge, or so hard and rare, as it breedeth just doubt. I call that plain to the judge, wherein he is assured of the law; and in such case the judge, with his associates, proceeds to judgement without farther work. But when it is doubtful to him and his associates, then is there stay made, and a time taken, either for the court to think farther upon it, and to agree, if they can; or else for all the justices to meet together in the Chequer-chamber, and, upon hearing that which the serjeants can say of both parts, to advise, and set down as law, whatsoever they conclude firm, without farther remedy. Cowel.

A prohibition was granted, and hereunto there was a demurrer. Ayliffe, Parergon.

2. One who pauses in uncertainty.

And is Lorenzo a demurrer still? Young, Night Th. 9.

DEMY'.* n. s. [Fr. demi.]

1. A term relating to the size of paper; as, demy, medium, royal, or large; of which the demy is the smallest. Cockeram, in his old vocabulary, defines demy what is little.

2. The name of a scholar at Magdalene College, Oxford; where there are thirty demies, or half-fellows, as it were; who, like scholars in other colleges, succeed to fellowships.

DEN. n. s. [ðen, Sax.]

1. A cavern or hollow running horizontally, or with a small obliquity, under ground; distinct from a hole which runs down perpendicularly.

They here dispersed, some in the air, some on the earth, some in the waters, some amongst the minerals, dens and caves under the earth. Hooker.

2. The cave of a wild beast.

What, shall they seek the lion in his den,
And fright him there? Shakspeare.

The tyrant's den, whose use, though lost to fame,
Was now th' apartment of the royal dame;
The cavern, only to her father known,
By him was to his darling daughter shown. Dryden.

'Tis then the shapeless bear his den forsakes;
In woods and fields a wild destruction makes. Dryden.

3. Den, the termination of a local name, may signify either a valley or a woody place; for the Saxon ðen imports both. Gibson's Camden.

To DEN.* v. n. [from the noun.] To dwell in a den.

They den among rocks. Chambers, in V. Snake.

DE'NARY.* n. s. [from the Lat. denarius, containing the number ten.] The number of ten.

They may very well be compared to the lowest figures, which are composed of lines, that owe their being to points; — or to centenaries, that are composed of denaries, and they of units. Sir Kenelm Digby, Suppl. to Cabala, p. 248.

To DENA'TIONALIZE.* v. a. [a word of recent introduction into our language from the very modern French.] To take away national rights; to destroy national privilege.

His Royal Highness can never admit, that neutral trade with Great Britain can be constituted a publick crime, the commission of which can expose the ships of any power to be denationalized. Declar. of the Prince Regent of Gr. Brit. and Ir. Jan. 1813.

DENA'Y.† n. s. [an old word, both as a substantive and verb. See To DENAY.] Denial; refusal.

To her in haste, give her this jewel: say
My love can give no place, bide no denay. Shaks.

To DENA'Y.* v. a. [an ancient usage of deny. We have also the verb to nay. Old Fr. denoier; Lat. denego. See To DENY.] To deny. Not now in use. It is, among old writers, a neuter verb also.

What were those three,
The which thy proffer'd curtesie denay'd.
Spenser, F. Q. iii. vii. 57.

The state of a cardinal — was naied and denaied him. Holinshed, Chron. of Eng. p. 620.

Let him be denay'd the regentship.
Shakspeare, K. Hen. VI. P. II.

DENDRO'LOGY. n. s. [δένδρον and λόγος.] The natural history of trees.

To DE'NEGATE.* v. a. [Lat. denego.] To deny. Obsolete. Cockeram.

DENEGA'TION.* n. s. [Fr. denegation, Cotgrave.] A denying. Bullokar.

DENI'ABLE. adj. [from deny.] That may be denied; that to which one may refuse belief.

The negative authority is also deniable by reason. Brown.

DENI'AL. n. s. [from deny.]

1. Negation; the contrary to affirmation.
2. Negation; the contrary to confession.

No man more impudent to deny, where proofs were not manifest; no man more ready to confess, with a repenting manner of aggravating his own evil, where denial would but make the fault fouler. Sidney.

3. Refusal; the contrary to grant, allowance, or concession.

Here comes your father; never make denial:
I must and will have Catharine to my wife. Shaks.

The denial of landing, and hasty warning us away, troubled us much. Bacon.

He, at ev'ry fresh attempt, is repell'd
With faint denials, weaker than before. Dryden.

4. Abjuration; contrary to acknowledgement of adherence.

We may deny God in all those acts that are capable of being morally good or evil: those are the proper scenes, in which we act our confessions or denials of him. South.

DENI'ER.† n. s. [from deny.]

1. A contradictor; an opponent; one that holds the negative of a proposition.

By the word Virtue the affirmer intends our whole duty to God and man, and the denier by the word Virtue means only courage, or, at most, our duty towards our neighbour, without including the idea of the duty which we owe to God. Watts.

2. A disowner; one that does not own or acknowledge.

All the late statutes which inflict capital punishment upon extollers of the pope's supremacy, deniers of the king's supremacy, jesuits, and seminaries, and other offenders of that nature, have, for their principal scope, not the punishment of the errour of conscience, but the repressing of the peril of the estate.

Bacon, Charge at a Sess. for the Verge.

If it was so fearful when Christ looked his denier into repentance, what will it be when he shall look him into destruction? South.

The deniers of the Being of God have no manner of advantage from that opinion of the eternity of the world, even supposing it could not be disproved. Clarke on the Attributes.

3. A refuser: one that refuses.

It may be I am esteemed by my denier: sufficient of myself to discharge my duty to God as a priest, though not to men as a prince. King Charles.

DENI'ER.† n. s. [from denarius, Lat. It is pronounced as deneer, in two syllables.] A small denomination of French money; the twelfth part of a sous.

You will not pay for the glasses you have burst?
—— No, not a denier. Shakspeare.
Have you no money left? ——
Not a denier.
Beaum. and Fl. Custom of the Country.

To DE'NIGRATE. v. a. [denigro, Latin.] To blacken; to make black.

By suffering some impression from fire, bodies are casually or artificially denigrated in their natural complexion: thus are charcoals made black by an infection of their own suffitus. Brown, Vulg. Err.

Hartshorn, and other white bodies, will be denigrated by heat; yet camphire would not at all lose its whiteness. Boyle.

DENIGRA'TION. n. s. [denigratio, Lat.] A blackening, or making black.

These are the advenient and artificial ways of denigration, answerably whereto may be the natural progress. Brown.

In several instances of denigration the metals are worn off, or otherwise reduced into very minute parts. Boyle.

DENIZA'TION.† n. s. [from denizen.] The act of infranchising or making free.

That the mere Irish were reputed aliens appears by the charters of denization, which in all ages were purchased by them. Davies.

By birth each man
Is in this world a cosmopolitan,
A free-born burgess; and receives thereby
His denization from nativity.
Howell, Lett. Poem to K. Ch. I.

DE'NIZEN.† } n. s. [from dinasddyn, a
DE'NISON. } man of the city, or dinesydd, free of the city, Welsh. The Norm. French deinzseins is used for denizens. V. Kelham.] A freeman; one infranchised, a stranger made free. Barret.

Denizen is a British law term, which the Saxons and Angles found here and retained. Davies.

Thus th' Almighty Sire began: ye gods,
Natives or denizens of blest abodes,
From whence these murmurs? Dryden.

A great many plants will hardly, with nursing, be made to produce their seed out of their native soil; but corn, so necessary for all people, is fitted to grow and to seed as a free denizen of the world. Grew.

He summons straight his denisens of air;
The lucid squadrons round the sails repair. Pope.

To DE'NIZEN.* v. a. [from the noun]. To infranchise; to make free.

You must give me leave to use new words of art, such as are proper to express new conceits, though they be yet strange, and not denizened in our language.

Brysket, Disc. of Civ. Life, (1606,) p. 44.

The Norman powers,
Whose name and honours now are denizen'd for ours. Drayton, Polyolb. S. 17.

Pride, lust, covetize, being several
To these three places yet all are in all;
And mingled thus, their issue is incestuous;
Falschood is denizen'd; virtue is barbarous.
Donne, Poems, p. 147.

DENO'MINABLE. adj. [denomino, Latin.] That may be named or denoted.

An inflammation consists of a sanguineous afluxion, or else is denominable from other humours according to the predominancy of melancholy, phlegm, or choler. Brown, Vulg. Err.

To DENO'MINATE. v. a. [denomino, Latin.] To name; to give a name to.

The commendable purpose of consecration being not of every one understood, they have been construed as though they had superstitiously meant either that those places, which were denominated of angels and saints, should serve for the worship of so glorious creatures: or else those glorious creatures for defence, protection, and patronage of such places. Hooker.

Predestination is destructive to all that is established among men, to all that is most precious to human nature, to the two faculties that denominate us men, understanding and will; for what use can we have of our understandings, if we cannot do what we know to be our duty? And if we act not voluntarily, what exercise have we of our wills? Hammond.

DENOMINA'TION.† n. s. [old Fr. denomination, Kelham; denominatio, Latin.] A name given to a thing, which commonly marks some principal quality of it.

But is there any token, denomination, or monument of the Gauls yet remaining in Ireland, as there is of the Scythians? Spenser on Ireland.

The liking or disliking of the people gives the play the denomination of good or bad; but does not really make or constitute it such. Dryden.

Philosophy, the great idol of the learned part of the Heathen world, has divided it into many sects and denominations; as Stoicks, Peripateticks, Epicureans, and the like. South.

All men are sinners: the most righteous among us must confess ourselves to come under that denomination. Rogers.

DENO'MINATIVE. adj. [from denominate.]

1. That gives a name: that confers a distinct appellation.
2. That which obtains a distinct appellation. This would be more analogically denominable.

The least denominative part of time is a minute, the greatest integer being a year. Cocker's Arith.

DENO'MINATOR. n. s. [from denominate.] The giver of a name; the person or thing that causes an appellation.

Both the seas of one name should have one common denominator. Brown, Vulg. Err.

DENO'MINATOR of a Fraction, is the number below the line, shewing the nature and quality of the parts which any integer is supposed to be divided into: thus in $\frac{6}{8}$, 8 the denominator shews you that the integer is supposed to be divided into 8 parts or half quarters, and the numerator 6 shews, that you take 6 of such parts, i. e. three quarters of the whole. Harris.

When a single broken number or fraction hath for its denominator a number consisting of an unit, in the first place towards the left hand, and nothing but cyphers from the unit towards the right hand, it is then more aptly and rightly called a decimal fraction. Cocker's Arithmetick.

Denominator of any proportion is the quotient arising from the division of the antecedent by the consequent: thus 6 is the denominator of the proportion that 30 hath to 5, because 5) 30 (6. This is also called the exponent of the proportion or ratio. Harris.

DENO'TABLE.* adj. [Lat. denoto.] Capable of being marked or distinguished.

In hot regions, and more spread and digested flowers, a sweet savour may be allowed, denotable from several human expressions.

Sir T. Brown, Miscell, p. 25.

To DE'NOTATE.* See To DENOTE.

DENOTA'TION.† n. s. [denotatio, Latin.] The act of denoting.

Mind and conscience are distinguished — that former being properly the denotation of the faculty merely speculative, or intellectual; this latter of the practical judgement.
Hammond of Conscience.

DENO'TATIVE.* adj. [from denote.] Having the power to denote or shew.
Cotgrave in V. Designatif.

What are the effects of sickness? the alteration it produces is so denotative, that a person is known to be sick by those who never saw him in health.
Letters upon Physiognomy, p. 121.

To DENO'TE.† v. a. [denoto, Latin. Some of our old vocabularies give to denotate instead of to denote. V. Bullokar and Cockeram.] To mark; to be a sign of; to betoken; to shew by signs: as, a quick pulse denotes a fever.

Thy wild acts denote
The unreasonable fury of a beast.
Shakspeare, Rom. and Jul.

You shall observe him;
And his own courses will denote him so,
That I may save my speech. Shaks. Othello.

DENO'TEMENT.* n. s. [from denote.] Sign; indication; token.

They are close denotements, working from the heart,
That passion cannot rule. Shakspeare, Othello.

DENOUEME'NT. n. s. [French.] The discovery of the plot of a drama, or plan of a poem. Introduced into our language by modern criticks.

The denouement, as a pedantic disciple of Bossu would call it, of this poem, [the Rape of the Lock,] is well conducted.
Dr. Warton, Ess. on Pope, i. 250.

To DENO'UNCE. v. a. [denuncio, Latin; denoncer, French.]

1. To threaten by proclamation.

I denounce unto you this day that ye shall surely perish. Deut.-xxx. 18.

He of their wicked ways
Shall them admonish, denouncing wrath to come
On their impenitence. Milton, P. L.

They impose their wild conjectures for laws upon others, and denounce war against all that receive them not. Dec. of Piety.

2. To threaten by some outward sign or expression.

He ended frowning, and his look denounc'd
Desperate revenge, and battle dangerous
To less than gods. Milton, P. L.

The sea grew white, the rolling waves from far,
Like heralds, first denounce the wat'ry war. Dryd.

3. To give information against; to delate; to accuse publickly.

Archdeacons ought to propose parts of the New Testament to be learned by heart by inferior clergymen and denounce such as are negligent.
Ayliffe, Parergon.

DENO'UNCEMENT.† n. s. [from denounce.] The act of proclaiming any menace; the proclamation of intended evil; denunciation.

False is the reply of Cain upon the denouncement of his curse, My iniquity is greater than can be forgiven. Brown.

Hooker would fain have this denouncement referred to the particular precept going before.
Milton, Reas. of Ch. Gov. B. i.

DENO'UNCER.† n. s. [from denounce. And old Fr. denunceor.] One that declares some menace.

These illiterate denouncers never paralleled so much of any age as would contribute to the title of a century. Milton, Observ. Art of Peace, betw. E. of Orm. and Irish.

Here comes the sad denouncer of my fate,
To toll the mournful knell of separation. Dryden.

DENSE.† adj. [dense, old French, densus, Latin.] Close; compact; approaching to solidity; having small interstices between the constituent particles.

The cause of cold is the density of the body, for all dense bodies are colder than most other bodies, as metals, stone, glass; and they are longer in heating than softer bodies. Bacon.

In the air the higher you go, the less it is compressed, and consequently the less dense it is; and so the upper part is exceedingly thinner than the lower part which we breathe. Locke.

To DE'NSHIRE. v. a. A barbarous term of husbandry.

Burning of land, or burnbating, is commonly called denshiring, that is, Devonshiring or Denbighshiring, because most used or first invented there.
Mortimer.

DE'NSITY. n. s. [densitas, Latin]. Closeness; compactness; close adhesion, or near approach of parts.

Whilst the densest of metals, gold, if foliated, is transparent, and all metals become transparent if dissolved in menstruums or vitrified, the opacity of white metals ariseth not from their density alone. Newton.

The air within the vessels being of a less density, the outward air would press their sides together; and being of a greater density, would expand them so as to endanger the life of the animal.
Arbuthnot on Aliments.

DENT.* n. s. A stroke, or blow; and also a mark made by a blow. See DINT.

DE'NTAL.† adj. [dental, old Fr. dentalis, Lat.]

1. Belonging or relating to the teeth.

Parts similar, dissimilar, — muscular, guttural, dental. Gayton, Notes on D. Quix. iii. 6.

2. [In grammar.] Pronounced principally by the agency of the teeth.

The Hebrews have assigned which letters are labial, which dental, and which guttural. Bacon.

The dental consonants are easy, therefore let them be next; first the labial-dentals, as also the lingua-dentals. Holder.

DE'NTAL. n. s. A small shell fish.

Two small black and shining pieces, seem, by the shape, to have been formed in the shell of a dental. Woodward.

DE'NTED.* adj. [Fr. denté, indented, jagged. Cotgrave.] Notched. Barret.

DENTE'LLI. n. s. [Italian.] Modillons.

The modillons or dentelli, make a noble shew by graceful projections. Spectator, No. 415.

DENTICULA'TION. n. s. [denticulatus, Lat.] The state of being set with small teeth, or prominencies resembling teeth, like those of a saw.

He omits the denticulation of the edges of the bill, or those small oblique incisions made for the better retention of the prey. Grew, Musæum.

DENTI'CULATED. adj. [denticulatus, Lat.] Set with small teeth.

DE'NTIFRICE. n. s. [dens and frico, Lat.] A powder made to scour the teeth.

Is this grey powder a good dentifrice?
B. Jonson.

The shells of all sorts of shell-fish, being burnt, obtain a caustick nature: most of them, so ordered and powdered, make excellent dentifrices.
Grew, Musæum.

To DE'NTISE. v. a. [denteler, French.] To have the teeth renewed. Not in use.

The old countess of Desmond, who lived till she was seven score, did dentise twice or thrice, casting her old teeth, and others coming in their place. Bacon.

DE'NTIST.* n. s. [dentiste, Fr. from dens, Lat.] One who professes to preserve the beauty, and to heal the diseases, of the teeth. A modern word both in French and English.

DENTI'TION.† n. s. [dentitio, Lat.]

1. The act of breeding the teeth.

2. The time at which children's teeth are bred.

Dentition and locution are for the most part contemporaries; toothing and speaking usually come and go together; the child cannot speak, till he put forth his teeth, neither can he speak well, when he sheds them, nor leave his lisping till they come again.
Smith, Portr. of Old Age, (1666,) p. 140.

To DENU'DATE.† v. a. [denudo, Lat.] To divest; to strip; to lay naked.

Denudate us of all, when that may fit us for our prizes. Hammond's Works, iv. 489.

I have put off righteousness like a garment, denudated myself of all that looks like holiness.
Ibid. p. 515.

Till he has denudated himself of all incumbrances, he is unqualified. Decay of Piety.

DENUDA'TION.† n. s. [Fr. denudation, Cotgrave.] The act of stripping or making naked.

There must be a denudation of the mind from all those images of our phantasy, how pleasing soever, that may carry our thoughts aside from those better objects. Bp. Hall, Devout Soul, § 10.

To DENU'DE. v. a. [denudo, Lat.] To strip; to make naked; to divest.

Not so much as a treaty can be obtained, unless we would denude ourself of all force to defend us from a visible strength marching against us.
K. Charles, in Clarendon, B. vi.

If in summer-time you denude a vine-branch of its leaves, the grapes will never come to maturity.
Ray on the Creation.

The eye, with the skin of the eye-lid, is denuded, to shew the muscle. Sharp, Surg.

To DENU'NCIATE.* v. a. [Lat. denuncio.] To denounce; to threaten.

The vicinage of Europe had not only a right, but an indispensable duty, and an exigent interest, to denunciate this new work before it had produced the danger we have so severely felt.
Burke on a Regicide Peace.

DENUNCIA'TION.† n. s. [denunciatio, Lat.]

1. The act of denouncing; the proclamation of a threat; a public menace.

In a denunciation or indiction of a war, the war is not confined to the place of the quarrel, but is left at large. Bacon.

Christ tells the Jews, that, if they believe not, they shall die in their sins: did they never read those denunciations? Ward.

Midst of these denunciations, and notwithstanding the warning before me, I commit myself to lasting durance. Congreve.

2. Publication; sanction.

She is fast my wife,
Save that we do the denunciation lack
Of publick order. Shakspeare, Meas. for Meas.

This publick and reiterated denunciation of banns before matrimony, is an institution required and kept both by all the churches of the Roman correspondence, and by all the Reformed.
Bp. Hall, Cases of Consc. D. 4. C. 9.

DENU'NCIATOR. n. s. [from denuncio, Lat.]

1. One that proclaims any threat.

2. One that lays an information against another.

The denunciator does not make himself a party in judgement, as the accuser does. Ayliffe's Parer.

To DENY'. v. a. [denier, Fr. ; denego, Lat.]

1. To contradict: opposed to affirm.
2. To contradict an accusation; not to confess.

Sarah denied, saying, I laughed not; for she was afraid. Genesis.

3. To refuse; not to grant.

My young boy
Hath an aspect of intercession, which
Great nature cries — deny not. Shakspeare.

Ah, charming fair, said I,
How long can you my bliss and your's deny?
Dryden.

4. To abnegate; to disown.

It shall be therefore a witness unto you, lest you deny your God. Jos. xxiv. 27.

5. To renounce; to disregard; to treat as foreign or not belonging to one.

The best sign and fruit of denying ourselves, is mercy to others. Sprat.

When St. Paul says, If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable; he considers Christians as denying themselves in the pleasures of this world, for the sake of Christ. Atterbury.

To DEOBSTRU'CT. v. a. [deobstruo, Lat.] To clear from impediments; to free from such things as hinder a passage.

It is a singular good wound-herb, useful for deobstructing the pores of the body. More, Ant. against Atheism.

Such as carry off the fæces and mucus, deobstruct the mouth of the lacteals, so as the chyle may have a free passage into the blood. Arbuthnot on Diet.

DEO'BSTRUENT.† adj. [deobstruens, Lat.] Having the medicinal power to resolve viscidities, or to open by any means the animal passages.

All soaps are attenuating and deobstruent, resolving viscid substances. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

DEO'BSTRUENT.* n. s. [from the adjective.] A medicine that has the power to resolve viscidities, or to open by any means the animal passages.

It is a powerful and safe deobstruent in cachectick and hysterick cases. Bp. Berkeley, Siris, § 6.

DE'ODAND.† n. s. [old Fr. deodande, from the Lat. Deo dandum.] A thing given or forfeited to God for the pacifying his wrath, in case of any misfortune, by which any Christian comes to a violent end, without the fault of any reasonable creature; as, if a horse should strike his keeper, and so kill him; if a man, in driving a cart, and endeavouring to rectify something about it, should fall so as the cart-wheels, by running over him, should press him to death; if one should be felling a tree, and giving warning to company by, when the tree were near falling, to look to themselves, and any of them should nevertheless be slain by the fall of the tree: in these cases the horse, the cart-wheel, cart and horses, and the tree, are to be given to God; that is, sold and distributed to the poor, for an expiation of this dreadful event, though occasioned by unreasonable, senseless, and dead creatures: and though this be given to God, yet is it forfeited to the king by law, as executor in this case, to see the price of these distributed to the poor. Cowel.

If a horse, or other animal, of his own motion, kill as well an infant, as an adult; or if a cart run over him; they shall in either case be forfeited as deodands, for this additional reason; that such misfortunes are in part owing to the negligence of the owner, and therefore he is properly punished by such forfeiture. Blackstone.

To DEO'NERATE.* v. a. [Lat. deonero.] Our old word for exonerate, which is of no great age in our language. See To EXONERATE.] To unload. Cockeram.

To DEO'PPILATE. v. a. [de and oppilo, Latin.] To deobstruct; to clear a passage; to free from obstructions.

DEOPPILA'TION. n. s. [from deoppilate.] The act of clearing obstructions; the removal of whatever obstructs the vital passages.

Though the grosser parts be excluded again, yet are the dissoluble parts extracted, whereby it becomes effectual in deoppilations. Brown, Vulg. Err.

DEO'PPILATIVE.† adj. [old Fr. deoppilatif.] Deobstruent.

A physician prescribed him a deoppilative and purgative apozem. Harvey.

DEORDINA'TION.* n. s. [Lat. de and ordinatio.] Disorder.

All things were of that kind, as did rather shew the frailty of nature than a deordination or reproach of it. Rowley's Tr. Bacon, Collect. of Q. Eliz.

Such a general deordination gives a taste and relish to the succeeding government. Modern Policies, ascribed to Abp. Sancroft, § 10.

To DEO'SCULATE.* v. a. [Lat. deosculor. Dr. Johnson has given deosculation, but overlooked the old verb.] To kiss. Cockeram.

DEOSCULA'TION. n. s. [deosculatio, Lat.] The act of kissing.

We have an enumeration of the several acts of worship required to be performed to images, viz. processions, genuflections, thurifications, and deosculations. Stilling fleet.

To DEPA'INT.† v. a. [Fr. depeindre, depeinct, depeint, from the Lat. depingo. Chaucer writes our word depeint; and Spenser, in his elder poetry, depeinct. See To DEPEINCT.]

1. To picture; to describe by colours; to paint; to shew by a painted resemblance.

He did unwilling worship to the saint,
That on his shield depainted he did see.
Spenser, F. Q.

2. To describe. Huloet.

As Lucan hath mournfully depainted the civil wars of Pompey and Cæsar, so hath Daniell the civil wars of Yorke and Lancaster. Meres, Wit's Treasury, (1593.)

All this which I have depainted to thee, are inciters and rousers of my mind. Shelton, Tr. of D. Quix. iii. 6.

Such ladies fair would I depaint
In roundelay, or sonnet quaint. Gay.

DEPAI'NTER.* n. s. [from depaint.] A painter. Obsolete.

Welcum depaynter of the blomyt medis. G. Douglas, Virg. Prol.

To DEPA'RT.† v. n. [depart, Fr.]

1. To go away from a place; with from before the thing left.

When the people departed away, Susanna went into her garden. Susanna, 7.

He said unto him, go in peace; so he departed from him a little way. 2 Kings, v. 19.

They departed quickly from the sepulchre, with fear and great joy, and did run to bring his disciples word. Matthew, xxviii.

He, which hath no stomach to this fight,
Let him depart; his passport shall be made.
Shakspeare.

Barbarossa appeased with presents, departed out of that bay. Knolles.

And could'st thou leave me, cruel, thus alone?
Not one kind kiss from a departing son!
No look, no last adieu! Dryden.

2. To desist from a practice.

He cleaved unto the sins of Jeroboam, he departed not therefrom. 2 Kings, iii. 3.

3. To be lost; to perish.

The good departed away, and the evil abode still. 2 Esd. iii.

4. To desert; to revolt; to fall away; to apostatise.

In transgressing and lying against the lord, and departing away from our God. Isaiah, lix. 13.

5. To desist from a resolution or opinion.

His majesty prevailed not with any of them to depart from the most unreasonable of all their demands. Clarendon.

6. To die; to decease; to leave the world.

As her soul was in departing; for she died. Gen. iii. 5. 18.

Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word. Luke, ii. 29.

7. To part with; to dispose of. Not now in use.

John, to stop Arthur's title in the whole,
Hath willingly departed with a part.
Shakspeare, K. John.

He, that departs with his own honesty
For vulgar praise, doth it too dearly buy.
B. Jonson, Epigr.

To DEPA'RT.† v. a.

1. To quit; to leave; to retire from.

You have had dispatch in private by the consul;
You are will'd by him this evening,
To depart Rome. B. Jonson.

2. To leave the world; not in use, Dr. Johnson says. He had overlooked our liturgy.

We also bless Thy Holy Name for all thy servants departed this life in thy faith and fear. Communion Service.

As you wish Christian peace to souls departed,
Stand these poor people's friend. Shaksp.

To DEPA'RT.† v. a. [old Fr. departir, from the Lat. partiri, or dispertire.] To divide; to separate: a chymical term, Dr. Johnson says, without any further notice of the word. But the fact is, that this is one of our oldest verbs, in the usual sense of divide or separate. Wicliffe, Gower, and Chaucer, thus employ the word; and many later writers. It was not in use, or at least was not thus understood, soon after the Restoration. For, among the exceptions of the dissenters against our book of Common Prayer in 1661, the word, in the old marriage-service, is thus branded: "Till death us depart: This word depart is here improperly used!" See the Exceptions in an Account of the Review, &c. of our Liturgy, 4to. 1661. The word was extended into the present form do part.

1. To separate; to part.

I N. take thee N. to my wedded wyf, to have and to holde fro this day forwarde, for better, for wors, for richer, for poorer; in sickenesse and in hele, tyl dethe us departe. Salisbury Manual, (1555,) fol. 38. b.

The Lord do so to me, and more also, if aught but death depart thee and me.
Ruth, i. 17. (Transl. 1578.)
And the deepe wound more deepe engor'd her heart,
That nought but death her dolour might depart.
Spenser, F. Q. iii. iv. 6.

2. To distribute.
The Holy Ghost departeth [gyftes] amonge all mankynde. Liber Festivalis, fol. 43.

DEPA'RT.† n. s. [depart, Fr.]
1. The act of going away: now departure.
But that lewd lover did the most lament
For her depart. Spenser, F. Q. iii. vii. 20.
I had in charge, at my depart from France,
To marry princess Margaret. Shakspeare.
Since his depart, his sports
Though craving seriousness, and skill, past slightly
His careless execution.
Beaum. and Fl. Two Noble Kinsmen.
2. Death.
When your brave father breath'd his latest gasp,
Tidings, as swiftly as the post could run,
Were brought me of your loss and his depart.
Shakspeare, Hen. VI.
3. [With chymists.] An operation so named, because the particles of silver are departed or divided from gold, or other metal, when they were before melted together in the same mass, and could not be separated any other way. Dict.
The chymists have a liquor called water of depart. Bacon.

DEPA'RTER. n. s. [from depart.] One that refines metals by separation.

DEPA'RTING.* n. s. [from depart.]
1. A going away.
By faith Joseph, when he died, made mention of the departing of the children of Israel.
Heb. xi. 22.
2. Separation.
Edw. Whose soul is that which takes her heavy leave?
Rich. A deadly groan, like life and death's departing. Shakspeare, K. Hen. VI. P. III.

DEPA'RTMENT.† n. s. [departement, Fr. from dispartio, Lat.]
1. Separate allotment; province or business assigned to a particular person: a French term.
The Roman fleets, during their command at sea, had their several stations and departments: the most considerable was the Alexandrian fleet, and the second was the African. Arbuthnot.
2. A division or extent of country under the same jurisdiction. This is an old French expression.
The ancient provinces of this kingdom [France] have been divided by the national assembly into eighty-three departments. Guthrie, France.
The deputies of the department choose their deputies to the national assembly.
Burke, on the Fr. Revolution.

DEPARTME'NTAL.* adj. [from department.] Belonging to a department, or province.
The game, played by the revolutionists in 1789 with respect to the French guards of the unhappy king, was now played against the departmental guards, called together for the protection of the revolutionists. Burke, Pref. to Brissot's Address.

DEPA'RTURE. n. s. [from depart.]
1. A going away.
For thee, fellow,
Who needs must know of her departure, and
Do'st seem so ignorant, we'll force it from thee
By a sharp torture. Shakspeare.
What besides
Of sorrow, and dejection, and despair,
Our frailty can sustain, thy tidings bring;
Departure from this happy place. Milton, P. L.
They were seen not only all the while our Saviour was upon earth, but survived after his departure out of this world. Addison.
2. Death; decease; the act of leaving the present state of existence.
Happy was their good prince in his timely departure, which barred him from the knowledge of his son's miseries. Sidney.
3. A forsaking; an abandoning: with from.
The fear of the Lord, and departure from evil, are phrases of like importance. Tillotson.

DEPA'SCENT. adj. [depascens, Lat.] Feeding.

To DEPA'STURE. v. a. [from depascor, Lat.] To eat up; to consume by feeding upon it.
They keep their cattle, and live themselves in bodies pasturing upon the mountains, and removing still to fresh land, as they have depastured the former. Spenser on Ireland.

To DEPA'STURE.* v. n. To feed; to graze. See To PASTURE.
If a man takes in a horse or other cattle to graze, and depasture, in his grounds. Blackstone.

To DEPAU'PERATE.† v. a. [depaupero, Latin.] To make poor; to impoverish; to consume. Bullokar, and Cockeram.
I cannot exclude hencefrom that change that befalleth the blood and natural humours of the body in the time of age: For they become low, and much depauperated.
Smith, Port. of Old Age, p. 184.
Liming does not depauperate; the ground will last long, and bear large grain. Mortimer.
Great evacuations, which carry off the nutritious humours, depauperate the blood. Arbuthnot.

DEPE'CTIBLE. adj. [from depecto, Lat.] Tough; clammy; tenacious; capable of being extended.
It may be also, that some bodies have a kind of lentor, and are of a more depectible nature than oil; as we see it evident in coloration; for a small quantity of saffron will tinct more than a very great quantity of brasil or wine. Bacon.

To DEPE'INCT.† v. a. [depeindre, French.] To depaint; to paint; to describe in colours. A word of Spenser, Dr. Johnson says; but Spenser followed the old French spelling, depeinct; as Chaucer followed that of depeint. See To DEPAINT.
The red rose medled with the white yfere,
In either cheek depeincten lively chere.
Spenser, Shep. Cal. April.

DEPECULA'TION.* n. s. [Lat. depeculatio.] A robbing of the commonwealth. See PECULATION. Cockeram.

To DEPE'ND.† v. n. [dependre, Fr. dependeo, Lat.]
1. To hang from.
Now nought but hoarie frost was seene, each branch tears down did send,
Whose dewie drops in isicles upon each bough depend. Mir. for Mag. p. 555.
From the frozen beard
Long isicles depend, and crackling sounds are heard. Dryden.
From gilded roofs depending lamps display
Nocturnal beams, that emulate the day. Dryden.
There is a chain let down from Jove,
So strong, that from the lower end,
They say, all human things depend. Swift.
The direful monster was afar descry'd,
Two bleeding babes depending at her side. Pope.
2. To be in a state influenced by some external cause; to live subject to the will of others: with upon.
We work by wit and not by witchcraft;
And wit depends on dilatory time. Shakspeare.
Never be without money, nor depend upon the curtsey of others, which may fail at a pinch. Bacon.
3. To be in a state of dependance; to retain to others.
Be then desir'd
Of fifty to disquantity your train;
And the remainders, that shall still depend,
To be such men as may besort your age. Shaksp.
4. To be connected with any thing, as with its cause, or something previous.
The peace and happiness of a society depend on the justice and fidelity, the temperance and charity of its members. Rogers.
5. To be in suspense; to be yet undetermined.
By no means be you persuaded to interpose yourself in any cause depending, or like to be depending in any court of justice. Bacon.
The judge corrupt, the long depending cause,
And doubtful issue of misconstru'd laws. Prior.
6. To be fixed with attention.
The hearer on the speaker's mouth depends,
And thus the tragick story never ends.
Dryden, Virg. Æn. 4.
7. To DEPE'ND upon. To rely on; to trust to; to rest upon with confidence; to be certain of.
He resolved no more to depend upon the one, or to provoke the other. Clarendon.
But if you're rough, and use him like a dog,
Depend upon it — he'll remain incog. Addison.
I am a stranger to your characters, further than as common fame reports them, which is not to be depended upon. Swift.

DEPE'NDANCE.† } n. s. [old Fr. depend-
DEPE'NDANCY. } ance.]
1. The state of hanging down from a supporter.
2. Something hanging upon another.
On a neighb'ring tree descending light,
Like a large cluster of black grapes they show,
And make a long dependance from the bough.
Dryden, Virg. Georg. 4.
3. Concatenation; connexion; relation of one thing to another.
In all sorts of reasoning, the connexion and dependance of ideas should be followed, till the mind is brought to the source on which it bottoms. Locke.
4. State of being at the disposal or under the sovereignty of another; with upon.
Every moment we feel our dependance upon God, and find that we can neither be happy without him, nor think ourselves so. Tillotson.
5. The things or persons of which any man has the dominion or disposal.
Never was there a prince bereaved of his dependancies by his council, except where there hath been either an over-greatness in one counsellor, or an over-strict combination in divers. Bacon.
The second natural division of power, is of such men who have acquired large possessions, and consequently dependancies; or descend from ancestors, who have left them great inheritances. Swift.
6. Reliance; trust; confidence.
Their dependancies on him were drowned in this conceit. Hooker.
They slept in peace by night,
Secure of bread, as of returning light;
And with such firm dependance on the day,
That need grew pamper'd, and forgot to pray.
Dryden.
7. Accident; that of which the existence presupposes the existence of something else.

Modes I call such complex ideas, which, however compounded, contain not in them the supposition of subsisting by themselves, but are considered as dependancies on, or affections of substances; such are the ideas signified by the words triangle, gratitude, murder. Locke.

DEPE'NDANT.† adj. [old Fr. dependant.]

1. Hanging down.
2. Relating to something previous.
3. In the power of another.

On God, as the most high, all inferior causes in the world are dependant. Hooker.

DEPE'NDANT. n. s. One who lives in subjection, or at the discretion of another; a retainer.

A great abatement of kindness appears as well in the general dependants, as in the duke himself also, and your daughter. Shakspeare.

For a six-clerk a person recommended a dependant upon him, who paid six thousand pounds ready money. Clarendon.

His dependants shall quickly become his proselytes. South.

DEPE'NDENCE. } n. s. [from dependeo, La-
DEPE'NDENCY. } tin. This word, with many others of the same termination, are indifferently written with ance or ence, ancy or ency, as the authors intended to derive them from the Latin or French.]

1. A thing or person at the disposal or discretion of another.

We invade the rights of our neighbours, not upon account of covetousness, but of dominion, that we may create dependencies. Collier on Pride.

2. State of being subordinate, or subject in some degree to the discretion of another; the contrary to sovereignty.

Let me report to him
Your sweet dependency, and you shall find
A conqu'ror that will pray in aid for kindness,
Where he for grace is kneel'd to. Shakspeare.

At their setting out they must have their commission, or letters patent from the king, that so they may acknowledge their dependency upon the crown of England. Bacon.

3. That which is not principal; that which is subordinate.

We speak of the sublunary worlds, this earth, and its dependencies, which rose out of a chaos about six thousand years ago. Burnet's Theory.

4. Concatenation; connexion; rise of consequents from premises.

Her madness hath the oddest frame of sense;
Such a dependency of thing on thing,
As ne'er I heard in madness. Shakspeare.

5. Relation of any thing to another, as of an effect to its cause.

I took pleasure to trace out the cause of effects, and the dependence of one thing upon another in the visible creation. Burnet, Theory.

6. Trust; reliance: confidence.

The expectation of the performance of our desire, is that we call dependence upon him for help and assistance. Stillingfleet.

DEPE'NDENT. adj. [dependens, Latin. This, as many other words of like termination, is written with ent or ant, as they are supposed to flow from the Latin or French.] Hanging down.

In the time of Charles the Great, and long since, the whole furrs in the tails were dependent; but now that fashion is left, and the spots only worn, without the tails. Peacham.

DEPE'NDENT. n. s. [dependens, Lat.] One subordinate; one at the discretion or disposal of another.

We are indigent, defenceless beings; the creatures of his power, and the dependents of his providence. Rogers.

DEPE'NDER.† n. s. [from depend.] A dependant; one that reposes on the kindness or power of another.

What shalt thou expect,
To be depender on a thing that leans? Shakspeare.

The absolute stoical depender on fate may starve for want of industry.

Hammond, Pract. Catechism, iii. § 5.

I have neither followers, nor fosterers, nor dependers. Swift, to Lady B. G. Lett. cccxlvii.

DEPE'RDIT.* n. s. [Lat. deperditus.] Any thing lost, or said to be lost.

No reason can be given why, if those deperdits ever existed, they have now disappeared.

Paley, Nat. Theol. ch. 5. § 4.

DEPE'RDITELY.* adv. [Lat. deperditus.] In a lost or ruined manner.

The most deperditely wicked of all others, in whom was the root of wickedness.

Dean King, Serm. (1608,) p. 17.

DEPERDI'TION.† n. s. [Fr. deperdition, Cotgrave, from the Lat. deperditus.] Loss; destruction.

It may be unjust to place all efficacy of gold in the non omission of weights, or deperdition of any ponderous particles. Brown.

A continual deperdition and reparation of the matter by nutrition and action.

Ross on Sir K. Digby.

To DEPHLE'GM. } v. a. [dephlegmo,
To DEPHLE'GMATE. } low Lat.] To clear from phlegm, or aqueous insipid matter.

We have sometimes taken spirit of salt, and carefully dephlegmed it. Boyle.

DEPHLEGMA'TION. n. s. [from dephlegm.] An operation which takes away from the phlegm any spirituous fluid by repeated distillation, till it is at length left all behind. Quincy.

In divers cases it is not enough to separate the aqueous parts by dephlegmation; for some liquors contain also an unsuspected quantity of small corpuscules, of somewhat an earthy nature, which, being associated with the saline ones, do clog and blunt them, and thereby weaken their activity. Boyle.

DEPHLE'GMEDNESS. n. s. [from dephlegm.] The quality of being freed from phlegm or aqueous matter.

The proportion betwixt the coralline solution and the spirit of wine, depends so much upon the strength of the former liquor, and the dephlegmedness of the latter, that it is scarce possible to determine generally and exactly what quantity of each ought to be taken. Boyle.

To DEPI'CT. v. a. [depingo depictum, Lat.]

1. To paint; to portray; to represent in colours.

The cowards of Lacedemon depicted upon their shields the most terrible beasts they could imagine. Bp. Taylor.

2. To describe; to represent an action to the mind.

When the distractions of a tumult are sensibly depicted, every object and every occurrence are so presented to your view, that while you read, you seem indeed to see them. Felton.

To DEPI'CTURE.* v. a. [from de, Lat. and picture.] To represent in colours.

They crackt apieces the glass-windows, wherein the effigies of our Blessed Saviour hanging on the cross, or any one of his saints, was depictured. Weever, Funer. Monum.

'Twas paint, 'twas life! and sure to piercing eyes
The warriour's face depictured Henry's mein.

Shenstone, Love and Honour.

To DE'PILATE.* v. a. [Lat. depilo.] To pull off hair. Cockeram.

DEPILA'TION.* n. s. [Lat. depilatio.] A pulling off the hair. Dryden uses this word.

DEPI'LATORY.† n. s. [Fr. depilatoire, n. s.] Any ointment, salve, or water, which takes away hair. Cotgrave.

DEPI'LATORY.* adj. Taking away hair.

Œlian says that they were depilatory, and, if macerated in vinegar, would take away the beard. Chambers, in V. Urtica Marina.

DE'PILOUS. adj. [de and pilus, Lat.] Without hair.

This animal is a kind of lizard, or quadruped, corticated and depilous; that is, without wool, furr, or hair. Brown.

DEPLANTA'TION. n. s. [deplanto, Lat.] The act of taking plants up from the bed. Dict.

DEPLE'TION. n. s. [depleo depletus, Lat.] The act of emptying.

Abstinence and a slender diet attenuates, because depletion of the vessels gives room to the fluid to expand itself. Arbuthnot.

DEPLO'RABLE.† adj. [desplorable, old Fr. from deploro, Lat.]

1. Lamentable; demanding or causing lamentation; dismal; sad; calamitous; miserable; hopeless.

This was the deplorable condition to which the king was reduced. Clarendon.

The bill of all weapons gives the most ghastly and deplorable wounds. Temple.

It will be considered in how deplorable a state learning lies in that kingdom. Swift.

2. It is sometimes, in a more lax and jocular sense, used for contemptible; despicable: as, deplorable nonsense: deplorable stupidity.

DEPLO'RABLENESS.† n. s. [from deplorable.] The state of being deplorable; misery; hopelessness.

To discern the sadness and deplorableness of this estate. Hammond, Works, vol. iv. 536.

DEPLO'RABLY.† adv. [from deplorable.] Lamentably; miserably; hopelessly: often in a sense of contempt.

Notwithstanding all their talk of reason and philosophy, God knows, they are deplorably strangers to them. South.

If this be uncomfortable, mankind must needs be the most deplorably unhappy kind of being in the whole world.

Goodman, Wint. Ev. Conf. P. iii.

DEPLO'RATE. adj. [deploratus, Lat.] Lamentable; hopeless.

The case is then most deplorate when reward goes over to the wrong side. L'Estrange.

DEPLORA'TION.† n. s. [from deplore.] The act of deploring, or of lamenting. Bullokar, and Cockeram.

To DEPLO'RE.† v. a. [deplorer, Fr. deploro, Lat.] To lament; to bewail; to wail; to mourn; to bemoan; to express sorrow.

Visit by night your lady's chamber-window
With some sweet consort: to their instruments
Tune a deploring dump; the night's dead silence
Will well become such sweet complaining grievance. Shakspeare, Two Gent. of Ver.

But chaste Diana who his death deplor'd,
With Æsculapian herbs his life restor'd. Dryden.
If Arcite thus deplore
His sufferings; yet Palemon suffers more. Dryd.

DEPLO'REDLY.* adv. [from the participle deplored.] Lamentably.

To be deploredly old, and affectedly young, is not only a great folly, but a gross deformity. 'Tis ridiculous to spend much of a moment's remnant in contending with the invincible wrinkles and irreparable ruins of old age, which nothing but a vizard can quite hide, or a miracle can wholly overcome. Bp. Taylor, Artif. Handsom. p. 72.

DEPLO'REMENT.* n. s. [from deplore.] A weeping; a lamenting. Cockeram.

DEPLO'RER. n. s. [from deplore.] A lamenter; a mourner; one that laments.

Not to be a mere spectator, or a lazy deplorer of the danger. Considerations about Reason and Religion, 1675, Pref. p. vii.

To DEPLO'Y.* v. a. [Fr. déployer.] A military word of modern times, hardly wanted in our language; for it is, literally, to display. A column of troops is deployed, when the divisions spread wide, or open out.

DEPLUMA'TION.† n. s. [deplumation, Fr. deplumatio, Lat.]

1. A pluming, or plucking off the feathers. Cotgrave.
2. [In surgery.] A swelling of the eyelids, accompanied with the fall of the hairs from the eye-brows. Philips.

To DEPLU'ME.† v. a. [de and pluma, Lat.] To strip of its feathers.

At every new change and choice, the emperour was deplumed of some of his feathers, until in the end he was made naked of authority. Hayward, Answ. to Doleman, (1603,) ch. 5.

Their wings deplum'd for starting from them. B. Jonson, Underwoods.

1. To lay down as a pledge or security.
2. To risk upon the success of an adventure.

On this I would depone
As much, as any cause I've known. Hudibras.

DEPO'NENT.† n. s. [from depono, Lat.]

1. One that deposes his testimony in a court of justice; an evidence; a witness. See DEPOSITION.

Deposition is the testimony of a witness set down in writing, by way of answers to interrogatories exhibited in chancery, where such witness is called a deponent. Cowel.

2. [In grammar.] Such verbs as have no active voice are called deponents, and generally signify action only; as fateor, I confess. Clark's Latin Grammar.

DEPO'NENT.* adj. Applied to particular verbs in Latin. See the substantive.

A verb deponent endeth in r, like a passive; and yet, in signification, is but either active or neuter. Lilly.

To DEPO'PULATE. v. a. [depopulor, Lat.] To unpeople; to lay waste; to destroy inhabited countries.

Where is this viper,
That would depopulate the city, and
Be every man himself? Shakspeare.

He turned his arms upon unarmed and unprovided people, to spoil only and depopulate, contrary to the laws both of war and peace. Bacon, Hen. VII.

A land exhausted to the last remains,
Depopulated towns and driven plains. Dryden.

Grim Death, in different shapes,
Depopulates the nations, thousands fall
His victims. Philips.

To DEPO'PULATE.* v. n. To become dispeopled.

This is not the place to enter into an inquiry, whether the country be depopulating or not. Goldsmith.

DEPOPULA'TION.† n. s. [from depopulate.] The act of unpeopling; havock; waste; destruction of mankind.

O poore and miserable citie, what sundry torments, excisions, subversions, depopulations, and other evil adventures, hath hapned unto thee, since thou wert bereft of that noble court of sapience! Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 197.

How did'st thou grieve then, Adam! to behold
The end of all thy offspring, end so sad,
Depopulation! Thee another flood,
Of tears and sorrow a flood, thee also drown'd,
And sunk thee as thy sons. Milton, P. L.

Remote thou hear'st the dire effect of war,
Depopulation. Philips.

DEPOPULA'TOR.† n. s. [from depopulate.] A dispeopler; a destroyer of mankind; a waster of inhabited countries.

Our puny depopulators allege for their doings the king's and country's good; and we will believe them, when they can persuade us, that their private coffers are the king's exchequer. Fuller, Holy State, p. 237.

To DEPO'RT.† v. a. [deporter, Fr.] To carry; to demean; to behave: it is used only with the reciprocal pronoun.

Cyprian said to the dames of his time, that it was not enough for them to keep themselves from being corrupted by others' solicitations, unless they took care so to dress and deport themselves that they might not be occasions of raising wanton thoughts in the beholders. Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 247.

Let an ambassador deport himself in the most graceful manner before a prince. Pope.

DEPO'RT. n. s. [from the verb.] Demeanour; grace of attitude; behaviour; deportment.

She Delia's self
In gait surpass'd, and goddess-like deport.
Milton, P. L.

Of middle age one rising, eminent
In wise deport, spake much of right and wrong.
Milton, P. L.

DEPORTA'TION.† n. s. [deportatio, Lat.]

1. Transportation; exile into a remote part of the dominion, with prohibition to change the place of residence.
2. Exile in general.

The wings seemed to be like the wings of a stork; another expression of that sudden transmigration and deportation out of our country. Stokes on the Minor Prophets, 1659, p. 497.

An abjuration, which is a deportation for ever into a foreign land, was anciently with us a civil death. Ayliffe.

DEPO'RTMENT. n. s. [deportement, Fr.]

1. Conduct; management; manner of acting.

I will but sweep the way with a few notes, touching the duke's own deportment in that island. Wotton.

2. Demeanour; behaviour.

The coldness of his temper, and the gravity of his deportment, carried him safe through many difficulties, and he lived and died in a great station. Swift.

DEPO'SABLE.* adj. [from depose.] Capable of being taken away.

Hereafter they shall be only keepers of the great seal, which, for title and office, are deposable; but they say, the lord chancellor's title is indelible. Howell, Lett. i. iv. 176.

DEPO'SAL.* n. s. [from depose.] The act of depriving a prince of sovereignty. A modern word, but more distinct than deposition. See DEPOSITION.

The short interval between the deposal and death of princes is become proverbial. Fox, Hist. of James II. p. 14.

A difficulty recently much increased by the captivity and deposal of the head of your church. Lord Grenville, Lett. to Lord Fingall, 1810.

To DEPO'SE.† v. a. [deposer, Fr. Cotgrave: from depono, Lat.]

1. To lay down; to lodge; to let fall.

Its shores are neither advanced one jot further into the sea, nor its surface raised by additional mud deposed upon it by the yearly inundations of the Nile. Woodward.

2. To degrade from a throne or high station.

First, of the king: what shall of him become?
— The duke yet lives that Henry shall depose.
Shakspeare.

May your sick fame still languish till it die;
Then, as the greatest curse that I can give,
Unpity'd, be depos'd, and after live. Dryden.

Deposed consuls, and captive princes, might have preceded him. Tatler.

3. To take away; to divest; to strip of: not in use.

You may my glory and my state depose,
But not my griefs; still am I king of those.
Shakspeare.

4. To lay aside.

Our Lord is the Saviour of all men, as having effected that Almighty God hath deposed his wrath towards all mankind. Barrow, Serm. vol. iii. S. 40.

5. To lay up as a security.

To depose my mind, as plainly as I may, safely in your breast. Wotton, Rem. p. 481.

6. To give testimony; to attest.

'Twas he that made you to depose;
Your oath, my lord, is vain and frivolous. Shaksp.

It was usual for him that dwelt in Southwark, or Tothill-street, to depose the yearly rent or valuation of lands lying in the North, or other remote part of the realm. Bacon.

7. To examine any one on his oath. Not now in use.

According to our law,
Depose him in the justice of his cause. Shaksp.

To DEPO'SE. v. n. To bear witness.

Love straight stood up and deposed, a lie could not come from the mouth of Zelmane. Sidney.

DEPO'SER.* n. s. [from depose.] One who deposes or degrades another from a throne or high station.

Then through the casement ventur'd so much face,
As kings depos'd shew, when through gates they peep
To see deposers to their crowning pass.
Davenant, Gondebert, iii. 3.

DEPO'SING.* n. s. [from depose.] The act of dethroning.

The persecuting bulls, interdicts, excommunications, deposings, and such like, published and acted by them. Selden on Drayton's Polyolb. S. 17.

There should'st thou find one heinous article,
Containing the deposing of a king,
Shakspeare, K. Rich. II.

To DEPO'SIT.† v. a. [old Fr. depositer, Cotgrave; from depositum, Lat. We write our word deposit. Dr. Johnson adds a final e. Lord Herbert uses depositate for this verb, Hen. VIII. p. 21.]

1. To lay up; to lodge in any place.

The eagle got leave here to deposit her eggs.
L'Estrange.

Dryden wants a poor square foot of stone, to shew where the ashes of one of the greatest poets on earth are deposited. Garth.

When the vessels were open, and the insects had free access to the aliment within them, Redi diligently observed, that no other species were produced, but of such as he saw go in and feed, and deposit their eggs there, which they would readily do in all putrefaction. Bentley, Serm. iv.

2. To lay up as a pledge, or security.

3. To place at interest.

God commands us to return as to him, to the poor, his gifts, out of mere duty and thankfulness; not to deposit them with him, in hopes of meriting by them. Sprat.

4. To lay aside.

It once again deposits its old colour and consistence, and so at length becomes perfectly changed into that true liquor of life, which is called blood. Smith, Portr. of Old Age, p. 107.

[He] the second time deposited his conjugal intendments, and thenceforth courted and espoused, what he preserved inviolate, unto his death, the more eminent perfection of spotless virgin chastity. Fell, Life of Hammond, sect. 2.

DEPO'SIT.† n. s. [depositum, Latin. This Latin word was employed by us, early in the seventeenth century, as appears by the vocabularies of Cockeram and Bullokar, to denote a pledge or surety. Depositum continued to be so used till late in the last century.]

1. Any thing committed to the trust and care of another.

Trustees for the sacred deposit of the monarchy. Burke.

They have guarded this precious deposit of legal and constitutional liberty with care. Hurd.

2. A pledge; a pawn; a thing given as a security.

The spoils of the Macedonian conquest were the first deposit on which the [Roman] bank was established. Pownall on Antiq. p. 110.

3. The state of a thing pawned or pledged.

They had since Marseilles, and fairly left it: they had the other day the Valtoline, and now have put it in deposit. Bacon.

DEPO'SITARY.† n. s. [depositaire, Fr. depositarius, Latin.] One with whom any thing is lodged in trust.

I gave you all,
— Made you my guardians, my depositaries;
But kept a reservation to be follow'd
With such a number. Shakspeare.

An honourable arbitrator, and a faithful depositary of the apostolical constitutions.
Bp. Bramhall, Schism Guarded.

They themselves, [the Jews,] are the depositaries of these and all the other prophecies, which tend to their own confusion Addison, Spect. No. 495.

DEPO'SITING.* n. s. [from To deposit.] A laying aside.

The difficulty will be to persuade the depositing of those lusts, which have, by I know not what fascination, so endeared themselves.
Decay of Chr. Piety.

DEPOSI'TION.† n. s. [from depositio, Lat.]

1. The act of giving publick testimony.

If you will examine the veracity of the fathers by those circumstances usually considered in depositions, you will find them strong on their side.
Sir K. Digby.

A witness is obliged to swear, otherwise his deposition is not valid. Ayliffe's Parergon.

2. The act of degrading a prince from sovereignty.

His [James the second's] former conduct, and the passage of Charles the second's reign, might rankle still at the hearts of some men, but could not be set to account among the causes of his deposition. Bolingb. on the Stud. of Hist. Lett. 2.

3. [In canon law.] Deposition properly signifies a solemn depriving of a man of his clerical orders. Ayliffe's Parergon.

DEPO'SITORY.† n. s. [from deposite.] The place where any thing is lodged. Depositary is properly used of persons, and depository of places, Dr. Johnson says; who cites an example from Addison, in which, he says, the words are confounded. But, in truth, Addison's word is not depository, but depositary; and I have carried the passage to the latter word. Dr. Johnson had been misled by a bad edition of the Spectator. But the word has been confounded in modern times.

Becket might have been justifiable, perhaps even laudable, for his steady maintenance of the privileges, which his church and order had acquired, by the care of his predecessors, and of which he by his place was the depository.
Burke, Abridg. of Eng. Hist. iii. 6.

*DEPO'SITUM. n. s. [Latin.] That which is entrusted to the care of another; a deposit. See DEPOSIT.

Compare the tales of the elder Pliny with the Pseudodoxia Epidemica of Dr. Brown, and you will be surprized to find with what zeal the sacred depositum of errour has been transmitted from age to age. Warburton on Prodigies, p. 5.

The secret — he delivered down to his successors in religious politicks — a depositum, whereby his memory became so singularly indeared to them.
Coventry, Phil. to Hyd. Conv. 4.

*DE'POT. n. s. [French, depôt; from the Lat. depositum.] A place, in which stores are deposited for the use of an army; or where recruits for an army are assembled; applied either to barracks, or magazines. A modern word.

The islands of Guernsey and Jersey are at present (1794) the great depôts of this kingdom.
Brit. Crit. 1794, p. 203.

DEPRAVA'TION. n. s. [depravatio, Lat.]

1. The act of making any thing bad; the act of corrupting; corruption.

The three forms of government have their several perfections, and are subject to their several depravations: however, few states are ruined by defect in their institution, but generally by corruption of manners. Swift.

2. The state of being made bad; degeneracy; depravity.

We have a catalogue of the blackest sins that human nature in its highest depravation, is capable of committing. South.

3. Defamation; censure: a sense not now in use.

Stubborn criticks are apt, without a theme
For depravation to square all the sex. Shakspeare.

To DEPRA'VE.† v. a. [depravo, Lat.]

1. To vitiate; to corrupt; to contaminate.

We admire the providence of God in the continuance of scripture, notwithstanding the endeavours of Infidels to abolish, and the fraudulence of hereticks to deprave the same. Hooker.

Who lives that's not depraved or depraves?
Shakspeare.

But from me what can proceed,
But all corrupt; both mind and will deprav'd.
Milton, P. L.

A taste which plenty does deprave,
Loaths lawful good, and lawless ill does crave.
Dryden.

2. To misrepresent; to wrest; to defame.

Envy is blind, and can do nothing but deprave and speak ill of virtuous doing. Barret.

I have heard his doings depraved of some, who did rather of malicious mind, or private grievance, seek to detract from the honour of his deeds, than of any just cause. Spenser on Ireland.

Lest the same kneeling should by any persons, either out of ignorance and infirmity, or out of malice and obstinacy, be misconstrued and depraved; it is hereby declared, that thereby no adoration is intended, or ought to be done, either unto the sacramental bread and wine there bodily received, or unto any corporal presence of Christ's natural flesh and blood.
Communion Service, Declaration at the End.

Unjustly thou deprav'st it with the name
Of servitude, to serve whom God ordains.
Milton, P. L.

DEPRA'VEDLY.* adv. [from the participle depraved.] Corruptedly; in a vitiated manner.

I have lived to behold the highest perversion of that excellent invention; [the press;] the name of his majesty defamed, the honour of parliament depraved; the writings of both depravedly, anticipatively, counterfeitly imprinted.
Brown, Religio Medici, To the Reader.

DEPRA'VEDNESS.† n. s. [from deprave.] Corruption; taint; contamination; vitiated state.

The natural man in this depravedness of estate cannot but offend God.
Bp. Hall, Hon. of Mar. Clergy, (1620,) p. 70.

What sins do you mean? Our original depravedness, and proneness of our eternal part to all evil. Hammond.

Cruelty — argues not only a depravedness of nature, but also a meanness of courage and imbecility of mind. Temple, Introd. Hist. Eng. p. 226.

DEPRA'VEMENT.† n. s. [from deprave.] A vitiated state; corruption.

He maketh men believe, that apparitions are either deceptions of sight, or melancholy depravements of fancy. Brown.

Such an irreligious depravement no longer may be soothed and flattered through custom.
Milton, Tetrachordon.

DEPRA'VER.† n. s. [from deprave.] A corrupter; one that causes depravity; one that vilifies.

But I believe you as I ever knew you,
A glorious talker, and a legend-maker
Of idle tales, and trifles; a depraver
Of your own truth.
Beaum. and F. Wild-goose-chase.

Notorious depravers of the Book of Common Prayer. Const. and Can. Ecc. 27.

These depravers of Scripture shall, with glorious assurance, affirm to themselves and their complices, the wonderful illapses and impulses of the divine spirit, when at the same time they contradict the holy catholick church and themselves; and when also many pretenders to a double portion of the spirit have acted as the eldest sons of Belial.
Fuller, Moderat. Ch. of Eng. p. 100.

DEPRA'VING.* n. s. [from To deprave.] The act of traducing or vilifying.

If any parson, vicar, or other whatsoever minister, — shall preach, declare, or speak any thing in the derogation or depraving of the said Book, &c. Act for the Uniformity of Common Prayer, &c. 1 Eliz. ch. 2.

DEPRA'VITY.† n. s. [from deprave.] Corruption; a vitiated state.

The preacher comes in the name of the great God of heaven and earth. — But his doctrines are received with impatience and disgust; his evidence is weighed in the false balance of prejudice and corruption, with a desire to find it weak and insufficient. And let this fatal prepossession once engage the mind, the clearer the evidence appears, the more offensive must it prove; the more must it be hated, and, of consequence, the more violently opposed: or, should it force its way through all the obstacles of depravity, it may be entertained for a while, but without a permanent and lively influence. Vicious habits and disordered passions soon resume their power.

Leland, Sermon on Infidelity.

To confound the notion of virtue and vice, shews as great a depravity in the understanding, as it does in the senses to confound contrary perceptions.

Tottie, Sermon before the Univ. of Oxf. 1767.

DE'PRECABLE.* adj. [Lat. deprecabilis.] To be averted; to be begged off.

I look upon the temporal destruction of the greatest king as far less deprecable than the eternal damnation of the meanest subject.

Icon Basilike, 1649, ch. ult.

To DE'PRECATE.† v. a. [old Fr. deprier, Lat. deprecor.]

1. To beg off; to pray deliverance from; to avert by prayer.

Daniel kneeled upon his knees, to deprecate the captivity of his people.

Hewyt, Serm. (1658,) p. 204.

In deprecating of evil, we make an humble acknowledgement of guilt, and of God's justice in chastising, as well as clemency, in sparing the guilty. Grew.

Poverty indeed, in all its degrees, men are easily persuaded to deprecate from themselves.

Rogers.

The judgements which we would deprecate, are not removed. Smalridge.

The Italian entered them in his prayer: amongst the three evils he petitioned to be delivered from, he might have deprecated greater evils.

Baker, Reflect. on Learning.

2. To implore mercy of: this is not proper.

At length he sets
Those darts, whose points make gods adore
His might, and deprecate his pow'r. Prior.

DEPRECA'TION.† n. s. [deprecatio, Lat.]

1. Prayer against evil.

Thy son himself had a sadness in his soul to death; and he had a reluctation, a deprecation of death, in the approaches thereof; but he had his cordial too, Yet not my will, but thine be done.

Donne, Devot. p. 280.

To this purpose is that excellent deprecation, "O God, merciful Father, that despisest not the sighing of a contrite heart, &c."

Bp. Prideaux, Euch. p. 225.

Sternutation they generally conceived to be a good sign, or a bad one; and so, upon this motion, they commonly used a gratulation for the one, and a deprecation for the other. Brown.

I, with leave of speech implored,
And humble deprecation thus reply'd. Milton, P. L.

2. Intreaty; petitioning.

3. An excusing; a begging pardon for.

Alexander of Hales and Bonaventure do maintain, that the power of the keys extends to the remission of faults, by way of intercession only and deprecation, not by imparting any immediate absolution. Abp. Usher, Reply to the Jesuit Malone, p. 87.

All sorts of reconcilement, in the very nature of the thing, suppose a deprecation of, or a satisfaction for, some misery, which first caused a breach between the persons thus to be reconciled.

South, Serm. v. 465.

DE'PRECATIVE.† } adj. [from deprecate.]
DE'PRECATORY. } That serves to deprecate; apologetick; tending to avert evil by supplication.

Bishop Fox understanding that the Scottish King was still discontent, being troubled that the occasion of breaking of the truce should grow from his men, sent many humble and deprecatory letters to the Scottish king to appease him. Bacon.

I confess with shame, it was an unpardonable omission to proceed so far as I have already done, before I had performed the due discourses, expostulatory, supplicatory, or deprecatory, with my good lords the criticks. Swift, Tale of a Tub, sect. 3.

DE'PRECATOR. n. s. [deprecator, Lat.] One that averts evil by petition.

To DEPRE'CIATE. v. a. [depretiare, Lat.]

1. To bring a thing down to a lower price.

2. To undervalue.

They presumed upon that mercy, which, in all their conversations, they endeavour to depreciate and misrepresent. Addison.

As there are none more ambitious of fame, than those who are coiners in poetry, it is very natural for such as have not succeeded in it to depreciate the works of those who have. Spectator.

DEPRECIA'TION.* n. s. [from depreciate.] The act of lessening the worth or value of any thing.

It is fruitless to inquire which of two acts of duty be the more acceptable, where both are indispensable; and dangerous, it should seem, to form comparisons of two indispensable duties, where the preference of one tends to the depreciation of the other. Burgess on the Div. of Christ, p. 34.

To DE'PREDATE. v. a. [deprædari, Lat.]

1. To rob; to pillage.

2. To spoil; to devour.

It maketh the substance of the body more solid and compact, and so less apt to be consumed and depredated by the spirits. Bacon.

DEPREDA'TION. n. s. [deprædatio, Lat.]

1. A robbing; a spoiling.

Commissioners were appointed to determine all matters of piracy and depredations between the subjects of both kingdoms. Hayward.

The land had never been before so free from robberies and depredations as through his reign.

Wotton.

Were there not one who had said, Hitherto shalt thou come and no farther, we might well expect such vicissitudes, such clashing in nature, and such depredations and changes of sea and land. Woodward.

2. Voracity; waste.

The speedy depredation of air upon watry moisture, and version of the same into air, appeareth in nothing more visible than in the sudden discharge or vanishing of a little cloud of breath, or vapour from glass, or the blade of a sword, or any such polished body. Bacon.

DE'PREDATOR. n. s. [deprædator, Lat.] A robber; a devourer.

It is reported, that the shrub called our Lady's Seal, which is a kind of briony, and coleworts, set near together, one or both will die: the cause is, for that they be both great depredators of the earth, and one of them starveth the other. Bacon.

We have three that collect the experiments, which are in all books; these we call depredators. Bacon.

To DEPREHE'ND.† v. a. [old Fr. deprehender; Lat. deprehendo.]

1. To catch one; to take unawares; to take in the fact.

That wretched creature, being deprehended in that impiety, was held in ward. Hooker.

The woman, deprehended in adultery, he indeed called not strumpet; for she carried her name written in her forehead: She was taken in adultery.

Bp. Morton, Discharge, &c. p. 244.

Who can believe men upon their own authority, that are once deprehended in so gross and impious an imposture. More.

2. To discover; to find out a thing; to come to the knowledge or understanding of.

The motions of the minute parts of bodies, which do so great effects, are invisible, and incur not to the eye; but yet they are to be deprehended by experience. Bacon.

We shall not long be quiet; but uncertain and desultorious, leap out of one humour into another, like those whom we must study and deprehend, and so meet and apply ourselves unto them in every mode and disposition. Farindon's Serm. (1657,) p. 429.

To DEPREHE'ND.* v. n. To discover.

Surely in the books of Tully men may deprehend, that in him lacked not the knowledge of geometry, ne musick, or grammar. Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 49. b.

DEPREHE'NSIBLE.† adj. [from deprehend.]

1. That may be caught.

2. That may be understood or discovered. Dict.

Such [qualities] as are not discernible by sense, or deprensible [deprehensible] by certain experiments. Sir W. Petty, Advice to Hartlib, (1648,) p. 15.

DEPREHE'NSIBLENESS. n. s.

1. Capableness of being caught.

2. Intelligibleness; easiness to be understood.

DEPREHE'NSION.† n. s. [old Fr. deprehension, discovery; Lat. deprehensio.]

1. A catching or taking unawares.

Her deprehension is made an aggravation of her shame. Bp. Hall, Contemp. The Woman taken in Adultery.

2. A discovery.

To DEPRE'SS.† v. a. [from depressus, of deprimo, Lat.]

1. To press, or thrust down.

Unless an age too late, or cold
Climate, or years, damp my intended wing

2. To let fall; to let down.

The same thing I have tried by letting a globe rest, and raising or depressing the eye, or otherwise moving it to make the angle of a just magnitude Newton.

3. To humble; to deject; to sink.

Others depress their own minds, despond at the first difficulty, and conclude that the making any progress in knowledge is above their capacities. Locke.

If we consider how often it breaks the gloom, which is apt to depress the mind, with transient unexpected gleams of joy, one would take care not to grow too wise for so great a pleasure of life. Addison.

Passion can depress or raise
The heavenly, as the human mind. Prior.

DEPRE'SSION. n. s. [depressio, Lat.]

1. The act of pressing down.

Bricks of a rectangular form, if laid one by another in a level row between supporters sustaining the two ends, all the pieces between will necessarily sink by their own gravity; and much more, if they suffer any depression by other weight above them. Wotton.

2. The sinking or falling in of a surface.

The beams of light are such subtile bodies, that, in respect of them, even surfaces that are sensibly smooth, are not exactly so: they have their own degree of roughness, consisting of little protuberances and depressions; and consequently such inequalities may suffice to give bodies different colours, as we see in marble that appears white or black, or red or blue, even when most carefully polished. Boyle.

If the bone be much depressed, and the fissure considerably large, it is then at your choice, whether you will enlarge that fissure, or continue it for the evacuation of the matter, and forbear the use of the trepan; not doubting but a small depression of the bone will either rise, or cast off, by the benefit of nature. Wiseman.

3. The act of humbling; abasement.

Depression of the nobility may make a king more absolute, but less safe. Bacon.

DEPRESSION of an Equation [in algebra], is the bringing it into lower and more simple terms by division. Dict.

DEPRESSION of a Star [with astronomers], is the distance of a star from the horizon below, and is measured by the arch of the vertical circle or azimuth, passing through the star, intercepted between the star and the horizon. Dict.

DEPRE'SSIVE.* adj. [from To depress.] Lowering; having the power to depress.

Ev'n where the keen depressive north descends. Thomson, Britannia.

We must pronounce that substance to be ponderous, depressive, and earthy, which such a soul draws with it; and therefore it is burdened by such a clog. Warton, Notes on Milton's Sm. Poems.

DEPRE'SSOR.† n. s. [depressor, Lat.]

1. One that keeps or presses down.

The greatest depressors of God's grace, and the advancers of men's abilities, were Pelagius and Celestius. Abp. Usher, on the Relig. of the Anc. Irish, ch. 2.

2. An oppressor.

DEPRE'SSOR. [in anatomy.] A term given to several muscles of the body, whose action is to depress the parts to which they adhere.

DE'PRIMENT. adj. [from deprimens, of deprimo, Lat.] An epithet applied to one of the straight muscles that move the globe or ball of the eye, its use being to pull it downwards.

The exquisite equilibration of all opposite and antagonist muscles is effected partly by the natural posture of the body and the eye, which is the case of the attollent and depriment muscles. Derham.

DEPRI'VABLE.* adj. [from deprive.] Liable to deprivation.

Upon surmise — they gather, that the persons that enjoy them [the church's grants and tolerations,] possess them wrongfully, and are deprivable at all hours! Hooker, v. § 81.

DEPRIVA'TION. n. s. [from de and privatio, Lat.]

1. The act of depriving, or taking away from.

2. The state of losing.

Fools whose end is destruction and eternal deprivation of being. Bentley.

DEPRIVA'TION. [in law], is when a clergyman, as a bishop, parson, vicar, or prebend, is deprived, or deposed from his preferment, for any matter in fact or law. Phillips.

To DEPRI'VE. v. a. [from de and privo, Lat.]

1. To bereave one of a thing; to take it away from him: with of.

God hath deprived her of wisdom, neither hath he imparted to her understanding. Job, xxxix. 17.

He lamented the loss of an excellent servant, and the horrid manner in which he had been deprived of him. Clarendon.

Now wretched Œdipus, depriv'd of sight,
Led a long death in everlasting night. Pope.

2. To hinder; to debar from: Milton uses it without of.

From his face I shall be hid, depriv'd
His blessed countenance. Milton, P. L.

The ghosts rejected are th' unhappy crew,
Depriv'd of sepulchres and fun'ral due. Dryden.

3. To release; to free from.

Most happy he,
Whose least delight sufficeth to deprive
Remembrance of all pains which him opprest.
Spenser, F. Q.

4. To put out of an office.

A minister, deprived for inconformity, said, that if they deprived him, it should cost an hundred men's lives. Bacon.

DEPRI'VEMENT.* n. s. [from deprive.] The state of losing.

The widower may lament and condole the unhappiness of so many deprivements; and, having proved the troubles and importunities of the flesh, may find time and leisure for prayer and repentance. Ricaut, Greek Church, p. 306.

DEPRI'VER.* n. s. [from deprive.] That which takes away or bereaves.

Depriver of those solid joys,
Which sack creates. Cleaveland, Poems, &c. p. 38.

DEPTH.† n. s. [Goth. diupith, "the deep," St. Luke, v. 4. See DEEP. Mr. H. Tooke considers depth as the third person singular of bippan, to sink.]

1. Deepness; the measure of any thing from the surface downwards.

As for men, they had buildings in many places higher than the depth of the water. Bacon.

We have large and deep caves of several depths: the deepest are sunk six hundred fathoms. Bacon.

The left to that unhappy region tends,
Which to the depth of Tartarus descends. Dryden.

For though in nature, depth and height
Are equally held infinite,
In poetry the height we know,
'Tis only infinite below. Swift.

2. Deep place; not a shoal.

The false tides skim o'er the cover'd land,
And seamen with dissembled depths betray. Dryd.

3. The abyss; a gulph of infinite profundity.

When he prepared the heavens I was there, when he set a compass upon the face of the depth. Prov. viii. 27.

4. The middle or height of a season.

And in the depth of winter, in the night,
You plough the raging seas to coasts unknown.
Denham.

The earl of Newcastle, in the depth of winter, rescued the city of York from the rebels. Clarendon.

5. Abstruseness; obscurity.

There are greater depths and obscurities in an elaborate and well-written piece of nonsense, than in the most abstruse tract of school divinity. Addison, Whig Examiner.

6. Sagacity. See the seventh sense of DEEP.

As the reporters were but few, they were generally looked upon as persons of little depth and great simplicity; and such qualifications too frequently render men very credulous. South, Serm. v. 172.

DEPTH of a Squadron or Battalion, is the number of men in the file. Milit. Dict.

To DE'PTHEN. v. a. [diepen, Dutch.] To deepen, or make deeper. Dict.

To DEPU'CELATE. v. a. [depuceler, Fr.] To deflower; to bereave of virginity. Dict.

To DEPU'LSE. v. a. [Lat. depello, depulsum. Formed like the verb repulse. It is not noticed by Dr. Johnson, who however introduces depulsion, with no other authority than his own; which word, however, is in our old lexicography.] To drive away; to thrust often away. Cockeram.

DEPU'LSION.† n. s. [depulsio, Lat.] A driving or thrusting away. Cockeram.

DEPU'LSORY. adj. [from depulsus, Lat.] Putting away; averting. Dict.

To DE'PURATE.† v. a. depurer, Fr. from depurgo, Lat.] To purify; to cleanse; to free any thing from its impurities.

The instrument that doth depurate the best of blood, and defecate and exalt the vital spirits. Smith, Portr. of Old Age, (1666,) p. 219.

Chemistry enabling us to depurate bodies, and in some measure to analize them, and take asunder their heterogeneous parts, in many chemical experiments we may better than in others, know what manner of bodies we employ. Boyle.

DE'PURATE. adj. [from the verb.]

1. Cleansed; free from dregs and impurities.

2. Pure; not contaminated.

Neither can any boast a knowledge depurate from the defilement of a contrary, within this atmosphere of flesh. Glanville.

DEPURA'TION. n. s. [depuratio, Lat.]

1. The act of separating the pure from the impure part of any thing.

Brimstone is a mineral body of fat and inflammable parts; and this is either used crude, and called sulphur vive, or is of a sadder colour, and, after depuration, such as we have in magdeleons, or rolls of a lighter yellow. Brown, Vulg. Err.

What hath been hitherto discoursed inclines us to look upon the ventillation and depuration of the blood as one of the principal and constant uses of respiration. Boyle.

2. The cleansing of a wound from its matter.

To DEPU'RE.† v. a. [depurer, Fr.]

1. To cleanse; to free from impurities.

The wyndowes clear depured all of crystall.
Hawes, Hist. of Gr. Amoure, &c. (1555,) ch. 4.

2. To purge; to free from some noxious quality.

It produced plants of such imperfection and harmful quality, as the waters of the general flood could not so wash out or depure, but that the same defection hath had continuance in the very generation and nature of mankind. Ralegh.

DEPU'RGATORY.* adj. [Fr. depurgatoire.] Having power to purge. Cotgrave, and Sherwood.

DEPUTA'TION. n. s. [deputation, Fr.]

1. The act of deputing or sending away with a special commission.

2. Vicegerency; the possession of any commission given.

Cut me off the heads
Of all the fav'rites that the absent king
In deputation left behind him here,
When he was personal in the Irish war. Shaksp.

He looks not below the moon, but hath designed the regiment of sublunary affairs into sublunary deputations. Brown.

The authority of conscience stands founded upon its vicegerency and deputation under God. South.

To DEPU'TE. v. a. [deputer, Fr.] To send with a special commission, to impower one to transact instead of another.

And Absalom said unto him, See thy matters are good and right, but there is no man deputed of the king to hear. 2 Sam.

And Linus thus, deputed by the rest,
The heroes welcome and their thanks express'd.
Roscommon.

A bishop, by deputing a priest or chaplain to administer the sacraments, may remove him. Ayliffe, Parergon.

DE'PUTY. n. s. [deputé, Fr. from deputatus, Lat.]

1. A lieutenant; a viceroy; one that is appointed by a special commission to govern or act instead of another.

He exerciseth dominion over them as the vicegerent and deputy of Almighty God. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

He was vouched his immediate deputy upon earth, and viceroy of the creation, and lord lieutenant of the world. South.

2. Any one that transacts business for another.

Presbyters, absent through infirmity from their churches, might be said to preach by those deputies, who, in their stead, did but read homilies. Hooker.

A man hath a body, and that body is confined to a place; but where friendship is, all offices of life are, as it were, granted to him and his deputy; for he may exercise them by his friend. Bacon.

3. [In law.] One that exercises any office or other thing in another man's right, whose forfeiture or misdemeanour shall cause the officer or person for whom he acts to lose his office. Phillips.

To DEQUA'NTITATE. v. a. [from de and quantitas, Lat.] To diminish the quantity of.

This we affirm of pure gold; for that which is current, and passeth in stamp amongst us, by reason of its allay, which is a proportion of silver or copper mixed therewith, is actually dequantitated by fire, and possibly by frequent extinction. Brown, Vulg. Err.

DER. A term used in the beginning of names of places. It is generally to be derived from Deop, a wild beast, unless the place stands upon a river; for then it may rather be fetched from the British dur, i. e. water. Gibson's Camden.

To DERA'CINATE. v. a. [deraciner, Fr.]

1. To pluck or tear up by the roots.

Her fallow leas,
The darnel, hemlock, and rank fumitory
Doth root upon; while that the culter rusts
That should deracinate such savagery. Shaks.

2. To abolish; to destroy; to extirpate.

To DERA'IGN.† } v. a. [from disratio-
To DERA'IN. } nare or dirationare, Lat. Dr. Johnson says. It is rather from the Norman French, dareigner, to make proof of, to make good, sometimes written desrener.]

1. To prove; to justify.

When the parson of any church is disturbed to to demand tythes in the next parish by writ of indicavit, the patron shall have a writ to demand the advowson of the tythes being in demand; and when it is deraigned, then shall the plea pass in the court christian, as far forth as it is deraigned in the king's court. Blount.

2. To disorder; to turn out of course. Dict.

DERA'IGNMENT. }
DERA'INMENT. } n. s. [from deraign.]

1. The act of deraigning or proving.
2. A disordering or turning out of course.
3. A discharge of profession; a departure out of religion.

In some places the substantive deraignment is used in the very literal signification with the French desrayer, or desranger; that is, turning out of course, displacing, or setting out of order; as deraignment or departure out of religion, and deraignment or discharge of their profession, which is spoken of those religious men who forsook their orders and professions. Blount.

To DERA'NGE.* v. a. [old Fr. desranger, to disrank, to disarray, to disorder. Cotgrave. Our word is modern. About twenty years since, it was condemned as a Gallicism. "We cannot but take notice, in derogation from our praise for correctness of style, that some few Gallicisms occur, such as derange for disarrange, &c." Brit. Crit. Sept. 1795, p. 237. But derange has gained ground; and is now common.] To turn out of the proper course; to disorder.

The republic of regicide—has actually conquered the finest parts of Europe; has distressed, disunited, deranged, and broke to pieces, all the rest. Burke on a Regicide Peace.

DERA'NGEMENT.* n. s. [from derange. Formerly deraignment was, in some places, used, as Blount and Cowel relate, in the literal signification of the French desranger, that is, turning out of course. See DERAIGNMENT, and Cowel in V. DERAIGNE.] Disorder. It is commonly applied to discomposure of mind or intellect. This word appears to have been used at an earlier period than has been supposed.

An irretrievable derangement. Ruffhead, Life of Pope.

An anatomist, who understands the structure of the heart, might say beforehand that it would play; but he would expect, I think, from the complexity of its mechanism, and the delicacy of many of its parts, that it should always be liable to derangement, or that it would soon work itself out. Paley, Nat. Theology, ch. 10.

DERA'Y. n. s. [from desrayer, Fr. to turn out of the right way.]

1. Tumult; disorder; noise.
2. Merriment; jollity; solemnity: not in use. Douglas.

To DERE, v. a. [bepian, Sax.] To hurt. Obsolete. Some think that in the example it means daring.

So from immortal race he does proceed,
That mortal hands may not withstand his might;
Dred for his derring doe, and bloody deed;
For all in blood and spoil is his delight.
Spenser, F. Q.

DERE.* adj. Hurtful. See the 4th sense of DEAR.

DE'RELICT.* adj. [Lat. derelictus.] Wilfully relinquished. See DERELICTS.

Taking out a patent in Charles the Second's time for derelict lands.
Letters (Sir P. Pett to A. Wood.) i. 61.

DERELI'CTION.† n. s. [derelictio, Lat.]

1. The act of forsaking or leaving; abandonment.

A sorrow proceeding from the love of God, and conversion to him, and ending in a dereliction of all our sins.
Bp. Taylor's Diss. against Popery, ch. 2. § 1.

2. The state of being forsaken.

There is no other thing to be looked for, but the effects of God's most just displeasure, the withdrawing of grace, dereliction in this world, and in the world to come confusion. Hooker.

O Saviour, hadst thou not been thus forsaken, we had perished! Thy dereliction is our safety.
Bp. Hall, Contempl. The Crucifixion.

'Tis true, Christ cried upon the cross, with a loud voice, saying "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" But if that dereliction should signify a solution of the former union of his natures, the separation had been made not at his death, but in his life. Whereas indeed those words infer no more, than that he was bereft of such joys and comforts from the Deity, as should assuage and mitigate the acerbity of his present torments. Pearson on the Creed, Art. 4.

DE'RELICTS. n. s. pl. [in law.] Goods wilfully thrown away, or relinquished by the owner. Dict.

To DERI'DE.† v. a. [old French, derider; Lat. derideo.] To laugh at; to mock; to turn to ridicule; to scorn.

Before such presence to offend with any the least unseemliness, we would be surely as loth as they who most reprehend or deride what we do. Hooker.

What shall be the portion of those who have derided God's word, and made a mock of every thing that is sacred and religious? Tillotson.

These sons, ye gods, who with flagitious pride
Insult my darkness, and my groans deride. Pope.

Some that adore Newton for his fluxions, deride him for his religion. Bp. Berkeley.

DERI'DER.† n. s. [from the verb.]

1. A mocker; a scoffer.

Lucian, a man learned and eloquent, but a derider of all religion.
Woolton, Christian Man. (1576) sign. K. iij.

Upon the wilful violation of oaths, execrable blasphemies, and like contempts offered by deriders of religion, fearful tokens of divine revenge have been known to follow. Hooker.

We see what sort of scoffers they are, who are to come in the last days, impudent deriders of religion, because they are resolved on walking after their own lusts. Glanville, Serm. p. 194.

2. A droll; a buffoon.

DERI'DINGLY.* adv. [from the participle deriding.] In a jeering manner.

His parasite was wont deridingly to advise him.
Bp. Reynolds on the Passions, ch. 37.

DERI'SION. n. s. [derisio, Lat.]

1. The act of deriding or laughing at.

Are we grieved with the scorn and derision of the profane? Thus was the blessed Jesus despised and rejected of men. Rogers.

Vanity is the natural weakness of an ambitious man, which exposes him to the secret scorn and derision of those he converses with. Addison.

2. Contempt; scorn; a laughing-stock.

I am in derision daily; every one mocketh me.
Jer. xx. 7.

Thou makest us a reproach to our neighbours, a scorn and a derision to them that are round about us. Ps. xliv. 13.

Ensnar'd, assaulted, overcome; led bound,
Thy foes derision, captive, poor and blind,
Into a dungeon thrust. Milton, S. A.

DERI'SIVE.† adj. [from deride.] Mocking; scoffing.

His (Christ's) head harrowed with the thorns, and his derisive purple stained, yea drenched, with blood.
Bp. Ganden on the Sacrament, ed. 1688, p. 98.

O'er all the doom they quaff, they feast;
Derisive taunts were spread from guest to guest,
And each in jovial mood his mate addrest. Pope.

DERI'SIVELY.* adv. [from derisive.] In a mocking or contemptuous manner.

The Persians—[were] thence called Magussæi derisively by other Ethnicks.
Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 243.

DERI'SORY.† adj. [derisorius, Lat.] Mocking; ridiculing.

The comick or derisory manner is further still from making shew of method. Shaftesbury.

DERI'VABLE.† adj. [from derive.]

1. Attainable by right of descent or derivation.

God has declared this the eternal rule and standard of all honour derivable upon me, that those who honour him shall be honoured by him. South.

2. Deducible, as from a root, from a cause, from a principle.

The second sort of arguments, from ourselves, are derivable from some of these heads.
Wilkins on Prayer, ch. 4.

All these lamentable accidents were both subsequent upon, and derivable from a sin, which was fully pardoned. South, Serm. vi. 226.

To DE'RIVATE.* v. a. [Lat. derivo.] To derive. Obsolete. Huloet.

DERIVA'TION. n. s. [derivatio, Lat.]

1. A draining of water; a turning of its course.

When the water began to swell, it would every way discharge itself by any descents or declivities of the ground; and these issues and derivations being once made, and supplied with new waters pushing them forwards, would continue their course till they arrived at the sea, just as other rivers do. Burnet.

2. [In grammar.] The tracing of a word from its original.

Your lordship here seems to dislike my taking notice, that the derivation of the word Substance favours the idea we have of it; and your lordship tells me, that very little weight is to be laid on it, on a bare grammatical etymology. Locke.

3. The transmission of any thing from its source.

As touching traditional communication, and tradition of those truths that I call connatural and engraven, I do not doubt but many of those truths have had the help of that derivation.

Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

4. [In medicine.] The drawing of a humour from one part of the body to another.

Derivation differs from revulsion only in the measure of the distance, and the force of the medicines used; if we draw it to some very remote, or, it may be, contrary part, we call that revulsion; if only to some neighbouring place, and by gentle means we call it derivation.

Wiseman.

5. The thing deduced or derived: not used.

Most of them are the genuine derivations of the hypothesis they claim to. Glanville.

DERI'VATIVE. adj. [derivativus, Lat.] Derived or taken from another.

As it is a derivative perfection, so it is a distinct kind of perfection from that which is in God. Hale.

DERI'VATIVE. n. s. [from the adjective.] The thing or word derived or taken from another.

For honour,
'Tis a derivative from me to mine,
And only that I stand for. Shakspeare.

The word Honestus originally and strictly signifies no more than creditable, and is but a derivative from honour, which signifies credit or honour. South.

DERI'VATIVELY.† adv. [from derivative.] In a derivative manner.

Life is otherwise in God, than in the creatures; in him originally, in them derivatively.

Pearson on the Creed, Art. i.

To DERI'VE.† v. a. [deriver, Fr. from derivo, Latin.]

1. To turn the course of water from its channel.

Company lessens the shame of vice by sharing it, and abates the torrent of a common odium by deriving it into many channels. South.

2. To deduce; as from a root, from a cause, from a principle.

They endeavour to derive the varieties of colours from the various proportion of the direct progress or motion of these globules to their circumvolution, or motion about their own centre. Boyle.

Men derive their ideas of duration from their reflection on the train of ideas they observe to succeed one another in their own understandings. Locke.

From these two causes of the laxity and rigidity of the fibres, the methodists, an ancient set of physicians, derived all diseases of human bodies with a great deal of reason; for the fluids derive their qualities from the solids. Arbuthnot.

3. To communicate to another, as from the origin and source.

Christ having Adam's nature as we have, but incorrupt, deriveth not nature but incorruption, and that immediately from his own person, unto all that belong unto him. Hooker.

4. To receive by transmission.

This property seems rather to have been derived from the Pretorian soldiers. Decay of Piety.

The censers of these wretches, who, I am sure, could derive no sanctity to them from their own persons; yet upon this account that they had been consecrated by the offering incense in them, were, by God's special command, sequestered from all common use. South.

5. To communicate to by descent of blood.

Besides the readiness of parts, an excellent disposition of mind is derived to your lordship from the parents of two generations, to whom I have the honour to be known. Felton.

6. To spread; to diffuse gradually from one place to another.

The streams of the publick justice were derived into every part of the kingdom. Davies.

7. [In grammar.] To trace a word from its origin.

While we are deriving words from the Latin, we would not have the reader fancy that we owe all to the Latin, and have not many words that came down to us pure, and unmixed, directly from the Saxon, Danish, Belgick, and Teutonick languages, and their dialects. For many of those words which of old we received from the Latins, and likewise many of those which we have more lately received from them by the mediation, or assistance, of the French, Italian, or Spanish, with some small variation according to the diversity and idiom of each dialect, are common to us with the Saxons, Danes, &c. and thence have come directly down to us, though they may be originally Latin.

Greenwood's Essay on Eng. Gram. 1722, p. 199.

To DERI'VE. v. n.

1. To come from; to owe its origin to.

He that resists the power of Ptolemy,
Resists the pow'r of heav'n; for pow'r from heav'n
Derives, and monarchs rule by gods appointed.
Prior.

2. To descend from.

I am, my lord, as well deriv'd as he,
As well possest. Shakspeare.

DERI'VER. n. s. [from derive.] One that draws or fetches, as from the source or principle.

Such a one makes a man not only a partaker of other men's sins, but also a deriver of the whole intire guilt of them to himself. South.

DERN.† adj. [beapn, Saxon.]

1. Sad; solitary; and it is so used in the north of England. See DEARN, and DERNFUL. Dern is used by Chaucer for secret.

Now with their backs to the den's mouth they sit,
Yet shoulder not all light from the dern pit.

More, Immort. of the Soul, 1647, i. i. 10.

2. Barbarous; cruel. Obsolete, Dr. Johnson says. I could never find that the word was used in this sense.

DE'RNFUL.* adj. [from dern.] Mournful. Not in use.

The birds of ill presage this lucklesse chance foretold
By dernful noise.

Brysket, Mourning Muse of Thestylis.

DERNIE'R. adj. Last. It is a mere French word, and used only in the following phrase.

In the Imperial chamber, the term for the prosecution of an appeal is not circumscribed by the term of one or two years, as the law elsewhere requires in the Empire, this being the dernier resort and supreme court of judicature. Ayliffe.

DE'RNLY.* adv. [from dern.] See DEARNLY. Mournfully; anxiously. Obsolete.

Next stroke him should have slaine,
Had not the lady, which by him stood bound,
Dernly unto her called to abstaine
From doing him to dy. Spenser, F. Q.

To DE'ROGATE.† v. a. [derogo, Lat.]

1. To do an act so far contrary to a law or custom, as to diminish its former extent; distinguished from abrogate.

By several contrary customs and stiles used here, many of those civil and canon laws are controuled and derogated. Hale.

2. To lessen the worth of any person or thing; to disparage; to minish. Huloet.

To DE'ROGATE. v. n.

1 To detract; to lessen reputation, with from.

We should be injurious to virtue itself: if we did derogate from them whom their industry hath made great. Hooker.

2. To degenerate; to act beneath one's rank, or place, or birth.

Is there no derogation in't?
— You cannot derogate my lord. Shakspeare.

DE'ROGATE.† adj. [from the verb.] Degraded; damaged; lessened in value.

That he should obteyne, if he might, of the king, his father, his gracious pardon; whereby no law or justice should be derogate.

Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 102.

Into her womb convey sterility;
Dry up in her the organs of increase,
And from her derogate body never spring
A babe to honour her! Shakspeare, K. Lear.

DE'ROGATELY.* adv. [from derogate.] In a manner which lessens honour or respect.

I must be laugh'd at,
If, or for nothing, or a little, I
Should say myself offended; and with you
Chiefly i' the world: more laugh'd at, that I should
Once name you derogately, when to sound your name
It not concern'd me. Shaksp. Ant. and Cleop.

DEROGA'TION. n. s. [derogatio, Lat.]

1. The act of weakening or restraining a former law or contract.

It was indeed but a wooing ambassage, with good respects to entertain the king in good affection; but nothing was done or handled to the derogation of the king's late treaty with the Italians. Bacon.

That which enjoins the deed is certainly God's law; and it is also certain, that the scripture, which allows of the will, is neither the derogation nor relaxation of that law. South.

2. A defamation; detraction; the act of lessening or taking away the honour of any person or thing. Sometimes with to, properly with from.

Which, though never so necessary, they could not easily now admit, without some fear of derogation from their credit; and therefore that which once they had done, they became for ever after resolute to maintain. Hooker.

So surely he is a very brave man, neither is that any thing which I speak to his derogation; for in that I said he is a mingled people, it is no dispraise. Spenser on Ireland.

The wisest princes need not think it any diminution to their greatness, or derogation to their sufficiency, to rely upon counsel. Bacon.

I say not this in derogation to Virgil, neither do I contradict any thing which I have formerly said in his just praise. Dryden.

None of these patriots will think it a derogation from their merit to have it said, that they received many lights and advantages from their intimacy with my lord Somers. Addison.

DERO'GATIVE. adj. [derogativus, Lat.] Detracting; lessening the honour of: not in use.

That spirits are corporeal seems to me a conceit derogative to himself, and such as he should rather labour to overthrow; yet thereby he establisheth the doctrine of lustrations, amulets, and charms. Brown, Vulg. Err.

DERO'GATORILY.† adv. [from derogatory.] In a detracting manner. Dict.

He was of a high rough spirit, and spake derogatorily of Sir Amias Pawlet. Aubrey, of Cardinal Wolsey, Anec. ii. 587.

DERO'GATORINESS. n. s. [from derogatory.] The act of derogating. Dict.

DERO'GATORY.† adj. [derogatorius, Latin; derogatoire, Fr.] Detractious; that lessens the honour of; dishonourable. With to or from; and formerly with against.

They live and die in their absurdities, passing their days in perverted apprehensions and conceptions of the world, derogatory unto God and the wisdom of the creation. Brown.

Who seeth not that it is but a meer mockery to make them, [rules,] to the end their bulls and dispensations may have as many clauses derogatory against them. Harmar, Tr. of Beza's Serm. p. 161.

New detestable doctrines, derogatory to the blood of Christ, which moderate men even of her own [Rome's] subjects detest. Bp. Bedell, Serm. on Revel. xviii. 14.

These deputed beings are derogatory from the wisdom and power of the Author of Nature, who doubtless can govern this machine he could create, by more direct and easy methods than employing these subservient divinities. Cheyne.

DE'RRING.* adj. [Sax. ðeꝛꝛan, to dare.] Daring. Spenser uses this word repeatedly with do and doers; and once as a substantive, for competition. But these terms have long been obsolete. See To DERE. The contemporary commentator on Spenser calls derring do "manhood and chivalry."

All mightie men and dreadfull derring doers. Spenser, F. Q. iv. ii. 38.

DE'RVIS.† n. s. [dervis, French, Dr. Johnson says. But this word requires further notice. In the Persian language, the dervis means a beggar, or poor man; and is written dervich. The word has been assimilated to our druids and witches, in a passage too curious to be here omitted: "Monachorum etiam et sacerdotum genus apud Turcas ab antiquissimis temporibus conservatum, Dervis, et nomine et re Druides, refert. Eadem enim populo præstare pollicentur, quæ Druides majoribus nostris, ut ex iis elucet, quæ Turnefort in Itinerario Orientali, tom. ii. p. 393. habet. Dervis autem eodem modo à Druidibus derivatur, quo Anglorum Witch, magus incantator; quod sonus et genuina pronunciatio magis evincit, quàm literarum scriptura." Keysler, Antiq. Septentr. et Celticæ. Hanov. 1720, p. 152.] A Turkish priest, or monk.

Even there, where Christ vouchsaf'd to teach,
Their dervises dare an impostor preach. Sandys.

The dervis at first made some scruple of violating his promise to the dying brachman; but told him, at last, that he could conceal nothing from so excellent a prince. Spectator.

DE'SART.* See DESERT.

DE'SCANT.† n. s. [discanto, Italian, Dr. Johnson says. But the Italians have not that word. Biscanto is their expression, as Mr. Malone also observes. Our word is probably from the old French deschant, "a descant; deschanter, to descant, or sing descant." Cotgrave, and Sherwood. Lat. decanto.]

1. A song or tune composed in parts; a variety of sounds produced by an instrument or voice. See To DESCANT.

Neither shall the sweete organs — be played upon, — nor yet the freshe descante, prycksonge, counterpoint, and faburden be called for. Bale on the Revel. P. iii. 1550, sign. B. 8.

Nay, now you are too flat,
And mar the concord with too harsh a descant. Shakspeare.

The wakeful nightingale,
She all night long her amorous descant sung. Milton, P. L.

He that at midnight should hear, as I have often done, the sweet descants, the natural rising and falling, the doubling and redoubling, of the nightingale's voice, might well be lifted above earth. Walton's Angler.

2. A discourse; a disputation; a disquisition branched out into several divisions or heads. It is commonly used as a word of censure or contempt. Adopted from the musical sense, of running a descant or division.

Look you get a prayer-book in your hand,
And stand between two churchmen, good my lord;
For on that ground I'll build a holy descant. Shakspeare.

We whet our malice and arrogance upon one another, by applauding each other in censuring those above, in running spiteful descants on their actions, and arraigning their mal-administration at the tribunal of our majesty. Scott's Works, ii. 37.

Kindness would supplant our unkind reportings, and severe descants upon our brethren. Government of the Tongue.

To DE'SCANT.† v. n. [from the noun.]

1. To sing in parts; to run a division or variety upon notes with the voice or instrument.

2. To discourse at large; to make speeches: in a sense of censure or contempt. From the musical sense.

Why I, in this weak piping time of peace,
Have no delight to pass away the time;
Unless to spy my shadow in the sun,
And descant on mine own deformity. Shakspeare, Rich. III.

Upon which plain-song of the poets I thus descant. Spencer on Prodigies, p. 63.

Com'st thou for this, vain boaster to survey me,
To descant on my strength, and give thy verdict. Milton, S. A.

A virtuous man should be pleased to find people descanting upon his actions, because, when they are thoroughly canvassed and examined, they turn to his honour. Addison.

DESCA'NTING.* n. s. [from descant.] Remark; conjecture; guess.

If mysteries were received rather in the simplicity in which they are delivered in the Scriptures, than according to the descantings of fanciful men upon them, they would not appear much more incredible than some of the common objects of sense and perception. Burnet, Life of Ld. Rochester, p. 107.

To DESCE'ND. v. n. [descendo, Lat.]

1. To go downwards; to come from a higher place to a lower; to fall; to sink.

The rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell not, for it was founded upon a rock. Matt. vii. 25.

The brook that descended out of the mount. Deut. ix. 21.

He cleft his head with one descending blow. Dryden.

Foul with stains
Of gushing torrents and descending rains. Addison.

O goddess! who, descending from the skies,
Vouchsaf'd thy presence to my wond'ring eyes. Pope.

2. To come down, in a popular sense, implying only an arrival at one place from another.

He shall descend into battle, and perish. 1 Sam. xxvi. 10.

3. To come suddenly or violently; to fall upon as from an eminence.

For the pious sire preserve the son;
His wish'd return with happy pow'r befriend,
And on the suitors let thy wrath descend. Pope.

4. To go down, in a figurative sense.

[He] with holiest meditations fed,
Into himself descended. Milton, P. R.

5. To make an invasion.

The goddess gives th' alarm; and soon is known
The Grecian fleet, descending on the town. Dryd.

A foreign son upon the shore descends,
Whose martial fame from pole to pole extends. Dryden.

6. To proceed as from an original; to be derived from.

Despair descends from a mean original; the offspring of fear, laziness, and impatience. Collier against Despair.

Will. is younger brother to a baronet, and descended of the ancient family of the Wimbles. Addison.

7. To fall in order of inheritance to a successor.

Should we allow that all the property, all the estate of the father, ought to descend to the eldest son; yet the father's natural dominion, the paternal power, cannot descend unto him by inheritance. Locke.

The inheritance of both rule over men and property, in things sprung from the same original, and were to descend by the same rules. Locke.

Our author provides for the descending and conveyance down of Adam's monarchical power to posterity, by the inheritance of his heir, succeeding to his father's authority. Locke.

8. To extend a discourse from general to particular considerations.

Congregations discerned the small accord that was among themselves, when they descended to particulars. Decay of Piety.

To DESCE'ND. v. a. To walk downward upon any place.

He ended, and they both descend the hill;
Descended, Adam to the bower, where Eve
Lay sleeping. Milton, P. L.

In all our journey through the Alps, as well when we climbed as when we descended them, we had still a river running along with the road. Addison.

In the midst of this plain stands a high hill, so so very steep, that there would be no mounting or descending it, were not it made up of a loose crumbled earth. Addison.

DESCE'NDANT. n. s. [descendant, Fr. decendens, Lat.] The offspring of an ancestor; he that is in the line of generation at whatever distance.

The descendants of Neptune were planted there. Bacon.

O, true descendant of a patriot line,
Vouchsafe this picture of thy soul to see. Dryden.

He revealed his own will and their duty, in a more ample manner than it had been declared to any of my descendants before them. Atterbury.

DESCE'NDENT. adj. [decendens, Latin. It seems to be established that the substantive should derive the termination from the French, and the adjective from the Latin.]

1. Falling; sinking; coming down; descending.

There is a regress of the sap in plants from above downwards; and this descendent juice is that which principally nourishes both fruit and plant. Ray on the Creation.

2. Proceeding from another as an original or ancestor.

More than mortal grace
Speaks thee descendent of ethereal race, Pope.

DESCE'NDER.* n. s. [from descend.] One who descends.

From among the descenders into the pit, or from going down. Hammond's Works, vol. iv. p. 93.

DESCENDIBI'LITY.* n. s. [from descendible.] Conformity to the rules of descent.

He must necessarily take the crown subject to these laws, and with all its inherent properties; the first and principal of which was its descendibility. Blackstone.

DESCE'NDIBLE. adj. [from descend.]

1. Such as may be descended; such as may admit of a passage downwards.

2. Transmissible by inheritance.

According to the customs of other countries those honorary fees and infeudations were descendible to the eldest, and not to all the males. Hale, Com. Law of Eng.

DESCE'NSION. n. s. [descensio, Lat.]

1. The act of going downwards, falling or sinking; descent.

2. A declension; a degradation.

From a god to a bull! a heavy descension:
It was Jove's case. From a prince to a 'prentice!
A low transformation: that shall be mine. Shaksp.

3. [In astronomy.] Right descension is the arch of the equator, which descends with the sign or star below the horizon of a direct sphere.

Oblique descension is the arch of the equator, which descends with the sign below the horizon of an oblique sphere. Ozanam.

DESCE'NSIONAL. adj. [from descension.] Relating to descent.

DESCE'NSIVE.* adj. [from descension.] Descending; having power to descend. Sherwood.

DESCE'NT. n. s. [decensus, Lat. descente, French.]

1. The act of passing from a higher to a lower place.

Why do fragments, from a mountain rent,
Tend to the earth with such a swift descent?
Blackmore.

2. Progress downwards.

Observing such gradual and gentle descents downwards, in those parts of the creation that are beneath men, the rule of analogy may make it probable, that it is so also in things above. Locke.

3. Obliquity; inclination.

The heads and sources of rivers flow upon a descent, or an inclining plane, without which they could not flow at all. Woodward, Nat. Hist. P. iii.

4. Lowest place.

From th' extremest upward of thy head,
To the descent and dust below thy feet. Shaksp.

5. Fall from a higher state; degradation.

O foul descent, that I who erst contended
With gods to sit the highest, am now constrain'd,
Into a beast; and, mix'd with bestial slime
This essence to incarnate and imbrute.
Milton, P. L.

6. Invasion; hostile entrance into a kingdom: in allusion to the height of ships.

At the first descent on shore, he was not immured with a wooden vessel, but he did countenance the landing in his long-boat. Wotton.

The duke was general himself, and made that unfortunate descent upon the Isle of Rhee, which was attended with a miserable retreat, in which the flower of the army was lost. Clarendon.

Arise, true judges, in your own defence,
Controul those foplings, and declare for sense;
For should the fools prevail, they stop not there,
But make their next descent upon the fair.
Dryden.

7. Transmission of any thing by succession and inheritance.

If the agreement and consent of men first gave a sceptre into any one's hand, that also must direct its descent and conveyance. Locke.

8. The state of proceeding from an original or progenitor.

All of them, even without such a particular claim, had great reason to glory in their common descent from Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, to whom the promise of the blessed seed was severally made. Atterbury.

9. Birth; extraction; process of lineage.

I give my voice on Richard's side,
To bar my master's heirs in true descent!
God knows, I will not do it. Shakspeare.

Turnus, for high descent and graceful mien,
Was first, and favour'd by the Latian queen.
Dryden.

10. Offspring; inheritors; those proceeding in the line of generation.

If care of our descent perplex us most,
Which must be born to certain woe. Milton, P. L.

From him
His whole descent, who thus shall Canaan win.
Milton, P. L.

11. A single step in the scale of genealogy; a generation.

No man living is a thousand descents removed from Adam himself. Hooker.

Then all the sons of these five brethren reign'd
By due success, and all their nephews late,
Even thrice eleven descents the crown retain'd,
Till aged Heli by due heritage it gain'd.
Spenser, F. Q.

12. A rank in the scale of subordination.

How have I then, with whom to hold converse,
Save with the creatures which I made, and those
To me inferiour; infinite descents
Beneath what other creatures are to thee?
Milton, P. L.

DESCRI'BABLE.* adj. [from describe.] That may be described.

Keill has reckoned up in the human body four hundred and forty-six muscles, dissectible and describable; and has assigned a use to every one of the number. Paley, Nat. Theol. ch. 9.

To DESCRI'BE.† v. a. [describo, Lat.]

1. To delineate; to mark out; to trace: as, a torch waved about the head describes a circle.

They [maps] are most commonly described upon a parallelogram.
Gregory's Posthuma, (1650,) p. 312.

Describe the skies,
And where the stars descended, and where they rise. Dryden, Virgil.

2. To mark out any thing by the mention of its properties.

I pray thee, overname them; and as thou nam'st them, I will describe them; and according to my description, level at my affection. Shakspeare.

He that writes well in verse will often send his thoughts in search, through all the treasure of words that express any one idea in the same language, that so he may comport with the measures or the rhyme, or with his own most beautiful and vivid sentiments of the thing he describes. Watts.

3. To distribute into proper heads or divisions.

Men passed through the land, and described it by cities into seven parts in a book. Jos. xviii. 9.

4. To define in a lax manner by the promiscuous mention of qualities general and peculiar. See DECRIPTION.

One out of its many beauties you may see not ill described by Mr. Whately, under the name of the New Weir. Gray.

DESCRI'BER.† n. s. [from describe.] One that describes.

From a plantation and colony, and island near Spain was by the Greek describers named Erythra. Brown.

The longitudes in Mr. Camden, Speed, Norden, and the late English describers, generally are taken from Mercator's first meridian, by S. Michael in the Azores. Gregory's Posthuma, p. 314.

I would the infection had stopped with the periods of its description, or life of the describer. Whitlock, Mann. of the Eng. p. 162.

DESCRI'ER. n. s. [from the verb.] A discoverer; a detecter.

The glad descrier shall not miss
To taste the nectar of a kiss. Crashaw.

DESCRI'PT.* See NON-DESCRIPT.

DESCRI'PTION.† n. s. [descriptio, Lat.]

1. The act of delineating or expressing any person or thing by perceptible properties.

The description is either of the earth and water both together; and it is done by circles; or of the water considered by itself; and is not so much a description of that, as of the mariner's course upon it, or to shew the way of a ship upon the sea. Gregory's Posthuma, Use of the Terr. Globe, p. 257.

2. The sentence or passage in which any thing is described.

A poet must refuse all tedious and unnecessary descriptions; a robe which is too heavy, is less an ornament than a burthen. Dryden.

Sometimes misguided by the tuneful throng,
I look for streams immortaliz'd in song,
That lost in silence and oblivion lie,
Dumb are their fountains, and their channels dry,
That run for ever by the muse's skill,
And in the smooth description murmur still.
Addison.

3. A lax definition.

The sort of definition, which is made up of a mere collection of the most remarkable parts or properties, is called an imperfect definition, or a description; whereas the definition is called perfect when it is composed of the essential difference, added to general nature or genus. Watts.

4. The qualities expressed in a description.

I'll pay six thousand, and deface the bond,
Before a friend of this description
Shall lose a hair. Shakspeare, Merch. of Ven.

DESCRI'PTIVE.* adj. [from description.] Expressing any person or thing by perceptible qualities.

I shall produce some noble lines which begin the ninth book of Lucan's Pharsalia, descriptive of the apotheosis of Pompey. Looker-On, No. 31.

To DESCRI'VE.* v. a. [Ital. descrivere; old Fr. descrire; "descripvrai, je décrirai." Roq.] To describe. Not now in use.

We may judge and descryve the dyversyte of e synne from an other. Bp. Fisher, Ps. 89.

Whoever is the mother of one chylde,
Which having long thought dead she finds alive,
Let her by proofe of that which she hath fylde
In her own breast, this mother's joy descrive.
Spenser, F. Q. vi. xii. 21.

To DESCRY'.† v. a. [descrier, Fr.]

1. To give notice of any thing suddenly discovered; as, the scout descried the enemy, or gave notice of their approach. This sense is now obsolete, but gave occasion to those which are now in use.

I cannot blame the Egyptian, that he was so easily induced to descry these unkind Amalekites to merciful Israelites.
Bp. Hall, Contempl. on 1 Sam. xxx.

2. To spy out; to examine at a distance.

And the house of Joseph sent to descry Bethel.
Judg. i. 23.

Edmund, I think, is gone to descry
The strength o' the enemy. Shakspeare.

Our merchants, to their great charges, set forth fleets to descry the seas. Abbot.

3. To detect; to find out any thing concealed.

Of the king they got a sight after dinner in a gallery, and of the queen mother at her own table; in neither place descried, no, not by Cadinet, who had been lately ambassador in England. Wotton.

4. To discover; to perceive by the eye; to see any thing distant or obscure.

Thus dight, into the court he took his way;
Both through the guard, which never him descry'd,
And through the watchmen, who him never spy'd.
Spenser, Hubb. Tale.

The spirit of deep prophecy she hath;
What's past and what's to come she can descry.
Shakspeare.

That planet would, unto our eyes, descrying only that part whereon the light falls, appear to be horned, as the moon seems. Ralegh.

And now their way to earth they had descry'd,
To Paradise first tending. Milton, P. L.

Although the motion of light be not descried, no argument can be made from thence to prove that light is not a body. Digby.

A tow'r so high, it seem'd to reach the sky,
Stood on the roof, from whence we could descry
All Ilium. Denham.

Once more at least look back, said I,
Thyself in that large glass descry. Prior.

DESCRY'. n. s. [from the verb.] Discovery; thing discovered.

How near's the other army?
— Near, and on speedy foot, the main descry
Stands in the hourly thought. Shakspeare.

To DE'SECATE.* v. a. [Lat. deseco.] To cut off; to cut away; to mow. Cockeram.

To DE'SECRATE.† v. a. [dessacrer, old Fr. desacro, Latin. Our word is perhaps a century older than the example given by Dr. Johnson, who cites the authority only of Salmon.] To divert from the purpose to which any thing is consecrated; to apply to a wrong use.

If we do venture to swear without due advice and care, without much respect and awe, upon any slight or vain (not to say bad and unlawful) occasion, we then desecrate swearing, and are guilty of profaning a most sacred ordinance.
Barrow, Serm. vol. i. S. 15.

Judas Maccabæus, diligently seeking every corner of the temple for oil, at length found a jar full, which was sealed with the high priest's seal, and had never fallen into the desecrating hands of the enemy. L. Addison, State of the Jews, p. 190.

The founders of monasteries imprecated evil on those who should desecrate their donations.
Salmon, Survey.

DESECRA'TION.† n. s. [from desecrate.] The abolition of consecration.

They sentenced him [Zoilus] to suffer by fire, as the due reward of his desecrations.
Parnell, Life of Zoilus.

DE'SERT.† n. s. [desertum, Latin; Fr. desert, which Cotgrave renders "a desart;" a method of spelling this substantive, which obtained formerly; for Sandys also writes "desart-haunting," in his Paraphrase of Lamentations, p. 8. And so Sir T. Herbert, in the example which I add. In several publications of modern times the word has also been so given; as in Steevens's edition of Shakspeare, &c.] A wilderness; solitude; waste country; uninhabited place.

Be alive again,
And dare me to the desert with thy sword.
If trembling I inhibit; then protest me
The baby of a girl. Shakspeare.

Last night we crost over an inhospitable sandy desart, which was ten miles broad.
Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 170.

He, looking round on every side, beheld
A pathless desert, dusk with horrid shades.
Milton, P. R.

DE'SERT. adj. [desertus, Lat.] Wild; waste; solitary; uninhabited; uncultivated; untilled.

I have words
That would be howl'd out in the desert air,
Where hearing should not catch them. Shaksp.

He found him in a desert land, and in the waste howling wilderness. Deut. xxxii. 10.

The promises and bargains between two men in a desert island are binding to them, though they are perfectly in a state of nature, in reference to one another. Locke.

To DESE'RT. v. a. [deserter, Fr. desero, Lat.]

1. To forsake; to fall away from; to quit meanly or treacherously; to abandon.

I do not remember one man, who heartily wished the passing of that bill, that ever deserted them till the kingdom was in a flame. Dryden.

2. To leave; to abandon.

What is it that holds and keeps the orbs in fixed stations and intervals, against an incessant and inherent tendency to desert them. Bentley.

To DESE'RT.* v. n. To quit the army, or regiment, in which one is enlisted.

If any militia man, having joined the corps, shall desert during the time of annual exercise, &c.
Stat. Militia Act.

DESE'RT. n. s. [properly dessert: the word is originally French.] The last course; the fruit or sweetmeats with which a feast is concluded. See DESSERT.

DESE'RT.† n. s. [old Fr. deserte, "recompence." Lacombe. Or the participle of deserve; deserv'd, desert.

1. Qualities or conduct considered with respect to rewards or punishments; degree of merit or demerit.

Being of necessity a thing common, it is, through the manifold persuasions, dispositions, and occasions of men, with equal desert both of praise and dispraise, shunned by some, by others desired.
Hooker.

The base o' th' mount
Is rank'd with all deserts, all kind of natures,
That labour on the bosom of this sphere
To propagate their states. Shakspeare.

Use every man after his desert, and who shall 'scape whipping? Shakspeare.

2. Proportional merit; claim to reward.

All desert imports an equality between the good conferred and the good deserved, or made due.
South.

3. Excellence; right to reward; virtue.

More to move you,
Take my deserts to his, and join them both. Shaks.

DESE'RTER.† n. s. [Lat. desertor.]

1. He that has forsaken his cause or his post: commonly in an ill sense.

The members of both houses, who at first withdrew, were counted deserters, and outed of their places in parliament. King Charles.

Streight to their ancient cells, recall'd from air,
The reconcil'd deserters will repair. Dryden.

Hosts of deserters, who your honour sold,
And basely broke your faith for bribes of gold.
Dryden.

2. He that leaves the army in which he is inlisted.

They are the same deserters, whether they stay in our own camp, or run over to the enemy's.
Decay of Piety.

A deserter, who came out of the citadel, says the garrison is brought to the utmost necessity.
Tatler, No. 59.

3. He that forsakes another; an abandoner.

The fair sex, if they had the deserter in their power, would certainly have shewn him more mercy than the Bacchanals did Orpheus.
Dryden.

Thou, false guardian of a charge too good,
Thou mean deserter of thy brother's blood. Pope.

DESE'RTFUL.* adj. [desert and full.] High in desert; meritorious.

My Lords, how much your country owes you both,
The due reward of your desertful glories
Must to posterity remain.
Beaum. and Fl. Laws of Candy.

But to another task the author's pen
Hath been employ'd, in this desertful book.
Verses prefixed to Verstegan's Rest of Dec. Intelligence.

DESE'RTION.† n. s. [Fr. desertion, Lat. desertio.]

1. The act of forsaking or abandoning a cause or post.

Every compliance that we are persuaded to by one, is a contradiction to the commands of the other; and our adherence to one, will necessarily involve us in a desertion of the other. Rogers.

2. [In theology.] Spiritual despondency; a sense of the dereliction of God; an opinion that grace is withdrawn.

Whiles thou, O Saviour, shalt enable me to say, My God, I shall hope never to sink under thy desertions. Bp. Hall, Contempl. B. 4.

Christ hears and sympathizes with the spiritual agonies of a soul under desertion, or the pressures of some stinging affliction. South.

3. Quitting the army or regiment, in which one is enlisted.

Desertion from the king's armies in time of war is, by the standing law of the land, made felony.
Blackstone.

DESE'RTLESS.† adj. [from desert.] Without merit; without claim to favour or reward.

It stays not long on thy desertless arm.
Beaum. and Fl. Wit at Sev. Weapons.

As if he had been giving some boon or begged office to a sort of his desertless grooms.
Milton, Eiconoclastes.

She said she lov'd;
Lov'd me desertless, who, with shame, confest
Another flame had seiz'd upon my breast. Dryden.

DESE'RTLESSLY.* adv. [from desertless.] Undeservedly.

But now people will call you valiant, desertlessly I think; yet, for their satisfaction, I will have you fight with me.
Beaum. and Fl. King and no King.

DESE'RTRICE.* n. s. [from deserter.] She who forsakes her duty.

Cleave to a wife; but let her be a wife, let her be a meet help, a solace, not a nothing, not an adversary, not a desertrice. Milton, Tetrachordon.

To DESE'RVE. v. a. [deservir, Fr.] To be worthy of either good or ill.

Those they honoured, as having power to work or cease, as men deserved of them. Hooker.

What he deserves of you and me I know. Shaks.

Yet well, if here would end
The misery: I deserv'd it, and would bear
My own deservings. Milton, P. L.

A mother cannot give him death, though he Deserves it, he deserves it not from me. Dryden.

Since my Orazia's death I have not seen
A beauty so deserving to be queen. Dryden.

To DESE'RVE. v. a. To be worthy of reward.

According to the rule of natural justice one man may merit and deserve of another. South.

Courts are the places where best manners flourish,
Where the deserving ought to rise. Otway.

DESE'RVEDLY. adv. [from deserve.] Worthily; according to desert, whether of good or evil.

For him I was not sent, nor yet to free
That people victor once, now vile and base,
Deservedly made vassal. Milton, P. R.

A man deservedly cuts himself off from the affections of that community which he endeavours to subvert. Addison.

DESE'RVER.† n. s. [from deserve.] A man who merits rewards. It is used, I think, only in a good sense, Dr. Johnson says. It is, however, used in an ill sense by Archbishop Laud.

Their love is never link'd to the deserver,
Till his deserts are pass'd. Shakspeare.

Be very careful, that it be not done upon any pretence whatsoever, for the man certainly is an ill deserver.

Abp. Laud, Hist. of his Ch. at Ox. p. 186.

Heavy, with some high minds, is an overweight of obligation; or otherwise great deservers do perchance grow intolerable presumers. Wotton.

Emulation will never be wanting amongst poets, when particular rewards and prizes are proposed to the best deservers. Dryden.

DESE'RVING.* n. s. [from deserve.] Desert; degree of merit or demerit.

We are accounted righteous before God, only for the merit of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ by faith, and not for our own works or deservings.

Articles of Religion, Art. 11.

All friends shall taste
The wages of their virtue, and all foes
The cup of their deservings. Shakspeare.

I deserv'd it, and would bear
My own deservings. Milton, P. L.

He had been a person of great deservings from the republick, was an admirable speaker, and very popular. Swift.

DESE'RVINGLY.* adv. [from deserving.] Worthily; according to good desert.

We have raised Sejanus, from obscure and almost unknown gentry, to the highest and most conspicuous point of greatness; and, we hope, deservingly. B. Jonson, Sejanus.

DESHABI'LLE.* See DISHABILLE.

DESI'CCANTS. n. s. [from desiccate.] Applications that dry up the flow of sores; driers.

This, in the beginning, may be prevented by desiccants, and wasted. Wiseman.

To DESI'CCATE. v. a. [desicco, Lat.]

1. To dry up; to exhaust of moisture.

In bodies desiccated by heat or age, when the native spirit goeth forth, and the moisture with it, the air with time getteth into the pores. Bacon.

Seminal ferments were elevated from the sea, or some desiccated places thereof, by the heat of the sun. Hale.

2. To exhale moisture.

Where there is moisture enough, or superfluous, there wine helpeth to digest and desiccate the moisture. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

To DESI'CCATE.* v. n. To grow dry; to be drained of moisture.

It is also accounted amongst the Greeks themselves, as a miracle and particular grace and favour of God to the bodies of such whom they have canonized for saints to continue unconsumed, and in the moist damps of a vault to dry and desiccate like the mummies in Egypt.

Ricaut, Greek Church, p. 277.

DESICCA'TION. n. s. [from desiccate.] The act of making dry; the state of being dried.

If the spirits issue out of the body, there followeth desiccation, induration, and consumption. Bacon.

DESI'CCATIVE.† adj. [Fr. desiccatif, Cotgrave.] That has the power of drying.

All those authors that have written of mineral waters, do generally agree, that they are of a desiccative or drying nature.

Ferrand, Love Melancholy, (1640,) p. 358.

DESI'CCATIVE.* n. s. A dryer; that which has the quality of absorbing moistures.

The ashes of a hedgehog are said to be a great desiccative of fistulas. Bacon, Nat. Hist. No. 979.

DESI'DERATE. v. a. [desidero, Latin.] To want; to miss; to desire in absence. A word scarcely used.

Eclipses are of wonderful assistance toward the solution of this so desirable and so much desiderated problem. Cheyne.

DESI'DERATUM. [Latin.] Somewhat which enquiry has not yet been able to settle or discover; as, the longitude is the desideratum of navigation. The trisection of an angle, and the quadrature of a circle, are the desiderata of geometry.

DESI'DIOSE. adj. [desidiosus, Lat.] Idle; lazy; heavy. Dict.

To DESI'GN. v. a. [designo, Latin; desseigner, Fr.]

1. To purpose; to intend any thing.

2. To form or order with a particular purpose: with for.

The acts of religious worship were purposely designed for the acknowledgement of a being, whom the most excellent creatures are bound to adore as well as we. Stillingfleet.

You are not for obscurity design'd,
But, like the sun, must cheer all human kind. Dryden.

3. To devote intentionally: with to.

One of those places was designed by the old man to his son. Clarendon.

He was born to the inheritance of a splendid fortune; he was designed to the study of the law. Dryden.

4. To plan; to project; to form in idea.

We are to observe whether the picture or outlines be well drawn, or, as more elegant artizans term it, well designed; then, whether it be well coloured, which be the two general heads. Wotton.

Thus while they speed their pace, the prince designs
The new elected seat, and draws the lines. Dryd.

5. To mark out by particular tokens; little used.

'Tis not enough to make a man a subject, to convince him that there is regal power in the world; but there must be ways of designing and knowing the person to whom this regal power of right belongs. Locke.

DESI'GN.† n. s. [Fr. desseing.]

1. An intention; a purpose.

Leave these sad designs
To him that hath more cause to be a mourner.

Shakspeare, K. Rich. III.

2. A scheme; a plan of action.

Is he a prudent man, as to his temporal estate, that lays designs only for a day, without any prospect to the remaining part of his life? Tillotson.

3. A scheme formed to the detriment of another.

A sedate settled design upon another man's life, put him in a state of war with him against whom he has declared such an intention. Locke.

4. The idea which an artist endeavours to execute or express.

I doubt not but in the designs of several Greek medals one may often see the hand of an Apelles or Protogenes. Addison.

Thy hand strikes out some new design,
Where life awakes and dawns at every line. Pope.

DESI'GNABLE. adj. [designo, Lat.] Distinguishable; capable to be particularly marked out.

The power of all natural agents is limited: the mover must be confined to observe these proportions, and cannot pass over all these infinite designable degrees in an instant. Digby.

DE'SIGNATE.* adj. [Lat. designatus.] Marked out; chosen; appointed. See DESIGNATION.

Richard Plantagenet, duke of Glocester, and king of England, — was the younger son of Sir Richard Plantagenet, the fourth duke of that royal family, and king of England, designate by king Henry the sixth, and by the most noble senate and universal synod of this kingdom, the high court of parliament.

Sir G. Buck, Hist of Rich. III. (1646,) p. 3.

To DE'SIGNATE.* v. a. [Lat. designo.] To point out; to distinguish. The adjective appears to be of considerable age in our language; but the verb, I think, is not so. Neither of them is noticed by Dr. Johnson.

Of these [faults] so few examples occur, that it would be invidious to designate them.

Brit. Crit. Jul. 1801.

DESIGNA'TION. n. s. [designatio, Lat.]

1. The act of pointing or marking out by some particular token.

This is a plain designation of the duke of Marlborough: one kind of stuff used to fatten land is called marle, and every body knows that borough is a name for a town. Swift.

2. Appointment; direction.

William the Conqueror forbore to use that claim in the beginning, but mixed it with a titulary pretence, grounded upon the will and designation of Edward the Confessor. Bacon.

3. Import; intention.

Finite and infinite seem to be looked upon by the mind as the modes of quantity, and to be attributed primarily in their first designation only to those things which have parts, and are capable of increase or diminution. Locke.

DE'SIGNATIVE.* adj. [Fr. designatif.] Appointing; shewing; declaring. Cotgrave.

DESI'GNEDLY. adv. [from design.] Purposely; intentionally; by design or purpose; not ignorantly; not inadvertently; not fortuitously.

Uses made things: that is to say, some things were made designedly, and on purpose for such an use as they serve to. Ray on the Creation.

The next thing is sometimes designedly to put children in pain; but care must be taken that this be done when the child is in good humour. Locke.

DESI'GNER.† n. s. [from design.]

1. One that designs, intends, or purposes; a purposer.
2. A plotter; a contriver; one that lays schemes.

The meanest worldly interest of the ambitious or covetous designer. Hammond of Conscience.

It has therefore always been both the rule and practice for such designers to suborn the publick interest, to countenance and cover their private. Decay of Piety.

3. One that forms the idea of any thing in painting or sculpture.

There is a great affinity between designing and poetry; for the Latin poets, and the designers of the Roman medals, lived very near one another, and were bred up to the same relish for wit and fancy. Addison.

4. One that plans a building, a garden, or the like. Unnoticed by Dr. Johnson.

The giant being a man of extraordinary dimensions, it was impossible to do this affair [to measure him by a quadrant] any other way than your designers use when they take the height of a country steeple. Reasons of Mr. Bays changing his Religion, (1688,) Pref.

In pursuance of our present taste in gardening, every good painter of landscape appears to me the most proper designer. Shenstone, Thoughts on Gardening.

Kent, and other designers of this century, [the eighteenth,] must have had an idea of the thing intended. Graves, Recollect. of Shenstone, p. 64.

DESI'GNFULNESS.* n. s. [design and fulness.] Abundance of design, formed to the detriment of another.

All the portraiture of human nature is drawn over with the dusky shades and irregular features of base designfulness and malicious cunning. Barrow, Serm. vol. ii. S. 7.

DESI'GNING. part. adj. [from design.] Insidious; treacherous; deceitful; fraudulently artful.

'Twould shew me poor, indebted, and compelled,
Designing, mercenary; and I know
You would not wish to think I could be bought. Southerne.

DESI'GNING. n. s. [from design.] The art of delineating the appearance of natural objects.

Whether France and Flanders could have drawn so much money from England for figured silks, lace, and tapestry, if they had not had academies for designing? Bp. Berkeley, Querist, § 65.

DESI'GNLESS.† adj. [from design.]

1. Without intention; without design; unknowing; inadvertent.
2. Without scheme or project.

That designless love of sinning and ruining his own soul. Hammond's Works, iv. 513.

DESI'GNLESSLY. adv. [from designless.] Without intention; ignorantly; inadvertently.

In this great concert of his whole creation, the designlessly conspiring voices are as differing as the conditions of the respetive singers. Boyle.

DESI'GNMENT. n. s. [from design.]

1. A purpose and intent.

The sanctity of the Christian religion excludes fraud and falsehood from the designments and aims of its first promulgators. Decay of Piety.

'Tis a greater credit to know the ways of captivating nature, and making her subserve our purposes and designments, than to have learned all the intrigues of policy. Glanville.

2. A scheme of hostility.

News, lords, our wars are done:
The desperate tempest hath so bang'd the Turks,
That their designment halts. Shakspeare.

She received advice both of the king's desperate estate, and of the duke's designments against her. Hayward.

3. The idea or sketch of a work.

The scenes which represent cities and countries are not really such, but only painted on boards and canvas; but shall that excuse the ill painture or designment of them? Dryden.

When absent, yet we conquer'd in his right;
For though that some mean artist's skill were shewn
In mingling colours, or in placing light,
Yet still the fair designment was his own. Dryden.

DE'SINENCE.* n. s. [Fr. desinence, from desino, Lat.] A close; an ending. Sherwood.

In their poesies, the fettering together the series of the verses, with the bonds of like cadence or desinence of rhyme, which if it be unusually abrupt, and not dependent in sense upon so near affinity of words, I know not what a loathsome kind of harshness and discordance it breedeth to my judicial ear. Bp. Hall, Postscript to his Satires.

DE'SINENT.* adj. [Lat. desinens.] Ending; extreme; lowermost.

In front of this sea were placed six tritons — their upper parts human — their desinent parts fish. B. Jonson, Masques at Court.

DESI'RABLE.* adj. [old Fr. desirable; Lat. desirabilis.]

1. To be wished with earnestness.

Adjudged cases, collected by men of great sagacity, will improve his mind, toward acquiring this desirable amplitude and extent of thought. Watts.

He cannot but confess, that it is a thing the most desirable to man, and most agreeable to the goodness of God, that he should send forth his light and his truth by a special revelation of his will. Rogers.

2. Pleasing; delightful.

She then let drop some expressions about an agate snuff-box; I immediately took the hint, and bought one, being unwilling to omit any thing that might make me desirable in her eyes. Addison.

Our own sex, our kindred, our houses, and our very names, seem so have something good and desirable in them. Watts.

DESI'RABLENESS.* n. s. [from desirable.] That which is wished with earnestness.

Painted beauty is a great argument of the desirableness of that which is true and native. Goodman, Winter's Ev. Conference, P. i.

DESI'RE. n. s. [desir, Fr. desio, Ital. desiderium, Lat.] Wish; eargerness to obtain or enjoy.

Desire is the uneasiness a man finds in himself upon the absence of any thing, whose present enjoyment carries the idea of delight with it. Locke.

Drink provokes, and unprovokes; it provokes the desire, but it takes away the performance. Shakspeare.

Desire's the vast extent of human mind;
It mounts above, and leaves poor hope behind. Dryden.

It is in a man's power only to observe what the ideas are that take their turns in his understanding, or else to direct the sort, and call in such as he hath a desire or use of. Locke.

To DESI'RE. v. a. [desirer, French; desiderare, Latin.]

1. To wish; to long for; to covet.

Thou shalt not desire the silver or gold. Deut. vii. 25.

2. To express wishes; to appear to long.

Jove beheld it with a desiring look. Dryden.

3. To ask; to intreat.

Sir, I intreat you home with me to dinner.
— I humbly do desire your grace of pardon;
I must away this night. Shakspeare.

But since you take such int'rest in our woe,
And Troy's disast'rous end desire to know,
I will restrain my tears, and briefly tell
What in our last and fatal night befell. Dryden.

4. To require; to demand. Not in use.

A doleful case desires a doleful song,
Without vain art or curious compliments. Spenser.

DESI'RER. n. s. [from desire.] One that is eager of any thing; a wisher.

I will counterfeit the bewitchment of some popular man, and give it bountifully to the desirers. Shakspeare.

DESI'RELESS.* adj. [desire and less.] Without desire.

The appetite is dull and desireless. Donne, Devot. p. 25.

DESI'ROUS.† adj. [old Fr. desireux.] Full of desire; eager; longing after; wishing for.

The same piety which maketh them that are in authority desirous to please and resemble God by justice, inflameth every way men of action with zeal to do good. Hooker.

Be not desirous of his dainties, for they are deceitful meat. Prov. xxiii. 3.

Men are drowsy, and desirous to sleep before the fit of an ague, and yawn and stretch. Bacon.

Adam the while,
Waiting desirous her return, had wove
Of choicest flow'rs a garland. Milton, P. L.

Conjugal affection,
Prevailing over fear and timorous doubt,
Hath led me on, desirous to behold
Once more thy face. Milton, P. L.

DESI'ROUSLY.† adv. [from desirous.] Eagerly; with desire; with ardent wishes. Dict.

Do they not rather come hither slowly, sit here uneasily, and depart desirously? South, Serm. on Div. Worship, i. 272.

DESI'ROUSNESS. n. s. [from desirous.] Fulness of desire; eagerness. Dict.

To DESI'ST. v. n. [desisto, Latin.] To cease from any thing; to stop; with from.

Desist, thou art discerned,
And toil'st in vain; nor me in vain molest. Milton, P. R.

There are many who will not quit a project, though they find it pernicious or absurd; but will readily desist from it, when they are convinced it is impracticable. Addison.

DESI'STANCE. n. s. [from desist.] The act of desisting; cessation.

Men usually give freeliest where they have not given before, and make it both the motive and excuse for their desistance from giving any more, that they have given already. Boyle.

DESI'TION.* n. s. [desitus, Lat.] End.

The soul must be immortal, and unsubject to death or desition. The Soul's Immortality Defended, 1645, p. 27.

DESI'TIVE. adj. [desitus, Latin.] Ending; concludent; final.

Inceptive and desitive propositions are of this sort: the fogs vanish as the sun rises; but the fogs have not yet begun to vanish; therefore the sun is not yet risen. Watts.

DESK.† n. s. [Sax. ᵹiꝛc, a table, as well as a dish; Teut. disch; Ital. disco. See also DESK.] An inclining table for the use of writers or readers, made commonly with a box or repository under it.

Tell her in the desk,
That's cover'd o'er with Turkish tapestry,
There is a purse of ducats. Shakspeare.

He is drawn leaning on a desk, with his bible before him. Walton's Angler.

I have been obliged to leave unfinished in my desk the heads of two essays. Pope.

Not the desk with silver nails,
Nor bureau of expence,
Nor standish well japann'd, avails
To writing of good sense. Swift.

To DESK.* v. a. [from the noun.] To shut up, as in a desk; to treasure.

Or if you into some blind convent fly,
You're inquisition'd straight for heresy,
Unless your daring frontispiece can tell
News of a relick, or brave miracle;
Then are you entertain'd and deskt up by
Our Ladies psalter and the rosary;
There to remain, till that their wisdoms please
To let you loose among the novices.
John Hall, Poems, (1646,) p. 2.

DE'SOLATE.† adj. [desolatus, Latin.]

1. Without inhabitants; uninhabited.

Let us seek some desolate shade, and there
Weep our sad bosoms empty. Shakspeare.

This hero appears at first in a desolate island, sitting upon the side of the sea. Broome.

2. Deprived of inhabitants; laid waste.

This city will be desolate, without an inhabitant. Jer. xxvi.

3. Solitary; without society.

Tamar remained desolate in her brother Absalom's house. 2 Sam. xiii. 20.

Desolate, desolate, will I hence, and die. Shakspeare, Rich. II.

To DE'SOLATE. v. a. [desolo, Latin.] To deprive of inhabitants; to lay waste; to make desert.

The island of Atlantis was not swallowed by an earthquake; but was desolated by a particular deluge. Bacon.

Thick around
Thunders the sport of those, who with the gun
And dog, impatient, bounding at the shot,
Worse than the season, desolate the fields.
Thomson.

DE'SOLATELY.† adv. [from desolate.] In a desolate manner. Sherwood.

DE'SOLATER.* n. s. [from desolate.] One who causes desolation.

He shall cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease, and commanding over a wing of abominations be a desolater, or make desolation. Mede on Daniel, p. 39.

But who is this desolater, or maker of desolations? Ib. p. 44.

DESOLA'TION.† n. s. [old Fr. desolation.]

1. Destruction of inhabitants; reduction to solitude.

What with your praises of the country, what with your discourse of the lamentable desolation thereof made by those Scots, you have filled me with a great compassion. Spenser on Ireland.

Without her follows to myself and thee,
Herself, the land, and many a Christian soul,
Death, desolation, ruin, and decay. Shakspeare.

2. Gloominess; sadness; melancholy; destitution.

That dwelling place is unnatural to mankind; and then the terribleness of the continual motion, the desolation of the far being from comfort, the eye and the ear having ugly images before it, doth still vex the mind, even when it is best armed against it. Sidney.

Then your hose shall be ungartered, and every thing about you demonstrate a careless desolation. Shakspeare.

My desolation does begin to make
A better life. Shakspeare.

To complete
The scene of desolation stretch'd around,
The grim guards stand. Thomson.

3. A place wasted and forsaken.

How is Babylon become a desolation among the nations! Jer. l. 23.

DE'SOLATOR.* See DESOLATER.

DE'SOLATORY.* adj. [from desolate.] Causing or inflicting desolation.

These desolatory judgements are a notable improvement of God's mercy. Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 55.

DESPA'IR.† n. s. [desespoir, French. This word is rarely found in the plural; and as Dr. Johnson has wholly omitted to notice this; I may here observe, that "despairs, equivocations, &c." are in Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 693.]

1. Hopelessness; despondence; loss of hope.

Despair is the thought of the unattainableness of any good, which works differently in men's minds, sometimes producing uneasiness or pain, sometimes rest and indolency. Locke.

You had either never attempted this change, set on with hope, or never discovered it, stopt with despair. Sidney.

We are troubled on every side, yet not distressed; we are perplexed, but not in despair. 2 Cor. iv. 8.

Weary'd, forsaken, and pursu'd at last,
All safety in despair of safety plac'd,
Courage he thence resumes, resolv'd to bear
All their assaults, since 'tis in vain to fear.
Denham.

Equal their flame, unequal was their care;
One lov'd with hope, one languish'd with despair.
Dryden.

2. That which causes despair; that of which there is no hope.

Strangely visited people,
All swoll'n and ulcerous, pitiful to the eye;
The mere despair of surgery, he cures;
Hanging a golden stamp about their necks,
Put on with holy prayers. Shakspeare.

3. [In theology.] Loss of confidence in the mercy of God.

Are not all or most evangelical virtues and graces in danger of extremes? As there is, God knows, too often a defect on the one side, so there may be an excess on the other: may not hope in God, or godly sorrow, be perverted into presumption or despair? Sprat.

To DESPA'IR.† v. n. [desesparer, Norm. French; despero, Latin.]

1. To be without hope; to despond; with of before a noun.

Though thou drewest a sword at thy friend, yet despair not; for there may be a turning. Eccles. xxii. 21.

We commend the wit of the Chinese, who despair of making of gold, but are mad upon making of silver. Bacon.

Never despair of God's blessings here, or of his reward hereafter; but go on as you have begun. Wake.

2. Without of.

Despair thy charm. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

And Love, despairing in her heart a place,
Would needs take up his lodging in her face.
Lord Lansdowne, Ess. on Unnat. Flights.

To DESPA'IR.* v. a. To cause to despair.

Having no hope to despair the governour to deliver it [the fort] into their enemies' hands. Sir R. Williams, Act. of the Low Countries, p. 30.

DESPA'IRABLE.* adj. [Fr. desesperable.] Unhopeful. Cotgrave, and Sherwood.

DESPA'IRER. n. s. [from despair.] One without hope.

He cheers the fearful, and commends the bold,
And makes despairers hope for good success.
Dryden.

DESPA'IRFUL. adj. [despair and full.] Hopeless. Obsolete.

That sweet but sour despairful care. Sidney.

Other sorts of cries also used amongst the Irish, —savour of the Scythian barbarism; as their lamentations at their burials, with despairful outcries. Spenser on Ireland.

DESPA'IRINGLY.† adv. [from despairing.] In a manner betokening hopelessness or despondency.

Think not to fasten thy imperfections on the stars, and so despairingly conceive thyself under a fatality of being evil. Brown, Chr. Morals, ii. 7.

He speaks severely and despairingly of our society. Boyle.

To DE'SPATCH.† v. a. [French depescher, depêcher. We had formerly the verb depeach in one of the senses of our present word. See Huloet's Dict. in voce. From the time that Dr. Johnson published his Dictionary, the spelling of despatch, in conformity to its French origin, has been only partial; dispatch, as Mr. Nares has justly remarked, seeming to be fixed beyond the power of any etymologist.]

1. To send away hastily.

Doctor Theodore Coleby, a sober man, I dispatched immediately to Utrecht, to bring the moxa, and learn the exact method of using it. Temple.

The good Æneas, whose paternal care
Julius' absence could no longer bear,
Despatched Achates to the ships in haste,
To give a glad relation of the past. Dryden.

2. To send out of the world; to put to death.

Edmund, I think, is gone,
In pity of his misery, to despatch
His knighted life. Shakspeare.

And the company shall stone them with stones, and despatch them with their swords. Ezek. xxiii. 47.

In combating, but two of you will fall;
And we resolve we will despatch you all. Dryden.

Despatch me quickly, I may death forgive;
I shall grow tender else, and wish to live. Dryden.

3. To perform a business quickly; as, I despatched my affairs, and ran hither.

Therefore commanded he his chariot-man to drive without ceasing, and to despatch the journey, the judgment of God now following him. 2 Mac. ix. 4.

No sooner is one action despatched, which, by such a determination as the will, we are set upon, but another uneasiness is ready to set us on work. Locke.

4. To conclude an affair with another.

What are the brothers parted?
—They have despatch'd with Pompey; he is gone. Shakspeare.

DESPA'TCH. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. Hasty execution; speedy performance.

Affected despatch is one of the most dangerous things to business that can be. Bacon.

You'd see, could you her inward motions watch,
Feigning delay she wishes for despatch;
Then to a woman's meaning would you look,
Then read her backward. Granville.

The despatch of a good office is very often as beneficial to the solicitor as the good office itself. Addison.

2. Conduct; management. Obsolete.

You shall put
This night's great business into my despatch,
Which shall, to all our nights and days to come,
Give solely sovereign sway and masterdom. Shaks.

3. Express; hasty messenger or message; as despatches were sent away.

DESPA'TCHER.* n. s. [I have placed the word here, among Dr. Johnson's family of despatch; though it is, like some of those in his examples, not spelt with an e.]

1. That which destroys or makes an end of.

Avaryce was the other dyspatcher, whych hath made an ende both of our lybraryes and bokes without respect.

Bale, Pref. to Leland's Itin. sign. B. 4.

2. One who performs business.

The dataire [is] adater of writings, and more particularly the dater or dispatcher of the pope's bulls; an ordinary officer in the court of Rome.

Cotgrave, in V. Dataire.

DESPA'TCHFUL. adj. [from despatch.] Bent on haste; intent on speedy execution of business.

So saying, with despatchful looks in haste
She turns, on hospitable thoughts intent.

Milton, P. L.

Let one despatchful bid some swain to lead
A well fed bullock from the grassy mead. Pope.

DESPE'CTION.* n. s. [Lat. despectio.] A looking down; figuratively, a despising.

They who take either of these guides, reason or grace, to carry them up to this cliff of meditation, may cast down their thoughts in a calm despection of all those shining attractives which they see to be so transitory.

W. Montagu, Dev. Ess. (1648,) P. i. p. 362.

DESPERA'DO.* n. s. [Pure Spanish. The French have, in their old language, the phrase "louer à la desesperade, to throw at all, to set all on sixes and sevens." This suits the character of the desperado.] One who is desperate, furious, without fear of danger or consequences. We had formerly the substantive desperate for men of this character; which, like desperado, is unnoticed by Dr. Johnson.

This dismal tragedy, perpetrated not by any private desperadoes of that faction.

The Cloak in its Colours, (1679,) p. 9.

DE'SPERATE. adj. [desperatus, Latin.]

1. Without hope.

Since his exile she hath despis'd me most;
Forsworn my company, and railed at me,
That I am desperate of obtaining her. Shaksp.

2. Without care of safety; rash; precipitant; fearless of danger.

Can you think, my lords,
That any Englishman dare give me counsel,
Or be a known friend 'gainst his highness' pleasure,
Though he be grown so desperate to be honest,
And live a subject? Shakspeare.

He who goes on without any care or thought of reforming, such an one we vulgarly call a desperate person, and that sure is a most damning sin.

Hammond.

3. Irretrievable; unsurmountable; irrecoverable.

These debts may be well called desperate ones; for a mad man owes them. Shakspeare.

In a part of Asia the sick, when their case comes to be thought desperate, are carried out and laid on the earth, before they are dead, and left there. Locke.

I am a man of desperate fortunes, that is, a man whose friends are dead; for I never aimed at any other fortune than in friends. Pope to Swift.

4. Mad; hot-brained; furious.

Were it not the part of a desperate physician to wish his friend dead, rather than to apply the best endeavours of his skill for his recovery?

Spenser on Ireland.

5. It is sometimes used in a sense nearly ludicrous, and only marks any bad quality predominating in a high degree.

Concluding all mere desp'rate sots and fools,
That durst depart from Aristotle's rules. Pope.

DE'SPERATE.* n. s. A desperate man.

A troop of execrable giants, violent oppressors of men, thieves, and adulterous desperates.

Donne, Hist. of the Septuagint, (1633,) p. 204.

DE'SPERATELY. adv. [from desperate.]

1. Furiously; madly; without attention to safety or danger.

Your eldest daughters have foredone themselves,
And desp'rately are dead. Shakspeare.

There might be somewhat in it, that he would not have done, or desired undone, when he broke forth as desperately as before he had done uncivilly. Brown, Vulg. Err.

2. In a great degree; violently; this sense is ludicrous.

She fell desperately in love with him, and took a voyage into Sicily in pursuit of him. Addison.

DE'SPERATENESS. n. s. [from desperate.] Madness; fury; precipitance.

The going on not only in terrours and amazement of conscience, but also boldly, hopingly, confidently, in wilful habits of sin, is called a desperateness also; and the more bold thus, the more desperate. Hammond.

DESPERA'TION. n. s. [from desperate.] Hopelessness; despair; despondency.

Desperation
Is all the policy, strength, and defence,
That Rome can make against them. Shaksp.

As long as we are guilty of any past sin, and have no promise of remission, whatever our future care be, this desperation of success chills all our industry, and we sin on, because we have sinned. Hammond.

DE'SPICABLE. adj. [despicabilis, Latin.] Contemptible; vile; mean; sordid; worthless. It is applied equally to persons or things.

Our case were miserable, if that wherewith we most endeavour to please God were in his sight so vile and despicable as men's disdainful speech would make it. Hooker.

Their heads as low
Bow'd down in battle, sunk before the spears
Of despicable foes. Milton, P. L.

All the earth he gave thee to possess and rule,
No despicable gift. Milton, P. L.

Not less ev'n in this despicable hero,
Than when my name shook Africk with affright,
And froze your hearts beneath your torrid zone. Dryden.

All the quiet that could be expected from such a reign, must be the result of absolute power on the one hand, and a despicable slavery on the other. Addison.

When men of rank and figure pass away their lives in criminal pursuits and practices, they render themselves more vile and despicable than any innocent man can be, whatever low station his fortune and birth have placed him in. Addison.

DE'SPICABLENESS. n. s. [from despicable.] Meanness; vileness; worthlessness.

We consider the great disproportion between the infinity of the reward and the despicableness of our service. Decay of Piety.

DE'SPICABLY. adv. [from despicable.] Meanly; sordidly; vilely.

Here wanton Naples crowns the happy shore,
Nor vainly rich, nor despicably poor;
The town in soft solemnities delights,
And gentle poets to her arms invites. Addison.

DESPI'CIENCY.* n. s. [Lat. despicientia.] A looking down; figuratively, contempt; a despising.

It is very probable, that to shew their despiciency of the poore Gentiles, and to pride themselves in their prerogative and discretion from them, they [the Jews] affected to have such acts there done.

Mede, Diatr. p. 191.

DESPI'SABLE.† adj. [from despise.] Contemptible; despicable; regarded with contempt. A word scarcely used but in low conversation, Dr. Johnson says. But it is in our old lexicography, without this note of degradation. See Huloet's Dict. It is also used by an author, whom Dr. Johnson has sometimes cited, though he has overpassed him here, in a very serious and affecting application.

I, that was respected by the honourable title of wife, am now rejected by the despisable name of a widow: I, that flourished like a fruitful vine upon the housetop, am now neglected and trodden under feet. Quarles, Judg. and Mercy, The Widow.

I am obliged to you for taking notice of a poor old distressed courtier, commonly the most despisable thing in the world. Arbuthnot to Pope.

DESPI'SAL.* n. s. [from despise.] Scorn; contempt.

No man is so mean but he is sensible of despisal, and may find means to shew his resentment.

Patrick on Proverbs, xi. 12.

Policy, the great idol of a carnal reason, is that which insensibly works the soul to a despisal of religion. South, Serm. viii. 385.

To DESPI'SE†. v. a. [despiser, old Fr., Skinner; dispicio, Lat. "You, my lord, high in birth and fortune, are a spectator from the summit of a high tower, or a high hill: the consequence of which is, that you can see nothing beautiful below you; at least nothing but with diminished beauty; and what you cannot see, you naturally disregard. Hence it is, that the word despise signifieth, in the original, to look down upon things from above." Delany, Observ. on Lord Orrery's Remarks on the Life of Swift, p. 255.]

1. To scorn; to contemn; to slight; to disrespect.

For, lo, I will make thee small among the Heathen, and despised among men. Jer. xlix. 15.

My sons their old unhappy sire despise,
Spoil'd of his kingdom, and depriv'd of eyes. Pope.

2. In Shakspeare it seems once to signify abhor, as from the Italian despettare.

Let not your ears despise my tongue for ever,
Which shall possess them with the heaviest sound
That ever yet they heard. Shakspeare.

DESPI'SEDNESS.* n. s. [from the participle despised.] The state of being despised.

He sent foolishness to confute wisdom, weakness to bind strength, despisedness to vanquish pride. Milton, Reas. of Ch. Gov. B. 2.

DESPI'SER. n. s. [from despise.] Contemner; scorner.

Art thou thus bolden'd man, by thy distress?
Or else a rude despiser of good manners,
That in civility thou seem'st so empty? Shaksp.

Wisdom is commonly, at long running, justified even of her despisers. Gov. of the Tongue.

Thus the atheists, libertines, and despisers of religion, usually pass under the name of free-thinkers. Swift.

DESPI'SING.* n. s. [from despise.] Scorn; contempt.

If any person shall declare or speak any thing in derogation, depraving, or despising of the same book, then, &c. Act for Uniform. of Comm. Prayer, &c. 1 Eliz. ch. 2.

All my contempts and despisings of Thy spiritual favours have not yet made Thee withdraw them. Whole Duty of Man.

DESPITE.† n. s. [despite, old Fr.; "en despite, in contempt." Kelham. This is exactly the sense of the second definition of our word; which also is sometimes used with in understood. The Dutch spyt is likewise vexation, despite, scorn; "spyt zyn bakkus," in spite of his teeth. See SPITE.]

1. Malice; anger; malignity; maliciousness: spleen; hatred.

Thou wretch! despite o'erwhelm thee! Shaksp.

With men these considerations are usually the causes of despite, disdain, or aversion from others; but with God they pass for reasons of our greater tenderness towards others. Sprat.

2. Defiance; unsubdued opposition.

The life, thou gav'st me first, was lost and done;
Till with thy warlike sword, despite of fate,
To my determin'd time thou gav'st new date.
Shaksp.

My life thou shalt command, but not my shame;
The one my duty owes; but my fair name,
Despite of death, that lives upon my grave,
To dark dishonour's use thou shalt not have.
Shakspeare.

Know I will serve the fair in thy despite.
Dryden.

I have not quitted yet a victor's right;
I'll make you happy in your own despite. Dryden.

Say, would the tender creature in despite
Of heat by day, and chilling dews by night,
Its life maintain? Blackmore.

Thou, with rebel insolence, did'st dare
To own and to protect that hoary ruffian;
And in despite, ev'n of thy father's justice,
To stir the factious rabble up to arms. Rowe.

3. Act of malice; act of opposition.

[He] hath done despite unto the Spirit of grace. Heb. x. 29.

It would be all his solace and revenge,
As a despite done against the Most High,
Thee once to gain companion of his woe.
Milton, P. L.

To DESPI'TE.† v. a. [old Fr. despiter.] To vex; to offend; to disappoint; to give uneasiness to.

Saturn, with his wife Rhea, fled by night, setting the town on fire, to despite Bacchus. Raleigh.

To what purpose did the Jews cry, The temple of the Lord, while they despited the Lord of that temple? Bp. Hall, Reconciler.

DESPI'TEFUL. adj. [despite and full.] Malicious; full of spleen; full of hate: malignant; mischievous: used both of persons and things.

I, his despiteful Juno, sent him forth
From courtly friends with camping foes to live,
Where death and danger dog the heels of worth.
Shakspeare.

Preserve us from the hands of our despiteful and deadly enemies. King Charles.

Mean while the heinous and despiteful act
Of Satan, done in Paradise, was known
In heaven. Milton, P. L.

DESPI'TEFULLY. adv. [from despiteful.] Maliciously; malignantly.

Pray for them that despitefully use you and persecute you. Matthew, v. 44.

DESPI'TEFULNESS. n. s. [from despiteful.] Malice; hate; malignity.

Let us examine him with despitefulness and torture, that we know his meekness, and prove his patience. Wisd. ii. 19.

DESPI'TEOUS.† adj. [old Fr. déspiteus or dépiteus; modern, despiteaux; without pity, cruel. Chaucer uses both despitous and despitously.] Malicious; furious. A word now out of use.

The knight of the red-cross, when him he spy'd,
Spurring so hot with rage despiteous,
Gan fairly couch his spear. Spenser, F. Q.

Turning despiteous torture out of doors. Shaks.

DESPI'TEOUSLY. adv. [from despiteous.] In a furious manner: not in use.

The mortal steel despiteously entail'd,
Deep in their flesh, quite through the iron walls,
That a large purple stream adown their giambeux falls. Spenser, F. Q.

To DESPO'IL.† v. a. [old Fr. dispouiller, Lat. despolio.]

1. To rob; to deprive: with of.

Despoil'd of warlike arms, and knowen shield. Spenser.

You are nobly born,
Despoiled of your honour in your life. Shaksp.

Waiting with hellish rancour imminent
To intercept thy way, or send thee back
Despoil'd of innocence, of faith, of bliss.
Milton, P. L.

He, pale as death, despoil'd of his array,
Into the queen's apartment takes his way. Dryden.

Ev'n now thy aid,
Eugene, with regiments unequal prest,
Awaits: this day of all his honours gain'd
Despoils him, if thy succour opportune
Defends not the sad hour. Philips.

2. To divest by any accident.

These formed stones despoiled of their shells, and exposed upon the surface of the ground, in time moulder away. Woodward.

3. Simply to strip: not in use. This, however, is the oldest employment of our word.

And for that nothing of her old gere
She should bring into his house, he bad
That women should despoilen her right there,
Of which these ladies weren nothing glad
To handle her clothes wherein she was clad.
Chaucer, Clerk's Tale.

A groom gan despoil
Of puissant arms, and laid in easy bed.
Spenser, F. Q.

DESPOI'LER.* n. s. [from despoil.] A plunderer: a robber. Huloet.

DESPOLIA'TION. n. s. [from despolio, Lat.] The act of despoiling or stripping.

To DESPO'ND.† v. n. [old Fr. despondre; Lat. despondeo.]

1. To despair; to lose hope; to become hopeless or desperate.

It is every man's duty to labour in his calling, and not to despond for any miscarriages or disappointments that were not in his own power to prevent. L'Estrange.

There is no surer remedy for superstitious and desponding weakness, than first to govern ourselves by the best improvement of that reason which providence has given us for a guide; and then, when we have done our own parts, to commit all chearfully, for the rest, to the good pleasure of Heaven with trust and resignation. L'Estrange.

Physick is their bane:
The learned leaches in despair depart,
And shake their heads, desponding of their art.
Dryden.

Others depress their own minds, despond at the first difficulty; and conclude that making any progress in knowledge, farther than serves their ordinary business, is above their capacities. Locke.

2. [In theology.] To lose hope of the divine mercy.

He considers what is the natural tendency of such a virtue, or such a vice: he is well apprized that the representation of some of these things may convince the understanding, some may terrify the conscience, some may allure the slothful, and some encourage the desponding mind. Watts.

DESPO'NDENCY.† n. s. [from despondent.] Despair; hopelessness; desperation.

These generations of the animal life — are anger, zeal, indignation, sorrow, derision, mirth, — despondency, triumph, or gloriation. More, Conject. Cabb. p. 211.

Religion is no friend to laziness and stupidity, or to supine and sottish despondencies of mind, under the pretence of compliances with Providence. Bp. Taylor, Artif. Handsom. p. 58.

DESPO'NDENT. adj. [despondens, Latin.] Despairing; hopeless; without hope.

It is well known, both from ancient and modern experience, that the very boldest atheists, out of their debauches and company, when they chance to be surprised with solitude or sickness, are the most suspicious, timorous, and despondent wretches in the world. Bentley.

Congregated thrushes, linnets, sit
On the dead tree, a dull despondent flock.
Thomson.

DESPO'NDENTLY.* adv. [from despondent.] Without hope.

He thus despondently concludes.
Barrow, Serm. 1679. p. 319.

DESPO'NDER.* n. s. [from despond.] One who is without hope.

I am no desponder in my nature. Swift.

DESPO'NDINGLY.* adv. [from the participle desponding.] In a hopeless manner.

Swift, without a penny in his purse, was despondingly looking out of his window, to gape away the time. Sheridan, Life of Swift.

To DESPO'NSATE.† v. a. [desponso, Lat. This is no modern word, though it stands in Dr. Johnson's Dictionary without any authority but his own; for desponsated occurs for betrothed, in the old vocabulary of Cockeram.] To betroth; to affiance; to unite by reciprocal promises of marriage.

DESPONSA'TION.† n. s. [from desponsate.] The act of betrothing persons to each other.

She was espoused to an honest and just person of her kindred and family; yet, for all this desponsation of her, she had set one step forward, &c. Landensium Apostatia, &c. By Rev. W. Hickman, 1660. Pref. a. 2 b.

DE'SPOT.† n. s. [old Fr. despote, Gr. δεσπόλης from ρεσπόζω, to rule.] An absolute prince; one that governs with unlimited authority. This word is not in use, except as applied to some Dacian prince; as, the despot of Servia. So far Dr. Johnson. Mr. Mason observes, that "the foregoing remark was true enough at the time it was written; but the French revolutionists have been very liberal in conferring this title." — If Dr. Johnson or Mr. Mason had opened the old dictionary of Cotgrave, the word would have presented itself to them not as one of exclusive or modern usage only; for thus Cotgrave writes, two centuries since: "DESPOTE, as despot, the chief or sovereign lord of a country."

The friends of Jacobins are no longer despots; the betrayers of the common cause are no longer traitors. Burke on a Regicide Peace.

DESPO'TICAL.† } adj. [Fr. despotique. But DESPO'TICK. } it may be questioned, whether our own is not the older word; and so from despot.] Absolute in power; unlimited in authority; arbitrary; unaccountable.

God's universal law
Gave to the man despotick power
Over his female in due awe,
Nor from that right to part an hour,
Smile she or lour. Milton, S. A.

In all its directions of the inferiour faculties, reason conveyed its suggestions with clearness, and enjoined them with power: it had the passions in perfect subjection; though its command over them was but persuasive and political, yet it had the force of coactive and despotical. South.

We may see in a neighbouring government the ill consequences of having a despotick prince, for notwithstanding there is vast extent of lands, and many of them better than those of the Swiss and Grisons, the common people among the latter are in a much better situation. Addison.

Patriots were forced to give way to the madness of the people, who were now wholly bent upon single and despotick slavery. Swift.

DESPO'TICALLY.* adv. [from despotical.] In an arbitrary manner.

Fortescue well distinguished between a monarchy despotically regal, and a political or civil monarchy. Burke.

DESPO'TICALNESS. n. s. [from despotical.] Absolute authority.

DE'SPOTISM.† n. s. [despotisme, Fr. from despot.] Absolute power.

The invention of these juvenile pretenders to liberty was, in reality, nothing more than a servile imitation of one of the poorest resources of doting despotism. Burke.

To DESPU'MATE.† v. a. [despumer, old French; despumo, Lat. Our own elder word was despume, which occurs in the vocabulary of Cockeram.] To throw off parts in foam; to froth; to work.

That discharge is a benefit to the constitution, and will help it the sooner and faster to despumate and purify, and so to get into perfect good health. Cheyne, Engl. Malady, 1733, p. 304.

To DISPU'MATE.* v. a. To throw off.

They were thrown off and despumated upon the larger emunctory and open glands. Cheyne, Engl. Mal. p. 360.

DESPUMA'TION. n. s. [from despumate.] The act of throwing off excrementitious parts in scum or foam.

DESQUAMA'TION.† n. s. [from squama, Lat.] The act of scaling foul bones. Term of chirurgery, Dr. Johnson says; and it also appears in the old vocabulary of Cockeram, that "to desquame" was "to scale a fish."

DESQUA'MATORY.* n. s. [from desquamation.] An instrument, by which chirurgical desquamation is performed.

In the tail of these, came the surgeons laden with pincers, crane-bills, catheters, desquamatories, dilaters, scissers, saws. L'Estrange, Quevedo's Visions, p. 28.

DESS.* n. s. [Teut. disch, a table; old Fr. dais, the same; whence the low Lat. dasium, a table in a hall higher than the rest. Thus in our ancient vocabulary, the Prompt. Parvulorum, "des" is defined "a hye benche." In Huloet's old dictionary, "dess" is "a lecturn to lay a book upon," that is, a desk. This old word was written also deis, as in Chaucer.]

1. A table on a raised floor; the high table, to use an expression yet retained in some of our colleges for the table at the top of the hall. Obsolete.

Wel semed eche of hem a fayre burgeis,
To sitten in a gild halle, on the deis.
Chaucer, C. T. Prol.

2. A desk, on which a book is laid.

And next to her sate goodly Shamefastnesse,
Ne ever durst her eyes from ground upreare,
Ne ever once did looke up from her desse.
Spenser, F. Q. iv. x. 50.

3. A truss or cut of hay. Gael. taas, Belg. hoy-tassen, to gather hay. Craven Dialect.

To DESS.* v. a. To cut a section of hay from the stack; to lay close together; to pile up in order. A northern term. Grose, Craven Dialect, and Brockett.

DESSE'RT. n. s. [desserte, Fr.] The last course at an entertainment; the fruit or sweetmeats set on the table after the meat.

To give thee all thy due, thou hast the art
To make a supper with a fine dessert. Dryden.
At your dessert bright pewter comes too late,
When your first course was well serv'd up in plate. King.

To DE'STINATE.† v. a. [destino, Lat.] To design for any particular end or purpose.

God is that point, in every part of the world, from whom every creature in the world doth proceed; by whom they are preserved; and unto whom they be destinated.
Fotherby, Atheom. (1622,) p. 298.

His purpose, fix'd when yet the world was young,
And oracles, so oft by prophets sung,
Now rushing on their destinated end,
No orisons nor sacrifice can bend.
Sandys, Christ's Passion, p. 5.

Birds are destinated to fly among the branches of trees and bushes. Ray on the Creation.

DE'STINATE.* adj. [from the verb.] Fixed; determined; designed.

The first exposition of our opposites is set down by Walo Messalinus, a destinate adversary to episcopacy. Bp. Morton, Episcopacy Asserted, p. 99.

Art cannot regain
One poor hour lost, nor rescue a small fly
By a fool's finger destinate to die.
Habington, Cast. Funerals of G. Talbot.

DESTINA'TION.† n. s. [Fr. destination.] The purpose for which any thing is appointed; the ultimate design.

The passages through which spirits are conveyed to the members, being almost infinite, and each of them drawn through so many meanders, it is wonderful that they should perform their regular destinations without losing their way. Glanville.

There is a great variety of apprehensions and fancies of men, in the destination and application of things to several ends and uses. Hale.

To DE'STINE. v. a. [destino, Lat.]

1. To doom; to devote; to appoint unalterably to any state or condition.

Wherefore cease we then?
Say they who counsel war: we are decreed,
Reserv'd, and destin'd to eternal woe:
Whatever doing, what can we suffer more?
Milton, P. L.

All altars flame; before each altar lies,
Drench'd in his gore, the destin'd sacrifice. Dryden.

2. To appoint to any use or purpose.

Too thin blood strays into the immediately subordinate vessels, which are destined to carry humours secreted from the blood. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

3. To devote; to doom to punishment or misery: used absolutely.

May Heav'n around this destin'd head
The choicest of its curses shed. Prior.

4. To fix unalterably.

The infernal judge's dreadful pow'r,
From the dark urn shall throw thy destin'd hour. Prior.

DE'STINY. n. s. [destinée, Fr.]

1. The power that spins the life, and determines the fate of living beings.

Thou art neither like thy sire or dam;
But like a foul mis-shapen stigmatick,
Mark'd by the destinies to be avoided. Shakspeare.

2. Fate; invincible necessity.

He said, dear daughter, rightly may I rue
The fall of famous children born of me;
But who can turn the stream of destiny,
Or break the chain of strong necessity,
Which fast is ty'd to Jove's eternal seat?
Spenser, F. Q.

How can hearts, not free, be tried whether they serve
Willing or no, who will but what they must
By destiny, and can no other choose? Milton, P. L.

Had thy great destiny but given thee skill
To know, as well as pow'r to act her will.
Denham.

Chance, or forceful destiny,
Which forms in causes first whate'er shall be.
Dryden.

3. Doom; condition in future time.

At the pit of Acheron
Meet me i' th' morning: thither he
Will come to know his destiny. Shakspeare.

DE'STITUTE. adj. [destitutus, Lat.]

1. Forsaken; abandoned: with of.

To forsake the true God of heaven, is to fall into all such evils upon the face of the earth, as men, either destitute of grace divine, may commit, or unprotected from above, may endure. Hooker.

2. Abject; friendless.

He will regard the prayer of the destitute, and not despise their prayer. Psalm cii. 17.

3. In want of.

Take the destin'd way
To find the regions destitute of day. Dryden.

Nothing can be a greater instance of the love that mankind has for liberty, than such a savage mountain covered with people, and the Campania of Rome, which lies in the same country, destitute of inhabitants. Addison.

DE'STITUTE.* n. s. One who is deprived of comfort; who is in want of friends.

O, my friends, have pity on this poor destitute, for the hand of God hath touched her.
P. St. John, Serm. (1737,) p. 224.

To DE'STITUTE.* v. a. [from the adjective.] To forsake; to leave; to disappoint.

It is good, in all causes, for every man to understand not only his advantages, but also his disadvantages; lest, expecting greater matters than the cause will afford, he be needlessly offended, when his expectation is destituted.
Fotherby, Atheom. (1622,) p. 8.

Suppose God do thus destitute us, yet our anxiety or solicitude, our using of unlawful means, can never be able to relieve or secure us.
Hammond, Pract. Catechism, iii. § 5.

DESTITU'TION.† n. s. [Fr. destitution.] Want; the state in which something is wanted: applied to persons.

That destitution in food and cloathing is such an impediment, as, till it be removed, suffereth not the mind of man to admit any other care. Hooker.

They which want furtherance unto knowledge, are not left in so great destitution, that justly any man should think the ordinary means of eternal life taken from them. Hooker.

The order of paying the debts of contract or restitution is set down by the civil laws of a kingdom: in destitution or want of such rules, we are to observe the necessity of the creditor, the time of the delay, and the special obligations of friendship. Taylor.

To DESTRO'Y. v. a. [destruo, Lat. detruire, Fr.]

1. To overturn a city; to raze a building; to ruin.
   The Lord will destroy this city. Gen. xix. 14.
2. To lay waste; to make desolate.
   Solyman sent his army, which burnt and destroyed the country villages. Knolles.
3. To kill.
   A people, great and many, and tall as the Anakims; but the Lord destroyed them before them, and they succeeded them, and dwelt in their stead. Deut. ii. 21.
   'Tis safer to be that which we destroy,
   Than by destruction dwell in doubtful joy. Shaksp.
   The wise providence hath placed a certain antipathy between some animals and many insects, whereby they delight in their destruction, though they use them not as food; as, the peacock destroys snakes and adders; the weasel, mice and rats; spiders, flies; and some sorts of flies destroy spiders. Hale.
4. To put an end to; to bring to nought.
   Do we not see that slothful, intemperate, and incontinent persons destroy their bodies with diseases, their reputations with disgrace, and their faculties with want? Bentley.
   There will be as many sovereigns as fathers: the mother too hath her title, which destroys the sovereignty of one supreme monarch. Locke.

DESTRO'YABLE.* adj. [from destroy.] Able to be destroyed. Huloet.

DESTRO'YER. n. s. [from destroy.] The person that destroys or lays waste: a murderer.
   It is said, that Assur both founded it and ruined it: it may be understood, that Assur the founder was the son of Shem, and Assur the destroyer was an Assyrian. Ralegh.
   Triumph, to be styl'd great conquerors,
   Patrons of mankind, gods, and sons of gods!
   Destroyers rightlier call'd, and slayers of men.
   Milton, P. L.
   Yet, guiltless too, this bright destroyer lives;
   At random wounds, nor knows the wound she gives. Pope.

To DESTRU'CT.† v. a. [Lat. destructus. This word, as the opposite to construct, and formed like that from a Latin participle, is worth notice; though it certainly is not in use.] To destroy.
   The world which perished by water, was no other than the sublunary world; the heaven whereof is that which we call air, but the Scripture heaven; which sublunary heaven, together with the earth, was marred by that general deluge; and the creatures, belonging to them both, either wholly destructed, or marvellously corrupted from that they were before.
   Mede, Paraphr. on St. Peter, (1642,) p. 12.

DESTRU'CTIBLE. adj. [from destruo, Lat.] Liable to destruction.

DESTRUCTIBI'LITY. n. s. [from destructible.] Liableness to destruction.

DESTRU'CTION. n. s. [destructio, Lat.]

1. The act of destroying; subversion; demolition.
2. Murder; massacre.
   'Tis safer to be that which we destroy,
   Than by destruction dwell in doubtful joy. Shaksp.
3. The state of being destroyed; ruin; murder suffered.
   If that your moody discontented souls
   Do through the clouds behold this present hour,
   Even for revenge mock my destruction. Shaksp.
   When that which we immortal thought,
   We saw so near destruction brought,
   We felt what you did then endure,
   And tremble yet, as not secure. Waller.
4. The cause of destruction; a destroyer; a depopulator: as a consuming plague.
   The destruction that wasteth at noon-day.
   Ps. xci. 6.
5. [In theology.] Eternal death.
   Broad is the way that leadeth to destruction.
   St. Matthew.

DESTRU'CTIVE. adj. [destructivus, low Lat.]

1. Having the quality of destroying; wasteful; causing ruin and devastation; that which brings to destruction.
   In ports and roads remote,
   Destructive fires among whole fleets we send.
   Dryden.
   One may think, that the continuation of existence, with a kind of resistance to any destructive force, is the continuation of solidity. Locke.
2. With of.
   He will put an end to so absurd a practice, which makes our most refined diversions destructive of all politeness. Addison.
   Both are defects equally destructive of true religion. Rogers.
3. With to.
   In a firm building, even the cavities ought not to be filled with rubbish which is of a perishable kind, destructive to the strength. Dryden.
   Excess of cold, as well as heat, pains us; because it is equally destructive to that temper which is necessary to the preservation of life. Locke.

DESTRU'CTIVELY. adv. [from destructive.] Ruinously; mischievously; with power to destroy.
   What remains but to breathe out Moses's wish? O that men were not so destructively foolish. Decay of Piety.

DESTRU'CTIVENESS. n. s. [from destructive.] The quality of destroying or ruining.
   The vice of professors exceeds the destructiveness of the most hostile assaults, as intestine treachery is more ruinous than foreign violence. Decay of Piety.

DESTRU'CTOR. n. s. [from destroy.] Destroyer; consumer.
   Helmont wittily calls the fire the destructor and the artificial death of things. Boyle.

DESUDA'TION. n. s. [desudatio, Lat.] A profuse and inordinate sweating, from what cause soever.

DE'SUETUDE.† n. s. [old Fr. dessuëtude; Lat. desuetudo.] Cessation to be accustomed; discontinuance of practice or habit.
   This soft voluptuous nation, after so long a desuetude from arms, could not repel their fury. Howell, Lett. i. i. 35. (dated in 1621.)
   By the irruption of numerous armies of barbarous people, those countries were quickly fallen off, with barbarism and desuetude, from their former civility and knowledge. Hale.
   We see in all things how desuetude does contract and narrow our faculties, so that we can apprehend only those things wherein we are conversant. Government of the Tongue.

DE'SULTORY.† } adj. [desultorius,
DESULTO'RIOUS. } Latin, Dr. Johnson says. 'I may add, that desultorius, which means leaping, vaulting, frisking to and fro, was applied by the Romans to horses properly trained, and running with the greatest speed, close to each other, without either bridle or saddle, upon which, in the midst of their career, persons would cast and recast themselves from one to another horse. Whence also the French chevaux desultoires; and the active rider by his leaping, obtained the name of "desulteur, sauteur qui passe d' un cheval sur un autre." Lacombe. Thus we see, by analogy, the force of our figurative expression, desultory.]

1. Roving from thing to thing; unsettled; immethodical; unconstant. Desultorious is not in use.
   'Tis not for a desultory thought to atone for a lewd course of life, nor for any thing but the superinducing of a virtuous habit upon a vicious one, to qualify an effectual conversion. L'Estrange.
   Let but the least trifle cross his way, and his desultorious fancy presently takes the scent, leaves the unfinished and half-mangled notion, and skips away in pursuit of the new game. Norris.
   Take my desultory thoughts in their native order, as they rise in my mind, without being reduced to rules, and marshalled according to art. Felton on the Classicks.
   This desultory character seems to have thrived in no vocation. — He was by turns a fiddler and a farmer, a grasier and a poet, with equal success. Warton, Hist. E. P. iii. 299.
2. Wavering; literally, by starts and leaps; in a hurry.
   I mark'd his desultory pace,
   His gestures strange, and varying face.
   T. Warton's Ode on the Suicide.

DE'SULTORINESS.* n. s. [from desultory.] The quality of being desultory. Ash.

To DESU'ME. v. a. [desumo, Lat.] To take from any thing; to borrow.
   This pebble doth suppose, as pre-existent to it, the more simple matter out of which it is desumed, the heat and influence of the sun, and the due preparation of the matter. Hale.
   They have left us relations suitable to those of Ælian and Pliny, whence they desumed their narrations. Brown.
   Laws, if convenient and useful, are never the worse, though they be desumed and taken from the laws of other countries. Hale.

To DETA'CH. v. a. [detacher, Fr.]

1. To separate; to disengage; to part from something.
   The heat takes along with it a sort of vegetative and terrestrial matter, which it detaches from the uppermost stratum. Woodward.
   The several parts of it are detached one from the other, and yet join again one cannot tell how. Pope.
2. To send out part of a greater body of men on an expedition.
   If ten men are in war with forty, and the latter detach only an equal number to the engagement, what benefit do they receive from their superiority? Addison.

DETA'CHMENT. n. s. [from detach.] A body of troops sent out from the main army.
   The Czar dispatched instructions to send out detachments of his cavalry, to prevent the king of Sweden's joining his army. Tatler, No. 55.
   Besides materials, which are brute and blind,
   Did not this work require a knowing mind?
   Who for the task should fit detachments chuse
   From all the atoms. Blackmore.

To DETA'IL. v. a. [detailler, Fr.] To relate particularly: to particularise; to display minutely and distinctly.
   They will perceive the mistakes of these philosophers, and be able to answer their arguments, without my being obliged to detail them. Cheyne.

DETA'IL.† n. s. [Fr. detail, "a piecemealing, a hewing or cutting in pieces; hence, also, retail, small sale, or a selling by parcels, or in pieces." Cotgrave.] A minute and particular account.

I chuse, rather than trouble the reader with a detail here, to defer them to their proper place. Woodward.

I was unable to treat this part of my subject more in detail, without becoming dry and tedious. Pope.

DETA'ILER.* n. s. [from detail.] One who relates particulars. A modern word.

Individuality was sunk in the number of detailers. Seward's Lett. vi. 135.

To DETA'IN.† v. a. [detenir, Fr. detineo, Lat. Spenser has once used detain as a substantive; but he has not been, and will not be, followed.]

1. To keep that which belongs to another.

Detain not the wages of the hireling; for every degree of detention of it, beyond the time, is injustice and uncharitableness. Bp. Taylor.

2. To withhold; to keep back.

These doings sting him
So venomously, that burning shame detains him
From his Cordelia. Shakspeare.

He has described the passion of Calypso, and the indecent advances she made to detain him from his country. Broome.

3. To restrain from departure.

Let us detain thee until we shall have made ready a kid. Judg. xiii. 15.

Had Orpheus sung it in the nether sphere,
So much the hymn had pleas'd the tyrant's ear,
The wife had been detain'd to keep her husband there. Dryden.

4. To hold in custody.

Every confinement of the person is an imprisonment, even by forcibly detaining one in the publick streets. Blackstone.

DETA'INDER.† n. s. [from detain.] The name of a writ for holding one in custody, Dr. Johnson says. It may be a corruption of detainer; but the writ for the purpose here named is called detinue. See DETINUE.

DETA'INER.† n. s. [from detain.]

1. He that holds back any one's right; he that detains any thing.

Judge of the obligation that lies upon all sorts of injurious persons; the sacrilegious, the detainers of tithes, and cheaters of men's inheritances. Bp. Taylor.

2. Confinement; detention.

St. Paul sends him back again, that Philemon might have no reason to be angry at his longer detainour. Bp. Smalridge.

3. In law, the act of unlawfully holding back the right of another person.

Deprivation of possession may also be by an unjust detainer of another's goods. Blackstone.

To DETE'CT. v. a. [detectus, Lat.]

1. To discover; to find out any crime or artifice.

There's no true lover in the forest, else sighing every minute and groaning every hour, would detect the lazy foot of time as well as a clock. Shaks.

Though should I hold my peace, yet thou
Wouldst easily detect what I conceal. Milton, P. L.

2. To discover in general.

The utmost infinite ramifications and inosculations of all the several sorts of vessels may easily be detected by glasses. Ray.

DETE'CTER†. n. s. [Lat. detector. Our own word is sometimes so written.] A discoverer; one that finds out what another desires to hide.

Oh heavens! that this treason were not; or not I the detecter. Shakspeare.

Hypocrisy has a secret hatred of its detecter; that which will bring it to a test which it cannot pass. Decay of Piety.

DETECTION. n. s. [from detect.]

1. Discovery of guilt or fraud, or any other fault.

Should I come to her with any detection in my hand, I could drive her then from the ward of her purity. Shakspeare.

That is a sign of the true evangelical zeal, and note for the detection of its contrary: it should abound more in the mild and good-natured affection, than in the vehement and wrathful passions. Sprat.

Detection of the incoherence of loose discourses was wholly owing to the syllogistical form. Locke.

2. Discovery of any thing hidden.

Not only the sea, but rivers and rains also, are instrumental to the detection of amber, and other fossils, by washing away the earth and dirt that concealed them. Woodward.

DETE'NTION. n. s. [from detain.]

1. The act of keeping what belongs to another.

How goes the world, that I am thus encountered
With clam'rous claims of debt, of broken bonds
And the detention of long since due debts,
Against my honour? Shakspeare.

2. Confinement; restraint.

This worketh by detention of the spirits, and constipation of the tangible parts. Bacon.

To DET'ER. v. a. [deterreo, Lat.] To discourage by terrour; to fright from any thing.

I never yet the tragick strain assay'd,
Deterr'd by thy inimitable maid. Waller.

Many and potent enemies tempt and deter us from our duty, yet our case is not hard, so long as we have a greater strength on our side. Tillotson.

Beauty or unbecomingness are of more force to draw or deter imitation, than any discourses which can be made to them. Locke.

The ladies may not be deterred from corresponding with me by this method. Addison.

My own face deters me from my glass:
And Kneller only shews what Celia was. Prior.

DETE'RMENT. n. s. [from deter.] Cause of discouragement: that by which one is deterred. A good word, but not now used.

This will not be thought a discouragement unto spirits, which endeavour to advantage nature by art; nor will the ill success of some be made a sufficient determent unto others. Brown, Vulg. Err.

These are not all the determents that opposed my obeying you. Boyle.

To DETE'RGE. v. a. [detergo, Lat.] To cleanse a sore; to purge any part from feculence or obstructions.

Consider the part and habit of body, and add or diminish your simples as you design to deterge or incarn. Wiseman.

Sea salt preserves bodies, through which it passeth, from corruption, and it detergeth the vessels, and keeps the fluid from putrefaction. Arbuthnot.

DETE'RGENT. adj. [from deterge.] Having the power of cleansing.

The food ought to be nourishing and detergent. Arbuthnot.

DETE'RGENT.* n. s. That which cleanses.

The virtues of the most valuable preparation, I mean salt of amber, are in a great degree answered by tar-water, as a detergent. Bp. Berkeley, Siris, § 23.

To DETE'RIORATE.* v. a. [old Fr. deteriorer; Lat deterior.] To impair; to make worse. A word nearly a century and a half old in our language.

There were designed most mganificent cloysters, the brave design whereof Dr. J. Fell hath deteriorated, with his new device. Aubrey, Anecd. ii. 589.

DETERIORA'TION.† n. s. [deterioration, Fr.] The act of making any thing worse; the state of growing worse. Lord Chesterfield has somewhere used it.

Thus has the Porte — after reducing the Ottoman empire to extreme weakness, and internal symptoms of ruin, irretrievable by a government in a regular progress of deterioration, lost an important territory. Guthrie, Russia.

DETE'RMINABLE.† adj. [from determine.] Capable of being certainly decided.

For the excess, or tumour, of this court of chancery, I shall divide it into five natures. The first is, when the court doth embrace, or retain, causes both in matter and substance merely determinable, and fit for the common law. Bacon, Speech in Chancery.

Whether all plants have seeds were more easily determinable, if we could conclude concerning harts-tongue, ferne, and some others. Brown, Vulg. Err.

About this matter, which seems so easily determinable by sense, accurate and sober men widely disagree. Boyle.

To DETE'RMINATE. v. a. [determiner, French.] To limit; to fix; to determine; to terminate: not in use.

The fly-slow hours shall not determinate
The dateless limit of thy dear exile. Shakspeare.

DETE'RMINATE. adj. [determinatus, Latin.]

1. Settled; definite; determined.

Demonstrations in numbers, if they are not more evident and exact than in extension, yet they are more general in their use, and determinate in their application. Locke.

To make all the planets move about the sun in circular orbs, there must be given to each, by a determinate impulse, those present particular degrees of velocity which they now have, in proportion to their distances from the sun and to the quantity of the solar matter. Bentley.

2. Established; settled by rule; positive.

Scriptures are read before the time of divine service, and, without either choice or stint, appointed by any determinate order. Hooker.

3. Decisive; conclusive.

I' th' progress of this business,
Ere a determinate resolution, he,
I mean the bishop, did require a respite. Shaksp.

4. Fixed; resolute.

Like men disused in a long peace, more determinate to do, than skilful how to do. Sidney.

5. Resolved.

My determinate voyage is mere extravagancy. Shakspeare.

DETE'RMINATELY. adv. [from determinate.]

1. Resolutely; with fixed resolve.

The queen obeyed the king's commandment, full of raging agonies, and determinately bent, that she would seek all loving means to win Zelmane. Sidney.

In those errours they are so determinately settled, that they pay into falsity the whole sum of whatsoever love is owing unto God's truth. Hooker.

2. Certainly; unchangeably.

Think thus with yourselves, that you have not the making of things true or false; but that the truth and existence of things is already fixed and settled, and that the principles of religion are already either determinately true or false, before you think of them. Tillotson.

DETERMINA'TION.† n. s. [from determinate.]

1. Absolute direction to a certain end.

When we voluntarily waste much of our lives, that remissness can by no means consist with a constant determination of will or desire to the greatest apparent good. Locke.

2. The result of deliberation; conclusion formed; resolution taken.

They have acquainted me with their determination, which is to go home, and to trouble you no more. Shakspeare, Merch. of Ven.

The proper acts of the intellect are intellection, deliberation, and determination or decision. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

It is much disputed by divines, concerning the power of man's will to good and evil in the state of innocence; and, upon very nice and dangerous precipices, stand their determinations on either side. South.

Consult thy judgement, affections, and inclinations, and make thy determination upon every particular; and be always as suspicious of thyself as possible. Calamy.

3. Judicial decision.

He confined the knowledge of governing to justice and lenity, and to the speedy determination of civil and criminal causes. Gulliver's Travels.

4. [Fr. determination.] Expiration; end. Used only by lawyers; as, from and after the determination of the said lease.

DETE'RMINATIVE. adj. [from determinate.]

1. That uncontrollably directs to a certain end.

That individual action which is justly punished as sinful in us, cannot proceed from the special influence and determinative power of a just cause. Bp. Bramhall against Hobbes.

2. That makes a limitation.

If the term added to make up the complex subject does not necessarily or constantly belong to it, then it is determinative, and limits the subject to a particular part of its extension; as, every pious man shall be happy. Watts.

DETE'RMINATOR.† n.s. [from determinate.] One who determines.

They have recourse unto the great determinator of virginity, conceptions, fertility, and the inscrutable infirmities of the whole body. Brown.

Choose them an author out of all protestant divines, whom they would make umpire and determinator between us and them. Bp. Morton, Episcopacy Asserted, p. 29.

To DETE'RMINE. v.a. [determiner, Fr. determino, Latin.]

1. To fix; to settle.

It is concluded he shall be protector.
— It is determin'd, not concluded yet;
But so it must be, if the king miscarry. Shaksp.

More particularly to determine the proper season for grammar, I do not see how it can be made a study, but as an introduction to rhetorick. Locke.

2. To conclude; to fix ultimately.

Probability, in the nature of it, supposes that a thing may, or may not be so, for any thing that yet appears, or is certainly determined on the other side. South.

Milton's subject was still greater than Homer's or Virgil's: it does not determine the fate of single persons or nations, but of a whole species. Addison.

Destruction hangs on every word we speak,
On every thought, till the concluding stroke
Determines all, and closes our design. Addison.

3. To bound; to confine.

The knowledge of men hitherto hath been determined by the view or sight; so that whatsoever is invisible either in respect of the fineness of the body itself, or the smallness of the parts, or of the subtility of the motion, is little enquired. Bacon.

The principium individuationis is existence itself, which determines a being of any sort to a particular time and place, incommunicable to two beings of the same kind. Locke.

No sooner have they climbed that hill, which thus determines their view at a distance, but a new prospect is opened. Atterbury.

4. To adjust; to limit; to define.

He that has settled in his mind determined ideas, with names affixed to them, will be able to discern their differences one from another, which is really distinguishing. Locke.

5. To influence the choice.

You have the captives,
Who were the opposites of this day's strife:
We do require them of you, so to use them
As we shall find their merits and our safety
May equally determine. Shakspeare.

A man may suspend the act of his choice from being determined for or against the thing proposed, till he has examined it. Locke.

As soon as the studious man's hunger and thirst makes him uneasy, he, whose will was never determined to any pursuit of good cheer, is by the uneasiness of hunger and thirst, presently determined to eating and drinking. Locke.

6. To resolve.

Jonathan knew that it was determined of his father to slay David. 1 Sam. xx. 33.

7. To decide.

I do not ask whether bodies so exist, that the motion of one cannot be without the motion of another: to determine this either way, is to beg the question for or against a vacuum. Locke.

8. To put an end to; to destroy.

Now where is he, that will not stay so long
Till sickness hath determin'd me? Shakspeare.

To DETE'RMINE. v.n.

1. To conclude; to form a final conclusion.

Eve! now expect great tidings, which perhaps
Of us will soon determine, or impose
New laws to be observ'd. Milton, P.L.

2. To settle opinion.

It is indifferent to the matter in hand which way the learned shall determine of it. Locke.

3. To end; to come to an end.

They were apprehended, and after conviction the danger determined by their deaths. Hayward.

All pleasure springing from a gratified passion, as most of the pleasure of sin does, must needs determine with that passion. South.

4. To make a decision.

She soon shall know of us,
How honourably and how kindly we Determine for her. Shakspeare.

5. To end consequentially.

Revolutions of state, many times, make way for new institutions and forms; and often determine in either setting up some tyranny at home, or bringing in some conquest from abroad. Temple.

6. To resolve concerning any thing.

Now, noble peers, the cause why we are met
Is to determine of the coronation. Shakspeare.

DETE'RMINER.* n.s. [from determine.] One who makes a determination or decision.

Good M. doctor determiner, how prove you that Antichrist's persecution shall dure but three years and a half? Fulke's Retentive, (1580,) p. 158.

Those which know least of things past or present, are usually the most confident determiners upon many mean occasions concerning things future. Spencer on Prodigies, p. 52.

DETERRA'TION. n.s. [de and terra, Latin; deterrer, French.] Discovery of any thing by removal of the earth that hides it; the act of unburying.

This concerns the raising of new mountains, deterrations or the devolution of earth down upon the valleys, from the hills and higher grounds. Woodward.

DETE'RSION. n.s. [from detergo, Latin.] The act of cleansing a sore.

I endeavoured detersion; but the matter could not be discharged. Wiseman.

DETE'RSIVE.† adj. [Fr. detersif.] Having the power to cleanse. Bullokar, and Sherwood.

DETE'RSIVE. n.s. An application that has the power of cleansing wounds.

We frequently see simple ulcers afflicted with sharp humours, which corrode them, and render them painful sordid ulcers, if not timely relieved by detersives and lenients. Wiseman.

To DETE'ST. v.a. [detestor, Latin.] To hate; to abhor; to abominate.

Nigh thereto the ever-damned beast
Durst not approach; for he was deadly made,
And all that life preserved did detest. Spenser, F.Q.

Glory grows guilty of detested crimes,
When for fame's sake, for praise an outward part,
We bend to that the working of the heart. Shaks.

I've liv'd in such dishonour, that the gods
Detest my baseness. Shakspeare.

There is that naturally in the heart of man which abhors sin as sin, and consequently would make him detest it both in himself and others too. South.

Who dares think one thing, and another tell,
My heart detests him as the gates of hell. Pope.

DETE'STABLE.† adj. [Fr. detestable. Our word, in old poetry, is found with the accent on the first syllable; and continued to be so used in Shakspeare's time; as the following example shews. Milton places it on the second.] Hateful; abhorred; abominable; odious.

He sent also that detestable ringleader Apollonius with an army of two and twenty thousand. Macc. v. 24.

Beguil'd, divorc'd, wrong'd, spighted, slain!
Most detestable death. Shakspeare.

He desired him to consider that both armies consisted of Christians, to whom nothing is more detestable than effusion of human blood. Hayward.

DETE'STABLY. adv. [from detestable.] Hatefully; abominably; odiously.

It stands here stigmatized by the apostle as a temper of mind, rendering men so detestably bad, that the great enemy of mankind neither can nor desires to make them worse. South.

DETE'STABLENESS.* n.s. [from detestable.] The quality of being detestable.

It is their intrinsick hatefulness, and detestableness, which originally inflames us against them, [detestable principles.] A. Smith, Theory of Mor. Sent. P. ii. § 2.

DETESTA'TION.† n.s. [Fr. detestation.]

1. Hatred; abhorrence; abomination.

Then only did misfortune make her see what she had done, especially finding in us rather detestation than pity. Sidney.

2. It is sometimes used with for; but of seems more proper.

Bloodshed — a sin, in the hatred and detestation of which heaven and earth seem to strive for the mastery. South, Serm. xi. 40.

The detestation you express
For vice in all its glitt'ring dress. Swift.

Our love of God will inspire us with a detestation for sin, as what is of all things most contrary to his divine nature. Swift.

DETE'STER.† n.s. [from detest.] One that hates or abhors. Sherwood.

It grew high time for the English nation to think of recovering itself from some of that infamy and loud reproach, that the spilling of innocent royal blood, and the profane invasion of all that was sacred or civil had brought upon it, in the opinion of all the nations round about, that stood as spectators and detesters of those religious barbarities, those villanies cloaked and sanctified with the name of reformation. South, Serm. ix. 115.

To DETHRO'NE.† v.a. [detroner, Fr. de and thronus, Latin.] To divest of regality; to throw down from the throne; to deprive of regal dignity.

In proportion as the queen became the object of public hatred, the dethroned king was regarded with pity. Hume, Hist. of Eng.

DETHRO'NEMENT.* n. s. [from dethrone.] The act of dethroning.

DETHRO'NER.* n. s. [from dethrone.] One who contributes towards depriving of regal dignity.

The hand of our dethroners is not only against, but hath prevailed against, and (to their power) blotted out the remembrance of the regal and sacerdotal throne. Archdeacon Ormsby, Tablet of Mod. (1661,) p. 176.

To DETHRO'NIZE.* v. a. [from dethrone.] To unthrone; to put out of a throne. Cotgrave in V. Desthroner.

DETI'NUE. n. s. [detènue, French.] A writ that lies against him, who, having goods or chattels delivered to him to keep, refuses to deliver them again. Cowel.

To DETONATE.* v. n. [Lat. detono.] To make a great noise, like thunder.

DETONA'TION. n. s. [detono, Lat.] A noise more forcible than the ordinary crackling of salts in calcination; as in the going off of the pulvis or aurum fulminans, or the like. It is also used for that noise which happens upon the mixture of fluids that ferment with violence; as oil of turpentine with oil of vitriol, resembling the explosion of gunpowder. Quincy.

A new coal is not to be cast on the nitre, till the detonation occasioned by the former be either quite or almost altogether ended; unless it chance that the puffing matter do blow the coal too soon out of the crucible. Boyle.

To DE'TONIZE.† v. a. [old Fr. detoniser, Lacombe; from detono, Latin.] To calcine with detonation. A chymical term.

Nineteen parts in twenty of detonized nitre is destroyed in eighteen days. Arbuthnot on Air.

DETO'RSION.* n. s. [Lat. detorsus. Sometimes written detortion.] A departure from the original design.

Cross those detorsions, when it [the heart] downward tends,
And when it to forbidden heights pretends.
Donne, Poems, p. 327.

To DETO'RT.† v. a. [detortus, of detorqueo, Latin.] To wrest from the original import, meaning, or design.

He hath not willingly detorted any thing in this discourse. Bp. Bancroft, Dangerous Positions, &c. 1593, Pref.

They have assumed what amounts to an infallibility in the private spirit, and have detorted texts of scripture to the sedition, disturbance, and destruction of the civil government. Dryden.

DETO'RTION.* n. s. [from detort.] The act of turning any thing from its original import. Ash.

DETO'UR. n. s. [French.] A turning; a way about. The word has recently crept into our language.

This is in fact saying the same thing, only with more detours and circumvolutions.
Dr. Tucker, Lett. to Dr. Kippis, 1773. p. 65.

To DETRA'CT.† v. a. [detractum, Latin; detracter, French.]

1. To derogate; to take away by envy, calumny, or censure, any thing from the reputation of another: with from.

Those were assistants in private, but not trusted to manage the affairs in publick; for that would detract from the honour of the principal ambassador. Bacon.

No envy can detract from this: it will shine in history, and, like swans, grow whiter the longer it endures. Dryden.

2. Without from.

Nor I, with biting verse, have yet
Detracted any man. Hulet, in V. Detract.

3. To take away; to withdraw.

By the largeness of the cornices they hinder both the light within, and likewise detract much from the view of the front without. Wotton.

The multitude of partners does detract nothing from each private share, nor does the publickness of it lessen propriety in it. Boyle.

DETRA'CTER.† n. s. [old Fr. detracteur, mod. detracteur; Lat. detractor. Our own word is oftener written detractor. See DETRACTOR.] One that takes away another's reputation; one that impairs the honour of another.

I am right glad to be thus satisfied, in that I yet was never able till now to choke the mouth of such detracters with the certain knowledge of their slanderous untruths. Spenser on Ireland.

Whether we are so entirely sure of their loyalty upon the present foot of government as you may imagine, their detracters make a question. Swift.

Away the fair detracters went,
And gave by turns their censures vent. Swift.

DETRA'CTINGLY.* adv. [from detract.] So as to derogate by slander or defamation.

Rather by a hidden and oblique way insinuate his error to him, than detractingly blaze it.
Bp. Henshaw's Thoughts, ed. 1651, p. 13.

DETRA'CTION.† n. s. [detractio, Latin; detraction, French.]

1. Detraction, in the native importance of the word, signifies the withdrawing or taking off from a thing; and, as it is applied to the reputation, it denotes the impairing or lessening a man in point of fame, rendering him less valued and esteemed by others, which is the final aim of detraction. Ayliffe.

I put myself to thy direction, and
Unspeak mine own detraction; here abjure
The taints and blames I laid upon myself,
For strangers to my nature. Shakspeare.

Fame, that her high birth to raise,
Seem'd erst so lavish and profuse,
We may justly now accuse
Of detraction from her praise. Milton, Arcades.

If detraction could invite us, discretion surely would contain us from any derogatory intention. Brown.

To put a stop to the insults and detractions of vain men, I resolved to enter into the examination. Woodward.

To consider an author as the subject of obloquy and detraction, we may observe with what pleasure a work is received by the invidious part of mankind, in which a writer falls short of himself. Addison.

2. A withdrawing; a taking away. Not noticed by Dr. Johnson, or any of our lexicographers.

You shall enquire of the unlawful taking of partridges, and pheasants, or fowl, the detraction of the eggs of the said wild-fowl, &c.
Bacon, Charge at the Sessions for the Verge, p. 18.

DETRA'CTIOUS.* adj. [from detract.] Lessening the honour of a thing; dishonourable. Johnson in V. Derogatory.

DETRA'CTIVE.* adj. [from detract.]

1. Having the power to take or draw away.

Finding that his patient hath any sweet herbes in his garden, [the surgeon] straightway will apply a detractive plaister.
Knight, Tr. of Truth, (1580,) fol. 28.

2. Disposed to derogate, to take away by slander.

The iniquity of an envious and detractive adversary. Bp. Morton, Discharge, &c. (1633, p. 276.

DETRA'CTOR.* n. s. [Lat. detractor.] One that takes away another's reputation. See DETRACTER.

Leaving the envie or displeasure to the detractor. Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 211.

He that hath the gift of good reputation, if his name be any thing touched by the detractor, how unquiet is he! Hoveden, ii. 226.

All poets are mad, a company of bitter satirists, detractors, or else parasitical applauders!
Burton, Anat. of Mel. To the Reader.

The detractor represents the perfection of him, whom he hates, lessened and diminished from what they really are, partly by a malicious concealment, partly by calumny and direct slander.
South, Serm. ix. 198.

DETRA'CTORY. adj. [from detract.] Defamatory by denial of desert; derogatory. Sometimes with to, properly from.

This is not only derogatory unto the wisdom of God, who hath proposed the world unto our knowledge, and thereby the notion of himself; but also detractory unto the intellect and sense of man, expressedly disposed for that inquisition. Brown.

In mentioning the joys of heaven, I use the expressions I find less detractory from a theme above our praises. Boyle.

The detractory lye takes from a great man the reputation that justly belongs to him. Arbuthnot.

DETRA'CTRESS. n. s. [from detract.] A censorious woman.

If any shall detract from a lady's character, unless she be absent, the said detractress shall be forthwith ordered to the lowest place of the room.
Addison.

To DETRE'CT.* v. a. [Lat. detrecto.] To refuse; to decline. Not in use.

He [Moses] detrected his going into Egypt, upon pretence that he was not eloquent.
Fotherby, Atheom. (1622,) p. 194.

DETRECTA'TION.* n. s. [Lat. detrectatio.] A refusing to do a thing. Not in use.
Cockeram.

DETRIMENT. n. s. [detrimentum, Latin.] Loss; damage; mischief; diminution; harm.

Difficult it must be for one Christian church to abolish that which all had received and held for the space of many ages, and that without any detriment unto religion. Hooker.

I can repair
That detriment, if such it be, to lose
Self-lost. Milton, P.L.

If your join power prevail, the affairs is frail
No detriment need fear: go, and be strong.
Milton, P.L.

There often fall out so many things to be done on the sudden, that some of them must of necessity be neglected for that whole year, which is the greatest detriment to this whole mystery. Evelyn's Calendar.

Let a family burn but a candle a night less than the usual number, and they may take in the Spectator without detriment to their private affairs.
Addison.

DETRIME'NTAL. adj. [from detriment.] Mischievous; harmful; causing loss.

Among all necessary rewards, which are neither dangerous nor detrimental to the state, I remember none so remarkable as the titles which are bestowed by the emperor of China: these are never given to any subject till the subject is dead.
Addison.

Obstinacy in prejudices, which are detrimental to our country, ought not to be mistaken for virtuous resolution and firmness of mind. Addison.

DETRI'TION.† n. s. [detero, detritus, Latin.] The act of wearing away. Dict.

The brush of time is the gradual detrition of time. Steevens, Note on Shaksp. K. Hen. VI. P. II.

To DETRU'DE. v. a. [detrudo, Latin.] To thurst down; to force into a lower place.

Such as are detruded down to hell,
Either, for shame, they still themselves retire;
Or, tied in chains, they in close prison dwell.
Davies.

Philosophers are of opinion, that the souls of men may, for their miscarriages, be detruded into the bodies of beasts. Locke.

At thy command the vernal sun awakes
The torpid sap, detruded to the root
By wintry winds. Thomson.

To DETRU'NCATE.† v. a. [detrunco, Latin.] To lop; to cut; to shorten by deprivation of parts. Cockeram.

DETRUNCA'TION.† n. s. [from detruncate. This word, like detruncate, was in use nearly two centuries since, as appears by its introduction into Cockeram's vocabulary. Neither to this, nor to the verb, has Dr. Johnson, however, given any other authority than his own. That of a century since I have found in a very valuable compilation; and the word has afforded to Johnson an expression of notable effect in his admirable preface to his dictionary; of which expression many have believed, and some have unjustly asserted, our great lexicographer to be the coiner.] The act of lopping or cutting.

This can never prove either any interpolations in the former, or detruncations in the latter.
Biblioth. Bibl. (Ox. 1720,) p. 58.

It may sometimes happen, by hasty detruncation, that the general tendency of the sentence may be changed: the divine may desert his tenets, or the philosopher his system. Johnson, Pref. to his Dict.

DETRU'SION.† n. s. [detrusio, Latin.] The act of thrusting or forcing down.

The insolent detrusion of imperial authority.
Bp. Hall, Hon. of Marr. Clergy, (1620,) p. 282.

Upon this foul revolt and apostasy of their's [the angels'] from their primeval glory, followed their punishment; which was their dejection and detrusion into the caliginous regions of the air.
Hallywell, Melampr. (1681,) p. 13.

From this detrusion of the waters towards the side, the parts towards the pole must be much increased. Keil against Burnet.

DETURBA'TION. n. s. [deturbo, Latin.] The act of throwing down; degradation. Dict.

To DETU'RPATE.* v. a. [deturper, Fr. deturpo, Lat.] To defile. Cockeram.

Errors, superstitions, heresies, and impieties, which had deturpated the face of the Church.
Bp. Taylor, Diss. from Popery, ch. 1. § 11.

To DEVA'ST.* v. a. [Lat. devasto.] To plunder; to waste; to destroy. Not now in use. But devastate supplies its place.

She [the eagle] dwells among the rocks —
From wounds her eaglets suck the reeking blood,
And all-devasting war provides her food.
Sandys, Paraph. of Job, p. 58.

To DEVA'STATE* v. a. [Lat. devasto.] To waste. See To DEVAST.

DEVASTA'TION.† n. s. [devastatio, Latin.] Waste; havock; desolation; destruction.

The flames of hostile fury rising up in our towns and cities; the devastation of our fruitful and pleasant villages. Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 158.

By devastation the rough warriour gains,
And farmers fatten most when famine reigns.
Garth.

That flood which overflowed Attica in the days of Ogyges, and that which drowned Thessaly in Deucalion's time, made cruel havock and devastation among them. Woodward.

DEUCE.† n. s. [old Fr. deues; modern, deux.]

1. Two. A word used in games, for a card or die with two spots.

You are a gentleman and a gamester; then, I am sure, you know how much the gross sum of deuce ace amounts to. Shakspeare.

2. The devil. See DEUSE.

To DEVE'LOPE. v. a. [developer, French.] To disengage from something that enfolds and conceals; to disentangle; to clear from its covering.

Take him to develope, if you can,
And hew the block off and get out the man.
Pope, Dunciad.

DEVE'LOPEMENT.* n. s. [Fr. desvelopement, "an unfolding, manifesting, spreading open," Cotgrave.] The act of minutely shewing; an exhibition.

These observations on Thomson — might still be augmented by an examination and developement of the beauties in the loves of the birds, in Spring; a view of the torrid zone, in Summer; the rise of fountains and rivers, in Autumn; a man perishing in the snows, in Winter.
Dr. Warton, Ess. on Pope, i. 49.

To DEVENU'STATE.* v. a. [devenusto, Lat.] To deface; to despoil.

They — would rejoice to see what yet remains of beauty and order devenustated, and exposed to shame and dishonour.
Waterhouse, Apol. for Learn. 1653, p. 245.

DEVE'RGENCE. n. s. [devergentia, Latin.] Declivity; declination. Dict.

To DEVE'ST.† v. a. [devestir, French; devestio, Latin. This word is more frequently written divest; though devest is the correct spelling, and some of our old lexicographers so give the word. But, like dispatch, divest seems to disdain submission to etymology.]

1. To strip; to deprive of clothes.

Friends all but now
In quarter and in terms like bride and groom,
Devesting them for bed. Shakspeare.

Then of his arms Androgeus he devests,
His sword, his shield he takes, and plumed crests.
Denham.

2. To annul; to take away any thing good.

What are those breaches of the law of nature and nations, which do forfeit and devest all right and title in a nation to government? Bacon.

3. To free from any thing bad.

Come on thou little inmate of this breast,
Which for thy sake from passions I devest. Prior.

DEVE'X. adj. [devexus, Latin.] Bending down; declivous; incurvated downwards.

DEVE'X* n. s. Used for devexity by an old writer of considerable merit, but improperly.

Upon the western lands,
Following the world's devex, he meant to tread,
To compass both the poles, and drink Nile's head.
May, Lucan, B. 10.

DEVE'XITY.† n. s. [Fr. devexité, "a hollowness, bowing, or bending," Cotgrave.] Incurvation downards; declivity.

The heaven's divexity, [devexity.]
Davies, Wit's Pilgrimage, sign. N. i. b.

To DE'VIATE.† v. n. [de via decedere, Latin, Dr. Johnson says. But our word is immediately from the French devier, or desvier, "to mislead or put out of the way; also, to die." Cotgrave. So the old Fr. deviat, he is dead. V. Lacombe.]

1. To wander from the right or common way.

The rest to some faint meaning make pretence,
But Shadwell never deviates into sense. Dryden.

Thus Pegasus, a nearer way to take,
May boldly deviate from the common track. Pope.

What makes all physical and moral ill?
There nature deviates, and here wanders will. Pope.

Besides places which may deviate from the sense of the author, it would be kind to observe any deficiencies in the diction. Pope.

2. To go astray; to err; to sin; to offend.

DEVIA'TION. n. s. [from deviate.]

1. The act of quitting the right way; errour; wandering.

These bodies constantly move round in the same tracts, without making the least deviation. Cheyne.

2. Variation from established rule.

Having once surveyed the true and proper natural alphabet, we may easily discover the deviations from it, in all the alphabets in use, either by defect of single characters, of letters, or by confusion of them. Holder.

3. Offence; obliquity of conduct.

Worthy persons, if inadvertently drawn into a deviation, will endeavour instantly to recover their lost ground, that they may not bring errour into habit. Clarissa.

DEVI'CE.† n. s. [devise, French; devisa, Italian.]

1. A contrivance; a stratagem.

This is our device,
That Falstaff at that oak shall meet with us.
Shakspeare.

He intented it as a politick device to lessen their interest, and keep them low in the world. Atterbury.

2. A design; a scheme formed; project; speculation.

Touching the exchange of laws in practice with laws in device, which they say are better for the state of the church, if they might take place: the farther we examine them, the greater cause we find to conclude, although we continue the same we are, the harm is not great. Hooker.

His device is against Babylon, to destroy it.
Jer. li. 11.

There are many devices in a man's heart: nevertheless, the counsel of the Lord shall stand.
Prov. xix. 21.

3. The emblem on a shield; the ensign armorial of a nation or family.

Then change we shields, and their devices bear;
Let fraud supply the want of force in war. Dryden.

Hibernia's harp, device of her command,
And parent of her mirth, shall there be seen. Prior.

They intend to let the world see what party they are of, by figures and designs upon these fans; as the knights errant used to distinguish themselves by devices on their shields. Addison.

4. Invention; genius.

He's gentle; never schooled; and yet learned; full of noble device, of all sorts enchantingly beloved. Shakspeare.

5. A spectacle; a show. See DEVICEFUL.

Masques and devices, welcome!
Beaum. and Fl. Coronation.

DEVI'CEFUL.* adj. [from device.]

1. Full of costly spectacles, and splendid exhibitions.

To tell the glory of the feast that day,
The goodly service, the devicefull sights,
The bridegroom's state, the bride's most rich array.
Spenser, F. Q. v. iii. 3.

2. Inventive; full of speculation.
Some clarks doe doubt in their deviceſull art,
Whether this heavenly thing whereof I treat,
To weeten Mercie, be of Justice part.
Spenser, F. Q. v. x. 1.

DEVI'CEFULLY.* adv. [from deviceful.] In a manner curiously contrived.
I had not taught thee then the alphabet
Of flow'rs; how they, devicefully being set
And bound up, might with secrecy
Deliver errands. Donne, Poems, p. 77.

DE'VIL.† n. s. [ðioful, Saxon; diabolus, Latin. It were more properly written divel, Dr. Johnson says. To this Mr. Nares assents; but thinks that it will not probably be adopted; though the Saxon and Latin words, already given, he says, require it. A grammarian of the 17th century has opposed this spelling, which seems to have been defended in his time; as indeed the word was usually then written. "Devil or rather deevil, not divel, as some, far fetching it from διάβολος, would have it. For as God cometh of good, (which in the old Saxon was written with a single o, and the Netherlanders yet say goed,) so doth deevil come of eevil, malus; as the Sax. of ðe yrel, the same." Butler's Eng. Gr. 1633. Index. The Sax. ðeoful, I may add, warrants the present spelling.]
1. A fallen angel; the tempter and spiritual enemy of mankind.
Are you a man?
—— Ay and a bold one, that dare look on that
Which might appal the devil. Shakspeare.
2. A wicked man or woman.
See thyself, devil:
Proper deformity seems not in the fiend
So horrid as in woman. Shakspeare.
3. A ludicrous term for mischief.
A war of profit mitigates the evil;
But to be tax'd, and beaten, is the devil. Granville.
4. A kind of expletive, expressing wonder or vexation.
The things, we know, are neither rich nor rare;
But wonder how the devil they got there! Pope.
5. A kind of ludicrous negative, in an adverbial sense.
The devil was well, the devil a monk was he!
A Proverb.
It is a fine thing to visit castles, and lodge in inns at a man's pleasure, without paying the devil a cross. Shelton, Tr. of D. Quix. iv. 25.
6. It is also a ludicrous expletive of elder times, coupled with all; implying, after an enumeration of some things, several understood. Bale appears to have been fond of applying it, in his zeal against popery; for he uses it half a dozen times, at least, in the little work which I cite. It is yet absurdly retained in low language.
Baptysed bells, bedes, organs, songs, wax-lyght, pyctures, reliques, banners, crosses, altars, holye water, and the devyll and all of soche idolatrouse beggery. Bale, Yet a Course at the Romishe Foxe, 1543, fol. 65.

DE'VILING.* n. s. [from devil.] A young devil. See DEVILKIN.
Engender young devilings.
Beaum. and Fl. Knight of Malta.

DE'VILISH.† adj. [Sax. ðeoflic.]
1. Partaking of the qualities of the devil; diabolical; mischievous; malicious; destructive.
Gynecia mistrusted greatly Cecropia, because she had heard much of the devilish wickedness of her heart. Sidney.
For grief thereof, and devilish despight,
From his infernal furnace forth he threw
Huge flames, that dimmed all the heaven's light,
Enroll'd in duskish smoke and brimstone blue.
Spenser, F. Q.
He trains his devilish enginery, impal'd
On every side with shadowy squadrons deep.
Milton, P. L.
2. Having communication with the devil.
The duchess, by his subornation,
Upon my life began her devilish practices. Shaks.
3. An epithet of abhorrence or contempt.
A devilish knave! besides the knave is handsome, young, and blithe: all those requisites are in him that delight. Shakspeare.
4. Excessive: in a ludicrous sense.
Thy hair and beard are of a different die,
Short of one foot, distorted of one eye,
With all these tokens of a knave complete,
If thou art honest, thou'rt a devilish cheat.
Addison.

DE'VILISHLY.† adv. [from devilish.] In a manner suiting the devil; diabolically.
Being so brutish, so devilishly bent one towards another, how is it possible but that we should be discontent of all sides, full of cares, woes, and miseries. Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 116.
Those trumpeters followed them with continual alarms of damnation, if they did not venture life, fortune, and all, in that which wickedly and devilishly those impostors called the cause of God.
South, Serm. i. 450.

DE'VILISHNESS.* n. s. [from devilish.] The quality of the devil. Sherwood.
Some shall they slee with the swerde of their false doctrine, having a glorious shine of wisdom in superstition and devilishness.
Bale on the Revel. P. i. sign. F. 7.
Besides the devilishness of the doctrine in contrarying the ordinance of God.
Bp. Sanderson, Serm. p. 242.

DE'VILISM.* n. s. [from To devilize.] The state of devils.
Did ever any man look for heaven in hell before? Did ever any seek for the greatest good in the worst of evils? This is not heresy, but meer devilism. Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 150.

To DE'VILIZE.* v. a. [from devil.] To place among devils.
Unjust favours are no less injurious than derogations; he that should deify a saint, should wrong him as much, as he that should devilize him.
Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 13.

DE'VILKIN. n. s. [from devil.] A little devil. Clarissa.

DE'VILSHIP.* n. s. [from devil.] The character of a devil.
Noisy nothing! stalking shade!
By what witchcraft wert thou made?
Empty cause of solid harms!
But I shall find out counter charms,
Thy airy devilship to remove
From this circle here of love.
Cowley, Descript. of Honour.

DE'VIOUS. adj. [devius, Latin.]
1. Out of the common track.
Creusa kept behind: by choice we stray
Through every dark and every devious way. Dryd.
In this minute devious subject I have been necessitated to explain myself in more words than may seem needful. Holder.
2. Wandering; roving; rambling.
Every muse,
And every blooming pleasure wait without
To bless the wildly devious morning walk.
Thomson.
3. Erring; going astray from rectitude.
One devious step, at first setting out, frequently leads a person into a wilderness of doubt and errour. Clarissa.
Some lower muse perhaps, who lightly treads
The devious paths where wanton fancy leads. Rowe.
4. It is used likewise of persons. Roving; idly vagrant; erring from the way.

To DEVI'RGINATE.* v. a. [Lat. devirgino.] To deflour; to deprive of virginity. This word is given in Cockeram's old dictionary, and in the later one of Robertson. But it is not now in use.
This very expression of virgin does direct us to make use of watchfulness over ourselves, that sin do not devirginate us.
Dr. Allestree's Serm. 1684, P. II. p. 96.

DEVI'SABLE.* adj. [from devise.]
1. Capable of being contrived, or invented.
In courts on earth, if there be no records; there is scarce devisable a legal traverse or a trial.
Sadler, Rights of the Kingdom, 1649, p. 189.
2. Possible to be excogitated.
God hath not prevented all exceptions or cavils devisable by curious or captious wits, against his dispensations. Barrow, Serm. vol. ii. S. ii.
3. That may be granted by will.
It seems sufficiently clear, that, before the conquest, lands were devisable by will. Blackstone.

To DEVI'SE. v. a. [deviser, French, as of devisare, to look about. Skinner.
1. To contrive; to form by art; to invent; to excogitate; to strike out by thought.
Whether they, at their first coming into the land, or afterwards, by trading with other nations which had letters, learned them of them, or devised them among themselves, is very doubtful.
Spenser on Ireland.
He could by his skill draw after him the weight of five thousand bushels of grain, and devise those rare engines which shot small stones at hand, but great ones afar off. Peacham.
Ye sons of art, one curious piece devise,
From whose constructure motion shall arise.
Blackmore.
2. To plan; to scheme.
Behold I frame evil against you, and devise a device against you. Jer. xiii. 11.

To DEVI'SE. v. n. To consider; to contrive; to lay plans; to form schemes: anciently with of.
Her merry fit she freshly gan to rear,
And did of joy and jollity devise,
Herself to cherish and her guest to chear.
Spenser, F. Q.
But sith now safe ye seized have the shore,
And well arrived are, high God be blest,
Let us devise of ease and everlasting rest.
Spenser, F. Q.
Since we are so far entered, let us, I pray you, a little devise of those evils by which that country is held in this wretched case, that it cannot, as you say, be recured. Spenser on Ireland.
Devise but how you'll use him when he comes,
and let us two devise to bring him thither. Shak.

DEVI'SE.† n. s. [devise, a will, old French; probably from the Lat. divisio.]
1. The act of giving or bequeathing by will.
This word is properly attributed in our common law to him that bequeaths his goods by his last will or testament in writing; and the reason is, because those that now appertain only to the devisour, by this act are distributed into many parts. Cowel.
The alienation is made by devise in a last will only, and the third part of these profits is there demandable. Locke.
2. Contrivance. See DEVICE.

God hath omitted nothing needful to his purpose, nor left his intention to be accomplished by our devices. Hooker.

To DEVI'SE. v. a. [from the noun.] To grant by will. A law term.

DEVISEE'. n. s. He to whom something is bequeathed by will.

DEVI'SER. n. s. [from devise.] A contriver; an inventer.

Being divided from truth in themselves, they are yet farther removed by advenient deception; for true it is, if I say they are daily mocked into errour by devisers. Brown.

The authors of useful inventions, the devisers of wholsome laws, as were the philosophers of antient times, were honoured as the fathers and prophets of their country. Grew.

DEVI'SOUR.† n. s. He that gives by will. See DEVISE. Mr. Mason is indignant at Dr. Johnson's writing devisour; which word, he says, is against all legal authority, and should therefore be altered to devisor. It is probable, however, that Johnson's is the old legal form from the ancient French devisur, a testator; and so written, in contradistinction to deviser or devisor, both of which were formerly indiscriminately used for a contriver.

DE'VITABLE. adj. [devitabilis, Latin.] Possible to be avoided; avoidable. Dict.

DEVITA'TION. n. s. [devitatio, Latin.] The act of escaping or avoiding. Dict.

DEVOCA'TION.* n. s. [Lat. devocatio.] A calling away; a seduction.

He that makes it his business to be freed and released from all its [sorcery's] blandishments and flattering devocations, and endeavours wholly to withdraw himself from the love of corporeity, and too near a sympathy with the frail flesh; he by it enkindles such a divine principle, as lifts him up above the fate of this inferiour world, and adorns his mind with such an awful majesty as beats back all inchantments. Hallywell, Melanpr. p. 97.

DEVO'ID. adj. [vuide, French.]

1. Empty; vacant; void.

When I awoke and found her place devoid,
And nought but pressed grass where she had lyen,
I sorrow'd all so much as earst I joy'd.
Spenser, F. Q.

2. Without any thing, whether good or evil; free from; in want of.

He flung it from him, and devoid of dread,
Upon him lightly leaped without heed.
Spenser, F. Q.

That the soul and angels are devoid of quantity and dimension, and that they have nothing to do with proper locality, is generally opinioned. Glanville.

The motion of this chariot will still be easier as it ascends higher, till at length it shall become utterly devoid of gravity, when the least strength will be able to bestow upon it a swift motion. Wilkins, Math. Magick.

His warlike mind, his soul devoid of fear,
His high designing thoughts were figur'd there,
As when, by magick, ghosts are made appear.
Dryden.

We Tyrians are not so devoid of sense,
Nor so remote from Phœbus' influence. Dryden.

DEVO'IR.† n. s. [devoir, French. It was formerly our word for endeavour. "Do your devir and your diligent labour." Mystery of Candlemas-Day, 1512.]

1. Service. A sense now not used.

To restore again the kingdom of the Mamalukes, he offered him their utmost devoir and service. Knolles.

Madam, if any service or devoir
Of a poor errant knight may right your wrongs,
Command it.
Beaum. and Fl. Knight of the Burning Pestle.

2. Act of civility or obsequiousness.

Gentlemen who do not design to marry, yet pay their devoirs to one particular fair. Spectator.

Aukward and supple, each devoir to pay,
She flatters her good lady twice a-day. Pope.

To DEVO'LVE.† v. a. [devolvo, Latin.]

1. To roll down.

Through splendid kingdoms he devolves his maze,
Now wanders wild through solitary tracts
Of life-deserted sand. Thomson.

Every headlong stream
Devolves its winding waters to the main.
Akenside, Pleas. of Imag. B. 2.

2. To move from one hand to another.

Upon the duke of Ormond, the king had wholly devolved the care and disposition of all affairs in Ireland. Temple.

Because they found too much confusion in such a multitude of statesmen, they devolved their whole authority into the hands of the council of sixty. Addison.

The whole power, at home and abroad, was devolved upon that family. Swift.

The matter which devolves from the hills down upon the lower grounds, does not considerably raise and augment them. Woodward.

To DEVO'LVE.† v. n.

1. To roll down.

Streams that had in rolling currents, from the tops of the mountains, devolved into the rivers below. Lord's Hist. of the Banians, 1630, p. 18.

2. To fall in succession into new hands. [The word, in this sense, is now written, I think, both with on and to. Dr. Johnson seems to prefer the latter, by his own example.]

Supposing people, by wanting spiritual blessings, did lose all their right to temporal, yet that forfeiture must devolve only to the supreme Lord. Decay of Piety.

His estate is said to have been fifteen hundred a-year, which by his death devolved to Lord Somerville of Scotland. Johnson, Life of Somerville.

DEVOLU'TION. n. s. [devolutio, Latin.]

1. The act of rolling down.

The raising of new mountains, deterrations, or the devolution of earth down upon the valleys from the hills and high grounds, will fall under our consideration. Woodward.

2. Removal successive from hand to hand.

The jurisdiction exercised in those courts is derived from the crown of England, and the last devolution is to the king by way of appeal. Hale.

DEVORA'TION. n. s. [from devoro, Latin.] The act of devouring. Dict.

DEVO'TARY.* n. s. [from devote.] One devoted to a particular worship; a votary.

To whose shrine, [Diana's,] there went up a more famous and frequent pilgrimage of devotaries, than to any holy land of their's whatsoever. Gregory's Works, (4th edit. 1684,) p. 50.

To DEVO'TE. v. a, [devoveo, devotus, Latin.]

1. To dedicate; to consecrate; to appropriate by vow.

No devoted thing that a man shall devote unto the Lord, of all that he hath, both of man and beast, and of the field of his possession, shall be sold or redeemed. Lev. xxvii. 21.

What black magician conjures up this fiend,
To stop devoted charitable deeds? Shakspeare.

They impious, dar'd to pray
On herds devoted to the god of day. Pope.

2. To addict; as to a sect, or study.

If persons of this make should ever devote themselves to science, they should be well assured of a solid and strong constitution of body. Watts.

3. To condemn; to resign to ill.

Aliens were devoted to their rapine and despight. Decay of Piety.

4. To addict; to give up to ill.

The Romans having once debauched their senses with the pleasures of other nations, they devoted themselves unto all wickedness. Grew.

5. To curse; to execrate; to doom to destruction.

I fly
Those wicked tents devoted; lest the wrath
Impendent, raging into sudden flame,
Distinguish not. Milton, P. L.

Goddess of maids, and conscious of our hearts,
So keep me from the vengeance of thy darts,
Which Niobe's devoted issue felt,
When, hissing through the skies, the feather'd deaths were dealt. Dryden.

Let her, like me, of ev'ry joy forlorn,
Devote the hour when such a wretch was born:
Like me to deserts and to darkness run. Rowe.

DEVO'TE.† adj. For devoted.

Belly-devote friars, whom hunger and loss of hope have made wickedly ireful. Sir E. Sandys, State of Religion.

Let's be no stoicks, nor no stocks, I pray;
Or so devote to Aristotle's checks.
Shakspeare, Tim. of Athens.

How on a sudden lost,
Defac'd, deflower'd, and now to death devote!
Milton, P. L.

Ah why, Penelope, this causeless fear,
To render sleep's soft blessings insincere!
Alike devote to sorrow's dire extreme,
The day reflection, and the midnight dream. Pope.

DEVO'TE.* n. s. One devoted to a particular service, or purpose.

One professeth himself a devote, or peculiar servant to our Lord. Sir E. Sandys, State of Religion.

Swallowed with infinite consolation by their meagre devotes. Swift, Tale of a Tub, edit. 1704.

DEVO'TEDNES. n. s. [from devote.] The state of being devoted or dedicated; consecration; addictedness.

Whatever may fall from my pen to her disadvantage, relates to her but as she was, or may again be, an obstacle to your devotedness to seraphick love. Boyle.

The owning of our obligation unto virtue, may be styled natural religion; that is to say, a devotedness unto God, so as to act according to his will. Grew.

DEVOTEE'.† n. s. [devot, French. The word is of no great age in our language; but I have seen it in a poem published a little before the appearance of the Spectator. Dr. Johnson gives no example. The Spectator applies the word, throughout a pointed and excellent letter, to a female of this character.] One erroneously or superstitiously religious; a bigot.

A devotee is one of those who disparage religion by their indiscreet and unseasonable introduction of the mention of virtue on all occasions, &c. Spectator, No. 354.

Pilgrimages have a place amongst those different ways of doing penance: They are often either enjoined by confessors, or wilfully undergone by devotees. Serces's Popery an Enemy to Scripture, (1736,) p. 57.

Secluded from conversation, as usual, she now entertained the visions of a devotee. Goldsmith, Ess. 19.

Let not then either the sober moralist, or the gay man of the world, any longer treat this most holy affection [the love of God] with derision and contempt, as a mere ideal unintelligible notion, fit only for the cloystered monk, or the superstitious devotee. Bp. Porteus, Serm. i. 1.

DEVO'TEMENT.* n. s. [from devote.] The act of devoting by a solemn dedication.

Her [Iphigenia's] devotement was the demand of Apollo, and the joint petition of all Greece. Hurd, Notes on Hor. Art of Poetry.

DEVO'TER.* n. s. [from devote.] One devoted to a particular service; a worshipper.

Where one doth profess himself a devoter, or peculiar servant of our Lord; whole towns sometimes, as Sienna by name, are devoters of our Lady. Sir Miles Sandys, Essays, (1634,) p.196.

DEVO'TION.† n. s. [devotion, French; devotio, Lat.]

1. The state of being consecrated or dedicated.

2. Piety; acts of religion; devoutness.

Meantime her warlike brother on the seas
His waving streamers to the winds displays,
And vows for his return, with vain devotion, pays.
Dryden.

3. An act of external worship.

Religious minds are inflamed with the love of publick devotion. Hooker.

For as I passed by and beheld your devotion, I found an altar with this inscription, To the unknown God. Acts, xvii. 23.

In vain doth man the name of just expect,
If his devotions he to God neglect. Denham.

4. Prayer; expression of devotion.

An aged holy man,
That day and night said his devotion,
No other worldly business did apply.
Spenser, F. Q.

Your devotion has its opportunity: we must pray always, but chiefly at certain times. Sprat.

5. An oblation devoted to charitable or pious use.

Whilst these sentences are in reading, the deacons, church-wardens, or other fit person appointed for that purpose, shall receive the alms for the poor, and other devotions of the people, in a decent basin. Communion Service, Rubrick after the Offertory.

6. The state of the mind under a strong sense of dependence upon God; devoutness; piety.

Grateful to acknowledge whence his good
Descends, thither with heart, and voice, and eyes
Directed in devotion, to adore
And worship God supreme, who made him chief
Of all his works. Milton, P. L.

From the full choir, when loud Hosannas rise,
And swell the pomp of dreadful sacrifice;
Amid that scene, if some relenting eye
Glance on the stone where our cold reliques lie,
Devotion's self shall steal a thought from heav'n,
One human tear shall drop, and be forgiv'n. Pope.

Devotion may be considered either as an exercise of publick or private prayers at set times and occasions, or as a temper of the mind, a state and disposition of the heart, which is rightly affected with such exercises. Law on Christ's Perfection.

7. An act of reverence, respect, or ceremony.

Whither away so fast?
— Upon the like devotion as yourselves,
To gratulate the gentle princes there. Shakspeare.

8. Strong affection; ardent love; such as makes the lover the sole property of the person loved.

Be opposite all planets of good luck,
To my proceeding, if, with pure heart's love,
Immaculate devotion, holy thoughts,
I tender not thy beauteous princely daughter.
Shakspeare.

He had a particular reverence for the person of the king, and the more extraordinary devotion for that of the prince, as he had had the honour to be trusted with his education. Clarendon.

9. Earnestness; ardour; eagerness.

He seeks their hate with greater devotion than they can render it him; and leaves nothing undone that may fully discover him their opposite. Shakspeare.

10. Disposal; power; state of dependance on any one.

Arundel castle would keep that rich corner of the country at his majesty's devotion. Clarendon.

DEVO'TIONAL. adj. [from devotion.] Pertaining to devotion; annexed to worship; religious.

Nor are the soberest of them so apt for that devotional compliance and juncture of hearts, which I desire to bear in holy offices, to be performed with me. King Charles.

The favourable opinion and good word of men comes oftentimes at a very easy rate, by a few demure looks, with some devotional postures and grimaces. South.

DEVO'TIONALIST.† n. s. [from devotional.] A man zealous without knowledge; superstitiously devout. This is the more modern word. See DEVOTIONIST.

This point being once admitted, it is but to give a religious turn to this natural softness, and you have the complete image of a French devotionalist. Coventry, Phil. to Hyd. Conv. 1.

DEVO'TIONIST.* n. s. [from devotion.] One who is only formally, or superstitiously devout.

There are certain zealous devotionists, which abhor all set forms and fixed hours of invocation. Bp. Hall, Soliloq. 73.

Such a way as the story of the saint, and the allusion to her name, most naturally leads the fancy of the devotionist to think suitable for her. More, Antid. against Idolatry, ch. 4.

DEVO'TO.* n. s. Another name for a devotee, which see; and perhaps the older word.

In confidence of this conceit, such numbers of devotos in all times have pretended enthusiasm and extraordinary illapse from heaven. Spencer, Vulg. Proph. (1665,) Pref. a. 2. b.

This hath been commonly experimented by the devotos of all religions. Scott's Works, (1718,) vol. ii. p.129.

DEVO'TOR.* n. s. [Lat. devotus.] One who reverences or worships.

His sacred hand He [Christ] lifted up,
And round about on his devoters dealt
His bounteous blessing. Beaumont's Psyche, C. ix. st. 123.

To DEVO'UR.† v. a. [devoro, Latin; devorer, French. Dr. Johnson's first definition of this word squares with the Greek original, which he has not noticed, viz. βορά, the food, properly, of beasts; whence vorare, to devour, by the change of b into v, which is not uncommon in the Latin adaptation of a Greek word. V. Morin, Fr. and Gr. Lex. Etymol.]

1. To eat up ravenously, as a wild beast or animal of prey.

We will say some evil beast hath devoured him. Genesis, xxxvii. 33.

We've willing dames enough: there cannot be
That vulture in you to devour so many
As will to greatness dedicate themselves,
Finding it so inclin'd. Shakspeare.

So looks the pent up lion o'er the wretch
That trembles under his devouring paws. Shaksp.

2. To destroy or consume with rapidity and violence.

A fire devoureth before them, and behind them a flame burneth. Joel, ii. 3.

How dire a tempest from Mycenæ pour'd,
Our plains, our temples, and our town devour'd;
It was the waste of war. Dryden.

Notwithstanding that Socrates lived in the time of this devouring pestilence at Athens, he never caught the least infection. Addison.

3. To swallow up; to annihilate.

He seemed in swiftness to devour the way. Shakspeare.

Such a pleasure as grows fresher upon enjoyment; and though continually fed upon, yet is never devoured. South.

Death stalks behind thee, and each flying hour
Does some loose remnant of thy life devour. Dryden.

4. To enjoy with avidity.

Longing they look, and gaping at the sight,
Devour her o'er and o'er with vast delight. Dryden.

DEVOU'RER. n. s. [from devour.] A consumer; one that devours; one that preys upon.

Rome is but a wilderness of tygers:
Tygers must prey, and Rome affords no prey
But me and mine: how happy art thou then,
From these devourers to be banished? Shakspeare.

Since those leviathans are withdrawn, the lesser devourers supply their place: fraud succeeds to violence. Decay of Piety.

Carp and tench do best together, all other fish being devourers of their spawn. Mortimer.

DEVO'URINGLY.* adv. [from the part. devouring.] In a consuming manner. Huloet.

DEVO'UT.† adj. [devot, old Fr. devotus, Latin.]

1. Pious; religious; devoted to holy duties.

We must be constant and devout in the worship of our God, and ready in all acts of benevolence to our neighbour. Rogers.

2. Filled with pious thoughts.

For this, with soul devout, he thank'd the god;
And, of success secure, return'd to his abode. Dryden.

3. Expressive of devotion or piety.

Anon dry ground appears, and from his ark
The ancient sire descends, with all his train:
Then with uplifted hands, and eyes devout,
Grateful to heaven. Milton, P. L.

DEVO'UT.* n. s. Another of our elder phrases for a devotee.

They are not to be the ordinary followers of Antichrist, but they are to be in his special devouts, and as it were sworn slaves. Sheldon, Miracles of Antichrist, (1616,) p. 247.

DEVO'UTLESSNESS.* n. s. [devout and less.] Want of devotion.

The last point of this armour be the darts of devoutlessness, unmercifulness, and epicurisme; which fly abrode in every place; for few or none there be that serve God devoutly. Bp. of Chichester's Two Sermons, (1576,) sign. C. 6. b.

DEVO'UTLY. adv. [from devout.] Piously; with ardent devotion; religiously.

Her grace rose, and with modest paces
Came to the altar, where she kneel'd; and saint-like,
Cast her fair eyes to heav'n, and pray'd devoutly.
Shakspeare.

One of the wise men having a while attentively and devoutly viewed and contemplated this pillar and cross, fell down upon his face. Bacon.

Her twilights were more clear than our mid-day,
She dreamt devoutlier than most use to pray.
Donne.

Think, O my soul, devoutly think,
How, with affrighted eyes,
Thou saw'st the wide extended deep
In all its horrors rise! Addison.

To second causes we seem to trust, without expressing, so devoutly as we ought to do, our dependence on the first. Atterbury.

DEVO'UTNESS.* n. s. [from devout.] Piety. Dr. Johnson uses this word in one of his definitions of devotion, but has omitted all further notice of it in his dictionary. It occurs in the old dictionary of Sherwood.

'Twas observed before, that there are some who have a sort of devoutness and religion in their particular complexion. Glanville, Serm. p. 52.

To DEVO'W.* v. a. [Lat. devoveo.] To give up; to addict.

To the inquiry
And search of which, your mathematical head
Hath so devow'd itself. B. Jonson, Magn. Lady.

DEUSE.† n. s. [more properly than deuce, Junius, from Dusius, the name of a certain species of evil spirits. Dr. Johnson might have added what St. Augustine says of the name: "dæmones, quos Dusios Galli nuncupant." De Civ. Dei, lib. xv. cap. 23. They are artfully represented as great followers of women; whence the old Teutonick duyse is said to have been formed for a concubine. V. Keysler, Antiq. Septentrion. p. 457. And Kilian in V. DUYSE.] The devil: a ludicrous word.

'Twas the prettiest prologue, as he wrote it;
Well, the deuce take me if I ha'n't forgot it.
Congreve.

DEU'SED.* adj. [from deuse.] Excessive, in the absurd sense of devilish; as, the man had a deused deal of pride. A low word; not used in serious writing.

DEUTERO'GAMIST.* n. s. [from deuterogamy.] He who enters into a second marriage.

He had published for me against the deuterogamists of the age.
Goldsmith, Vic. of Wakefield, ch. 18.

DEUTERO'GAMY.† n. s. [δεύτερος and γάμος.] A second marriage. Dict.

You here see that unfortunate divine, who has so long, and it would ill become me to say successfully, fought against the deuterogamy of the age. Goldsmith, Vic. of Wakefield, ch. 14.

DEU'TERONOMY.† n. s. [Gr. δεύτερος νόμος, Fr. deuteronome.] The second book of the law; the fifth book of Moses.

The book of Deuteronomy brings down the Sacred History to the year of the world 2552, and completes the volume of the Pentateuch; of which every part is uniformly and consistently perfect.
Gray, Key to the Old Testament.

DEUTERO'SCOPY. n. s. [δεύτερος and σκοπέω.] The second intention; the meaning beyond the literal sense: not in use.

Not attaining the deuteroscopy, or second intention of the words, they are fain to omit their consequences, coherences, figures, or tropologies.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

To DEW.† v. a. [Some have thought the Gr. δεύω, to moisten, the parent of this word. The Saxons, however, had the verb deapian, whence the substantive; which is, that which is wetted; the participle, as Mr. Tooke observes, of deapian; and therefore the verb is not, as Dr. Johnson asserts, from the noun.] To wet as with dew; to moisten; to bedew.

A trickling stream of balm most sovereign,
And dainty dear, which on the ground still fell,
And overflowed all the fertile plain,
As it had dewed been with timely rain.
Spenser, F. Q.

With him pour we in our country's purge,
Each drop of us.
—— Or so much as he needs
To dew the sovereign flower, and drown the weeds.
Shakspeare.

Give me thy hand,
That I may dew it with my mournful tears. Shaks.

He ceas'd; discerning Adam with such joy
Surcharg'd, as had, like grief, been dew'd in tears,
Without the vent of words, which these he breath'd.
Milton, P. L.

Palemon above the rest appears,
In sable garments, dew'd with gushing tears.
Dryden.

In Gallick blood again
He dews his reeking sword, and strows the ground
With headless ranks. Philips.

DEW. n. s. [deap, Saxon; daaw, Dutch.] The moisture upon the ground.

Fogs which we frequently observe after sun-setting, even in our hottest months, are nothing but a vapour consisting of water; which vapour was sent up in greater quantity all the foregoing day, than now in the evening; but the sun then being above the horizon, taking it at the surface of the earth, and rapidly mounting it up into the atmosphere, it was not discernible: the sun being now gone off, the vapour stagnates at and near the earth, and saturates the air till it is so thick as to be easily visible therein; and when at length the heat there is somewhat further spent, which is usually about the middle of the night, it falls down again in a dew, alighting upon herbs and other vegetables, which it cherishes, cools, and refreshes. Woodward.

Never yet one hour in bed
Did I enjoy the golden dew of sleep,
But with his tim'rous dreams was still awak'd.
Shakspeare.

That churchman bears a bounteous mind indeed;
A hand as fruitful as the land that feeds us;
His dew falls every where. Shakspeare.

She looks as clear
As morning roses newly wash'd with dew. Shaks.

Dews and rains are but the return of moist vapours condensed. Bacon.

Now sliding streams the thirsty plants renew,
And feed their fibres with reviving dew. Pope.

DE'WBENT.* part. adj. [from dew and bent.] Bent by dew.

Thine is the balmy breath of morn,
Just as the dew-bent rose is born.
Thomson, Hymn on Solitude.

The dew-bent primrose kiss'd the breeze-swept ground. A. Hill, The Wedding Day.

DE'WBERRY. n. s. [from dew and berry.] Dewberries, as they stand here among the more delicate fruits, must be understood to mean rasberries, which are also of the bramble kind.
Hanmer.

Feed him with apricocks and dewberries,
With purple grapes, green figs, and mulberries.
Shakspeare.

DE'WBESPRENT. part. [dew and besprent.] Sprinkled with dew.

This evening late, by then the chewing flocks,
Had ta'en their supper on the savoury herb
Of knot-grass dewbesprent, and were in fold,
I sat me down to watch upon a bank
With ivy canopied, and interwove
With flaunting honey-suckle. Milton, Comus.

DEW-BURNING. adj. [from dew and burning.] The meaning of this compound is doubtful. Perhaps it alludes to the sparkling of dew.

He, now to prove his late renewed might,
High brandishing his bright dew-burning blade,
Upon his crested scalp so sore did smite,
That to the scull a yawning wound it made.
Spenser, F. Q.

DE'WDROP. n. s. [dew and drop.] A drop of dew which sparkles at sun-rise.

I must go seek some dewdrops here,
And hang a pearl in every cowslip's ear. Shaksp.

An host
Innumerable! as the stars of night,
Or stars of morning, dewdrops, which the sun
Impearls on every leaf, and ev'ry flower.
Milton, P. L.

Rest, sweet as dewdrops on the flow'ry lawns,
When the sky opens, and the morning dawns!
Tickel.

DEW-DROPPING.* part. adj. [from dew and drop.] Wetting as with dew.

Half in a blush of clustering roses lost,
Dew-dropping Coolness to the shade retires.
Thomson, Summer.

DEW-IMPEARLED.* part. adj. [from dew and impearl.] Covered with dewdrops, which resemble pearls.

Where nightingales in Arden sit and sing
Amongst the dainty dew-impearled flowers.
Drayton, Sonn. 53.

DE'WLAP. n. s. [from lapping or licking the dew.]

1. The flesh that hangs down from the throat of oxen.

Large rolls of fat about his shoulders slung,
And from his neck the double dewlap hung.
Addison.

2. It is used in Shakspeare for a lip flaccid with age, in contempt.

And sometimes lurk I in a gossip's bowl,
In very likeness of a roasted crab;
And when she drinks against her lips I bob,
And on the wither'd dewlap pour the ale. Shaksp.

DE'WLAPT. adj. [from dewlap.] Furnished with dewlaps.

Who would believe, that there were mountaineers
Dewlapt like bulls, whose throats had hanging at 'em
Wallets of flesh? Shakspeare.

The dewlapt bull now chafes along the plain,
While burning love ferments in ev'ry vein. Gay.

DEW-WORM. n. s. [from dew and worm.] A worm found in dew.

For the trout, the dew-worm, which some call the lob-worm, and the brandling, are the chief.
Walton.

DE'WY.† adj. [Sax. deapiz.]

1. Resembling dew; partaking of dew.

From the earth a dewy mist
Went up, and water'd all the ground, and each
Plant of the field. Milton, P. L.

Where two adverse winds,
Sublim'd from dewy vapours in mid sky,
Engage with horrid shock, the ruffled brine
Roars stormy. Philips.

2. Moist with dew; roscid.

The joyous day gan early to appear,
And fair Aurora from her dewy bed
Of aged Tithone gan herself to rear,
With rosy cheeks, for shame as blushing red.
Spenser.

The bee with honied thigh,
That at her flowery work doth sing,
And the waters murmuring,
With such consort as they keep,
Entice the dewy feather'd sleep. Milton, Il Pens.

His dewy locks distill'd

Besides the succour which cold Ancien yields,
The rocks of Hernicus and dewy fields. Dryden.

My mother's blood
Runs on the dexter cheek, and this sinister
Bounds in my sire's. Shakspeare.

DEXTE'RITY.† n. s. [dexterité, old Fr. dexteritas, Lat. from dexter, (Gr. δεξιτερὸς,) the right hand, which is chiefly employed in workmanship. Hence our handiness is dexterity.

1. Readiness of limbs; activity; readiness to attain skill; skill; expertness.
2. Readiness of contrivance; quickness of expedient; skill of management.

His wisdom, by often evading from perils, was turned rather into a dexterity to deliver himself from dangers, when they pressed him, than into a providence to prevent and remove them afar off. Bacon.

They attempted to be knaves, but wanted art and dexterity. South.

The same Protestants may, by their dexterity, make themselves the national religion, and dispose the church-revenues among their pastors. Swift.

DE'XTEROUS. adj. [dexter, Lat.]

1. Expert at any manual employment; active; ready: as, a dexterous workman.

For both their dext'rous hands the lance could wield. Pope.

2. Expert in management; subtle; full of expedients.

They confine themselves, and are dexterous managers enough of the wares and products of that corner, with which they content themselves. Locke.

DE'XTEROUSLY. adv. [from dexterous.] Expertly; skilfully; artfully.

The magistrate sometimes cannot do his own office dexterously, but by acting the minister. South.

But then my study was to cog the dice,
And dexterously to throw the lucky sice. Dryden.

DE'XTEROUSNESS.* n. s. [from dexterous.] Skill.

Besides the dexterousness and propensity of the child, being descended lineally from so many of the same trade, the father is more careful to instruct him, and to discover to him all the mystery thereof. Howell, Lett. iii. 8.

A man surprised is even in reason more than half beaten; being taken at a disadvantage, from which he hath no way to extricate himself but by the dexterousness of his ingenuity. Feltham, Res. ii. 60.

As for any tunicles or skins, which should hinder the liver from enabling the dextral parts, we must not conceive it diffuseth its virtue by mere irradiation, but by its veins and proper vessels. Brown, Vulg. Err.

DEXTRA'LITY. n. s. [from dextral.] The state of being on the right, not the left, side.

If there were a determinate prepotency in the right, and such as ariseth from a constant root in nature, we might expect the same in other animals, whose parts are also differenced by dextrality. Brown, Vulg. Err.

DEY.* n. s. The title of the supreme governour of Algiers in Barbary, who is called bey at Tunis. See Shaw's Travels, 4to. p. 248.

DIABE'TES.† n. s. [διαβήτης, Gr. Our word was anciently diabete, but uncommon even in that form. See Sylvester's Du Bart. 1621, p. 659.] A morbid copiousness of urine; a fatal colliquation by the urinary passages.

An increase of that secretion may accompany the general colliquations; as in fluxes, hectick sweats and coughs, diabetes, and other consumptions. Derham, Phys. Theology.

DIABO'LICAL. } adj. [from diabolus, Lat.]
DIABO'LICK. } Devilish; partaking of the qualities of the devil; impious; atrocious; nefarious; pertaining to the devil.

This, in other beasts observ'd,
Doubt might beget of diabolick power,
Active within, beyond the sense of brute. Milton, P. L.

Does not the ambitious, the envious, and the revengeful man know very well, that the thirst of blood, and affectation of dominion by violence and oppression, is a most diabolical outrage upon the laws of God and nature? L'Estrange.

The practice of lying is a diabolical exercise, and they that use it are the devil's children. Ray.

Damned spirits must needs be all envy, despair, and rage; and have so much of a diabolical nature in them, as to wish all men to share their misery. Atterbury.

DIABO'LICALTY.* adv. [from diabolical.] In a devilish or nefarious manner. Sherwood.

DIABO'LICALNESS.* n. s. [from diabolical.] The quality of a devil.

You must know then that H-d-g-r, the manager of masquerades, is a devil disguised in human shape. I wonder he did not change his face as well as his body, but that retains its primitive diabolicalness. Dr. Warton, Satire on Ranelagh House.

To DIABO'LIFY.* v. a. [diabolus and fio, Lat.] To ascribe diabolical qualities to.

One faction turns them against another; the Lutheran against the Calvinist, and diabolifies him; and the Calvinist against the Lutheran, and superdiabolifies him. Farindon's Serm. 1647, p. 59.

DIA'BOLISM.* n. s. [from diabolus, Lat.]

1. The actions of the devil.

While thou so hotly disclaimest the devil, be not guilty of diabolism. Brown, Chr. Mor. i. 16.

2. Possession by the devil.

He was now projecting — the farce of diabolisms and exorcisms. Warburton, Doct. of Gr. ii. 238.

DIA'CHYLON.* n. s. [old Fr. diaculon, or diachylon; Gr. διὰ and χυλὸς, juice.] A mollifying plaster, made of juices. Cotgrave.

He thought it better, as better it was, to assuage his bruised dignity with half a yard square of balmy diplomatick diachylon. Burke on a Regicide Peace.

DIACO'DIUM.† n. s. [Gr. διὰ and κώδεια, the head of a poppy; Fr. diacode.] The syrup of poppies.

I can keep my cough quiet by diacodium. Johnson, Lett.

DIA'CONAL.* adj. [Fr. diaconal; from the Lat. diaconus.] Of or belonging to a deacon. A proper word, in contradistinction to archidiaconal. Cotgrave, and Sherwood.

DIACO'USTICKS. n. s. [διακεχυκὰ.] The doctrine of sounds.

DIACRI'TICAL.* } adj. [Gr. διακριτικὸς.]
DIACRI'TICK. } Distinguishing by a point or mark.

The Greek χ does of course pass into the Arabic ha or cha — distinguished only by the diacritick points; the one having two points, the other three adjoined to the same character. Wallis to Bp. Lloyd, (1699,) Nicholson's Epist. Corr. i. 123.

From f, in the Icelandick alphabet, v is distinguished only by a diacritical point. Johnson, Gramm. of the Eng. Tongue.

DI'ADEM.† n. s. [diademe, Fr. diadema, Lat. διάδημα, Gr. from διὰ and δέω, to bind; a diadem being the band round the heads of kings. See Scapulæ Lex. and Morin Fr. and Gr. Etym. Dict.]

1. A tiara; an ensign of royalty bound about the head of Eastern monarchs.

The sacred diadem in pieces rent,
And purple robe gored with many a wound. Spenser.

A list the coblers' temples ties,
To keep the hair out of their eyes;
From whence 'tis plain the diadem,
That princes wear, derives from them. Swift.

2. The mark of royalty worn on the head; the crown.

A crown,
Golden in shew, is but a wreath of thorns;
Brings dangers, troubles, cares, and sleepless nights,
To him who wears the regal diadem. Milton, P. L.

Why should he ravish then that diadem
From your grey temples, which the hand of time
Must shortly plant on his? Denham.

Faction, that once made diadems her prey,
And stopt our prince in his triumphant way,
Fled like a mist before this radiant day. Roscommon.

DI'ADEMED. adj. [from diadem.] Adorned with a diadem; crowned.

Not so, when diadem'd with rays divine,
Touch'd with the flame that breaks from virtue's shrine,
Her priestless muse forbids the good to die,
And opes the temple of eternity. Pope.

DI'ADROM. n. s. [διὰ δρομέω.] The time in which any motion is performed; the time in which a pendulum performs its vibration.

A gry is one tenth of a line, a line one tenth of an inch, an inch one tenth of a philosophical foot, a philosophical foot one third of a pendulum; whose diadroms, in the latitude of forty-five degrees, are equal to one second of time, or a sixtieth of a minute. Locke.

DIÆ'RESIS. n. s. [διαίρεσις.] The separation or disjunction of syllables; as aër.

DIAGNO'STICK. n. s. [διαγινώσκω.] A symptom by which a disease is distinguished from others.

I shall lay down some indisputable marks of this vice, that whenever we see the tokens, we may conclude the plague is in the house: — let us hear your diagnosticks. Collier on Pride.

One of our physicians proved disappointed of his prognosticks, or rather diagnosticks. Harvey on Consumption.

DIA'GONAL. adj. [διαγώνιος.] Reaching from one angle to another, so as to divide a parallelogram into equal parts.

The monstrosity of the badger is ill-contrived, and with some disadvantage; the shortness being fixed unto the legs of one side, that might have been more properly placed upon the diagonal movers. Browne, Vulg. Err.

All sorts of stone composed of granules, will cut and rive in any direction, as well in a perpendicular, or in a diagonal, as horizontally and parallel to the side of the strata. Woodward.

DIA'GONAL. n. s. [from the adjective.] A line drawn from angle to angle, and dividing a square into equal parts.

When a man has in his mind the idea of two lines, viz. the side and diagonal of a square, whereof the diagonal is an inch long, he may have the idea also of the division of that line into a certain number of equal parts. Locke.

DIA'GONALLY. adv. [from diagonal.] In a diagonal direction.

The right and left are not defined by philosophers according to common acceptation, that is, respectively from one man unto another, or any constant site in each, as though that should be the right in one, which, upon confront or facing, stands athwart or diagonally unto the other; but were distinguished, according unto their activity and predominant locomotion, on the either side. Brown, Vulg. Err.

DI'AGRAM. n. s. [διάγραμμα.] A delineation of geometrical figures; a mathematical scheme.

Many a fair precept in poetry is like a seeming demonstration in the mathematicks; very specious in the diagram, but failing in the mechanick operation. Dryden.

Why do not these persons make a diagram of these cogitative lines and angles, and demonstrate their properties of perception and appetite, as plainly as we know the other properties of triangles and circles? Bentley.

DIAGRA'PHICAL.* adj. [Gr. διὰ and γράφω, to describe.] Descriptive; as, "the diagraphical art, the art of painting or carving." Cockeram.

DIAGRY'DIATES. n. s. [from diagrydium, Lat.] Strong purgatives made with diagrydium.

All cholerick humours ought to be evacuated by diagrydiates, mixed with tartar, or some acid, or rhubarb powder. Floyer.

DI'AL. n. s. [diale, Skinner.] A plate marked with lines, where a hand or shadow shews the hour.

O, gentlemen, the time of life is short:
To spend that shortness basely were too long,
Though life did ride upon a dial's point,
Still ending at th' arrival of an hour.
Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

If the motion be very slow, we perceive it not: we have no sense of the accretive motion of plants or animals; and the sly shadow steals away upon the dial, and the quickest eye can discover no more but that it is gone. Glanville.

DIAL-PLATE, n. s. [dial and plate.] That on which hours or lines are marked.

Strada tells us that the two friends, being each of them possessed of a magnetic needle, made a kind of dial-plate, inscribing it with the four-and-twenty letters, in the same manner as the hours of the day are marked upon the ordinary dial-plate. Addison, Spect.

DIA'LECT. n. s. [διάλεκτος.]

1. The subdivision of a language; as the Attick, Dorick, Ionick, Æolick, dialects.

2. Style; manner of expression.

When themselves do practise that whereof they write, they change their dialect; and those words they shun, as if there were in them some secret sting. Hooker.

3. Language; speech.

In her youth
There is a prone and speechless dialect,
Such as moves men. Shakspeare, Meas. for Meas.

If the conferring of a kindness did not bind the person upon whom it was conferred, to the returns of gratitude, why, in the universal dialect of the world, are kindnesses still called obligations? South.

DIALE'CTICAL.† adj. [from dialectick.]

1. Logical; argumental.

Those dialectical subtleties that the schoolmen employ about physiological mysteries, more declare the wit of him that uses them, than increase the knowledge of sober lovers of truth. Boyle.

2. Respecting dialects, or the subdivision of a language.

Schultens supposes, that we have the book of Job as it was penned at first without any translations, as at that time the Hebrew and Arabick language was the same, with a small dialectical variation only. Hodges on Job, Prelim. Discourse.

Dr. Johnson was scarcely at all aware of the authenticity of ancient dialectical words, and therefore seldom gives them any place in his Dictionary. Pegge, Anec. of the Eng. Language.

DIALECTI'CIAN.* n. s. [Fr. dialecticien.] A logician; a reasoner.

DIALE'CTICK. n. s. [διαλεκτικη.] Logick; the art of reasoning.

DIALE'CTICK.* adj. [from the substantive.] Argumental.

Masters of the dialectick sciences, so able to guide our reason, assist in the discovery of truth, and fix the understanding in possession of it. Ellis, Knowl. of Divine Things, p. 337.

DI'ALLING.† n. s. [from dial.] The sciaterick science; the knowledge of shadow; the act of constructing dials on which the shadow may shew the hour.

This hypothesis may be tolerated in physicks, as it is not necessary in the arts of dialling or navigation to mention the true system or earth's motion. Bp. Berkeley, Siris, § 285.

DI'ALIST n. s. [from dial.] A constructer of dials.

Scientifick dialists, by the geometrick considerations of lines, have found out rules to mark out the irregular motion of the shadow in all latitudes, and on all planes. Moxon.

To DIA'LOGISE.* v. n. [old Fr. dialogiser. Lacombe.] To discourse in dialogue.

These interlocutory and dialoguising dreams, were not unknown even to the very heathens. Fotherby, Atheom. p. 126.

DIA'LOGISM.* n. s. [Fr. dialogisme, Gr. διαλογισμὸς.] A speech between two or more.

His foolish dialogism is a fighting with his own shadow. Fulke's Retentive, (1580,) p. 306.

Enlarging what they would say by bold and unusual metaphors, by their dialogisms and colloquies. Stokes on the Min. Prophets, 1659, Pref.

DIA'LOGIST.† n. s. [Fr. dialogiste.] A speaker in a dialogue or conference; a writer of dialogues.

The like doth Cicero assert in many places, sometimes in the persons of his dialogists, sometimes according to his own sense. Barrow, Serm. vol. ii. S. 8.

Our writer goes stumbling on, and adds, That as to Plato's arguments for the immortality of the soul, Cicero says to his dialogist, let us not produce them. Bentley, Phil. Lipsiensis.

I am very far from conceitedly insinuating, that this dialogist is the only person who hath managed the dispute, I speak of, with candour. Skelton, Deism Revealed, Pref.

DIALOGI'STICAL,* adj. [from dialogist.] Speaking in dialogue.

Two dialogistical conjurors, with their dramatick enchantments, change the scene. Icon. Lib. or Hist. of Pamphlets, 1715, p. 185.

DIALOGI'STICALLY.* adv. [from dialogistical.] In the manner of a dialogue.

In his Prophecy he [Malachi] proceeds most dialogistically. Bp. Richardson on the O. Test. p. 449.

DI'ALOGUE.† n. s. [old Fr. dialogue, from the Gr. διάλογος.] A conference; a conversation between two or more, either real or feigned.

Will you hear the dialogue that the two learned men have compiled in praise of the owl and cuckoo? Shakspeare.

Oh, the impudence of this wicked sex! Lascivious dialogues are innocent with you. Dryden, Span. Friar.

In easy dialogues is Fletcher's praise;
He mov'd the mind, but had not pow'r to raise.
Dryden.

To DI'ALOGUE. v. n. [from the noun.] To discourse with another; to confer.

Do'st dialogue with thy shadow? Shaks. Timon.

DIALOGUE-WRITER.* n. s. One who writes feigned conversations between two or more.

It is somewhat singular, that so many modern dialogue-writers should have failed in this particular, when so many of the most celebrated wits of modern Italy had given them eminent examples of the contrary proceeding. Dr. Warton, Essay on Pope.

DIA'LYSIS. n. s. [διάλυσις.] The figure in rhetorick by which syllables or words are divided.

DI'AMANTINE.* adj. [old Fr. diamantin; Ital. diamantino, "diamantine." Florio.] Adamantine; hard as a diamond.

In Destiny's hard diamantine rock.
Sylvestre, Du Bart. (1621,) p. 83.

DIA'METER. n. s. [διὰ and μέτρον.] The line, which passing through the centre of a circle, or other culvilinear figure, divides it into equal parts.

The space between the earth and the moon, according to Ptolemy, is seventeen times the diameter of the earth, which makes, in a gross account, about one hundred and twenty thousand miles. Ralegh.

The bay of Naples is the most delightful one that I ever saw: it lies in almost a round figure of about thirty miles in the diameter. Addison on Italy.

DIA'METRAL.† adj. [from diameter.]

1. Describing the diameter; relating to the diameter.

That conjunction or opposition maketh an eclipse which is diametral, that is, when the center of the earth and the centers of both the luminaries shall be in the same line, which happeneth to be there only, where the moon's eccentrick cutteth the sun's in that line, which is therefore called the ecliptick. Gregory's Posthuma, (1650,) p. 130.

2. Opposite.

There are gentlewomen and male guests,
Of several humours, carriage, constitution,
Profession too; but so diametral
One to another, and so much oppos'd,
As if I can but hold them altogether,
And draw 'em to a sufferance of themselves.
But till the dissolution of the dinner,
I shall have just occasion to believe
My wit is magisterial.
Ben Jonson, Magnetick Lady.

Your own oppositions [are] direct and diametral to God and his holy law. Abp. Sancroft, Serm. p. 79.

DIA'METRALLY.† adv. [from diametral.] According to the direction of a diameter; in direct opposition.

Their doctrine being directly and diametrally repugnant unto the Scriptures of the prophets and apostles. Harmar, Transl. of Beza's Serm. p. 151.

A learned priest might have known councils enow diametrally opposite to each other. Bp. Hall, Hon. of the Marr. Clergy, p. 239.

Christian piety is, beyond all other things, diametrally opposed to profaneness and impiety of actions. Hammond.

DIAME'TRICAL. adj. [from diameter.]
1. Describing a diameter.
2. Observing the direction of a diameter.

The sin of calumny is set in a most diametrical opposition to the evangelical precept of loving our neighbours as ourselves.
Government of the Tongue.

DIAME'TRICALLY. adv. [from diametrical.] In a diametrical direction.

He persuaded the king to consent to what was diametrically against his conscience and his honour, and, in truth, his security. Clarendon.

Thus intercepted in its passage, the vapour, which cannot penetrate the stratum diametrically, glides along the lower surface of it, permeating the horizontal interval, which is betwixt the said dense stratum and that which lies underneath it.
Woodward.

DI'AMOND. n. s. [diamant, Fr. adamas, Lat.]

The diamond, the most valuable and hardest of all the gems, is, when pure, perfectly clear and pellucid as the purest water; and is eminently distinguished from all other substances by its vivid splendour, and the brightness of its reflexions. It is extremely various in shape and size, being found in the greatest quantity very small, and the larger ones extremely seldom met with. The largest ever known is that in the possession of the Great Mogul, which weighs two hundred and seventy-nine carats, and is computed to be worth seven hundred and seventy-nine thousand two hundred and forty-four pounds. The diamond bears the force of the strongest fires, except the concentrated solar rays, without hurt; and even that infinitely fiercest of all fires does it no injury, unless directed to its weaker parts. It bears a glass-house fire for many days, and if taken carefully out and suffered to cool by degrees, is found as bright and beautiful as before; but if taken hastily out, it will sometimes crack, and even split into two or three pieces. The places where we have diamonds are the East Indies and the Brasils; and though they are usually found clear and colourless, yet they are sometimes slightly tinged with the colours of the other gems, by the mixture of some metalline particles.
Hill on Fossils.

Give me the ring of mine you had at dinner;
Or, for the diamond, the chain you promised.
Shakspeare.

I see how thine eye would emulate the diamond: thou hast the right arched bent of the brow.
Shakspeare.

The diamond is preferable and vastly superiour to all others in lustre and beauty; as also in hardness, which renders it more durable and lasting, and therefore much more valuable than any other stone. Woodward.

The diamond is by mighty monarchs worn,
Fair as the star that ushers in the morn.
Blackmore.

The lively diamond drinks thy purest rays,
Collected light compact. Thomson.

DI'AMONDED.* adj. [from diamond.] In squares like diamonds.

Break a stone in the middle, or lop a bough of a tree, and one shall behold the grain thereof (by some secret cause in Nature) diamonded or streaked in the fashion of a lozenge.
Fuller, Profane State, p. 368.

DI'APASE. n. s. [διὰ πασῶν.] A chord including all tones. The old word for diapason. See DIAPASON.

And 'twixt them both a quadrant was the base,
Proportion'd equally by seven and nine;
Nine was the circle set in heaven's place,
All which compacted made a good diapase.
Spenser.

The sweet numbers and melodious measures,
With which I wont the winged words to tie,
And make a tuneful diapase of pleasures,
Now being let to run at liberty. Spenser.

DI'APASM.* n. s. [Fr. diapasme, Gr. διάπασμα, from διάπασσω, to sprinkle or throw about.] A powder or perfume.

There's an excellent diapasm in a chain too, if you like it. B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels.

DIAPA'SON. n. s. [διά πασῶν.]

Diapason denotes a chord which includes all tones: it is the same with that we call an eighth, or an octave; because there are but seven tones or notes, and then the eighth is the same again with the first. Harris.

It discovereth the true coincidence of sounds into diapasons, which is the return of the same sound.
Bacon.

Harsh din
Broke the fair musick that all creatures made
To their great Lord, whose love their motion sway'd
In perfect diapason, whilst they stood
In first obedience, and their state of good.
Milton, Ode.

Many a sweet rise, many as sweet a fall,
A full-mouth diapason swallows all. Crashaw.

From harmony, from heav'nly harmony,
This universal frame began:
From harmony to harmony
Through all the compass of the notes it ran,
The diapason closing full in man. Dryden.

DI'APER.† n. s. [diapre, Fr. of uncertain etymology, Dr. Johnson says. Anderson, in his History of Commerce, conjectures, that diaper, a species of printed linen, took its name from the city of Ypres in Flanders, where it was first made, being originally called d'ipre, Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, i. 176. But it may be from the Italian diaspro. jasper; jasper being spotted or figured. V. Du Cange in V. DIASPRUS.]
1. Linen cloth woven in flowers, and other figures; the finest species of figured linen after damask.

Not any damsel, which her vaunteth most
In skilful knitting of soft silken twine;
Nor any weaver, which his work doth boast
In diaper, in damask, or in lyne,
Might in their diverse cunning ever dare
With this so curious net-work to compare. Spenser.

Whether our linen-manufacture would not find the benefit of this institution? and whether there be any thing that makes us fall short of the Dutch, in damask diapers, and printed linen?
Bp. Berkeley, Querist, p. 126.

2. A napkin; a towel.

Let one attend him with a silver bason
Full of rose-water, and bestrew'd with flowers;
Another bear the ewer, a third a diaper. Shaksp.

To DI'APER.† v. a. [old Fr. diaprer. "This term, which is partly heraldick, occurs in the provisor's rolls of the great-wardrobe, containing deliveries for furnishing rich habiliments, at tilts and tournaments, and other ceremonies. It properly signifies embroidering on a rich ground." Peacham's Complete Gentlemen, p. 345.]
1. To variegate; to diversify; to flower.

For fear the stones her tender foot should wrong,
The ground he strew'd with flowers all along,
And diaper'd like the discoloured mead. Spenser.

Flora useth to clothe our grand-dame Earth with a new livery, diaper'd with various flowers, and chequer'd with delightful objects.
Howell, Voc. Forest.

2. To draw flowers upon clothes.

If you diaper upon folds, let your work be broken, and taken, as it were, by the half; for reason tells you, that your fold must cover somewhat unseen. Peacham on Drawing.

DIA'PHANED.* adj. [old Fr. diaphaner, to clear, from the Gr. διὰ and φαίνω.] Transparent. Not in use.

Drinking of much wine hath the virtue to make bodies diaphaned or transparent!
Trans. of Boccalini, (1626,) p. 53.

DIAPHANE'ITY.† n. s. [Fr. [diaphanéité, from διαφανεία.] Transparency; pellucidness; power of transmitting light.

Because the outward coat of the eye ought to be pellucid, to transmit the light, which, if the eyes should always stand open, would be apt to grow dry and shrink, and lose their diaphaneity; therefore are the eyelids so contrived as often to wink, that so they may, as it were, glaze and varnish them over with the moisture they contain.
Ray.

DIAPHA'NICK. adj. [διὰ and φαίνω.] Transparent; pellucid; having the power to transmit light.

Air is an element superior and lighter than water, through whose vast, open, subtle, diaphanick, or transparent body, the light afterwards created, easily transpired. Ralegh.

DIA'PHANOUS. adj. [διὰ and φαίνω.] Transparent; clear; translucent; pellucid; capable to transmit light.

Aristotle calleth light a quality inherent, or cleaving to a diaphanous body. Ralegh.

When he had taken off the insect, he found in the leaf very little and diaphanous eggs, exactly like to those which yet remained in the tubes of the fly's womb. Ray.

DIAPHORE'TICAL.* adj. [Fr. diaphoretique; Gr. διαφορητικὸς.] Sudorifick.

Methinks there may be an excellent medicinal extraction drawn (by prudence directed by grace) out of the nature of temporal felicity, in order to the fortifying our minds, which may not improperly be called the spirit or salt of human frailty, since it may work upon the mind, as physicians say, those kind of diaphoretical medicines do upon the body. W. Montague, Dev. Ess. (1648,) P. i. p. 60.

DIAPHORE'TICK. adj. [διαφορητικὸς.] Sudorifick; promoting a diaphoresis or perspiration; causing sweat.

A diaphoretick medicine, or a sudorifick, is something that will provoke sweating. Watts.

DIAPHORE'TICK.* n. s. [from the adjective.] A sudorifick medicine.

Diaphoreticks, or promoters of perspiration, help the organs of digestion, because the attenuation of the aliment makes it perspirable. Arbuthnot.

DI'APHRAGM.† n. s. [Fr. diaphragme; Gr. διάφραγμα.]
1. The midriff which divides the upper cavity of the body from the lower.

It must be owned, we are not conscious of the systole and diastole of the heart, or the motion of the diaphragm. Bp. Berkeley, Siris, § 257.

2. Any division or partition which divides a hollow body.

It consists of a fasciculus of bodies, round, about one sixth of an inch in diameter, hollow, and parted into numerous cells by means of diaphragms, thick set throughout the whole length of the body.
Woodward on Fossils.

DIARRHOE'A.† n. s. [διαῤῥοίη, Gr. Considered as an unusual word in Sylvester's Du Bart. 1621, p. 659.] A flux of the belly, whereby a person frequently goes to stool, and is cured either by purging off the cause, or restringing the bowels.
Quincy.

During his diarrhœa I healed up the fontanels.
Wiseman.

DIARRHOE'TICK. adj. [from diarrhœa.] Promoting the flux of the belly; solutive; purgative.

Millet is diarrhœtick, cleansing, and useful in diseases of the kidneys. Arbuthnot.

DI'ARIST.* n. s. [from diary.] One who keeps a regular account of transactions.

DI'ARY.† n. s. [old Fr. diaire, Lacombe; diarium, Lat.] An account of the transactions, accidents, and observations of every day; a journal.

In sea-voyages, where there is nothing to be seen but sky and sea, men make diaries; but in land-travel, wherein so much is to be observed, they omit it. Bacon.

I go on in my intended diary. Tatler.

DI'ASTEM.* n. s. [Gr. διάστημα.] In musick. A name applied to a simple interval, in contradistinction to a compound one, which has been called a system.

DIA'STOLE. n. s. [διαστολή.]

1. A figure in rhetorick, by which a short syllable is made long.
2. The dilatation of the heart.

The systole seems to resemble the forcible bending of a spring, and the diastole its flying out again to its natural state. Ray on the Creation.

DIA'STYLE. [διὰ and στύλος, a pillar.] A sort of edifice where the pillars stand at such a distance from one another, that three diameters of their thickness are allowed for intercolumniation. Harris.

DIATE'SSERON. n. s. [of διὰ and τέσσερα, four.] An interval in musick, composed of one greater tone, one lesser, and one greater semi-tone; its proportion being as four to three. It is called, in musical composition, a perfect fourth. Harris.

DIATO'NICK. [of διατόνος.] The ordinary sort of musick which proceeds by different tones, either in ascending or descending. It contains only the two greater and lesser tones, and the greater semi-tone. Harris.

DIA'TRIBE.* n. s. [Gr. διατριβή.] A disputation, or continued discourse. Bailey.

DIAZE'UTICK Tone. [of διὰ and ζύγνυμι.] In the ancient Greek musick, disjoined two fourths, one on each side of it; and which being joined to either, made a fifth. This is, in our musick, from A to B.

They allowed to this diazeutick tone, which is our La, Mi, the proportion of nine to eight, as being the unalterable difference of the fifth and fourth. Harris.

To DIB.* v. n. To dip. This word occurs in the old dictionary of Barret. See To DIBBLE. It is also a Yorkshire word. Craven Dial. 1824.

DI'BBLE.† n. s. [from dipfel, Dutch, a sharp point, Skinner; from dabble, Junius.] A small spade; a pointed instrument with which gardeners make holes for planting.

Through cunning, with dibble, rake, mattock, and spade,
By line and by level trim garden is made.
Tusser's Husb.

I'll not put
The dibble in earth to set one slip of them.
Shakspeare, Wint. Tale.

Yet for all this there comes another strange gardener, that never knew the soil, never handled a dibble or spade to set the least potherb that grew there. Milton, Animad. Rem. Def.

To DI'BBLE.* v. n. Formerly "to dib or dip," Barret. A term used by anglers. See To DAPE.

This stone-fly, then we dape or dibble with, as with the drake. Walton's Angler.

DI'BSTONE. n. s. A little stone which children throw at another stone.

I have seen little girls exercise whole hours together, and take abundance of pains to be expert at dibstones. Locke.

DICA'CITY.† n. s. [dicacitas, Lat.] Pertness; sauciness; much talk, or prating.
Bullokar.

As every one had something to say to Jerry, so Jerry had something to say to every one; and this gave a sort of petulant dicacity to his repartees, by no means agreeable to the natural civility of his disposition. Graves, Spiritual Quixote, i. 8.

DICE. n. s. The plural of die. See DIE.

It is above a hundred to one against any particular throw, that you do not cast any given set of faces with four cubical dice; because there are so many several combinations of the six faces of four dice: now, after you have cast all the trials but one, it is still as much odds at the last remaining time, as it was at the first. Bentley.

To DICE. v. n. [from the noun.] To game with dice.

I was as virtuously given as a gentleman need to be; virtuous enough; swore little: diced not above seven simes a-week. Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

DICE-BOX. n. s. [dice and box.] The box from which the dice are thrown.

What would you say, should you see the sparkler shaking her elbow for a whole night together, and thumping the table with a dice-box?
Addison, Guardian.

DI'CER. n. s. [from dice.] A player at dice; a gamester.

They make marriage vows
As false as dicers' oaths. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

DICH. This word seems corrupted from dit for do it.

Rich men sin, and I eat root:
Much good dich thy good heart, Apemantus.
Shakspeare, Tim.

To DICHO'TOMIZE.* v. a. [from dichotomy.] To separate; to divide.

That great city might well be dichotomized into cloisters and hospitals.
Bp. Hall, Epist. Dec. i. Ep. 5.

Then was all Italy (resembled by geographers for the fashion thereof, to a man's leg) troubled with the incurable gout of schism and faction: not a city of note in it which was not dichotomized into the sect of the Guelfes, which favoured the Pope, and Gibellines, which adhered to the Emperour. Fuller, Holy War, p. 166.

Nor hath the book of creation in the Scripture, the Beresith, or natural philosophy of the Bible given us any hint for such a resolution, that some should be born to riot, and others to famish, some to be glutted, and others to starve, that mankind should be thus dichotomized into such extreme distant fates, some to reign in Paradise for ever, others to be thrown over the wall as out of the Adamites' stove, to pine and freeze among thorns and briers. Hammond, Serm. xi.

DICHO'TOMY. n. s. [διχοτομία.] Distribution of ideas by pairs.

Some persons have disturbed the order of nature, and abused their readers by an affectation of dichotomies, trichotomies, sevens, twelves, &c. Let the nature of the subject, considered together with the design which you have in view, always determine the number of parts into which you divide it. Watts.

DI'CKENS. A kind of adverbial exclamation, importing, as it seems, much the same with the devil; but I know not whence derived.

Where had you this pretty weathercock?
— I cannot tell what the dickens his name is my husband had him of. Shaks. Mer. Wives of Winds.

What a dickens does he mean by a trivial sum?
But han't you found it, sir? Congreve, Old Bachel.

DI'CKER of Leather.† n. s. [dicra, low Lat.] Ten hides. Not peculiar to leather, as Dr. Johnson limits the meaning; for a dicker of iron contained ten bars of iron. See Blount's Anc. Tenures, p. 33.

To DI'CTATE.† v. a. [dicto, Latin. The earliest example, given by Dr. Johnson, of this word, is from Pope. It appears among words not familiarly used, in the list of such, at the end of Bagwell's Mystery of Astronomy, 1655.] To deliver to another with authority; to declare with confidence.

The spoils of elephants the roofs inlay,
And studded amber darts a golden ray;
Such, and not nobler, in the realms above,
My wonder dictates is the dome of Jove.
Pope, Odyssey.

Whatsoever is dictated to us by God himself, or by men who are divinely inspired, must be believed with full assurance. Watts.

DI'CTATE. n. s. [dictatum, Latin.] Rule or maxim delivered with authority; prescription; prescript.

Those right helps of art which will scarce be found by those who servilely confine themselves to the dictates of others. Locke.

I credit what the Grecian dictates say,
And Samian sounds o'er Scota's hills convey.
Prior.

Then let this dictate of my love prevail.
Pope, Odyssey.

DICTA'TION.† n. s. [from dictate.] The act or practice of dictating or prescribing. Dict.

What heresies and prodigious opinions have been set on foot, and maintained to the death, under the pretence of the dictation and warrant of God's Spirit! Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 148.

DICTA'TOR.† n. s. [Lat.]

1. A magistrate of Rome made in times of exigence and distress, and invested with absolute authority.

Kind dictators made, when they came home,
Their vanquish'd foes free citizens of Rome.
Waller.

Julius with honour, tam'd Rome's foreign foes;
But patriots fell, ere the dictator rose. Prior.

2. One invested with absolute authority.

Unanimous they all commit the care,
And management of this main enterprize,
To him their great dictator. Milton, P. L.

3. One whose credit or authority enables him to direct the conduct or opinion of others.

Say, that you were the emperor of pleasures,
The great dictator of fashions, for all Europe,
And had the pomp of all the courts and kingdoms,
Laid forth unto the shew? to make yourself
Gaz'd and admir'd at? you must go to bed,
And take your natural rest: then all this vanisheth.
B. Jonson, Staple of News.

Nor is it a small power it gives one man over another, to have the authority to be the dictator of principles, and teacher of unquestionable truths.
Locke.

That riches, honours, and outward splendour, should set up persons for dictators to all the rest of mankind, is a most shameful invasion of the right of our understanding. Watts.

DICTATO'RIAL. adj. [from dictator.] Authoritative; confident; dogmatical; overbearing.

A young academick often dwells upon a journal, or an observator that treats of trade and politicks in a dictatorial style, and is lavish in the praise of the author. Watts.

DICTA'TORSHIP. n. s. [from dictator.]

1. The office of dictator.

This is the solemnest title they can confer under the princedom, being indeed a kind of dictatorship. Wotton.

2. Authority; insolent confidence.

This is that perpetual dictatorship which is exercised by Lucretius, though often in the wrong.
Dryden.

DI'CTATORY.* adj. [from dictator.] Overbearing; dogmatical.

Our English, the language of men ever famous and foremost in the achievements of liberty, will not easily find servile letters enow to spell such a dictatory presumption englished.
Milton, Areopagitica.

DI'CTATURE. n. s. [dictatura, Lat.] The office of a dictator; dictatorship. Dict.

DI'CTION. n. s. [diction, Fr. dictio, Lat.] Style; language; expression.

There appears in every part of his diction, or expression, a kind of noble and bold purity.
Dryden.

DI'CTIONARY. n. s. [dictionarium, Lat.] A book containing the words of any language in alphabetical order, with explanations of their meaning; a lexicon; a vocabulary; a word-book.

Some have delivered the polity of spirits, and left an account that they stand in awe of charms, spells, and conjurations; that they are afraid of letters and characters, notes, and dashes, which, set together, do signify nothing; and not only in the dictionary of man, but in the subtler vocabulary of Satan. Brown, Vulg. Err.

Is it such a fault to translate simulacra images? I see what a good thing it is to have a good catholick dictionary. Stilling fleet.

An army, or a parliament, is a collection of men; a dictionary, or nomenclature, is a collection of words. Watts.

DID. of do. [ðiδ, Saxon.]

1. The preterite of do.

Thou canst not say I did it. Shakspeare.

What did that greatness in a woman's mind?
Ill lodg'd and weak to act what is design'd.
Dryden.

2. The sign of the preter-imperfect tense, or perfect.

When did his pen on learning fix a brand,
Or rail at arts he did not understand? Dryden.

3. It is sometimes used emphatically; as, I did really love him.

DIDA'CTICAL.† } adj. [didactique, Fr. from
DIDA'CTICK. } Gr. διδάκλικος.] Preceptive; giving precepts: as a didactick poem is a poem that gives rules for some art; as the Georgicks.

We shall not need here to describe, out of their didactical writings, what kind of prayers, and what causes of confidence they teach towards the Blessed Virgin Mary and all Saints.
Bp. Taylor, Diss. from Popery, ch. 2. § 9.

I am very glad that he finds vacancy from his other cares to bestow some hours upon the institution of youth; he finding in himself a great promptness in such didactick work.
Worthington to Hartlib. (1661,) Ep. 16.

The means used to this purpose are partly didactical, and partly proptreptical, demonstrating the truth of the gospel; and then urging the professors of those truths to be stedfast in the faith, and to beware of infidelity. Ward on Infidelity.

DIDA'CTICALLY.* adv. [from didactical.] In a preceptive manner.

Points best resolved by the books of the Fathers, written dogmatically or didactically.
Bp. Andrewes Answ. to Card. Perron, p. 50.

DI'DAPPER.† n. s. [from dip, Dr. Johnson says. Ray remarks, that this bird is also called dabchick, which is sometimes written dipchick. The present word has been also written divedapper.] A bird that dives into the water.

The misery of man may fitly be compared to a didapper, who when she is under water, past our sight, and indeed, can seem no more to us, rises again, shakes but herself, and is the same she was.
Beaum. and Fl. Woman-hater.

DIDASCA'LICK. adj. [διδασκαλικος.] Preceptive; didactick; giving precepts in some art.

I found it necessary to form some story, and give a kind of body to the poem: under what species it may be comprehended, whether didascalick or heroick, I leave to the judgement of the criticks. Prior.

To DI'DDER. v. n. [diddern, Teut. zittern, Germ.] To quake with cold; to shiver. A provincial word, Dr. Johnson says, after Skinner. It may be added, that in the north of England it is so used. It occurs also in the old dictionary of Sherwood, as a word of general usage: "To didder with cold."

To DI'DDLE.* v. n. To totter; to move like a child, or an aged person. See To DADDLE.

And when his forward strength began to bloom,
To see him diddle up and down the room!
O, who would think so sweet a babe as this
Should ere be slain by a false-hearted kiss.
Quarles, Divine Fancies, i. 4.

DI'DDLING.* n. s. [from diddle.] A word in many places applied in fondness to children.

DI'DRACHM.* n. s. [Fr. didrachme, Gr. δις and δραχμὴ.] A piece of money.

A — didrachm, the fourth part of an ounce of silver, which was the tribute, &c.
Bp. Taylor, Life of Christ, iii. § 14.

DIDST. The second person of the preter tense of do. See DID.

Oh last and best of Scots! who didst maintain
Thy country's freedom from a foreign reign.
Dryden.

DIDU'CTION. n. s. [diductio, Latin.] Separation by withdrawing one part from the other.

He ought to shew what kind of strings they are, which, though strongly fastened to the inside of the receiver and superficies of the bladder, must draw as forcibly one as another, in comparison of those that within the bladder draw so as to hinder the diduction of its sides. Boyle.

To DIE.† v. a. [Sax. ðeaȝan, to tinge; from ðeaȝ, or ðeah, a colour; or, as some think, from the Gr. δύω, to dip. This word is often, and should be always, written dye; in order to distinguish it from to die, to expire. But Dr. Johnson has made no distinction.] To tinge; to colour; to stain.

So much of death her thoughts
Had entertain'd, as dy'd her cheeks with pale.
Milton, P. L.

All white, a virgin saint she sought the skies;
For marriage, though it sullies not, it dies.
Dryden.

DIE. n. s. [from the verb.] Colour; tincture; stain; hue acquired.

It will help me nothing
To plead mine innocence; for that die is on me,
Which makes my whit'st part black.
Shakspeare, Hen. VIII.

We have dainty works of feathers of wonderful lustre, excellent dies, and many.
Bacon, New Atlantis.

Darkness we see emerges into light,
And shining suns descend to sable night;
Even heav'n itself receives another die,
When weary'd animals in slumber lie
Of midnight ease; another, when the gray
Of morn preludes the splendour of the day.
Dryden.

It is surprising to see the images of the mind stamped upon the aspect; to see the cheeks take the die of the passions, and appear in all the colours of thought. Collier of the Aspect.

To DIE.† v. n. [Goth. deya, Sax. ðeaðian. See DEAD and DEATH.]

1. To lose life; to expire; to pass into another state of existence.

Thou dost kill me with thy falsehood; and it grieves me not to die, but it grieves me that thou art the murderer. Sidney.

Nor did the third his conquests long survive,
Dying ere scarce he had begun to live.
Addison, Ovid.

Oh let me live my own, and die so too!
To live and die is all I have to do! Pope.

2. To perish by violence or disease.

The dira only served to confirm him in his first opinion, that it was his destiny to die in the ensuing combat. Dryden.

Talk not of life or ransom, he replies,
Patroclus dead, whoever meets me, dies:
In vain a single Trojan sues for grace;
But least the sons of Priam's hateful race:
Die then, my friend! what boots it to deplore!
The great, the good Patroclus is no more!
He, far thy better, was foredoom'd to die;
And thou, dost thou, bewail mortality?
Pope, Homer.

3. It has by before an instrument of death.

Their young men shall die by the sword; their sons and daughters shall die by famine.
Jerem. xi. 22.

4. Of before a disease.

They often come into the world clear, and with the appearance of sound bodies; which, notwithstanding, have been infected with disease, and have died of it, or at least have been very infirm.
Wiseman.

5. For commonly before a privative, and of before a positive cause: these prepositions are not always truly distinguished.

At first she startles, then she stands amaz'd;
At last with terrour she from thence doth fly,
And loaths the wat'ry glass wherein she gaz'd,
And shuns it still, although for thirst she die. Davies.

He in the loaden vineyard dies for thirst. Addison.

Hipparchus being passionately fond of his own wife, who was enamoured of Bathyllus, leaped and died of his fall. Addison.

6. To be punished with death.

If I die for it, as no less is threatened me, the king my old master must be relieved. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

What is the love of our neighbour? —The valuing him as the image of God, one for whom Christ died. Hammond.

7. To be lost; to perish; to come to nothing.

How now, my lord, why do you keep alone?
Of sorriest fancies your companion making,
Using those thoughts which should indeed have died
With them they think on. Shaksp. Macb.

If any sovereignty, on account of his property, had been vested in Adam, which in truth there was not, it would have died with him. Locke.

Whatever pleasure any man may take in spreading whispers, he will find greater satisfaction by letting the secret die within his own breast. Spectator.

8. To sink; to faint.

His heart died within him, and he became as a stone. 1 Sam. xxv. 1.

9. [In theology] To perish everlastingly.

So long as God shall live, so long shall the damned die. Hakewill on Providence.

10. To languish with pleasure or tenderness.

To sounds of heav'nly harps she dies away,
And melts in visions of eternal day. Pope.

11. To vanish.

This battle fares like to the morning's war,
When dying clouds contend with growing light. Shakspeare.

The smaller stains and blemishes may die away and disappear, amidst the brightness that surrounds them; but a blot of a deeper nature casts a shade on all the other beauties, and darkens the whole character. Addison, Spectator.

12. [In the style of lovers.] To languish with affection.

The young men acknowledged in love-letters, that they died for Rebecca. Tatler.

13. To wither, as a vegetable.

Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground, and die, it abideth alone; but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit. St. John, xii. 24.

14. To grow vapid, as liquor.

DIE. n. s. pl. dice. [dé, French; dis, Welsh.]

1. A small cube, marked on its faces with numbers from one to six, which gamesters throw in play.

Keep a gamester from the dice, and a good student from his book, and it is wonderful. Shakspeare.

I have set my life upon a cast,
And I will stand the hazard of the die.
Shakspeare, Rich. III.

He knows which way the lot and the die shall fall, as perfectly as if they were already cast. South.

2. Hazard; chance.

Eftsoons his cruel hand Sir Guyon staid,
Temp'ring the passion with advisement slow,
And must'ring might on enemy dismay'd;
For th' equal die of war he well did know.
Spenser, F. Q.

So both to battle fierce arranged are;
In which his harder fortune was to fall
Under my spear: such is the die of war.
Spenser, F. Q.

Thine is the adventure, thine the victory:
Well has thy fortune turn'd the die for thee.
Dryden.

3. Any cubick body.

Young creatures have learned spelling of words by having them pasted upon little flat tablets or dies. Watts.

DIE. n. s. plur. dies. The stamp used in coinage.

Such variety of dies made use of by Wood in stamping his money, makes the discovery of counterfeits more difficult. Swift.

DI'ER. n. s. [from die.] One who follows the trade of dying; one who dies cloaths.

The fleece, that has been by the dier stain'd,
Never again its native whiteness gain'd. Waller.

There were some of very low rank and professions, who acquired great estates: coblers, diers, and shoemakers gave publick shows to the people. Arbuthnot on Coins.

DI'ET. n. s. [diæta, Low Latin; δίαιτα, Gr. So far Dr. Johnson. Diæta is used by Cicero, Att. 4. 3. The old Fr. diette must be also noticed. See Du Cange in V. DIÆTA.]

1. Food; provisions for the mouth; victuals.

They cared for no other delicacy of fare, or curiosity of diet, than to maintain life. Ralegh.

Time may come, when men
With angels may participate; and find
No inconvenient diet, nor too light fare.
Milton, P. L.

No part of diet, in any season, is so healthful, so natural, and so agreeable to the stomach, as good and well-ripened fruits. Temple.

Milk appears to be a proper diet for human bodies, where acrimony is to be purged or avoided; but not where the canals are obstructed; it being void of all saline quality. Arbuthnot.

2. Food regulated by the rules of medicine, for the prevention or cure of any disease.

I commend rather some diet for certain seasons, than frequent use of physick; for those diets alter the body more, and trouble it less. Bacon.

I restrained myself to so regular a diet, as to eat flesh but once a-day, and little at a time, without salt or vinegar. Temple.

3. Allowance of provision.

For his diet, there was a continual diet given him of the king of Babylon. Jerem. lii. 34.

To DI'ET. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To feed by the rules of medicine.

She diets him with fasting every day,
The swelling of his wounds to mitigate,
And made him pray both early and eke late.
Spenser, F. Q.

Shew a while like fearful war,
To diet rank minds sick of happiness,
And purge th' obstructions, which begin to stop
Our very veins of life. Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

He was not taken well; he had not din'd:
The veins unfill'd, our blood is cold; and then
We pout upon the morning, are unapt
To give or to forgive; but when we've stuff'd
These pipes, and these conveyances of blood,
With wine and feeding, we have suppler souls
Than in our priestlike fasts; therefore I'll watch him
Till he be dieted to my request. Shaksp. Coriol.

I will attend my husband, be his nurse,
Diet his sickness; for it is my office. Shaks.

Henceforth my early care
Shall tend thee, and the fertile burden ease,
Till, dieted by thee, I grow mature
In knowledge as the gods, who all things know.
Milton, P. L.

We have lived upon expedients, of which no country had less occasion: we have dieted a healthy body into a consumption, by plying it with physick instead of food. Swift.

2. To give food to.

I'm partly led to diet my revenge,
For that I do suspect the lusty Moor
Hath lept into my seat. Shakspeare, Othello.

3. To board; to supply with diet.

To DI'ET. v. n.

1. To eat by rules of physick.

2. To eat; to feed.

And join with thee calm Peace and Quiet;
Spare Fast, that oft with gods doth diet.
Milton, Il Pens.

DI'ET-DRINK. n. s. [diet and drink.] Medicated liquors; drink brewed with medicinal ingredients.

The observation will do that better than the lady's diet-drinks, or apothecary's medicines. Locke.

DI'ET. n. s. [from dies, an appointed day, Skinner; from diet, an old German word signifying a multitude, Junius.] An assembly of princes or estates.

An emperour in title without territory, who can ordain nothing of importance but by a diet, or assembly of the states of many free princes, ecclesiastical and temporal. Ralegh.

DI'ETARY. adj. [from diet.] Pertaining to the rules of diet. Dict.

DI'ETARY.* n. s. A medicine of diet. Huloet. There is a publication of the sixteenth century entitled "The old man's dietary."

DIE'TER. n. s. [from diet.] One who prescribes rules for eating; one who prepares food by medicinal rules.

He sauc'd our broth as Juno had been sick,
And he her dieter. Shaksp. Cymb.

DIETE'TICAL.† } adj. [old Fr. dietique, Gr.
DIETE'TICK. } διαιτητικὴ. Our word has also been written dietical, and by a physician, unless it be an errour of the the press. "The three fountains of physick, namely, dietical, chirurgical, and pharmaceutical." Ferrand, Love Melancholy, 1640, p. 237.] Relating to diet; belonging to the medicinal cautions about the use of food.

He received no other counsel than to refrain from cold drink, which was but a dietetical caution, and such as culinary prescription might have afforded. Brown, Vulg. Err.

This book of Cheyne's became the subject of conversation, and produced even sects in the dietetick philosophy. Arbuthnot on Aliments, Pref.

DI'ETING.* n. s. [from diet.] The act of eating by rules.

With much greater care, doubtless, than the Persian king could appoint for his queen Esther those maiden dietings and set prescriptions of baths and odours, which may render her at last more amiable to his eye. Milton, Reason of Ch. Gov.

DIFFARREA'TION.* n. s. [Lat. dis and farreatio.] The parting of a cake; a sacrifice performed between man and wife at their divorcement, among the Romans, as confarreation was at their marriage. See CONFARREATION. Bullokar.

To DI'FFER. v. n. [differo, Latin.]

1. To be distinguished from; to have properties and qualities not the same with those of another person or thing.

If the pipe be a little wet on the inside, it will make a differing sound from the same pipe dry. Bacon.

Thy prejudices, Syphax, wont discern
What virtues grow from ignorance and choice,
Nor how the hero differs from the brute.
Addison, Cato.

The several parts of the same animal differ in their qualities. Arbuthnot.

2. To contend; to be at variance.

A man of judgement shall sometimes hear ignorant men differ, and know well within himself that those which so differ mean one thing, and yet they themselves never agree. Bacon.

Here uncontroll'd you may in judgement sit:
We'll never differ with a crowded pit. Rowe.

3. To be of a contrary opinion.

In things purely speculative, as these are, and no ingredients of our faith, it is free to differ from one another in our opinions and sentiments. Burnet's Theory.

There are certain measures to be kept, which may leave a tendency rather to gain than to irritate those who differ with you in their sentiments. Addison, Freeholder.

Others differ with me about the truth and reality of these speculations. Cheyne.

To DI'FFER.* v. a. To make different.

In thy immortal part
Man, as well as I, thou art;
But something 'tis that differs thee and me.
Cowley.

DI'FFERENCE.† n. s. [difference, Fr. differentia, Latin.]

1. State of being distinct from something; contrariety to identity.

Where the faith of the holy church is one, a difference between customs of the church doth no harm. Hooker.

2. The quality by which one differs from another.

This nobility, or difference from the vulgar, was not in the beginning given to the succession of blood, but to the succession of virtue. Ralegh.

Thus born alike, from virtue first began
The diff'rence that distinguish'd man from man:
He claim'd no title from descent of blood,
But that which made him noble made him good.
Dryden.

Though it be useful to discern every variety that is to be found in nature, yet it is not convenient to consider every difference that is in things, and divide them into distinct classes, under every such difference. Locke.

3. The disproportion between one thing and another caused by the qualities of each.

You shall see great difference betwixt our Bohemia and your Sicilia. Shaksp. Wint. Tale.

Oh the strange difference of man and man!
To thee a woman's services are due;
My fool usurps my body. Shaksp. K. Lear.

Here might be seen a great difference between men practised to fight, and men accustomed only to spoil. Hayward.

4. Dispute; debate; quarrel; controversy.

What was the difference?
—— It was a contention in publick.
Shaksp. Cymb.

He is weary of his life that hath a difference with any of them, and will walk abroad after daylight. Sandys.

Nothing could have fallen out more unluckily than that there should be such differences among them about that which they pretend to be the only means of ending differences. Tillotson.

5. Distinction.

Our constitution does not only make a difference between the guilty and the innocent, but even among the guilty, between such as are more or less criminal. Addison, Freeholder.

6. Point in question; ground of controversy.

Are you acquainted with the difference,
That holds this present question in the court?
Shakspeare.

7. A logical distinction.

Some are never without a difference, and commonly, by amusing men with a subtilty, blanch the matter. Bacon.

8. Evidences of distinction; differential marks.

Henry had the title of sovereign, yet did not put those things in execution which are the true marks and differences of sovereignty. Davies.

9. Distinct kind.

This is notoriously known in some differences of brake or fern. Brown, Vulg. Err.

To DI'FFERENCE.† v. a. [Fr. differencier.] To cause a difference; to make one thing not the same as another.

You know it in common practice in your trades and merchandise, that when a man hath bought a parcel of commodities he sets his mark upon them; to distinguish them from the rest in the warehouse; so doth our God; he sets a mark upon his own; whereby they are plainly differenced from others. Bp. Hall, Remains, p. 134.

By human law and human persuasion, a magistrate and a private man are primarily differenced. Dr. Jackson's Works, iii. 937.

Most are apt to seek all the differences of letters in those articulating motions; whereas several combinations of letters are framed by the very same motions of those organs, which are commonly observed, and are differenced by other concurrent causes. Holder.

Grass differenceth a civil and well cultivated region from a barren and desolate wilderness. Ray.

We see nothing that differences the courage of Mnestheus from that of Sergesthus. Pope, Essay on Homer.

DI'FFERENT.† adj. [old Fr. different.]

1. Distinct; not the same.

There are covered galleries that lead from the palace to five different churches. Addison on Italy.

2. Of contrary qualities.

The Britons change
Sweet native home for unaccustom'd air,
And other climes, where diff'rent food and soil
Portend distempers. Philips.

3. Unlike; dissimilar.

Neither the shape of faces, nor the age, nor the colour, ought to be alike in all figures, any more than the hair; because men are as different from each other, as the regions in which they are born are different. Dryden, Dufresnoy.

Happiness consists in things which produce pleasure, and, in the absence of those which cause any pain: now these, to different men, are very different things. Locke.

DIFFERE'NTIAL.† adj. [from different.] Differential method is applied to the doctrine of infinitesimals, or infinitely small quantities, called the arithmetick of fluxions. It consists in descending from whole quantities to their infinitely small differences, and comparing together these infinitely small differences, of what kind soever they be: and from thence it takes the name of the differential calculus, or analysis of infinitesimals. Harris.

By differential profundity, is understood different kinds of things descending. More, Notes upon Psychozoia.

DI'FFERENTLY. adv. [from different.] In a different manner.

He may consider how differently he is affected by the same thought, which presents itself in a great writer, from what he is when he finds it delivered by an ordinary genius. Addison.

DI'FFERINGLY. adv. [from differing.] In a different manner.

Such protuberant and concave parts of a surface may remit the light so differingly, as to vary a colour. Boyle.

DI'FFICILE.† adj. [difficile Fr. difficilis, Latin.]

1. Difficult; hard; not easy; not obvious. Little used, Dr. Johnson says. But it is frequent in our old authors; and is usually written difficile, not without the e, as Dr. Johnson writes it; who also has printed Bacon difficileness without it, where the authority of a good edition of the Essays does not countenance it. Yet Dr. Johnson writes facile, not facil.

Nothing almost escaped that he achieved not, were the thing never so difficile.
Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 74.

Hope oft fancies that to be facile in the attainment, which reason in the event shows difficile: so as prudence we see is of force, where force prevails not. Sir T. Herbert's Travels, p. 88.

That that should give motion to an unwieldly bulk, which itself hath neither bulk nor motion, is of as difficile apprehension as any mystery in nature. Glanville, Scepsis.

Latin was no more difficil,
Than for a blackbird 'tis to whistle. Hudibras.

2. Scrupulous; hard to be persuaded.

The cardinal finding the pope difficile in granting the dispensation, doth use it as a principal argument, concerning the king's merit, that he had touched none of those deniers which had been levied by popes in England. Bacon.

DI'FFICILENESS. n. s. [from difficil.] Difficulty to be persuaded; incompliance; impractibility. A word not in use, but proper.

There be that in their nature do not affect the good of others: the lighter sort of malignity turneth but to a crossness, or frowardness, or aptness to oppose, or difficileness, or the like; but the deeper sort, to envy and mere mischief. Bacon, Essay of Goodness.

To DIFFICI'LITATE.* v. a. To make difficult. An old and forgotten word; but not improper as the opposite to facilitate. Cotgrave and Sherwood give this verb under difficulter and difficultate.

DI'FFICULT. adj. [difficilis, Latin.]

1. Hard; not easy; not facile.

If it be difficult [in the margin] in the eyes of this people. Zachar. viii.

2. Troublesome; vexatious.

3. Hard to please; peevish; morose.

To DI'FFICULTATE.* v. a. [old Fr. difficulter.] To render difficult; to perplex. This word is not likely to be revived. The late lord chancellor Thurlow was fond of using the verb difficult; as, he difficulted the matter; but he was pronounced unjustifiable in this usage. The old French verb, we see, upholds him; and the old English offers a synonyme. Cotgrave, and Sherwood.

DI'FFICULTLY. adv. [from difficult.] Hardly; with difficulty; not easily.

A man who has always indulged himself in the full enjoyment of his station, will difficultly be persuaded to think any methods unjust that offer to continue it. Rogers, Sermons.

DI'FFICULTY. n. s. [from difficult; difficulté, French.]

1. Hardness; contrariety to easiness or facility.

The religion which, by this covenant, we engage ourselves to observe, is a work of labour and difficulty; a service that requires our greatest care and attention. Rogers.

2. That which is hard to accomplish; that which is not easy.

They mistake difficulties for impossibilities: a pernicious mistake certainly; and the more pernicious, for that men are seldom convinced of it, till their convictions do them no good. South.

3. Distress; opposition.

Thus, by degrees, he rose to Jove's imperial seat: Thus difficulties prove a soul legitimately great. Dryden.

4. Perplexity in affairs; uneasiness of circumstances.

They lie under some difficulties, by reason of the emperour's displeasure, who has forbidden their manufactures. Addison on Italy.

5. Objection; cavil.

Men should consider, that raising difficulties concerning the mysteries in religion, cannot make them more wise, learned, or virtuous. Swift.

To DIFFI'DE.† v. n. [diffido, Latin. Our word is not of Dryden's coinage, which the solitary example, given by Dr. Johnson, might lead the reader to imagine.] To distrust; to have no confidence in.

To cleanse the soul from sin, and still diffide
Whether our reason's eye be clear enough
To intromit true light,
More, Cupid's Conflict, Poems, 1647.

Since the Divine power hath given unto us all things that pertain unto life and godliness, we have no more colour left to diffide in the means of rectifying the enormities of our infirm nature, then a malefactor, that were offered grace for asking it, had reason to fall sick and die for fear of his former sentence.
W. Montague, Dev. Ess. P. i. (1648,) p. 81.

With hope and fear
The woman did the new solution hear:
The man diffides in his own augury,
And doubts the gods. Dryden.

DI'FFIDENCE. n. s. [from diffide.]

1. Distrust; want of confidence in others.

No man almost thought himself secure, and men durst scarce commune or talk one with another; but there was a general diffidence every where. Bacon, Hen. VII.

You have brought scandal
To Israel, diffidence of God and doubt
In feeble hearts, propense enough before
To waver. Milton, S. A.

2. Doubt; want of confidence in ourselves.

If the evidence of its being, or that this is its true sense, be only on probable proofs, our assent can reach no higher than an assurance or diffidence, arising from the more or less apparent probability of the proofs. Locke.

Be silent always, when you doubt your sense;
And speak, though sure, with seeming diffidence. Pope.

Whatsoever atheists think on, or whatsoever they look on, all do administer some reasons for suspicion and diffidence, lest possibly they may be in the wrong; and then it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God. Bentley.

DI'FFIDENT. adj. [from diffide.]

1. Distrustful; doubting others.

Be not diffident
Of wisdom; she deserts thee not, if thou
Dismiss not her, when most thou need'st her nigh. Milton, P. L.

Pliny speaks of the Seres, the same people with the Chinese, as being very shy and diffident in their manner of dealing. Arbuthnot.

2. Doubtful of an event, used of things; uncertain.

I was really so diffident of it, as to let it lie by me these two years, just as you now see it. Pope.

3. Doubtful of himself; not confident.

I am not so confident of my own sufficiency as not willingly to admit the counsel of others; but yet I am not so diffident of myself, as brutishly to submit to any man's dictates. King Charles.

Distress makes the humble heart diffident. Clarissa.

DI'FFIDENTLY.* adv. [from diffident.] In a manner not presumptuous.

In man humility's alone sublime,
Who diffidently hopes he's Christ's own care.
Smart, Hymn to the Supreme Being.

To DIFFI'ND. v. a. [diffindo, Latin.] To cleave in two; to split. Dict.

DIFFI'NITIVE.*. adj [Lat. diffinio, diffinitum.] Determinate; definitive.

The tribunal where we speak being not diffinitive (which is no small advantage) I now promised to ease his memory myself with an extract of what I had said. Sir H. Wotton, Letters, p. 537.

DIFFI'SION. n. s. [diffisio, Latin.] The act of cleaving or splitting. Dict.

DIFFLA'TION. n. s. [difflare, Latin.] The act of scattering with a blast of wind. Dict.

DI'FFLUENCE. } n. s. [from diffluo, Latin.]
DI'FFLUENCY. } The quality of falling away on all sides; the effect of fluidity; the contrary to consistency.

Ice is water congealed by the frigidity of the air, whereby it acquireth no new form; but rather a consistence or determination of its diffluency, and omitteth not its essence, but condition of fluidity. Brown, Vulg. Err.

DI'FFLUENT. adj. [diffluens, Latin.] Flowing every way; not consistent; not fixed.

DI'FFORM. adj. [from forma, Latin.] Contrary to uniform; having parts of different structure; dissimilar; unlike; irregular: as a difform flower, one, of which the leaves are unlike each other.

The unequal refractions of difform rays proceed not from any contingent irregularities; such as are veins, an uneven polish, or fortuitous position of the pores of glass. Newton.

DIFFO'RMITY.† n. s. [from difform.] Diversity of form; irregularity; dissimilitude.

In respect of uniformity with the primitive church, as of difformity.
Stapleton, Fortr. of the Faith, (1565,) fol. 138. b.

While they murmur against the present disposure of things, they desire in them a difformity from the primitive rule, and the idea of that mind, that formed all things best. Brown, Vulg. Err.

There must [thus] needs be infinite difformity in the publick worship; and all the benefits which were, before, the consequents of conformity and unity, will be lost. Bp. Taylor, on Extemp. Prayer.

Necessity, absolute in itself, is simple and uniform and universal, without any possible difference, difformity, or variety whatsoever.
Clarke on the Attributes, § 7.

DIFFRA'NCHISEMENT. n. s. [franchise, French.] The act of taking away the privileges of a city.

To DIFFU'SE.† v. a. [diffusus, Latin.]

1. To pour out upon a plane, so that the liquor may run every way; to pour without particular direction.

When these waters began to rise at first, long before they could swell to the height of the mountains, they would diffuse themselves every way. Burnet's Theory.

2. To spread; to scatter; to disperse.

That iron man
With his huge flail began to lay about;
From whose stern presence they diffused ran,
Like scatter'd chaff, the which the wind away doth fan. Spenser, F. Q. v. xi. 47.

Wisdom hath ordain'd
Good out of evil to create; instead
Of spirits malign, a better race to bring
Into their vacant room, and thence diffuse
His good to worlds, and ages, infinite. Milton.

No sect wants its apostles to propagate and diffuse it. Decay of Piety.

A chief renown'd in war,
Whose race shall bear aloft the Latian name,
And through the conquer'd world diffuse our fame. Dryden.

His eyes diffus'd a venerable grace,
And charity itself was in his face. Dryden's Good Parson.

DIFFU'SE.† adj. [old Fr. diffus, Lat. diffusus.]

1. Scattered; widely spread.

2. Copious; not concise.

The reasoning of them is sophistical and inconclusive; the style diffuse and verbose. Dr. Warton, Ess. on Pope.

3. Difficult. This sense assigned to the word by Huloet, and exemplified by Skelton, is unnoticed by Dr. Johnson.

John Lydgate
Writeth after an higher rate;
It is diffuse to fynde
The sentence of his mind. Skelton, Poems, p. 237.

DIFFU'SED.† participial adj. [from diffuse.]

1. This word seems to have signified, in Shakspeare's time, the same as wild, uncouth, irregular.

Let them from forth a sawpit rush at once,
With some diffused song. Shakspeare, Merry W. of Windsor.

He grows like savages,
To swearing and stern looks, diffused attire,
And every thing that seems unnatural. Shakspeare, Hen. V.

2. Extended; at full length.

See how he lies at random, carelessly diffused,
With languish'd head unprop't. Milton, S. A.

DIFFU'SEDLY. adv. [from diffused.] Widely; dispersedly; in manner of that which is spread every way.

DIFFU'SEDNESS.† n. s. [from diffused.] The state of being diffused; dispersion. Sherwood.

DIFFU'SELY. adv. [from diffuse.]

1. Widely; extensively.

2. Copiously; not concisely.

DIFFU'SER.* n. s. [from diffuse.] One who spreads or disperses.

If the Jews were such diffusers of secular learning, why are the wisest men of their own nation, such as Joseph, Moses, Solomon, and David, charactered and deciphered to us in the Bible with a comparison so advantageous to the wisdom of other nations; as, that they were skilled in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, that their wisdom excelled all the wisdom of the east countries and of Babylon? Mannyngham's Disc. (1681,) p. 32.

DIFFU'SIBLE.* adj. [from diffuse.] Capable of being diffused.

DIFFU'SION n. s. [from diffuse.]

1. Dispersion; the state of being scattered every way.

Whereas all bodies act either by the communication of their natures, or by the impressions and signatures of their motions, the diffusion of species visible seemeth to participate more of the former operation, and the species audible of the latter. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

A sheet of very well sleeked marble paper did not cast distinct colours upon the wall, nor throw its light with an equal diffusion; but threw its beams, unstained and bright, to this and that part of the wall. Boyle on Colours.

2. Copiousness; exuberance of style.

DIFFU'SIVE. adj. [from diffuse.]

1. Having the quality of scattering any thing every way.

Diffusive of themselves, where-e'er they pass
They make that warmth in others they expect:
Their valour works like bodies on a glass,
And does its image on their men project. Dryden.

2. Scattered; dispersed; having the quality of suffering diffusion.

All liquid bodies are diffusive; for their parts being in motion, have no connexion, but glide and fall off any way. Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

No man is of so general and diffusive a lust, as to prosecute his amours all the world over. South.

The stars, no longer overlaid with weight,
Exert their heads from underneath the mass,
And upward shoot, and kindle as they pass,
And with diffusive light adorn their heav'nly place. Dryden.

Cherish'd with hope, and fed with joy it grows;
Its cheerful buds their opening bloom disclose,
And round the happy soil diffusive odour flows. Prior.

3. Extended.

They are not agreed among themselves where infallibility is seated; whether in the pope alone, or a council alone, or in both together, or in the diffusive body of Christians. Tillotson.

DIFFU'SIVELY.† adv. [from diffusive.] Widely; extensively; every way.

Εκκλησία — means diffusively the whole community of the Christian name. Bentley, Phil. Lips. § 35.

DIFFU'SIVENESS.† n. s. [from diffusive.]

1. Extension; dispersion; the power of diffusing; the state of being diffused.

The reflection of this quality upon us should be our diffusiveness; that we should so be lights, as that we should give light; so have light in ourselves, that we should give it unto others. Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 43.

The most obvious and most general notion of this catholicism consisteth in the diffusiveness of the Church. Pearson on the Creed, Art. 9.

2. Want of conciseness; large compass of expression.

The fault that I find with a modern legend, is its diffusiveness: you have sometimes the whole side of a medal overrun with it. Addison on Medals.

To DIG. v. a. preter. dug, or digged; part. pass. dug, or digged. [ᵭic, Saxon, a ditch; dyger, Danish, to dig.]

1. To pierce with a spade.

Then said he unto me, Son of man, dig now in the wall; and when I had digged in the wall, I beheld a door. Ezek. viii. 8.

2. To form by digging.

Seek with heart and mouth to build up the walls of Jerusalem, which you have broken down; and to fill up the mines that you have digged by craft and subtlety, to overthrow the same. Whitgift.

He built towers in the desert, and digged many wells; for he had much cattle. 2 Chron. xxvi. 10.

3. To cultivate the ground by turning it with a spade.

The walls of your garden, without their furniture, look as ill as those of your house; so that you cannot dig up your garden too often. Temple.

Be first to dig the ground, be first to burn
The branches lopt. Dryden, Virg.

4. To pierce with a sharp point.

A ravenous vulture in his open'd side,
Her crooked beak and cruel talons try'd;
Still for the growing liver digg'd his breast,
The growing liver still supply'd the feast. Dryden, Æn.

5. To gain by digging.

It is digged out of even the highest mountains, and all parts of the earth contingently; as the pyrites. Woodward.

Nor was the ground alone requir'd to bear
Her annual income to the crooked share;
But greedy mortals, rummaging her store,
Digg'd from her entrails first the precious ore. Dryden, Ovid.

To DIG. v. n. To work with a spade; to work in making holes, or turning the ground.

They long for death, but it cometh not: and dig for it more than for hid treasures. Job, iii. 21.

The Italians have often dug into lands described in old authors, as the places where statues or obelisks stood, and seldom failed of success. Addison, Travels.

To DIG up. v. a. To throw up that which is covered with earth.

If I digg'd up thy forefathers graves,
And hung their rotten coffins up in chains,
It would not slake mine ire. Shakspeare.

DIGA'MMA.* n. s. [Greek.] "The letter F so called, because he beareth a form like the Greek letter gamma, made double." Bullokar. It is originally an Æolick letter. The Lombardick F in later times is an exact double gamma.

Towering o'er your alphabet, like Saul,
Stands our digamma, and o'ertops them all. Pope, Dunciad.

DI'GAMY.† n. s. [old Fr. digamie, Gr. δι-γαμία.] Second marriage; marriage to a second wife after the death of the first: as bigamy, having two wives at once.

They parallel the antick Romans, who (as Tacitus, Marcellin, and Tertullian tell us) so hated digamy (both in enjoying two wives at one time, and being twice married) as no holocaust was ever offered, no holy fire lookt unto by such, nor such as issued from such parents. Sir T. Herbert, Travels, p. 46.

Dr. Champny only proves, that archbishop Cranmer was twice married; which is not denied: but brings nothing to prove that such bigamy or digamy rather deprives a bishop of the lawful use of his power of ordaining. Bishop Ferne.

DIGA'STRICK* adj. [Fr. digastrique, Lat. digastricus, Gr. δίς and γαστὴρ, the belly. It has been printed, inaccurately, in Paley's Natural Theology, diagastrick.] Applied to a muscle of the lower jaw, as having, as it were, a double belly.

A certain muscle, called the digastrick, rises on the side of the face. Paley, Nat. Theology, p. 142.

DI'GERENT. adj. [digerens, Lat.] That which has the power of digesting, or causing digestion. Dict.

DI'GEST. n. s. [digesta, Lat.] The pandect of the civil law, containing the opinions of the ancient lawyers.

I had a purpose to make a particular digest, or recompilement to the laws of mine own nation. Bacon.

Laws in the digest shew that the Romans applied themselves to trade. Arbuthnot on Coins.

To DIGE'ST.† v. a. [digero, digestum, Lat.]

1. To distribute into various classes or repositories; to range or dispose methodically.

When that I heard where Richmond did arrive,
I did digest my bands in battell-ray. Mir. for Mag. p. 763.

2. To concoct in the stomach, so as that the various particles of food may be applied to their proper use.

If little faults, proceeding on distemper,
Shall not be wink'd at, how shall we stretch our eye,
When capital crimes, chew'd, swallow'd, and digested,
Appear? Shakspeare, Hen. V.

Each then has organs to digest his food;
One to beget, and one receive the brood. Prior.

3. To soften by heat, as in a boiler, or in a dunghill: a chymical term.

To be sure he will rather have the primitive man to be produced by a long process in a kind of digesting balneum, where all the heavier lees may have time to subside, and a due equilibrium be maintained, not disturbed by any such rude and violent shocks. Bentley, Serm. iv. p. 133.

4. To range methodically in the mind; to apply knowledge by meditation to its proper use.

Blessed Lord, who hast caused all holy scriptures to be written for our learning; grant that we may in such wise hear them, read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest them, that by patience and comfort of thy holy word we may embrace, and ever hold fast, the blessed hope of everlasting life, which thou hast given us in our Saviour Jesus Christ. Collect, 2nd Sund. in Adv.

Chosen friends, with sense refin'd,
Learning digested well. Thomson.

5. To reduce to any plan, scheme, or method.

Our play,
Leaps o'er the vaunt and firstlings of those broils,
Ginning i' the middle: starting thence away,
To what may be digested in a play. Shakspeare.

My words and deeds they daily wrest,
And in their thoughts my fall digest. Sandys, Ps. p. 88.

6. To receive without loathing or repugnance; not to reject.

First, let us go to dinner.
— Nay, let me praise you while I have a stomach.
— No, pray thee, let it serve for table-talk;
Then howsoe'er thou speak'st, 'mong other things
I shall digest it. Shakspeare, Merch. of Venice.

The pleasance of numbers is, that rudeness and barbarism might the better taste and digest the lessons of civility. Peacham.

7. To receive and enjoy.

Cornwal and Albany,
With my two daughters dowers, digest the third. Shakspeare.

8. [In chirurgery.] To dispose a wound; to generate pus in order to a cure.

To DIGE'ST. v. n. To generate matter as a wound, and tend to a cure.

DIGE'STEDLY.* adv. [from digest.] In a methodical and regular way.

Not in a slight and perfunctory manner, but studiedly and digestedly. Life of Mede, Pref. to his Works, p. xxxix.

DIGE'STER. n. s. [from digest.]

1. One that digests or disposes.

2. One that digests or concocts his food.

People that are bilious and fat, rather than lean, are great eaters and ill digesters. Arbuthnot.

3. A strong vessel or engine, contrived by M. Papin, wherein to boil, with a very strong heat, any bony substances, so as to reduce them into a fluid state. Quincy.

4. That which causes or strengthens the concoctive power.

Rice is of excellent use for all illnesses of the stomach, a great restorer of health, and a great digester. Temple.

DIGE'STIBLE. adj. [from digest.] That is capable of being digested or concocted in the stomach.

Those medicines that purge by stool are, at the first, not digestible by the stomach, and therefore move immediately downwards to the guts. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

DIGE'STION.† n. s. [Fr. digestion.]

1. The act of digesting or concocting food in the stomach.

Now good digestion wait on appetite,
And health on both. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

Digestion is a fermentation begun, because there are all the requisites of such a fermentation; heat, air, and motion: but it is not a complete fermentation, because that requires a greater time than the continuance of the aliment in the stomach: vegetable putrefaction resembles very much animal digestion. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

Quantity of food cannot be determined by measures and weights, or any general Lessian rules; but must vary with the vigour or decays of age or of health, and the use or disuse of air or of exercise, with the changes of appetite; and then, by what every man may find or suspect of the present strength or weakness of digestion. Temple.

Every morsel to a satisfied hunger, is only a new labour to a tired digestion. South.

2. The preparation of matter by a chymical heat.

We conceive, indeed, that a perfect good concoction, or digestion, or maturation of some metals, will produce gold. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Did chymick chance the furnaces prepare,
Raise all the labour-houses of the air,
And lay crude vapours in digestion there?
Blackmore.

3. Reduction to a plan; the act of methodising; the maturation of a design.

The digestion of the counsels in Sweden is made in senate, consisting of forty counsellors, who are generally the greatest men. Temple.

4. The act of disposing a wound to generate matter.

5. The disposition of a wound or sore to generate matter.

The first stage of healing, or the discharge of matter, is by surgeons called digestion.
Sharp's Surgery.

DIGE'STIVE.† adj. [Fr. digestif.]

1. Having the power to cause digestion, or to strengthen the stomach.

A chilifactory menstruum, or a digestive preparation, drawn from species or individuals, whose stomachs peculiarly dissolve lapideous bodies.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

2. Capable by heat to soften and subdue.

The earth and sun were in that very state; the one active, piercing, and digestive by its heat; the other passive, receptive, and stored with materials for such a production. Hale.

3. Methodising, adjusting.

To business, ripen'd by digestive thought,
This future rule is into method brought. Dryden.

DIGE'STIVE. n. s. An application which disposes a wound to generate matter.

I dressed it with digestives. Wiseman on Abscesses.

DIGE'STURE. n. s. Concoction: not used.

Neither tie yourself always to eat meats of easy digesture; such as veal, sweetbreads. Harvey.

DIG'GABLE* adj. [from To dig.] That may be digged. Huloet.

DI'GGER. n. s. [from dig.] One that opens the ground with a spade.

When we visited mines, we have been told by diggers, that even when the sky seemed clear, there would suddenly arise a steam so thick, that it would put out their candles. Boyle.

To DIGHT.† v. a. ðihtan, to prepare, to regulate, Saxon.]

1. To dress; to deck; to bedeck; to embellish; to adorn. It seems always to signify the past; the participle passive is dight, as dighted in Hudibras is perhaps improper. So far Dr. Johnson. But dight does not always signify the past; and dighted is as regular from dight, as plighted is from plight. Butler, in his Hudibras, follows another quaint describer. Spenser also, and Beaumont and Fletcher, in the present definition, confute Dr. Johnson's remark.

But now, ye shepherd lasses, who shall lead
Your wandring troops, or sing your virelays?
Or who shall dight your bow'rs, sith she is dead
That was the lady of your holy-days?
Spenser, Daphnaida.

Have a care, you dight things handsomely; I will look over you. Beaum. and Fl. Coxcomb.

In an instant they were dighted, and came cleanly off, though they went foully on.
Gayton, Notes on D. Quixote.

Let my due feet never fail
To walk the studious cloisters pale,
And love the high embowed roof,
With antick pillar massy proof,
And storied windows richly dight,
Casting a dim religious light. Milton, Il Pens.

Just so the proud insulting lass
Array'd and dighted Hudibras. Hudibras.

2. To put on.

On his head his dreadful hat he dight,
Which maketh him invisible to sight.
Spenser, Hubb. Tale.

DI'GIT. n. s. [digitus, Latin.]

1. The measure or length containing three fourths of an inch.

If the inverted tube of mercury be but twenty-five digits high, or somewhat more, the quicksilver will not fall, but remain suspended in the tube, because it cannot press the subjacent mercury with so great a force as doth the incumbent cylinder of the air, reaching thence to the top of the atmosphere. Boyle, Spring of the Air.

2. The twelfth part of the diameter of the sun or moon.

3. Any of the numbers expressed by single figures; any number to ten: so called from counting upon the fingers.

Not only the number seven and nine, from considerations abstruse, have been extolled by most, but all or most of other digits have been as mystically applauded. Brown, Vulg. Err.

DI'GITAL.* adj. [Lat. digitalis.] Pertaining to a finger. Bailey.

To DI'GITATE.* v. a. [from digitus, Lat.] To point out as with a finger. Not in use.

The resting on water, without motion, doth digitate a reason. Robinson's Endoxa, 1658, p. 46.

DI'GITATED. part. adj. [from digitus, Lat.] Branched out into divisions like fingers; as a digitated leaf is a leaf composed of many small leaves.

For animals multifidous, or such as are digitated, or have several divisions in their feet, there are but two that are uniparous; that is, men and elephants.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

To DIGLA'DIATE.* v. n. [digladior, Lat.] To quarrel; to fence; to fight.

Digladiating, like Æschines and Demosthenes, they reciprocally lay open each other's filthiness to the view and scorn of the world.
Hales, Rem. p. 42.

Warring and digladiating amongst themselves in controversies. Bp. Reynolds on Broth. Agreement, 1659, P. II. p. 9.

DIGLADIA'TION.† n. s. [digladiatio, Lat.] A combat with swords; any quarrel or contest.

Mingle no matter of doubtful credit with the simplicity of truth, but gently stir the mould about the root of the question, and avoid all digladiations.
B. Jonson, Discoveries.

The noblest digladiation is in the theatre of ourselves. Brown, Chr. Mor. i. 24.

Aristotle seems purposely to intend the cherishing of controversial digladiations, by his own affection of an intricate obscurity. Glanville, Scepsis.

DI'GNIFIED. adj. [from dignify.] Invested with some dignity: it is used chiefly of the clergy.

Abbots are stiled dignified clerks, as having some dignity in the church. Ayliffe, Parergon.

DIGNIFICA'TION. n. s. [from dignify.] Exaltation.

I grant that where a noble and ancient descent and merit meet in any man, it is a double dignification of that person. Walton's Angler.

To DI'GNIFY. v. a. [from dignus and facio, Latin.]

1. To advance; to prefer; to exalt. Used chiefly of the clergy.

2. To honour; to adorn; to give lustre to; to improve by some adventitious excellence, or honourable distinction.

Such a day,
So fought, so follow'd, and so fairly won,
Came not till now to dignify the times,
Since Cæsar's fortunes! Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

Not that we think us worthy such a guest,
But your worth will dignify our feast. B. Jonson.

No turbots dignify my boards;
But gudgeons, flounders, what my Thames affords.
Pope.

DI'GNITARY. n. s. [from dignas, Latin.] A clergyman advanced to some dignity, to some rank above that of a parochial priest.

If there be any dignitaries, whose preferments are perhaps not liable to the accusation of superfluity, they may be persons of superior merit. Swift.

DI'GNITY.† n. s. [old French digneté, from dignitas, Latin.]

1. Rank of elevation.

Angels are not any where spoken so highly of as our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and are not in dignity equal to him. Hooker.

2. Grandeur of mien; elevation of aspect.

Some men have a native dignity, which will procure them more regard by a look, than others can obtain by the most imperious commands.
Clarissa.

3. Advancement; preferment; high place.

Faster than spring-time show'rs comes thought on thought,
And not a thought but thinks on dignity. Shaks.

For those of old,
And these late dignities heap'd up to them. Shaks.

4. [Among ecclesiasticks.] By a dignity we understand that promotion or preferment to which any jurisdiction is annexed. Ayliffe's Parergon.

5. Maxims; general principles; κυριαὶ δοξαὶ.

The sciences concluding from dignities, and principles known by themselves, receive not satisfaction from probable reasons, much less from bare asseverations. Brown.

6. [In astrology.] The planet is in dignity when it is in any sign.

DIGNO'TION. n. s. [from dignosco, Latin.] Distinction; distinguishing mark.

That temperamental dignotions, and conjecture of prevalent humours, may be collected from spots in our nails, we are not averse to concede.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

To DIGRE'SS.† v. n. [digressus, Latin.]

1. To turn aside out of the road.

2. To depart from the main design of a discourse, or chief tenour of an argument.

Let my talk return thither from whence it digressed. Barret.

Thus far have I digressed, readers, from my former subject. Milton, Apol. for Smectymn.

In the pursuit of an argument there is hardly room to digress into a particular definition, as often as a man varies the signification of any term. Locke.

3. To wander; to expatiate.

It seemeth, to digress no farther, that the Tartarians, spreading so far, cannot be the Israelites. Brerewood.

4. To go out of the right way, or common track; to transgress; to deviate: not in use.

I am come to keep my word,
Though in some part am forced to digress,
Which at more leisure I will so excuse
As you shall well be satisfied. Shakspeare.

Thy noble shape is but a form of wax,
Digressing from the valour of a man. Shakspeare.

DIGRE'SSION. n. s. [digressio, Latin.]

1. A passage deviating from the main tenour or design of a discourse.

The good man thought so much of his late conceived commonwealth, that all other matters were but digressions to him. Sidney.

He, she knew, would intermix
Grateful digressions, and solve high dispute
With conjugal caresses. Milton, P. L.

Here some digression I must make, t' accuse
Thee, my forgetful and ungrateful muse. Denham.

To content and fill the eye of the understanding, the best authors sprinkle their works with pleasing digressions, with which they recreate the minds of their readers. Dryden.

2. Deviation.

The digression of the sun is not equal; but near the equinoctial intersections, it is right and greater; near the solstices, more oblique and lesser. Brown, Vulg. Err.

DIGRE'SSIONAL.* adj. [from digression.] Deviating from the main purpose.

Milton has judiciously avoided Fletcher's digressional ornaments, which, however poetical, are here unnecessary. Warton, Notes on Milton.

DIGRE'SSIVE.* adj. [from To digress.] Expatiating.

The wild diffusion of the sentiments, and the digressive sallies of imagination, would have been compressed and restrained by confinement of rhyme. Johnson, Life of Young.

DIGRE'SSIVELY.* adv. [from digressive.] In the way of digression. Used, according to Mr. Malone, by the celebrated W. Pitt, Earl of Chatham.

To DIJU'DICATE.* v. a. [Lat. dijudico.] To determine by censure. Cockeram.

The church of Rome, when she commends unto us the authority of the church in dijudicating of scriptures, seems only to speak of herself. Hales, Rem. p. 260.

DIJUDICA'TION.† n. s. [dijudicatio, Latin.] Judicial distinction. Cockeram.

DIKE.† n. s. [ðic, Saxon; dyk, Erse.]

1. A channel to receive water.

The dykes are fill'd, and with a roaring sound
The rising rivers float the nether ground.
Dryden, Virgil.

The king of dykes! than whom no sluice of mud
With deeper sable blots the silver flood.
Pope, Dunciad.

2. A mound to hinder inundations. [probably from the Celt. digh, solid, strong; though Dr. Johnson has made no distinction. So the Fr. digue; and the Gr. τειχος, a wall, whence the Germ. teich, and the Dutch dyke.]

God, that breaks up the flood-gates of so great a deluge, and all the art and industry of man is not sufficient to raise up dykes and ramparts against it. Cowley.

To DIKE.* v. n. [Sax. ðician, to dig.] To work with a spade. This word, as well as diker for ditcher formed from it, is obsolete.

It were better dike and delve,
And stand upon the right faith,
Than know all that the bible saith,
And erre as some clerkes do.
Gower, Conf. Am. Prol.

To DILA'CERATE.† v. a. [dilacero, Latin.] To tear; to rend; to force in two.

The infant, at the accomplished period, struggling to come forth, dilacerates and breaks those parts which restrained him before. Brown, Vulg. Err.

Their greatest pride is expressed in the adorning their ears and noses; supposing them most courtly who dilacerate their ears widest. Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 337.

DILACERA'TION.† n. s. [from dilaceratio, Latin.] The act of rending in two.

Deep was that sense and grievous was that pain which those scourges produced, when the plowers plowed upon his back and made long their furrows: the dilaceration of those nervous parts created a most sharp and dolorous sensation. Pearson on the Creed, Art. 4.

The greatest sensation of pain is by the obstruction of the small vessels, and dilaceration of the nervous fibres. Arbuthnot.

To DILA'NIATE. v. a. [dilanio, Latin.] To tear; to rend in pieces.

Rather than they would dilaniate the entrails of their own mother, and expose her thereby to be ravished, they met half way in a gallant kind. Howell, Eng. Tears.

DILANIA'TION.* n. s. [from dilanaite.] A tearing in pieces. Bullokar.

To DILA'PIDATE.† v. n. [dilapido, Lat.] To go to ruin; to fall by decay.

The church of Elgin had, in the intestine tumults of the barbarous ages, been laid waste by the irruption of an Highland chief, whom the bishop had offended; but it was gradually restored to the state of which the traces may be now discerned, and was at last not destroyed by the tumultuous violence of Knox, but more shamefully suffered to dilapidate by deliberate robbery and frigid indifference. Johnson, Journey to the Western Islands.

To DILA'PIDATE.* v. a. To make desert; to consume wastefully.

Many pluralists do reside at one living for the greater part, and at the other for some considerable part of the year; and do neither dilapidate, nor neglect alms or hospitality. H. Wharton, Def. of Pluralities, (1692,) p. 159.

Was her moderation seen in dilapidating the revenues of the church? Hurd.

The old patrimonial mansion is desolated, and even the parish church unroofed and dilapidated. Warton, Hist. Eng. Poet. iv. 43.

DILAPIDA'TION.† n. s. [dilapidatio, Lat.]

1. The incumbent's suffering the chancel, or any other edifices of his ecclesiastical living, to go to ruin or decay, by neglecting to repair the same: and it likewise extends to his committing, or suffering to be committed, any wilful waste in or upon the glebe-woods, or any other inheritance of the church. Ayliffe's Parergon.

'Tis the duty of all church-wardens to prevent the dilapidations of the chancel and mansion-house belonging to the rector or vicar. Ayliffe's Parergon.

So great a demand, as the bishop had upon his predecessor's executors for dilapidations, could not very soon, or very easily, be brought to an accommodation. Lowth, Life of Wykeham, p. 59.

2. Ruin or decay in general.

I have often heard it said, that, by keeping a strict account of incomes and expences, a man might easily preserve an estate from dilapidation. Goodman, Wint. Ev. Conf. P. 1.

DILA'PIDATOR. n. s. [from dilapidate.] One who occasions dilapidation.

It is alleged, that non-residence and dilapidations for the most part go hand in hand; that you shall seldom see a non-resident, but he is also a dilapidator. H. Wharton, Def. of Pluralities, p. 156.

DILATABI'LITY. n. s. [from dilatable.] The quality of admitting extension.

We take notice of the wonderful dilatability or extensiveness of the gullets of serpents: I have taken two adult mice out of the stomach of an adder, whose neck was not bigger than my little finger. Ray.

By this continual contractibility and dilatability, by different degrees of heat, the air is kept in a constant motion. Arbuthnot.

DILA'TABLE.† adj. [old Fr. dilatable.] Capable of extension.

The windpipe divides itself into a great number of branches called bronchia: these end in small air-bladders, dilatable and contractible, capable to be inflated by the admission of air, and to subside at the expulsion of it. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

DILATA'TION.† n. s. [old Fr. dilatation, Lat. dilatatio. This is one of our oldest substantives, being used by Chaucer in the sense of enlargement. Bishop Reynolds has employed this word in a manner, which well illustrates the etymology of it. "A second effect of joy is opening and dilatation of the heart and countenance, expressing the serenity of the mind, whence it hath the name of lætitia, as it were a broad and spreading passion." Bp. Reynolds on the Passions. ch. 21.]

1. The act of extending into greater space: opposed to contraction.

The motions of the tongue, by contraction and dilatation, are so easy and so subtle, that you can hardly conceive or distinguish them aright. Holder.

I might also add—the contraction or dilatation of the apple of the eye. Smith, Portr. of Old Age, p. 100.

2. The state of being extended; the state in which the parts are at more distance from each other.

Joy causeth a cheerfulness and vigour in the eyes; singing, leaping, dancing, and sometimes tears: all these are the effects of the dilatation, and coming forth of the spirits into the outward parts. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

The image of the sun should be drawn out into an oblong form, either by a dilatation of every ray, or by any other casual inequality of the refractions. Newton.

To DILA'TE.† v. a. [dilato, Lat.]

1. To extend; to spread out; to enlarge: opposed to contract.

But ye thereby much greater glory gate,
Than had ye sorted with a prince's peer;
For now your light doth more itself dilate,
And in my darkness greater doth appear.
Spenser, F. Q.

He hath so dilated himself with the beams of prosperity, that he lies open to all dangers. Bp. Hall, Charact. The Unthrift.

I have been hammered, and dilated upon the anvil, as our countryman Breakspear (Adrian IV.) said of himself; I have been strained through the limbeck of affliction. Howell, Lett. i. vi. 80.

Satan alarm'd,
Collecting all his might, dilated stood,
Like Teneriff, or Atlas, unremov'd. Milton, P. L.

Opener of mine eyes,
Dim erst; dilated spirits, ampler heart,
And growing up to godhead: which for thee
Chiefly I sought; without thee, can despise.
Milton, P. L.

Through all the air his sounding strings dilate
Sorrow, like that which touch'd our hearts of late.
Waller.

Diffus'd, it rises in a higher sphere;
Dilates its drops, and softens into air. Prior.

I mark the various fury of the winds;
These neither seasons guide, nor order binds:
They now dilate, and now contract, their force;
Various their speed, but endless in their course.
Prior.

The second refraction would spread the rays one way as much as the first doth another, and so dilate the image in breadth as much as the first doth in length. Newton.

2. To relate at large; to tell diffusely and copiously.

But he would not endure that woful theam
For to dilate at large; but urged sore,
With piercing words, and pitiful implore,
Him hasty to arise. Spenser, F. Q.

I observing,
Took once a pliant hour, and found good means
To draw from her a prayer of earnest heart,
That I would all my pilgrimage dilate,
Whereof by parcels she had something heard,
But not distinctively. Shakspeare, Othello.

To DILA'TE.† v. n.

1. To widen; to grow wide.

And Naphtali, which borders on
Old Jordan, where his stream dilates.
Sandys, Ps. p. 107.

His heart dilates and glories in his strength.
Addison.

2. To speak largely and copiously.

I will not talk of that, at which himself was silent, his condemnation; whereby the Lord of life was delivered to the power of death: nor will I dilate of his crucifying.
Walsall, Life of Christ, (1615,) sign. C. i. b.

It may be behoveful for princes, in matters of grace, to transact the same publickly, and by themselves; or their ministers to dilate upon it, and improve their lustre, by any addition or eloquence of speech. Clarendon.

DILA'TE.* adj. [from the verb.] Extensive.

And it is fit a good and honest prince,
Whom they out of their bounty have instructed
With so dilate and absolute a power,
Should owe the office of it to their service,
And good of all and every citizen.
B. Jonson, Sejanus.

DILA'TER.* n. s. [from dilate.] One who enlarges or extends.

Thy labours shew thy will to dignify
The first dilaters of thy famous nation;
And whilst thy lines their glories signify,
They likewise do increase thy reputation.
Shelton, Verses pref. to Verstigan's Restitution.

DILA'TION.* n. s. [old Fr. dilacion, Lat. dilatio.] Delay.

What construction canst thou make of our wilful dilations, but as a stubborn contempt?
Bp. Hall, Contempt, B. 4.

DILA'TOR. n s. [from dilate.] That which widens or extends.

The buccinatores, or blowers up of the cheeks, and the dilators of the nose, are too strong in cholerick people. Arbuthnot.

DI'LATORILY.* adv. [from dilatory.] In a sluggish or procrastinating manner.

Some time in March I finished the Lives of the Poets, which I wrote in my usual way, dilatorily and hastily, unwilling to work, and working with vigour and haste.
Johnson, Prayers and Medit. p. 190.

DI'LATORINESS.† n. s. [from dilatory.] The quality of being dilatory; slowness; sluggishness.

If the parliament would enact that a sum should be defalked from the ordinary fees of the lawyer, and that no cause should depend in any court above a time which they should prefix; this would very much remedy the dilatoriness of their processes.
Moral State of England, (1670,) p. 63.

DI'LATORY. adj. [dilatoire, Fr. dilatorius, Lat.] Tardy; slow; given to procrastination; addicted to delay; sluggish; loitering.

An inferiour council, after former tedious suits in a higher court, would be but dilatory, and so to little purpose. Hayward.

What wound did ever heal but by degrees?
Thou know'st we work by wit, and not by witchcraft;
And wit depends on dilatory time. Shaksp. Othello.

These cardinals trifle with me: I abhor
This dilatory sloth, and tricks of Rome.
Shakspeare, Hen. VIII.

Dilatory fortune plays the jilt
With the brave, noble, honest, gallant man,
To throw herself away on fools and knaves.
Otway.

A dilatory temper commits innumerable cruelties without design. Addison, Spect.

DILE'CTION.† n. s. [dilectio, Lat.] The act of loving; kindness.

These words mine, and thine, proceeded first of iniquitie, because men did not observe mutual and natural dilection.
Martin, Marr. of Priests, (1555,) sign. H. ii.

And this was the first testimony of the infinite dilection of God towards man.
Harmar, Transl. of Beza's Serm. (1586,) p. 29.

A bone not far from his heart, to put him in mind of dilection and love to the woman.
Bp. of London's Vine Palatine, (1614,) p. 27.

So free is Christ's dilection, that the grand condition of our felicity is our belief.
Boyle, Seraph. Love.

DILE'MMA.† n. s. [διλημμα.]

1. An argument equally conclusive by contrary suppositions. A young rhetorician applied to an old sophist to be taught the art of pleading, and bargained for a certain reward to be paid, when he should gain a cause. The master sued for his reward, and the scholar endeavoured to elude his claim by a dilemma: If I gain my cause, I shall withhold your pay, because the judge's award will be against you; if I lose it, I may withhold it, because I shall not yet have gained a cause. On the contrary, says the master, if you gain your cause, you must pay me, because you are to pay me when you gain a cause; if you lose it, you must pay me, because the judge will award it.

A dilemma, that Morton used, to raise benevolence, some called his fork, and some his crotch.
Bacon, Hen. VII.

Hope, whose weak being ruin'd is
Alike if it succeed, and if it miss;
Whom good or ill does equally confound,
And both the horns of fate's dilemma wound.
Cowley.

2. A difficult or doubtful choice; a vexatious alternative.

Betwixt this dilemma of deaths, the sharp pikes of the soldiers on the one side, and fury of the fire, on the other; he preferred the former, not as most honourable, and best complying with a military soul; (not being at leisure, alass, in time of torment, to stand on terms of credit;) but as least painful. Fuller, Profane State, p. 479.

A strong dilemma in a desp'rate case!
To act with infamy, or quit the place. Swift.

A dire dilemma; either way I'm sped;
If foes, they write, if friends, they read me dead.
Pope.

DILETTA'NTE. n. s. [plur. dilettanti, Italian.] One who delights in cultivating or promoting science. A society of dilettanti, composed of distinguished characters, was formed in this country about half a century since, and still exists under this appellation.

He told me a current story of a simple English country 'squire, who was persuaded by certain dilettanti of his acquaintance to see the world, and to become knowing in men and manners.
Burke on a Regicide Peace.

DI'LIGENCE. n. s. [diligentia, Lat.] Industry; assiduity; constancy in business; continuance of endeavour; uninterrmitted application; the contrary to idleness.

Do thy diligence to come shortly unto me.
2 Tim. iv. 9.

Brethren, give diligence to make your calling and election sure. 2 Pet. i. 10.

DI'LIGENT. adj. [diligens, Lat.]

1. Constant in application; persevering in endeavour; assiduous; not idle; not negligent; not lazy.

Seest thou a man diligent in his business? he shall stand before kings. Prov. xxii. 29.

2. Constantly applied; prosecuted with activity and perseverance; assiduous.

And the judges shall make diligent inquisition.
Deut. xix.

DI'LIGENTLY. adv. [from diligent.] With assiduity; with heed and perseverance; not carelessly; not idly; not negligently.

If you inquire not attentively and diligently, you shall never be able to discern a number of mechanical motions. Bacon.

The ancients have diligently examined in what consists the beauty of good postures.
Dryden, Dufresnoy.

DILL. n. s. [bile, Sax.] It hath a slender, fibrose, annual root; the leaves are like those of fennel; the seeds are oval, plain, streaked, and bordered.

Dill is raised of seed, which is ripe in August.
Mortimer.

To DILL.* v. a. [dilla, Icel. lallare.] To soothe; to blunt; to silence pain or sound. A northern word. Grose, Craven Dialect, and Brockett.

DILU'CID.† adj. [old Fr. dilucide, from dilucidus, Lat.]

1. Clear; not opaque.
2. Clear; plain; not obscure.

To DILU'CIDATE. v. a. [from dilucidare, Lat.] To make clear or plain; to explain; to free from obscurity.

I shall not extenuate, but explain and delucidate, according to the custom of the ancients.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

DILUCIDA'TION. n. s. [from dilucidatio, Lat.] The act of making clear; explanation; exposition.

DILU'CIDLY.* adv. [from dilucid.] Clearly; evidently. Bailey.

DI'LUENT. adj. [diluens, Lat.] Having the power to thin and attenuate other matter.

DI'LUENT. n. s. [from the adjective.] That which thins other matter.

There is no real diluent but water: every fluid is diluent, as it contains water in it.
Arbuthnot on Aliments.

To DILU'TE. v. a. [diluo, Lat.]
1. To make thin; to attenuate by the admixture of other parts.
Drinking a large dose of diluted tea, as she was ordered by a physician, she got to bed. Locke.
The aliment ought to be thin to dilute, demulcent to temper, or acid to subdue.
Arbuthnot on Aliments.
2. To make weak.
The chamber was dark, lest these colours should be diluted and weakened by the mixture of any adventitious light. Newton.

DILU'TE.† adj. Thin; attenuated; weakened; figuratively, poor.
I say, it is not evident that he so much reprehends him for the notation of the word, as for the application of it to such a sense as he there expresses; which is much different from that sense we have proposed, and far more dilute.
More, Sev. Churches, Pref.
The religion of the Jews was much wrapt up in shadow and mystery; they had but dilute ideas of God's nature, and scant discoveries of his will.
Barrow, Serm. vol. iii. S. 3.
Now it seems very dilute and insipid to direct the intention of these laws only against juglers, miraclemongers, or impostors.
Hallywell, Melampronoca.
If the red and blue colours were more dilute and weak, the distance of the images would be less than an inch, and if they were more intense and full, that distance would be greater. Newton.

DILU'TER. n. s. [from dilute.] That which makes any thing else thin.
Water is the only diluter, and the best dissolvent of most of the ingredients of our aliment.
Arbuthnot on Aliments.

DILU'TION. n. s. [dilutio, Lat.] The act of making any thing thin or weak.
Opposite to dilution is coagulation, or thickening, which is performed by dissipating the most liquid parts by heat, or by insinuating some substances, which make the parts of the fluid cohere more strongly. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

DILU'VIAN. adj. [from diluvium, Lat.] Relating to the deluge.
Suppose that this diluvian lake should rise to the mountain tops in one place, and not diffuse itself equally into all countries about. Burnet, Theory.

To DILU'VIATE.* v. n. [diluvio, Lat.] To run or spread as a flood.
These inundations have so wholly diluviated over all the south.
Sir E. Sandys, State of Rel. 1605, sign. S. 2.

DIM.† adj. [ðim, Sax. dy, Welsh; dow, Erse; according to Dr. Johnson. It is the participle of the Sax. ðimnian, to darken, according to Mr. Horne Tooke; and was formerly written dimned. The old Goth. dimma, darkness, must not, however, be overpassed.]
1. Not having a quick sight; not seeing clearly.
For her true form, how can my spark discern,
Which, dim by nature, art did never clear? Davies.
2. Dull of apprehension.
The understanding is dim, and cannot by its natural light discover spiritual truths. Rogers.
3. Not clearly seen; obscure; imperfectly discovered.
We might be able to aim at some dim and seeming conception, how matter might begin to exist by the power of that eternal first Being.
Locke.
Something, as dim to our internal view,
Is thus perhaps the cause of all we do. Pope.
4. Obstructing the act of vision; not luminous; somewhat dark.
Her face right wond'rous fair did seem to be,
That her broad beauty's beam great brightness threw
Through the dim shade, that all men might it see.
Spenser, F. Q.
How is the gold become dim! how is the most fine gold changed. Lament. iv. 1.

To DIM. v. a. [from the adjective.]
1. To cloud; to darken; to hinder from a full perception of light, and free exercise of vision.
As where the Almighty's lightning brand does light,
It dims the dazed eyen, and daunts the senses quite.
Spenser, F. Q.
It hath been observed by the ancients, that much use of Venus doth dim the sight; and yet eunuchs, which are unable to generate, are nevertheless also dim-sighted. Bacon.
Every one declares against blindness, and yet who almost is not fond of that which dims his sight? Locke.
For thee I dim these eyes, and stuff this head,
With all such reading as was never read.
Pope, Dunc.
2. To make less bright; to obscure.
A ship that through the ocean wide,
By conduct of some star doth make her way,
When as a storm hath dimm'd her trusty guide,
Out of her course doth wander far astray. Spenser.
Thus while he spake, each passion dimm'd his face,
Thrice chang'd. Milton, P. L.
The principal figure in a picture is like a king among his courtiers, who dims all his attendants.
Dryden.

DIM-SIGHTED.* adj. [dim and sight.] Having weak eyes.
Nor may the least suspicion of pride fall upon many women, who while they modestly use help to their complexions, are the more humbled and dejected, under the defects they find of native beauty, or lively colour; the remedying of which, by artificial applications, can be no more temptation to pride, than the use of crutches, or spectacles, to those that are lame and dim-sighted.
Bp. Taylor, Artif. Handsom. p. 99.
First then for chronology, how dim-sighted are the ancients in the computation of time.
Hakewill on Providence, p. 246.
We are only deceived in what is not discerned, and to err is but to be blind or dim-sighted as to some perceptions. Brown, Chr. Mor. ii. 3.

DI'MBLE.* n. s. The same word as dingle, that is, a valley between two hills, according to Mr. Warton in his notes on Milton; supposed by Mr. Whalley, the commentator on Ben Jonson, to be a corruption of it; and defined a dingle by Mr. Mason in his Supplement. The word is no corruption; but perhaps a bower, a retreat, a cell, is the true meaning; and the Sax. ðim hol, a cave, is believed to be its origin.
The scene [is] Sherwood; consisting of a landscape of a forest, hills, valleys, cottages, a castle, a river, pastures, herds, flocks, all full of country simplicity: Robin Hood's bower, his well, the witch's dimble, the swineherd's oak, the hermit's cell.
B. Jonson, Sad Shepherd.
Deep in a gloomy dimble she doth dwell.
B. Jonson, Sad Shepherd.
Satyrs, that in shades and gloomy dimbles dwell.
Drayton, Polyolb. S. 2.
And in a dimble near, ev'n as a place divine,
For contemplation fit, an ivy-cieled bower.
Drayton, Polyolb. S. 26.

DIME'NSION.† n. s. [dimension, Fr. dimensio, Latin.] Space contained in any thing; bulk; extent; capacity. It is seldom used but in the plural, Dr. Johnson says. But he had overlooked both Shakspeare and Milton, as Mr. Mason also has observed. The three dimensions are length, breadth, and depth.
And in dimension, and the shape of nature,
A gracious person. Shakspeare, Tw. Night.
A dark
Illimitable ocean, without bound,
Without dimension. Milton, P. L.
These, as a line, their long dimension drew.
Milton, P. L.
He try'd
The tomb, and found the strait dimensions wide.
Dryden.
My gentleman was measuring my walls, and taking the dimensions of the room. Swift.

DIME'NSIONED.* part. adj. Having dimension.
He would els [have] ben invisible wyth all his dimencioned body under the form of breade transubstanciated into it. The Supper of the Lord, &c. 1533, sign. B. 3.

DIME'NSIONLESS. adj. [from dimension.] Without any definite bulk.
In they pass'd
Dimensionless through heav'nly doors.
Milton, P. L.

DIME'NSITY.* n. s. [Lat. dimensus.] Extent: capacity.
If of the smallest stars in sky
We know not the dimensity;
If those bright sparks which them compose,
The highest mortal wits do pose;
How then, poor shallow man, can'st thou
The Maker of these glories know?
Howell, Lett. iv. 44.

DIME'NSIVE. adj. [dimensus, Lat.] That marks the boundaries or outlines.
All bodies have their measure, and their space;
But who can draw the soul's dimensive lines?
Davies.

DI'METER.* adj. Lat. dimeter; "dimeter versus."] Having two poetical measures.
The Octosyllable metre — was in reality the ancient Dimeter Iambick. Tyrwhitt, Essay on the Lang. and Versif. of Chaucer.

To DIMI'NISH. v. a. [diminuo, Lat.]
1. To make less by abscission or destruction of any part; the opposite to increase.
That we call good which is apt to cause or increase pleasure, or diminish pain in us. Locke.
2. To impair; to lessen; to degrade.
Impiously they thought
Thee to diminish, and from thee withdraw
The number of thy worshippers. Milton, P. L.
3. To take any thing from that to which it belongs: the contrary to add.
Nothing was diminished from the safety of the king by the imprisonment of the duke. Hayward.
Ye shall not add unto the word which I command you, neither shall you diminish aught from it. Deut. iv. 2.

To DIMI'NISH. v. n. To grow less; to be impaired.
What judgement I had increases rather than diminishes; and thoughts, such as they are, come crowding in so fast upon me, that my only difficulty is to chuse or to reject. Dryden.

Crete's ample fields diminish to our eye;
Before the Boreal blasts the vessels fly.
Pope, Odyssey.

DIMI'NISHER.* n. s. [from diminish.] That which, or one who, impairs or lessens.

The diminisher of regal, but the demolisher of episcopal authority. Clarke's Serm. 1637, p. 241.

DIMI'NISHINGLY. adv. [from diminish.] In a manner tending to vilify, or lessen.

I never heard him censure, or so much as speak diminishingly of any one that was absent. Locke.

DIMI'NUENT.* adj. [Lat. diminuens.] Lessening.

The comparative degree in such kind of expressions, being usually taken for a diminuent term. Bp. Saunderson's Sermons, Pref.

DI'MINUTE.* adj. [Lat. diminutus.] Small; diminutive.

The first seeds of things are little and diminute. Sir A. Gorges.

DI'MINUTELY.* adv. [from diminute.] In a manner which lessens.

An execration only; but that, too, elliptically and diminutely uttered. Bp. Saunderson on Promiss. Oaths, i. § 10.

DIMINU'TION. n. s. [diminutio, Lat.]

1. The act of making less; opposed to augmentation.

The one is not capable of any diminution or augmentation at all by men; the other apt to admit both. Hooker.

2. The state of growing less; opposed to increase.

The gravitating power of the sun is transmitted through the vast bodies of the planets without any diminution, so as to act upon all their parts, to their very centres, with the same force, and according to the same laws, as if the part upon which it acts were not surrounded with the body of the planet. Newton.

Finite and infinite seems to be looked upon as the modes of quantity, and to be attributed primarily to those things which are capable of increase or diminution. Locke.

3. Discredit; loss of dignity; degradation.

Gladly to thee
Heroick laurel'd Eugene yields the prime;
Nor thinks it diminution to be rank'd
In military honour next. Philips.

4. Deprivation of dignity; injury of reputation.

Make me wise by the truth, for my own soul's salvation, and I shall not regard the world's opinion or diminution of me. King Charles.

They might raise the reputation of another, though they are a diminution to his. Addison, Spect.

5. [In architecture.] The contraction of the diameter of a column, as it ascends.

DIMI'NUTIVE. adj. [diminutivus, Latin.] Small; little; narrow; contracted.

The poor wren,
The most diminutive of birds, will fight,
Her young ones in her nest, against the owl.
Shakspeare, Macbeth.

It is the interest of mankind, in order to the advance of knowledge, to be sensible they have yet attained it but in poor and diminutive measure. Glanville, Scepsis.

The light of man's understanding is but a short, diminutive, contracted light, and looks not beyond the present. South.

If the ladies should once take a liking to such a diminutive race of lovers, we should, in a little time, see mankind epitomized, and the whole species in miniature. Addison.

They know how weak and awkward many of those little diminutive discourses are. Watts.

DIMI'NUTIVE.† n. s. [from the adjective.]

1. A word formed to express littleness; as, lapillus in Latin, a little stone; maisonette, in French, a little house; manniken, in English, a little man.

He afterwards proving a dainty and effeminate youth, was commonly called, by the diminutive of his name, Peterkin or Perkin. Bacon, Hen. VII.

Sim, while but Sim, in good repute did live;
Was then a knave, but in diminutive. Cotton.

2. A small thing: a sense not now in use.

Follow his chariot; monster-like, be shewn
For poor'st diminutives, for doits! Shakspeare.

3. That which diminishes, or abates.

Diet, diminutives, alteratives, cordials, correctors, as before, intermixt as occasion serves. Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 403.

DIMI'NUTIVELY. adv. [from diminutive.] In a diminutive manner.

DIMI'NUTIVENESS.† n. s. [from diminutive.] Smallness; littleness; pettiness; want of bulk; want of dignity.

At all our concerts he was a constant, but an invisible performer; for, while he stood on tip-toes thrumming his bass-viol, the diminutiveness of his figure was totally eclipsed by the expansion of his instrument. Student, ii. 225.

DI'MISH. adj. [from dim.] Somewhat dim; somewhat obscure.

'Tis true, but let it not be known,
My eyes are somewhat dimish grown;
For nature, always, in the right,
To your decays adapts my sight. Swift.

DIMI'SSION.* n. s. [Lat. dimissio.] Leave to depart. Huloet.

DI'MISSORY.† adj. [dimissorius, Lat. Our word was formerly written, as it is now sometimes pronounced, (in both cases improperly,) demissory.]

1. By which a man is dismissed to another jurisdiction.

A bishop of another diocess ought neither to ordain or admit a clerk, without the consent of his own proper bishop, and without the letters dimissory. Ayliffe's Parergon.

2. Granting leave to depart. See DIMISSION.

Old Simeon's craving his letters dimissory, Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace. Bp. Prideaux, Euchol. (1656,) p. 101.

To DIMI'T.* v. a. [Lat. dimitto.] To allow to go; also, to grant to farm. Huloet.

I directed a trowze of fine dimity. Wiseman.

DI'MLY. adv. [from dim.]

1. Not with a quick sight; not with a clear perception.

Unspeakable! who sitt'st above these heav'ns,
To us invisible, or dimly seen,
In these thy lowest works. Milton, P. L.

2. Not brightly; not luminously.

In the beginning of our pumping the air, the match appeared well lighted; though it had almost filled the receiver with fumes; but by degrees it burnt more and more dimly. Boyle, Spring of the Air.

I saw the angelick guards from earth ascend,
Griev'd they must now no longer man attend;
The beams about their temples dimly shone;
One would have thought the crime had been their own. Dryden.

DI'MMING.* n. s. [from dim.] Obscurity.

All of us have cause
To wail the dimming of our shining star.
Shakspeare, K. Rich. III.

DI'MMISH. See DIMISH.

DI'MNESS.† n. s. [Sax. ðimneꝛ.]

1. Dulness of sight.

Not with a total blindness, (for then they would not have sought for the door of Lot's house, but rather have groped for the way home) but such a dimness that they could not see any thing distinctly, or in its right place. Bp. Patrick, on Genesis.

2. Want of apprehension; stupidity.

Answerable to this dimness of their perception, was the whole system and body of their religion. Decay of Piety.

DI'MPLE. n. s. [dint, a hole; dintle, a little hole; by a careless pronunciation dimple. Skinner.] A small cavity or depression in the cheek, chin, or other part.

The dimple of the upper lip is the common measure of them all. Grew.

In her forehead's fair half round,
Love sits in open triumph crown'd;
He in the dimple of her chin,
In private state, by friends is seen. Prior.

To DI'MPLE. v.n. [from the noun.] To sink in small cavities, or little inequalities.

The wild waves master'd him, and suck'd him in,
And smiling eddies, dimpled on the main. Dryden.

Eternal smiles his emptiness betray,
As shallow streams run dimpling all the way. Pope.

DI'MPLED. adj. [from dimple.] Set with dimples.

On each side her,
Stood pretty dimpled boys like smiling Cupids.
Shakspeare.

DI'MPLY.† adj. [from dimple.] Full of dimples; sinking in little inequalities.

The wanderers of heaven
Each to his home retire, save those that love
To take their pastime in the troubled air,
Or skimming flutter round the dimply pool.
Thomson, Winter.

As the smooth surface of the dimply flood,
The silver-slipper'd virgin lightly trod.
Warton, Isis.

DIN.† n. s. [ðýn, a noise; ðýnan, to make a noise, Sax. dyna, to thunder, Icelandick. Thus, in some parts of the west of England, thunder is called dinder. The word was also formerly written deen.] A loud noise; a violent and continued sound.

And all the way he roared as he went,
That all the forest with astonishment
Thereof did tremble; and the beasts therein
Fled fast away from that so dreadful din.
Spenser, Hubb. Tale.

O, 'twas a din to fright a monster's ear;
To make an earthquake: sure, it was the roar
Of a whole herd of lions. Shakspeare, Tempest.

While the cock with lively din
Scatters the rear of darkness thin,
And to the stack or the barn-door
Stoutly struts his dame before. Milton, L'All.

Now night o'er heav'n
Inducing darkness, grateful truce impos'd,
And silence on the odious din of war.
Milton, P. L.

How, while the troubled elements around,
Earth, water, air, the stunning din resound,
Through streams of smoke and adverse fire he rides,
While every shot is levell'd at his sides. Smith.

Some independent ideas, of no alliance to one another, are, by education, custom, and the constant din of their party, so coupled in their minds, that they always appear there together. Locke.

To DIN. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To stun with noise; to harass with clamour.

Rather live
To bait thee for his bread, and din your ears
With hungry cries. Otway, Venice Pres.

2. To impress with violent and continued noise.

What shall we do, if his majesty puts out a proclamation commanding us to take Wood's halfpence? This hath been often dinned in my ears. Swift.

To DINE. v. n. [diner, Fr.] to eat the chief meal about the middle of the day.

Perhaps some merchant hath invited him,
And from the mart he's somewhere gone to dinner:
Good sister, let us dine and never fret. Shaks.
Myself, he, and my sister,
To-day did dine together. Shakspeare.
He would dine with him the next day. Clarend.
Thus, of your heroes and brave boys,
With whom old Homer makes such noise,
The greatest actions I can find,
Are, that they did their work and din'd. Prior.

To DINE. v. a. To give a dinner to; to feed.

Boil this restoring root in generous wine,
And set beside the door the sickly stock to dine.
Dryden, Virgil.

DINE'TICAL. adj. [διναλικος.] Whirling round; vertigenous.

Some of late have concluded, from spots in the sun, which appear and disappear again, that besides the revolution it maketh with its orbs, it hath also a dinetical motion, and rolls upon its own poles. Brown, Vulg. Err.

A sperical figure is most commodious for dinetical motion, or revolution upon its own axis. Ray.

To DING.† v. a. pret. and part dinged and dung. [Gael. dingam, to push, to drive, to thrust; Irish, dingim; Sax. ðenezan, to beat; Goth. deinga, the same. The word is common in the North of England.

1. To dash with violence.

Ding them all down from fair Jerusalem,
And mew them up in thy deserved Bedlem.
Marston, Sat. (1598,) S. 4.

Prometheus ———
Is ding'd to hell, and vulture eats his heart.
Ibid. S. 5.

This giant carrier would have been more merciful to his hand, if he had known against the jaw-bones of what creature he so often dinged his fist. Gayton, Notes on D. Quix.

2. To impress with force.

To DING. v. n. To bluster; to bounce; to huff. A low word.

He huffs and dings, because we will not spend the little we have left, to get him the title of lord Strut. Arbuthnot.

DING-DONG. n. s. A word by which the sound of bells is imitated.

Let us all ring fancy's knell;
Ding, dong, bell. Shakspeare.

DI'NGLE.† n. s. [from ðen, or ðin,* a hollow, Sax.] A hollow between hills; a dale. See CLOUGH.

In dingles deep and mountains hoar.
Drayton, Muse's Elysium.

I know each lane and every alley green,
Dingle or bushy dell of this wild wood;
And every bosky bourne from side to side,
My daily walks, and ancient neighbourhood.
Milton, Comus.

Stretch'd among the daisies pied
Of a green dingle's sloping side. T. Warton, Ode.

DINGLE-DANGLE.* An adverbial expression, denoting any thing carelessly pendant. The old dictionary of Sherwood gives the verb dingle-dangle.

By dingle, which he [Peck] thinks is no where else to be found in our language, he understands boughs hanging dingle-dangle over the edge of the dell. Warton, Notes on Milton.

DI'NGINESS.* n. s. [from dingy.] The quality of being dingy or brownish.

DI'NGTHRIFT.* n. s. [from ding and thrift.] A spendthrift; one who throws away his possessions.

A just revenge, that a ruffian and dingthrift rise up, and riotously waste all.
Granger on Ecclesiastes, 1621, p. 83.

DI'NGY*. adj. [Sax. ðunig; Swedish, dingig.] Dark brown; dun; dirty. The g is sounded as in tinge.

On the dingy sea,
Over deep waters,
Dublin they seek. Ellis, Transl. of Athelstan's Ode, Sp. of Eng. Poetry, i. 27.

DI'NING-ROOM. n. s. dine and room.] The principal apartment of the house; the room where entertainments are made.

He went out from the dining-room before he had fallen into errour by the intemperance of his meat, or the deluge of drink.
Bp. Taylor, Rule of Living Holy.

DI'NNER. n. s. [diner, French.] The chief meal; the meal eaten about the middle of the day.

Let me not stay a jot for dinner:
Go, get it ready. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

Before dinner and supper, as often as it is convenient, or can be had, let the publick prayers of the church, or some parts of them, be said publickly in the family. Bp. Taylor.

The jolly crew, unmindful of the past,
The quarry share, their plenteous dinner haste.
Dryd. Æn.

DI'NNER-TIME. n. s. [dinner and time.] The time of dining.

At dinner-time,
I pray you, have in mind where we must meet.
Shakspeare.

Then from the mint walks forth the man of rhyme,
Happy to catch me just at dinner-time. Pope.

DINT.† n. s. [Sax. ðynt, a blow; which Mr. Horne Tooke asserts to be the past participle of ðynan, to din, to make a noise. See Div. of Purley, ii. 305. This, however, is not probable. It is more likely to be from ding, to strike, to dash with violence. See To DING. This word was formerly written dent.]

1. A blow; a stroke.

Much daunted with that dint, her sense was daz'd;
Yet kindling rage, herself she gather'd round.
Spenser.

Neither vainly hope
To be invulnerable in these bright arms,
Though temper'd heavenly; for that mortal dint,
Save he who reigns above, none can resist.
Milton, P. L.

2. The mark made by a blow; the cavity remaining after a violent pressure.

He embrac'd her naked body o'er,
And, straining hard the statue, was afraid
His hands had made a dint and hurt the maid.
Dryden.

3. Violence; force; power.

Now you weep, and I perceive you feel
The dint of pity. Shakspeare, Jul. Cæs.

They daily run themselves upon the dint of the Apostle's sentence against evil-speaking.
Hooker, Ecc. Pol. Pref.

We are to wrest the whole Spanish monarchy out of the hands of the enemy; and, in order to it, to work our way into the heart of his country by dint of arms. Addison.

The dewlap'd bull now chafes along the plain,
While burning love ferments in every vein;
His well arm'd front against his rival aims,
And by the dint of war his mistress claims. Gay.

I have myself known a man, from the lowest conditions of life, without friends or education, not knowing so much as to write or read, bred to no trade or calling, by pure dint of day-labour, frugality, and foresight, to have grown wealthy.
Bp. Berkeley, Word to the Wise.

To DINT. v. a [from the noun.] To mark with a cavity by a blow, or violent impression.

With greedy force each other doth assail,
And strike so fiercely that they do impress
Deep dinted furrows in the batter'd mails:
The iron walls to ward their blows were weak and frail. Spenser, F. Q.

Leave, leave, fair bride, your solitary bed,
No more shall you return to it alone;
It nurseth sadness; and your body's print,
Like to a grave, the yielding down doth dint.
Donne, Poems, p. 114.

Deed dinted wrinkles on her cheek she draws;
Sunk are her eyes, and toothless are her jaws.
Dryden, Æn.

DINUMERA'TION.† n. s. [dinumeratio, Lat.] The act of numbering out singly.
Bullokar, and Cockeram.

DIO'CESAN.* n. s. [from diocess.] A bishop as he stands related to his own clergy or flock.

As a diocesan you are like to outdo yourself in all other capacities, and exemplify every word of this discourse. South.

I have heard it has been advised by a diocesan to his inferior clergy, that they should read some of the most celebrated sermons printed by others.
Tatler.

DIO'CESAN. adj. [from diocess.] Pertaining to a diocese.

The SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE looks with peculiar hope and satisfaction to the permanent zealous aid and co-operation of the diocesan and district committees. Account of the Soc. for prom. Chr. Knowledge.

DI'OCESS.† n. s. [Norman Fr. deocisse; Lat. diœcesis. It is a Greek word compounded of δια and οικησις.]

1. The circuit of every bishop's jurisdiction; for this realm has two divisions, one into shires or counties, in respect of temporal policy; another into dioceses, in respect of jurisdiction ecclesiastical. Cowel.

None ought to be admitted by any bishop but such as have dwelt and remained in his diocess a convenient time. Whitgift.

He should regard the bishop of Rome as the islanders of Jersey and Guernsey do him of Constance in Normandy; that is, nothing at all; since by that French bishop's refusal to swear unto our king, those isles were annexed to the diocess of Winchester. Ralegh, Essays.

St. Paul looks upon Titus as advanced to the dignity of a prince, ruler of the church, and intrusted with a large diocess containing many particular cities, under the immediate government of their respective elders, and those deriving authority from his ordination. South.

2. A district or division of a country, generally speaking; not noticed by Dr. Johnson, or any of our lexicographers. But this is the original meaning.

Wild boars are no rarity in this diocess, which the Moors hunt and kill in a manly pastime.
L. Addison, Descript. of W. Barbary, ch. ii. (Oxf. 1671.)

DIO'PTICAL, and DIO'PTICK.* So the next words are now sometimes written.

DIO'PTRICAL.† } adj. [διόπτομαι, Gr. Dr.
DIO'PTRICK. } Johnson says; but it is more immediately from διόπτρα, Lat. dioptra, a perspective glass.] Affording a medium for the sight; assisting the sight in the view of distant objects.

Being excellently well furnished with dioptrical glasses, he had not been able to see the sun spotted. Boyle.

View the asperities of the moon through a dioptrick glass, and venture at the proportion of her hills by their shadows. More, Ant. against Atheism.

DIO'PTRICKS.† n. s. A part of opticks, treating of the different refractions of the light passing through different mediums; as the air, water, glasses, &c. Harris.

He has added much to the theory of dioptricks; much to the manufacture itself of grinding good glasses. Sprat, Hist. of R. Soc. p. 314.

DI'ORISM.* n. s. [Gr. διόρισμα.] Distinction, or definition, which in few words explains what is spoken of.

To eat things sacrificed to idols, is one mode of idolatry; but, by a prophetical diorism, it signifies idolatry in general. More, Expos. of Sev. Churches, p. 72.

DIORI'STICALLY.* adv. [from diorism.] In a distinguishing manner.

Ye are not so pure and clean as ye ought to be, and free from the lusts of the flesh; which vice is here noted by Nicolaitism dioristically, as idolatry in general before by eating things sacrificed to idols. More, Expos. of Sev. Churches, p. 72.

DIORTHO'SIS. n. s. [διορθωσις, of διορθόω, to make straight.] A chirurgical operation, by which crooked or distorted members are restored to their primitive and regular shape. Harris.

To DIP.† v. a. pret. dipped; particip. dipped, or dipt. [dippen, Dutch; dippan, Saxon; diupjan, Goth.]

1. To immerge; to put into any liquor.

The person to be baptized may be dipped in water; and such an immersion or dipping ought to be made thrice, according to the canon. Ayliffe's Parergon.

Old Corineus compass'd thrice the crew,
And dipp'd an olive branch in holy dew,
Which thrice he sprinkled round, and thrice aloud,
Invok'd the dead, and then dismiss'd the crowd. Dryden, Æn.

He turn'd a tyrant in his latter days,
And from the bright meridian where he stood,
Descending, dipp'd his hands in lover's blood. Dryden, Fables.

The kindred arts shall in their praise conspire;
One dip the pencil, and one string the lyre. Pope.

Now on fancy's easy wing convey'd,
The king descended to th' Elysian shade;
There in a dusky vale, where Lethe rolls,
Old Bavius sits to dip poetic souls. Pope, Dunciad.

So fishes rising from the main,
Can soar with moisten'd wings on high;
The moisture dry'd, they sink again,
And dip their wings again to fly. Swift.

2. To moisten; to wet.

And thou not mortal, yet a cold shudd'ring dew
Dips me all o'er, as when the wrath of Jove Speaks thunder. Milton, Comus.

3. To be engaged in any affair.

When men are once dipt, what with the encouragements of sense, custom, facility, and shame of departing from what they have given themselves up to, they go on till they are stifled. L'Estrange.

In Richard's time, I doubt, he was a little dipt in the rebellion of the commons. Dryden, Fables.

4. To engage as a pledge: generally used for the first mortgage.

Be careful still of the main chance, my son,
Put out the principal in trusty hands,
Live on the use, and never dip thy lands. Dryden, Pers.

To DIP. v. n.

1. To sink; to immerge.

We have snakes in our cups, and in our dishes; and whoever dips too deep will find death in the pot. L'Estrange.

2. To enter; to pierce.

The vulture dipping in Prometheus's side,
His bloody beak with his torn liver dy'd. Granville.

3. To enter slightly into any thing.

When I think all the repetitions are struck out in a copy, I sometimes find more upon dipping in the first volume. Pope.

4. To take that which comes first; to choose by chance.

With what ill thoughts of Jove art thou possess'd?
Would'st thou prefer him to some man? Suppose
I dipp'd among the worst, and Staius chose? Dryden, Pers.

DIP.* n. s. [from the verb.]

1. Depression; the sinking or falling in of a surface; as, the depression or dip of the visible horizon; which denotes its sinking or dipping below the true horizontal plane; whether caused by some variation of the atmosphere, or by the different height of the observer's eye above the surface of the sea. Chambers.

Great columns of stone hang down the face of some of these rocks almost perpendicularly, or with a very slight dip. Pennant.

2. The act of taking that which comes first. This is used only in low language.

DIPCHI'CK. n. s. [from dip and chick.] The name of a bird.

Dipchick is so named of his diving and littleness. Carew.

DIPE'TALOUS. adj. [δις and πέταλον.] Having two flower-leaves.

DI'PHTHONG. n. s. [διφθογγος.] A coalition of two vowels to form one sound; as vain, leaf, Cæsar.

We see how many disputes the simple and ambiguous nature of vowels created among grammarians, and how it has begot the mistake concerning diphthongs: all that are properly so are syllables, and not diphthongs, as is intended to be signified by that word. Holder, Elem. of Speech.

Make a diphthong of the second eta and iota, instead of their being two syllables, and the objection is gone. Pope.

DI'PLOE. n. s. The inner plate or lamina of the skull.

DIPLO'MA.† n. s. [διπλώμα, Gr. diploma, Lat. Our plural is also the Latin diplomata.] A letter or writing conferring some privilege, so called because they used formerly to be written on waxed tables, and folded together.

My present design is more relating to the nature of letters, than to the diplomata or charters themselves. Humph. Wanley to Dr. Smith, Anec. i. 80.

DIPLO'MACY.* n. s. [from diploma.]

1. A privileged state.

At a very early period in the diplomacy of humiliation, a gentleman was sent on an errand, of which, from the motive of it, whatever the event might be, we can never be ashamed. Burke on a Regicide Peace.

2. A body of envoys.

The foreign ministers were ordered to attend at this investiture of the directory; for so they call the managers of their burlesque government. The diplomacy, who were a sort of envoys, were quite awe-struck with "the pride, pomp, and circumstance" of this majestic senate! Burke on a Regicide Peace.

To DIPLO'MATE.* v. a. [from diploma.] To invest with a privilege.

By virtue of the Chancellor's letters he was diplomated doctor of divinity in 1660. A. Wood, Ath. Ox. of Bp. Nicolson.

DIPLO'MATICK.* adj. [Fr. diplomatique.]

1. Relating to the art of deciphering all old written characters and abbreviations.

One of the principal objects of the following work, is the illustration of what for near two centuries has been called the diplomatick science, the knowledge of which will enable us to form a proper judgement of the age and authenticity of manuscripts, charters, records, and other monuments of antiquity. Astle on the Orig. and Prog. of Writing, Introd.

2. Respecting envoys and ambassadors, or the privileges belonging to them; and sometimes to others, in a publick capacity.

The ambassadors from the rights of man, and their admission into the diplomatick system, I hold to be a new era in this business. Burke on French Affairs.

His lordship is a great member of the diplomatick body; he has of course all the fundamental treaties, which make the publick statute law of Europe, by heart. Burke on a Regicide Peace.

DIPLO'MATIST.* n. s. [from diplomatick.] One employed or versed in affairs of state.

DI'PPER.† n. s. [from dip.] One that dips in the water.

The chief enemy was a dipper, Pharaoh; the first and last of kings that were so, as the Red Sea can witness; he could not away with Moses skilled in all the learning of the Egyptians, nor with eloquent Aaron. Whitlock, Manners of the English.

In which number, I must be forced to reckon that doctor, who in a late equivocating treatise plausibly set afloat against the Dippers, diving the while himself with a more deep prelatical malignance against the present state and church-government, mentions with ignominy "the Tractate of Divorce." Milton, Tetrachordon.

Our townsmen, since of floods they must turn skippers,
Will change religion too, and so turn dippers. Cleaveland, Poems, &c. p. 18.

DI'PPING Needle. n. s. A device which shews a particular property of the magnetick needle, so that, besides its polarity or verticity, which is its direction of altitude, or height above the horizon, when duly poised about an horizontal axis, it will always point to a determined degree of altitude, or elevation above the horizon, in this or that place respectively.

DI'PSAS. n. s. [Latin, from διψάω, to thirst.] A serpent, whose bite produces the sensation of unquenchable thirst.

Scorpion, and asp, and amphisbœna dire,
Cerastes horn'd, hydrus, and ellops drear,
And dipsas. Milton, P. L.

DI'PTOTE. n. s. [διπτωτα.] A noun consisting of two cases only. Clark.

DI'PTYCH.† n. s. [diptycha, Lat. two leaves folded together.] A register of bishops and martyrs.

They had a lower degree of remembrance for bishops, and confessors, and all other eminent persons departed this life; whom they not only praised in orations at their funerals, but writ their names in their diptychs or two-leaved records: which contained, in one page, all the names of the living; in the other, the dead that were of note in the church. Bp. Lloyd, Serm. p. 19.

The commemoration of saints was made out of the diptychs of the church, as appears by multitudes of places in St. Austin. Stilling fleet.

DIRE. adj. [dirus, Lat.] Dreadful; dismal; mournful; horrible; terrible; evil in a great degree.

Women fight,
To doff their dire distresses. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

More by intemperance die
In meats, and drinks, which on the earth shall bring
Diseases dire, of which a monstrous crew
Before thee shall appear. Milton, P. L.

Hydras, and gorgons, and chimæras dire. Milton.

Or what the cross, dire-looking planet smites,
Or hurtful worm with canker'd venom bites. Milton, Arcades.

Dire was the tossing, deep the groans, despair
Tended the sick. Milton, P. L.

Discord! dire sister of the slaughter'd pow'r,
Small at her birth, but rising ev'ry hour;
While scarce the skies her horrid head can bound,
She stalks on earth, and shakes the world around. Pope.

DIRE'CT. adj. [directus, Lat.]

1. Strait, not crooked.
2. Not oblique.

The ships would move in one and the same surface; and consequently must needs encounter when they either advance towards one another in direct lines, or meet in the intersection to cross lines. Bentley.

3. [In astronomy.] Appearing to an eye on earth to move progressively through the zodiac; not retrograde.

Two geomantick figures were display'd,
Above his head, a warrior and a maid,
One when direct, and one when retrograde. Dryden, Fab.

4. Not collateral, as the grandson succeeds his grandsire in a direct line.
5. Apparently tending to some end, as in a strait line.

Such was as then the state of the king, as it was no time by direct means to seek her. And such was the state of his captivated will, as he would delay no time of seeking her. Sidney.

He that does this, will be able to cast off all that is superfluous; he will see what is pertinent, what coherent, what is direct to, what slides by the question. Locke.

6. Open; not ambiguous.

There be, that are in nature faithful and sincere, and plain and direct; not crafty and involved. Bacon.

7. Plain; express.

He no where, that I know, says it in direct words. Locke.

To DIRE'CT.† v. a. [old Fr. directer; Lat. dirigo, directum.]

1. To aim or drive in a strait line.

Two eagles from a mountain's height,
By Jove's command direct their rapid flight. Pope.

2. To point against as a mark.

The spear flew hissing through the middle space,
And pierc'd his throat, directed at his face. Dryden, Æneid.

3. To regulate; to adjust.

It is not in man that walketh to direct his steps. Jer. x. 23.

Wisdom is profitable to direct. Eccles. x. 10.

All that is in a man's power, is to mind what the ideas are that take their turns in his understanding; or else to direct and sort, and call in such as he desires. Locke.

4. To prescribe certain measure; to mark out a certain course.

He directeth it under the whole heavens, and his lightning unto the ends of the earth. Job, xxxvii. 3.

5. To order; to command: to direct is a softer term than to command.

DIRE'CTER.† n. s. [directeur, Fr. director, Lat.] See DIRECTOR.

1. One that directs; one that prescribes. Sherwood.
2. An instrument that serves to guide any manual operation.

DIRE'CTION. n. s. [directio, Lat.]

1. Aim at a certain point.

These men's opinions are not the product of judgement, or the consequence of reason; but the effects of chance and hazard, of a mind floating at all adventures, without choice, and without direction. Locke.

The direction of good works to a good end, is the only principle that distinguishes charity. Bp. Smalridge.

2. Tendency of motion impressed by a certain impulse.

No particle of matter, nor any combination of particles, that is, no body can either move of itself, or of itself alter the direction of its motion. Cheyne.

3. Order; command; prescription.

From the counsel that St. Jerome giveth Læta, of taking heed how she read the Apocrypha; as also by the help of other learned men's judgements, delivered in like case, we may take direction. Hooker.

Ev'n now
I put myself to thy direction. Shaksp. Macbeth.

The nobles of the people digged it by the direction of the law-giver. Numb. xxi. 18.

Men's passions and God's direction seldom agree. King Charles.

General directions for scholastic disputers, is never to dispute upon mere trifles. Watts.

4. Regularity; adjustment.

All nature is but art unknown to thee,
All chance, direction which thou canst not see. Pope.

DIRE'CTIVE. adj. [from direct.]

1. Having the power of direction.

A law therefore generally taken, is a directive rule unto goodness of operation. Hooker.

A power of command there is without all question, though there be some doubt in what faculty this command doth principally reside, whether in the will or the understanding. The true resolution is, that the directive command for counsel is in the understanding; and the applicative command, or empire, for putting in execution of what is directed, is in the will. Bp. Bramhall against Hobbs.

On the directive powers of the former, and the regularity of the latter, whereby it is capable of direction, depends the generation of all bodies. Grew.

2. Informing: showing the way.

Nor visited by one directive ray,
From cottage streaming, or from airy hall. Thomson.

DIRE'CTLY. adv. [from direct.]

1. In a strait line; rectilineally.

The more a body is nearer to the eyes, and the more directly it is opposed to them, the more it is enlightened; because the light languishes and lessens the farther it removes from its proper source. Dryden, Dufresnoy.

There was no other place assigned to any of this matter, than that whereunto its own gravity bore it, which was only directly downwards, whereby it obtained that place in the globe which was just underneath. Woodward.

If the refracted ray be returned directly back to the point of incidence, it shall be refracted by the incident ray. Newton, Opticks.

2. Immediately; apparently; without circumlocution; without any long train of consequence.

Infidels being clean without the church, deny directly and utterly reject the very principles of Christianity, which hereticks embrace erroneously by misconstruction. Hooker.

No man hath hitherto been so impious, as plainly and directly to condemn prayer. Hooker.

By asserting the scripture to be the canon of our faith, I have unavoidably created to myself enemies in the papists directly, because they have kept the scripture from us what they could. Dryden, Pref. to Rel. Laici.

His work directly tends to raise sentiments of honour and virtue in his readers. Addison, Freeholder.

No reason can be assigned, why it is best for the world that God Almighty hath absolute power, which does not directly prove that no mortal man should have the like. Swift.

DIRE'CTNESS. n. s. [from direct.] Straitness; tendency to any point; the nearest way.

They argued from celestial causes only, the constant vicinity of the sun, and the directness of his rays; never suspecting that the body of the earth had so great an efficiency in the changes of the air. Bentley.

DIRE'CTOR. n. s. [director, Lat.]

1. One that has authority over others; a superintendant; one that has the general management of a design or work.

Himself stood director over them, with nodding or stamping, shewing he did like or mislike those things he did not understand. Sidney.

In all affairs thou sole director. Swift.

2. A rule; an ordinance.

Common forms were not design'd
Directors to a noble mind. Swift.

3. An instructor; one who shews the proper methods of proceeding.

They are glad to use counsellors and directors in all their dealings of weight, as contracts, testaments. Hooker.

4. One who is consulted in cases of conscience.

I am her director and her guide in spiritual affairs. Dryden.

5. One appointed to transact the affairs of a trading company.

What made directors cheat in south-sea year? Pope.

6. An instrument in surgery, by which the hand is guided in its operation.

The manner of opening with a knife, is by sliding it on a director, the groove of which prevents its being misguided. Sharp, Surg.

DIRECTO'RIAL.* adj. [from directory.]

1. Giving direction; enacting rule.

The emperour's power in the collective body, or the diet, is not directorial, but executive. Guthrie, Germany.

2. Respecting a government of France, called the directory.

When this object was to be weighed against the directorial conquests, merely as an object of a value at market, the principle of barter became perfectly ridiculous. Burke, on a Regicide Peace.

DIRE'CTORY.† n. s. [from director.] The book which the factious preachers published in the rebellion for the direction of their sect in acts of worship.

As to the ordinance concerning the directory, we cannot consent to the taking away of the book of common prayer. Oxford Reasons against the Covenant.

Under the directory there will be as different religions, and as different desires, and as differing forms, as there are several varieties of men and manners under one half of heaven. Bp. Taylor on Extemp. Prayer.

The king's body [Ch. I.] being by the bearers set down near the place of burial, the bishop of London stood ready with the service-book in his hands to have performed his last duty to the king his master, according to the order or form for the burial of the dead, set forth in the Book of Common-Prayer, which the lords likewise desired; but would not be suffered by Col. Whitchcott the governour, by reason of the directory, to which (said he) he and others were to be conformable.

Sir T. Herbert's Memoirs.

DIRE'CTORY.* n. s. [old Fr. directoire, a rule; Lat. directio.] A direction; a guide. This sense, of which Dr. Johnson takes no notice, is of higher antiquity than that which he assigns to the book of the factious preachers. It is in the old vocabularies of Cockeram and Bullokar.

But by the way this example of Christ's choosing illiterate men to this weighty function of the ministry, is no more our directory to follow, than it is to choose such as we (if possible) knew Judasses as he did. Whitlock, Manners of the English.

The bishop being writ to, to send an account out of the Casuistical directories for confessors, about the sins proper for kings to be interrogated in confession, returned this answer.

Bp. Barlow, Rem. p. 222.

DIRE'CTORY.* n. s. The name of the democratick French government in modern times.

The foreign ministers were ordered to attend at this investiture of the directory; — for so they call the managers of their burlesque government.

Burke on a Regicide Peace.

DIRE'CTORY.* adj. [Fr. directoire.]

1. Guiding.

This needle, touched with the stone, and directing towards the north and south, the mariners, as the magnetical philosophers, call their directory needle. Gregory's Posthum. (1650,) p. 281.

2. Commanding.

Every law may be said to consist of several parts: one declaratory, whereby the rights to be observed, and the wrongs to be eschewed, are clearly laid down; another directory, whereby the subject is enjoined to observe those rights, and abstain from the commission of those wrongs.

Blackstone.

DIRE'CTRESS.* n. s. [from director.] She who directs or governs.

Our reason being the noblest principle of our nature, that by which we are raised above the level of brutes, yea by which we are allied to angels, and do border upon God himself, ought upon that account, to be submitted to, as the supreme regent and directress of all our other powers, and to be looked upon as the rule of our will, and the guide of all our animal motions.

Scott, Christian Life, i. 3.

DIRE'CTRIX.* n. s. [from director.] She who manages or directs.

Every part of the body studying as it were to pay [by adorning itself to its best advantage] some tribute of comeliness, as an homage to the face; which is not only the queen and sovereign of human and visible beauty, but the regent and directrix of the whole body's culture, motion, and welfare. Bp. Taylor, Artif. Hands. p. 24.

DI'REFUL.† adj. [This word is frequent among the poets, but has been censured as not analogical: all other words compounded with full consisting of a substantive and full, as dreadful, or full of dread; joyful, or full of joy. So far Dr. Johnson. I must add, that good writers, besides the poets, use this word; as the fine sentence of Bishop Richardson, and the remarks of Dr. Addison and Bishop Bull, now added to the examples, shew. Dr. Addison's use of the word carries the etymology to the Latin diræ, curses, and full, i. e. full of curses; which removes the want of analogy, which Dr. Johnson states. But all other words, compounded with full, do not consist of a substantive and full; witness resentful, admitted by Dr. Johnson himself into his dictionary.] Dire; dreadful; dismal.

Point of spear it never piercen would,
Ne dint of direful sword, divide the substance could. Spenser, F. Q.

But yet at last, whereas the direful fiend,
She saw not stir, off shaking vain affright,
She nigher drew, and saw that joyous end;
Then God she pray'd, and thank'd her faithful knight. Spenser, F. Q.

Direful hap betide that hated wretch
That makes us wretched by the death of thee. Shaks.

The dehortation in this case is urgent; the accusation dreadful; the sin itself direful.

Bp. Richardson on the Old Test. (1655,) p. 302.

This notice of the ceremony is very agreeable to the execratory, which is now used by them, [the Jews,] wherein they profoundly curse the Christians; desiring that God would smite them as he did the first born of Egypt. And though this direful prayer is not found in the Liturgy printed at Venice, yet I am assured by a good author, that it is extant in the Machsor of the Cracovian impression.

L. Addison, State of the Jews, (1675,) p. 179.

The holy prophet predicts and foretells things so direful to God's people.

Bp. Bull's Works, ii. 716.

The voice of God himself speaks in the heart of men, whether they understand it or no; and by secret intimations gives the sinner a foretaste of that direful cup, which he is like to drink more deeply of hereafter. South.

I curs'd the direful author of my woes:
'Twas told again, and thence my ruin rose. Dryd.

Achilles' wrath, to Greeks the direful spring
Of woes unnumber'd, heavenly goddess, sing. Pope.

DI'REFULNESS.* n. s. [from direful.] Dreadfulness; horrour.

The direfulness of this pestilence is more emphatically set forth in these few words, than in forty such odes as Sprat's on the plague at Athens.

Dr. Warton, Essay on Pope.

DIRE'MPTION.* n. s. [Lat. diremptio.] Separation. Cockeram.

This match is only capable of a late, but much wished repentance on the offender's part, and a just diremption on the part of the judges.

Bp. Hall, Cases of Consc.

DI'RENESS. n. s. [from dire.] Dismalness; horror; hideousness.

Direness, familiar to my slaught'rous thoughts,
Cannot once start me. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

DIRE'PTION.† n. s. [direptio, Latin.] The act of plundering.

This lord for some direptions being cast
Into close prison.

Heywood, Hier. of Angels, (1635,) p. 515.

Arrears which were due to him before the direption and depredation.

Bp. Ganden, Life of Bp. Brownrigg, p. 203.

DIRGE.† n. s. [This is not a contraction of the Latin dirige, in the popish hymn dirige gressus meos, as some pretend; but from the Teutonick dyrke, laudare, to praise and extol. Whence it is possible their dyrke, and our dirge, was a laudatory song to commemorate and applaud the dead. Cowel. Bacon apparently derives it from dirige. Serenius deduces it from the Goth. dyr, dear. But see DIRIGE.] A mournful ditty; a song of lamentation.

Th' imperial jointress of this warlike state,
Have we, as 'twere, with a defeated joy,
With mirth in funeral, and with dirge in marriage,
In equal scale weighing delight and dole,
Taken to wife. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

Mean while the body of Richard, after many indignities and reproaches, the diriges and obsequies of the common people towards tyrants, was obscurely buried. Bacon.

You from above shall hear each day,
One dirge dispatch'd unto your clay,
These your own anthems shall become,
Your lasting epicedium. Sandys.

All due measures of her mourning kept,
Did office at the dirge, and by infection wept.

Dryden.

DI'RIGE.* n. s. Whether from the first word of the Latin hymn, "dirige gressus meos," or not; certain it is, that this is our old word; notwithstanding the remark of Cowel, which Dr. Johnson assigns to Vestegan, under DIRGE. It is dyryge in the very old vocabulary, Vulg. Hormanni. Chaucer, Bale, and Bacon, and the compilers of our Homilies, write this funeral expression, dirige.

DI'RIGENT. adj. [dirigens, Lat.] The dirigent line in geometry is that along which the line describent is carried in the generation of any figure. Harris.

DIRK. n. s. [an Erse word.] A kind of dagger used in the Highlands of Scotland.

In vain thy hungry mountaineers
Come forth in all their warlike geers,
The shield, the pistol, dirk, and dagger,
In which they daily wont to swagger. Tickel.

To DIRKE.] v. a. To spoil; to ruin. Obsolete, Dr. Johnson says. In truth, it never was used in this sense; and in the passage, which he cites from Spenser, it means to darken, to obscure; in imitation of Chaucer, who uses dercked for darkened, in his translation of Boethius.

Thy waste bigness but cumbers the ground,
And dirkes the beauties of my blossoms round.

Spenser, Shep. Cal. Feb.

DIRK.* adj. The old northern word for dark.

Day that was is wightly past,
And now at earst the dirke night doe haste.

Spenser, Shep. Cal. Sept.

To DIRL.* v. n. To move round quickly. A northern word. Craven Dial. and Brockett. [Sax. ðiplian. See To THIRL.]

DIRT.† n. s. [dryt, Dutch; Icel. drit; Goth. dirt. The Icelandick word means excrement; in which sense our word is used, though unnoticed by Dr. Johnson, long before the application of it in those examples which he has given to mud.]

1. Excrement.

The fat closed upon the blade, so that he could not draw the dagger out of his belly; and the dirt came out [in the margin, came out at the fundament.] Judges, iii. 22.

2. Mud; filth; mire; any thing that sticks to the clothes or body.

They gilding dirt in noble verse
Rustick philosophy rehearse. Denham.

Numbers engage their lives and labours, to heap together a little dirt, that shall bury them in the end. Wake.

The sea rises as high as ever, though the great heaps of dirt it brings along with it are apt to choak up the shallows. Addison.

Mark by what wretched steps their glory grows;
From dirt and sea-weed as proud Venice rose,
In each how guilt and greatness equal ran,
And all that rais'd the hero sunk the man. Pope.

Is yellow dirt the passion of thy life?
Look but on Gripus, or on Gripus' wife. Pope.

3. Meanness; sordidness.

To DIRT. v. a. [from the noun.] To foul; to bemire; to make filthy; to bedaub; to soil; to pollute; to nasty.

Ill company is like a dog, who dirts those most whom he loves best. Swift.

DIRT-PIE. n. s. [dirt and pie.] Forms moulded by children of clay, in imitation of pastry.

Thou set'st thy heart upon that which has newly left off making of dirt-pies, and is but preparing itself for a green-sickness. Suckling.

DI'RTILY.† adv. [from dirty.]

1. Nastily; foully; filthily.

Take care not to eat awkwardly or dirtily. Ld. Chesterfield.

2. Meanly; sordidly; shamefully.

Such gold as that wherewithal
Chimiques from each mineral
Are dirtily and desperately gull'd. Donne.

DI'RTINESS. n. s. [from dirty.]

1. Nastiness; filthiness; foulness.
2. Meanness; baseness; sordidness.

DI'RTY. adj. [from dirt.]

1. Foul; nasty; filthy.

Thy Dol and Helen of thy noble thoughts
Is in base durance, and contagious prison,
Haul'd thither by mechanic, dirty hands. Shaksp.

2. Sullied; clouded; not elegant.

Pound an almond, and the clear white colour will be altered into a dirty one, and the sweet taste into an oily one. Locke.

3. Mean; base; despicable.

Such employments are the diseases of labour, and the rust of time which it contracts not by lying still, but by dirty employment. Bp. Taylor, Holy Lying.

Marriages would be made up upon more natural motives than mere dirty interests, and increase of riches without measure or end. Temple.

They come at length to grow sots and epicures, mean in their discourses, and dirty in their practices. South.

To DI'RTY. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To foul; to soil.

The lords Strutts lived generously, and never used to dirty their fingers with pen, ink, and counters. Arbuthnot.

2. To disgrace; to scandalize.

DI'RUPTION. n s. [diruptio, Lat.]

1. The act of bursting or breaking.
2. The state of bursting, or breaking.

DIS. An inseparable particle used in composition, implying commonly a privative or negative signification of the word to which it is joined; as to arm, to disarm; to join, to disjoin. It is borrowed from des, used by the French and Spaniards in the same sense; as desnouer, to unite; desterrar, to banish; from the Latin de; as struo, to build; destruo, to destroy.

DISABI'LITY. n. s. [from disable.]

1. Want of power to do any thing; weakness; impotence.

Our consideration of creatures, and attention unto scriptures, are not in themselves things of like disability to breed or beget faith. Hooker.

Many withdrew themselves out of pure faintness, and disability to attend the conclusion. Ralegh.

He that knows most of himself, knows least of his knowledge, and the exercised understanding is conscious of its disability. Glanville.

The ability of mankind does not lie in the impotency or disabilities of brutes. Locke.

2. Want of proper qualifications for any purpose; legal impediment.

A suit is commenced in a temporal court for an inheritance, and the defendant pleads in disability, that the plaintiff is a bastard. Ayliffe's Parergon.

This disadvantage which the dissenters at present lie under, of a disability to receive church preferments, will be easily remedied by the repeal of the test. Swift.

To DISA'BLE. v. a. [dis and able.]

1. To deprive of force; to weaken; to disqualify for any act.

The invasion and rebellion did not only disable this king to be a conqueror, but deprived him both of his kingdom and life. Davies on Ireland.

Nor so is overcome
Satan, whose fall from heav'n, a deadlier bruise
Disabled not to give thee thy death's wound. Milton.

A Christian's life is a perpetual exercise, a wrestling and warfare, for which sensual pleasure disables him, by yielding to that enemy with whom he must strive. Bp. Taylor, Holy Living.

2. To hinder from action: used of things.

I have known a great fleet disabled for two months, and thereby lose great occasions by an indisposition of the admiral. Temple.

3. To impair; to diminish.

I have disabled mine estate,
By shewing something a more swelling port
Than my faint means would grant continuance. Shakspeare.

4. To deprive of usefulness or efficacy.

Farewel, Mousieur Traveller; look you lisp, and wear strange suits; disable all the benefits of your own country. Shakspeare.

Your days I will alarm, I'll haunt your nights,
And worse than age disable your delights. Dryden.

5. To exclude as wanting proper qualifications.

I will not disable any for proving a scholar, nor yet dissemble that I have seen many happily forced upon the course, to which by nature they seemed much indisposed. Wotton.

DISA'BLEMENT.* n. s. [from To disable.]

1. Legal impediment.

The penalty of the refusal thereof was turned into a disablement to take any promotion, or to exercise any charge. Bacon, Observ. on a Libel in 1592.

2. Weakness.

This is only an interruption of the acts, rather than any disablement of the [intellectual judging] faculty; which, as soon as the present passion is over, comes to debate and judge of all objects presented to it, as perfectly as it did before. South, Serm. v. 182.

To DISABU'SE.† v. a. [old Fr. disabuser, "to disabuse;" Cotgrave.] To set free from a mistake; to disentangle from a fallacy; to set right; to undeceive.

That last trump when it begins to sound, will have the faculty thus to make all men wise, to disabuse, and inspire the whole world with a new sense. Hammond, Serm. viii.

The imposture and fallacy of our senses impose not only on common heads, but even more refined mercuries, who have the advantages of an improved reason to disabuse you. Glanville, Scepsis.

Those teeth fair Lyce must not show,
If she would bite her lovers: though
Like birds they stoop at seeming grapes,
Are disabus'd, when first she gapes. Waller.

If by simplicity you meant a general defect in those that profess angling, I hope to disabuse you. Walton's Angler.

Chaos of thought and passion, all confus'd;
Still by himself abus'd, or disabus'd. Pope.

To DISACCO'MMODATE.* v. a. [old Fr. desaccommoder, "to disaccommodate;" Cotgrave.] To put to inconvenience.

I hope this will not disaccommodate you. Warburton to Hurd, Lett. 192.

DISACCOMMODA'TION. n. s. [dis and accommodation.] The state of being unfit or unprepared.

Devastations have happened in some places more than in others, according to the accommodation or disaccommodation of them to such calamities. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

To DISACCO'RD.* v. n. [old Fr. desaccorder.] To refuse consent.

She was daughter to a noble lord
Which dwelt thereby, who sought her to affy
To a great peer; but she did disaccord,
Ne could her liking to his love apply. Spenser, F. Q. vi. iii. 7.

To DISACCU'STOM. v. a. [dis and accustom.] To destroy the force of habit by disuse or contrary practice.

To DISACKNO'WLEDGE. v. a. [dis and acknowledge.] Not to acknowledge.

The manner of denying Christ's deity, here prohibited, was by words and oral expressions verbally to deny and disacknowledge it. South.

To DISACQUA'INT.* v. a. [old Fr. desaccointer.] To break or dissolve acquaintaince. Cotgrave, and Sherwood.

DISACQUA'INTANCE. n. s. [dis and acquaintance.] Disuse of familiarity.

Conscience, by a long neglect of, and disacquaintance with itself, contracts an inveterate rust or soil. South.

To DISADO'RN.* v. a. [dis and adorn.] To deprive of ornament or beauty.

He saw grey hairs begin to spread,
Deform his beard, and disadorn his head. Congreve, Transl. of Homer's Hymn to Venus.

To DISADVA'NCE.* v. a. [old Fr. desavancer, "to hinder, to cast backward;" Cotgrave. Spenser writes this word also disavance.] To stop; to check.

Which th' other seeing gan his course relent,
And vaunted spear eftsoons to disadvance. Spenser, F. Q. iv. iv. 7.

To DISADVA'NCE.* v. n. To keep back; to halt. In the following example, the modern editor of Fletcher's fine poem has unwarrantably converted disadvance into "cease t' advance."

For when they saw their Lord's bright cognizance
Shine in his face, soon did they disadvance,
And some unto him kneel, and some about him dance. G. Fletcher, Christ's Triumph, P. ii.

DISADVA'NTAGE.† n. s. [old Fr. desavantage.]

1. Loss; injury to interest: as, he sold to disadvantage.

Truth, unseasonably and unmannerly proposed, comes with a disadvantage; and is in danger to miscarry through the unskilfulness of the proposer. South, Serm. vii. 146.

2. Diminution of any thing desirable, as credit, fame, honour.

Chaucer, in many things resembled Ovid, and that with no disadvantage on the side of the modern author. Dryden.

The most shining merit goes down to posterity with disadvantage, when it is not placed by writers in its proper light. Addison, Freeholder.

Those parts already published give reason to think, that the Iliad will appear with no disadvantage to that immortal poem. Addison, Freeholder.

Their testimony will not be of much weight to its disadvantage, since they are liable to the common objection of condemning what they did not understand. Swift.

3. A state not prepared for defence.

No fort can be so strong,
Ne fleshly breast can armed be so sound,
But will at last be won with batt'ry long,
Or unawares at disadvantage found. Spenser, F. Q.

To DISADVA'NTAGE. v. a. [from the noun.] To injure in interest of any kind.

All other violences are so far from advancing Christianity, that they extremely weaken and disadvantage it. Decay of Piety.

DISADVA'NTAGEABLE. adj. [from disadvantage. Contrary to profit; producing loss. A word not used.

In clearing of a man's estate, he may as well hurt himself in being too sudden, as in letting it run on too long; for hasty selling is commonly as disadvantageable as interest. Bacon, Ess. of Expence.

DISADVANTA'GEOUS. adj. [from disadvantage.] Contrary to interest; contrary to convenience; unfavourable.

A multitude of eyes will narrowly inspect every part of an eminent man, consider him nicely in all views, and not be a little pleased when they have taken him in the worst and most disadvantageous lights. Addison, Spectator.

DISADVANTA'GEOUSLY. adj. [from disadvantageous.] In a manner contrary to interest or profit; in a manner not favourable.

An approving nod or smile serves to drive you on, and make you display yourselves more disadvantageously. Government of the Tongue.

DISADVANTA'GEOUSNESS.† n. s. [from disadvantageous.] Contrariety to profit; inconvenience; mischief; loss.

This disadvantageousness of figure he [Pope] converted, as Lord Bacon expresses it, into a perpetual spur to rescue and deliver himself from scorn, and to watch the weakness of others, that he might have something to repay them. Tyers, Hist. Rhaps. on Pope, p. 5.

DISADVE'NTURE.* n. s. [old Fr. desadventure, Cotgrave; Span. desventura; Ital. disavventura. Chaucer and Spenser write this word disaventure.] Misfortune.

Experience hath oft proved, that man in best fortune, and such as esteem themselves most secure, even then fall soonest into disadventure. Ralegh, Arts of Empire, p. 176.

DISADVE'NTUROUS.† adj. [old Fr. disaventureux. Spenser writes it disaventurous in the following example; though Dr. Johnson has printed it disadventurous.] Unhappy; unprosperous.

Now he hath left you here,
To be the record of his rueful loss,
And of my doleful disaventurous deare.
Spenser, F. Q. i. vi. 48.

To DISAFFE'CT.† v. a. [dis and affect.]

1. To fill with discontent; to discontent; to make less faithful or zealous.

They had attempted to disaffect and discontent his majesty's late army. Clarendon.

2. To dislike; to disdain.

Not that any force is allowed either way, to be used towards the daughter; whether to continue her in a constrained virginity, or to cast her against her mind upon a disaffected match. Bp. Hall, Cases of Conscience.

Making plain that truth, which my charity persuades me the most part of them disaffect, only because it hath not been well represented to them. Chillingworth, Rel. of Prot. Dedic.

3. To disorder.

If the more classical notion of the word take place, it disaffects the bowels, entangles and distorts the entrails. Hammond, Serm. xxiii.

DISAFFE'CTED. part. adj. [from disaffect.] Not disposed to zeal or affection. Usually applied to those who are enemies to the government.

By denying civil worship to the emperor's statues, which the custom then was to give, they were proceeded against as disaffected to the emperor. Stillingfleet.

DISAFFE'CTEDLY. adv. [from disaffected.] After a disaffected manner.

DISAFFE'CTEDNESS. n. s. [from disaffected.] The quality of being disaffected.

DISAFFE'CTION. n. s. [from disaffect.]

1. Dislike; ill-will.

In making laws, princes must have regard to the public dispositions, to the affections and disaffections of the people, and must not introduce a law with publick scandal and displeasure. Bp. Taylor, Holy Living.

2. Want of zeal for the government; want of ardour for the reigning prince.

In this age, every thing disliked by those who think with the majority, is called disaffection. Swift.

3. Disorder; bad constitution: in a physical sense.

The disease took its original merely from the disaffection of the part, and not from the peccancy of the humours. Wiseman.

DISAFFE'CTIONATE.* adj. [dis and affectionate.] Not disposed to affection or zeal.

They, according to that climate, were found damnably corrupt, and disaffectionate to the Turkish affairs.

Blount, Voyage into the Levant, (1650,) p. 99.

He [Milton] had been tormented by a beautiful but disaffectionate and disobedient wife. Hayley, Life of Milton.

To DISAFFI'RM.* v. a. [dis and affirm.] To contradict.

Neither doth Glanvil or Bracton disaffirm the antiquity of the reports of the law. Davies, Preface to Reports.

DISAFFI'RMANCE. n. s. [dis and affirm.] Confutation; negation.

That kind of reasoning which reduceth the opposite conclusion to something that is apparently absurd, is a demonstration in disaffirmance of any thing that is affirmed. Hale.

To DISAFFO'REST. v. a. [dis and forest.] To throw open to common purposes; to reduce from the privileges of a forest to the state of common ground.

The commissioners of the treasury moved the king to disafforest some forests of his, explaining themselves of such forests as lay out of the way, not near any of the king's houses. Bacon.

How happy's he, which hath due place assign'd
To his beasts; and disafforested his mind? Donne.

To DISAGREE'. v. n. [dis and agree.]

1. To differ; not to be the same.

The mind clearly and infallibly perceives all distinct ideas to disagree; that is, the one not to be the other. Locke.

2. To differ; not to be of the same opinion.

Why both the bands in worship disagree,
And some adore the flow'r, and some the tree.
Dryden.

3. To be in a state of opposition: followed by from or with, before the opposite.

It containeth many improprieties, disagreeing almost in all things from the true and proper description. Brown.

Strange it is, that they reject the plainest sense of scripture, because it seems to disagree with what they call reason. Atterbury.

DISAGREE'ABLE. adj. [from disagree.]

1. Contrary; unsuitable.

Some demon, an enemy to the Greeks, had forced her to a conduct disagreeable to her sincerity. Broome.

2. Unpleasing; offensive.

To make the sense of esteem or disgrace sink the deeper, and be of the more weight, either agreeable or disagreeable things should constantly accompany these different states. Locke.

DISAGREE'ABLENESS. n. s. [from disagreeable.]

1. Unsuitableness; contrariety.
2. Unpleasantness; offensiveness.

A father will hug and embrace his beloved son for all the dirt and foulness of his cloaths; the dearness of the person easily apologizing for the disagreeableness of the habit. South.

DISAGREE'ABLY.* adv. [from disagreeable.]

1. Unsuitably.
2. Unpleasantly.

It is a frequent complaint that tar water is made of bad tar, being of a reddish colour, sweetish or disagreeably insipid. Bp. Berkeley.

For me, I passed the end of May and all June in Kent, not disagreeably. Gray, Letters.

DISAGREE'MENT. n. s. [from disagree.]

1. Difference; dissimilitude; diversity; not identity; not likeness.

These carry such plain and evident notes and characters, either of disagreement or affinity with one another, that the several kinds of them are easily distinguished. Woodward.

2. Difference of opinion; contrariety of sentiments.

They seemed one to cross another, as touching their several opinions about the necessity of sacraments, whereas in truth their disagreement is not great. Hooker.

To DISALLI'EGE.* v. a. [dis and liege. I have found this expressive word only in Milton, by whom it was probably coined.] To alienate from allegiance.

What greater dividing than, by a pernicious and hostile peace, to disalliege a whole feudary kingdom from the ancient dominion of England?

Milton, Obser. on the Art. of Peace betw. E. of Orm. and the Irish.

To DISALLO'W. v. a. [dis and allow.]

1. To deny authority to any.

When, said she,
Were those first councils disallow'd by me?
Or where did I at sure tradition strike,
Provided still it were apostolick.
Dryden, Hind and Panther.

2. To consider as unlawful; not to permit.

Their usual kind of disputing sheweth, that they do not disallow only these Romish ceremonies which are unprofitable, but count all unprofitable which are Romish. Hooker.

3. To censure by some posterior act.

It was known that the most eminent of those who professed his own principles, publickly disallowed his proceedings. Swift.

4. To censure; not to justify.

There is a secret, inward foreboding fear, that some evil or other will follow the doing of that which a man's own conscience disallows him in. South.

To DISALLO'W. v. n. To refuse permission; not to grant; not to make or suppose lawful.

God doth in converts, being married, allow continuance with infidels, and yet disallow that the faithful, when they are free, should enter into bonds of wedlock with such. Hooker.

DISALLO'WABLE.† adj. [from disallow.] Not allowable; not to be suffered.

Neutrality is always a thing dangerous and disallowable, because it offendeth all parties. Ralegh, Arts of Empire, p. 126.

DISALLO'WANCE.† n. s. [from disallow.] Prohibition.

Nothing is more ordinary, or less obnoxious to disallowance. Bp. Hall, Cases of Conscience.

God accepts of a thing suitable for him to receive, and for us to give, where he does not declare his refusal and disallowance of it. South.

To DISALLY'.* v. a. [dis and ally.] To sunder; to disjoin; to dissolve.

If any of these, or all, the Timnian bride
Had not so soon preferr'd
Thy paranymph, worthless to thee compar'd,
Successor in thy bed;
Nor both so loosely disallied
Their nuptials. Milton, S. A.

To DISA'NCHOR.† v. a. [old Fr. desancrer, "to weigh anchor and be gone," Cotgrave.] To drive a ship from its anchor.

DISANGE'LICAL.* adj. [dis and angelical.] Not angelical; not suiting the nature or dignity of angels.

You are not then of the opinion of that learned casuist, returned I, who accounts for the shame attending these pleasures of the sixth sense, as he is pleased to call them, from their disangelical nature. Coventry, Phil. to Hyd. Conv. 2.

To DISA'NIMATE.† v. a. [old Fr. desanimer.]

1. To deprive of life.
2. To discourage; to deject; to depress.

The presence of a king engenders love amongst his subjects, and his loyal friends, as it disanimates his enemies. Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

He was confounded and disanimated at his presence, and added, How can the servant of my lord talk with my lord? Boyle, Seraphick Love.

DISANIMA'TION. n. s. [from disanimate.] Privation of life.

They cannot in reason retain that apprehension after death, as being affections which depend on life, and depart upon disanimation. Brown, Vulg. Err.

To DISANNU'L. v. a. [dis and annul. This word is formed contrarily to analogy, by those who, not knowing the meaning of the word annul, intended to form a negative sense by the needless use of the negative particle. It ought therefore to be rejected as ungrammatical and barbarous.] To annul; to deprive of authority; to vacate; to make null; to make void; to nullify.

The Jews ordinances for us to resume, were to check our Lord himself, which hath disannulled them. Hooker.

That gave him power of disannulling of laws, and disposing of men's fortunes and estates, and the like points of absolute power; being in themselves harsh and odious. Bacon.

To be in both worlds full,
Is more than God was, who was hungry here:
Wouldst thou his laws of fasting disannul?
Herbert.

Wilt thou my judgements disannul? Defame
My equal rule, to clear thyself of blame? Sandys.

DISANU'LLER.* n. s. [from disannul.] One who makes null, or puts down; one who deprives.

Another, to her everlasting fame, erected
Two ale-houses of ease; the quarter-sessions
Running against her roundly; in which business
Two of the disannullers lost their night-caps.
Beaum. and Fl. Tamer Tamed.

DISANNU'LLING.* n. s. [from disannul.] The act of making void.

There is verily a disannulling of the commandment going before, for the weakness and unprofitableness thereof. Heb. vii. 18.

DISANNU'LMENT.† n. s. [from disannul.] The act of making void.

The disannulment of this lustre amazed him as much, as the presentation thereof made him admire. Lord's Hist. of the Banians, 1630, p. 19.

To DISANO'INT.* v. a. [dis and anoint.] To invalidate consecration by unction.

After they have juggled and paltered with the world, bandied and borne arms against their king, divested him, disanointed him, nay cursed him all over in their pulpits, and their pamphlets, to the engaging of sincere and real men beyond what is possible or honest to retreat from, not only turn revolters from those principles, which only could at first move them, but lay the stain of disloyalty, and worse, on those proceedings, which are the necessary consequences of their own former actions. Milton, Ten. of Kings and Magistrates.

To DISAPPA'REL.* v. a. [old Fr. desapareiller.] To disrobe.

Drink disapparels the soul, and is the betrayer of the mind. Junius, Sin Stigmatized, (1635,) p. 82.

To DISAPPE'AR. v. n. [disparoitre, Fr.] To be lost to view; to vanish out of sight; to fly; to go away.

She disappear'd, and left me dark! I wak'd
To find her, or for ever to deplore. Milton, P. L.

When the night and winter disappear,
The purple morning rising with the year,
Salutes the Spring. Dryden.

The pictures drawn in our minds are laid in fading colours, and, if not sometimes refreshed, vanish and disappear. Locke.

Criticks I saw, that others' names deface,
And fix their own with labour in their place;
Their own, like other, soon their place resign'd,
Or disappear'd, and left the first behind. Pope.

DISAPPE'ARANCE.* n. s. [from disappear.] An end of appearance.

If we look into the bulk of our species, they are such as are not likely to be remembered a moment after their disappearance. Addison, Spect. No. 317.

DISAPPE'ARING.* n. s. Cessation of appearance.

Ninus, we may imagine, thought to provide a remedy against the frequent absences and disappearings of the heavenly bodies, by appointing a medium of adoration to them which might be always at hand. Coventry, Phil. to Hyd. Conv. 3.

To DISAPPO'INT.† v. a. [old Fr. disappointer.]

1. To defeat of expectation; to balk; to hinder from something expected.

The superior Being can defeat all his designs, and disappoint all his hopes. Tillotson.

Whilst the champion, with redoubled might,
Strikes home the jav'lin, his retiring foe
Shrinks from the wound, and disappoints the blow.
Addison.

There's nothing like surprising the rogues: how will they be disappointed, when they hear that thou hast prevented their revenge?
Arbuthnot, Hist. of John Bull.

We are not only tortured by the reproaches which are offered us, but are disappointed by the silence of men when it is unexpected, and humbled even by their praises. Addison.

2. It has of before the thing lost by disappointment.

The Janizaries, disappointed by the bassas of the spoil, received of the bounty of Solyman a great largess. Knolles.

3. To deprive, or bereave of any thing. Cotgrave, under the old French verb, gives "to deprive of authority," as one of the explanations. In the following passage, the speaker is deprived of the appointments or preparations for death, as confession, absolution, &c. See the 4th sense of To APPO'INT.

Thus was I ——————
Cut off even in the blossoms of my sin,
Unhousel'd, disappointed, unanel'd. Shaks. Hamlet.

DISAPPO'INTMENT. n. s. [from disappoint.] Defeat of hopes; miscarriage of expectations.

It is impossible for us to know what are calamities, and what are blessings: how many accidents have passed for misfortunes, which have turned to the welfare and prosperity of the persons in whose lot they have fallen? How many disappointments have, in their consequences, saved a man from ruin? Spectator.

If we hope for things, of which we have not thoroughly considered the value, our disappointment will be greater than our pleasure in the fruition of them. Addison, Spectator.

DISAPPROBA'TION. n. s. [dis and approbation.] Censure; condemnation; expression of dislike.

He was obliged to publish his letters, to shew his disapprobation of the publishing of others. Pope.

DISAPPRO'VAL.* n. s. [from disapprove.] A word, like approval, not common; but which has been used, I think, in modern times, for disapprobation.

To DISAPPRO'VE. v. a. [disapprover, French.]

1. To dislike; to censure.

I reason'd much, alas! but more I lov'd;
Sent and recall'd, ordain'd and disapprov'd. Prior.

Without good breeding, truth is disapprov'd;
That only makes superior sense belov'd. Pope.

2. To reject as disliked; not to confirm by concurrence.

A project for a treaty of barrier with the States was transmitted hither from Holland, and was disapproved of by our courts. Swift.

DI'SARD.† n. s. [ðýrı ðýrıȝ, Sax. a fool, Skinner; diseur, Fr. Junius.] A prattler; a boasting talker. This word is inserted both by Skinner and Junius; but I do not remember it, Dr. Johnson says. The word, however, is frequent in Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy, and occurs in the Homilies of our Church. It is usually written dizard.

Shall I be such an ideot, and dizard, to suffer every man to speak upon me what they list?
Homilies, B. 1. Against Contention.

This progress of melancholy you shall easily observe in them that have been so affected; they go smiling to themselves at first, at length they laugh out; at first solitary; at last they can endure no company; or if they do, they are now dizards, past sense and shame.
Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 196.

How like a dizard, a fool, an ass, he looks; how like a clown he behaves!
Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 608.

To DISA'RM. v. a. [disarmer, Fr.]

1. To spoil or divest of arms; to deprive of arms.

An order was made by both houses for disarming all the Papists in England. Clarendon.

I am still the same,
By different ways still moving to one fame;
And by disarming you, I now do more
To save the town, than arming you before.
Dryden.

2. It has of before the arms taken away.
They would be immediately disarmed of their great magazine of artillery. Locke.

DISA'RMER.* n. s. [from disarm.] One who deprives another of arms.
It is not imaginable how so much learning and abilities, as this disarmer is believed to have, should admit so great a mixture of rudeness and scurrility. Hammond's Works, ii. 62.

DISA'RMING.* n. s. [from disarm.] Deprivation of arms.
All the scoffings, and revilings, which were thought necessary by S. W. for the disarming of schism. Hammond's Works, ii. 63.

To DISARRA'NGE.* v. a. [old Fr. desarrenger, "to unrank, disorder, disarray;" Cotgrave.] To unsettle. This word is of no great age in our language; but I conceive it to be of earlier usage than in the example of T. Warton which has been remarked to me.
This circumstance disarranges all our established ideas. Warton.

DISARRA'NGEMENT.* n. s. [old Fr. desarrengement.] Disorder; confusion.
How, I pray, is it possible that the mere disarrangement of the parts of matter should perform this; when it hath been shewn absolutely impossible, that any arrangement of them should perform such an effect?
A. Baxter on the Soul, (1737,) ii. 137.
Her glitt'ring turrets rise, upbearing high,
(Fantastick disarrangement) on the roof
Large growth of what may seem the sparkling trees. Cowper, Task, B. v.

To DISARRA'Y.† v. a. [old Fr. desarroyer.]
1. To undress any one; to divest of clothes.
So, as she bad, the witch they disarray'd.
Spenser, F. Q.
Now night is come, now soon her disarray,
And in her bed her lay. Spenser, Epithal.
2. To discomfit; to rout; to overthrow. [old Fr. desarroyer.]
O'er the necks
Thou drov'st of warring Angels disarray'd.
Milton, P. L.

DISARRA'Y.† n. s.
1. Disorder; confusion; loss of the regular order of battle. [old Fr. dessaroy.]
He returned towards the river, to prevent such danger as the disarray, occasioned by the narrowness of the bridge, might cast upon them.
Hayward.
Disarray and shameful route ensue,
And force is added to the fainting crew.
Dryden, Fables.
2. Undress. [from dis and array.]
And him behind a wicked hag did stalk,
In ragged robes, and filthy disarray.
Spenser, F. Q. ii. iv. 4.

DISASSIDU'ITY.† n. s. Absence of care or attention.
The Cecilians kept him back; as very well knowing that, upon every little absence or disassiduity, he should be subject to take cold at his back.
Wotton, Parall. E. of Ess. and D. of Buck.
He came in, and went out; and, through disassiduity, drew the curtain between himself and the light of her grace. Sir R. Naunton, Fragm. Regalia.

To DISASSO'CIATE.* v. a. [old Fr. desassocier, "to disassociate, break company, or separate friends;" Cotgrave.] To disunite. See To DISSOCIATE.
As if our mind had not other hours enough to do her business, without disassociating herself from the body in that little space which she needeth for her necessity. Florio's Transl. of Montaigne's Ess. (1613,) p. 630.

DISA'STER. n. s. [desastre, Fr.]
1. The blast or stroke of an unfavourable planet.
Stars shone with trains of fire, dews of blood fall;
Disasters veil'd the sun; and the moist star,
Upon whose influence Neptune's empire stands,
Was sick almost to doomsday with eclipse. Shaks.
2. Misfortune; grief; mishap; misery; calamity.
This day black omens threat the brightest fair,
That e'er deserv'd a watchful spirit's care,
Some dire disaster, or by force or slight;
But what, or where, the fates have wrapt in night.
Pope.

To DISA'STER. v. a. [from the noun.]
1. To blast by the stroke of an unfavourable star.
Ah, chaste bed of mine, said she, which never heretofore couldst accuse me of one defiled thought, how canst thou now receive that disastered changling? Sidney.
2. To afflict; to mischief.
These are the holes where eyes should be, which pitifully disaster the cheeks. Shakspeare.
In his own fields, the swain
Disaster'd stands. Thomson.

DISA'STROUS. adj. [from disaster.]
1. Unlucky; not fortunate.
That seemeth a most diastrous day to the Scots, not only in regard of this overthrow, but for that upon the same day they were defeated by the English at Floodenfield. Hayward.
2. Gloomy; threatening misfortune.
The moon,
In dim eclipse, disastrous twilight sheds
On half the nations. Milton, P. L.
3. Unhappy; calamitous; miserable; struck with affliction.
Then Juno, pitying her disastrous fate,
Sends Iris down, her pangs to mitigate. Denham.
Immediately after his return from this very expedition, such disastrous calamities befel his family, that he burnt two of his children himself. South.
Fly the pursuit of my diastrous love,
From my unhapppy neighbourhood remove.
Dryden.

DISA'STROUSLY.† adv. [from disastrous.] In a dismal manner.
There were never poor Christians perished more lamentably than those 6000 we sent under M. Hamilton for the assistance of the K. of Sweden, who did much, but you know what became of him at last; how disastrously the Prince Palatine himself fell, and in what an ill conjecture of time, being upon the very point of being restored to his country. Howell, Lett. i. vi. 29.

DISA'STROUSNESS. n. s. [from disastrous.] Unluckiness; unfortunateness. Dict.

To DISAVOU'CH. v. a. [dis and avouch.] To retract profession; to disown.
Thereupon they flatly disavouch,
To yield him more obedience or support. Daniel.

To DISAVO'W.† v. a. [old Fr. desavoüer.] To disown; to deny knowledge of; to deny concurrence in any thing, or with any person.
The heirs and posterity of them which yielded the same, are either ignorant thereof, or do wilfully deny, or stedfastly disavow it.
Spenser, State of Ireland.
The English did believe his name was therein abused, which he manifested to be true by disavowing it openly afterwards. Hayward.
To deal in person is good, when a man's face breedeth regard, and generally when a man will reserve to himself liberty either to disavow or to expound. Bacon.
A man that acts below his rank, doth but disavow fortune, and seemeth to be conscious of his own want in worth, and doth but teach others to envy him. Bacon.
He only does his conquest disavow,
And thinks too little what they found too much.
Dryden.
We are reminded by the ceremony of taking an oath, that it is a part of that obedience which we learn from the gospel, expressly to disavow all evasions and mental reservations whatsoever.
Addison, Freeholder.

DISAVO'WAL. n. s. [from disavow.] Denial.
An earnest disavowal of fear, often proceeds from fear. Richardson, Clarissa.

DISAVO'WMENT. n. s. [from disavow.] Denial.
As touching the Tridentine history, his holiness will not press you to any disavowment thereof.
Wotton.

To DISAU'THORIZE.† v. a. [dis and authorize.] To deprive of credit or authority.
The obtrusion of such particular instances as these, are insufficient to disauthorize a note grounded upon the final intention of nature.
Wotton, Survey of Education.
Who ever heard that, to commend the fidelity of a keeper, were to disauthorize the thing committed to his custody? Char. maint. by Catholicks, (in Chillingworth's Rel. of Prot.) ch. 2.

To DISBA'ND.† v. a. [old Fr. desbander.]
1. To dismiss from military service; to break up an army; to dismiss soldiers from their colours.
They disbanded themselves, and returned every man to his own dwelling. Knolles, History.
Pythagoras bids us in our station stand,
Till God, our general, shall us disband. Denham.
I am content to lead a private life;
Disband my army to secure the state.
Dryden, Aurengzebe.
Bid him disband his legions. Addison, Cato.
2. To dismiss from service.
Some imagine that a quantity of water, sufficient to make such a deluge, was created upon that occasion; and when the business was done, all disbanded again, and annihilated. Woodward.

To DISBA'ND.† v. n.
1. To retire from military service; to separate; to break up.
Our navy was upon the point of disbanding, and many of our men come ashore.
Bacon, War with Spain.
The ranged pow'rs
Disband; and, wandering, each his several way
Pursues. Milton, P. L.
The common soldiers, and inferior officers, should be fully paid upon their disbanding.
Clarendon.
Were it not for some small remainders of piety and virtue, which are yet left scattered among mankind, human society would in a short space disband and run into confusion, and the earth would grow wild and become a forest. Tillotson.
2. To be dissolved.
When great prelates are living, their authority is depressed by their personal defaillances, and the contrary interests of their contemporaries; which disband, when they are dead, and leave their credit entire upon the reputation of those excellent books and monuments of learning and piety, which are left beind them. Bp. Taylor, Lib. of Prophesying.
While rocks stand
And rivers stir, thou canst not shrink or quail;
Yea, when both rocks and all things shall disband,
Then shalt thou be my rock and tower. Herbert.

To DISBA'RK.† v. a. [desbarquer, French.]
1. To land from a ship; to put on shore.

Together sail'd they, fraught with all the things
To service done by land that might belong,
And, when occasion serv'd disbarked them. Fairfax.

The ship we moor on these obscure abodes;
Disbark the sheep, an offering to the gods.
Pope, Odyssey.

2. To strip the bark from. [dis and bark of of a tree.]

Dr. Plot speaks of an elm growing near the bowling-green at Magdalen-college, quite round disbarked almost for a yard near the ground, which yet flourishes exceedingly. Evelyn, ii. vii. § 7.

The matter is heart of oak, disbarked quite from superfluity. Hacket's Life of Abp. Williams, p. 186.

DISBELI'EF. n. s. [from disbelieve.] Refusal of credit; denial of belief.

Our belief or disbelief of a thing does not alter the nature of the thing. Tillotson.

To DISBELI'EVE. v. a. [dis and believe.] Not to credit; not to hold true.

The thinking it impossible his sins should be forgiven, though he should be truly penitent, is a sin, but rather of infidelity than despair; it being the disbelieving of an eternal truth of God's.
Hammond, Pract. Catech.

Such, who profess to disbelieve a future state, are not always equally satisfied with their own reasonings. Atterbury.

From a fondness to some vices, which the doctrine of futurity rendered uneasy, they brought themselves to doubt of religion; or, out of a vain affectation of seeing farther than other men, pretended to disbelieve it. Rogers.

DISBELI'EVER. n. s. [from disbelieve.] One who refuses belief; one who denies any position to be true.

An humble soul is frighted into sentiments, because a man of great name pronounces heresy upon the contrary sentiments, and casts the disbeliever out of the church. Watts.

To DISBE'NCH. v. a. [dis and bench.] To drive from a seat.

Sir, I hope
My words disbench'd you not?
—— No, sir; yet oft,
When blows have made me stay, I fled from words.
Shakspeare.

To DISBLA'ME.* v. a. [dis and blame.] To clear from blame or censure.

I pray you meekily
Disblameth me if any word be lame.
Chaucer, Tr. and Cress. ii. 17.

I was sent to him by his lordship to let him know more particularly the duke's displeasure, and back by the ambassador to the duke with his humble request but of one quarter of an hour's audience for his disblaming. Sir J. Finett, Obs. on For. Ambassadors, (1656,) p. 240.

DISBO'DIED.* adj. [dis and body.] Freed from the clogs and impediments of the the body.

They conceive that the disbodied souls shall return from their unactive and silent recess, and be joined again to bodies of purified and duly prepared air. Glanville, Pre-exist. of Souls, p. 143.

To DISBO'WEL.* v. a. [dis and bowel.] To eviscerate; to deprive of contents.

A great oak dry and dead ——
Whose foot in ground hath left but feeble hold,
But half disbowell'd lies above the ground.
Spenser, Ruins of Rome, st. 28.

To DISBRA'NCH. v. a. [dis and branch.] To separate or break off, as a branch from a tree.

She that herself will sliver and disbranch
From her maternal sap, perforce must wither,
And come to deadly use. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

Such as are newly planted, need not be disbranched till the sap begins to stir, that so the wound may be healed without the scar.
Evelyn's Kalendar.

To DISBU'D. v. a. [With gardeners.] To take away the branches or sprigs newly put forth, that are ill placed. Dict.

To DISBU'RDEN. v. a. [dis and burden.]

2. To disencumber, discharge, or clear.

They removed either by casualty and tempest, or by intention and design, either out of lucre of gold, or for the disburdening of the countries, surcharged with multitudes of inhabitants.
Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

We shall disburden the piece of those hard shadowings, which are always ungraceful.
Dryden, Dufresnoy.

3. To throw off a burden.

Better yet do I live, that though by my thoughts
I be plunged
Into my life's bondage, I yet may disburden a passion. Sidney.

Lucia, disburden all thy cares on me,
And let me share thy most retired distress.
Addison, Cato.

To DISBU'RDEN.† v. n. To ease the mind.

Adam ——
—— in a troubled sea of passion tost,
Thus to disburden sought with sad complaint.
Milton, P. L.

To DISBU'RSE v. a. [debourser, French]. To spend or lay out money.

Money is not disbursed at once, but drawn into a long length, by sending over now twenty thousand, and next half year ten thousand pounds.
Spenser.

Nor would we deign him burial for his men,
Till he disburs'd ten thousand dollars. Shakspeare.

As Alexander received great sums, he was no less generous and liberal in disbursing them.
Arbuthnot on Coins.

DISBU'RSEMENT. n. s. [deboursement, Fr.]

1. Act of disbursing or laying out.

The queen's treasure, in so great occasions of disbursements, is not always so ready, nor so plentiful, as it can spare so great a sum together.
Spenser on Ireland.

2. Sum spent.

DISBU'RSER. n. s. [from disburse.] One that disburses.

To DISCA'LCEATE.* v. a. [Lat. discalceo. Dr. Johnson has given discalceated upon his own authority; but the verb is two hundred years old in our lexicography.] To put off the shoes.
Cockeram.

DISCA'LCEATED. adj. [discalceatus, Latin.] Stripped of shoes.

DISCALCEA'TION.† n. s. [from discalceated.] The act of pulling off the shoes.

The custom of discalceation, or putting off their shoes at meals, is conceived to have been done, as by that means keeping their beds clean.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

Among the Jews, and other nations, of the Orient especially, that rite of discalceation, or putting off their shoes, [is] still used and continued amongst them unto this day, when they come into their temples and sacred places.
Mede, Reverence of God's House, (1638,) p. 37.

To DISCA'NDY. v. n. [from dis and candy.] To dissolve; to melt. Hanmer.

The hearts,
That spaniel'd me at heels, to whom I gave
Their wishes, do discandy, melt their sweets
On blossoming Cæsar. Shakspeare.

To DISCA'RD. v. a. [dis and card.]

1. To throw out of the hand such cards as are useless.

2. To dismiss or eject from service or employment.

These men being certainly jewels to a wise man, considering what wonders they were able to perform, yet were discarded by that unworthy prince, as not worthy the holding. Sidney.

Their captains, if they list, discard whom they please, and send away such as will perhaps willingly be rid of that dangerous and hard service.
Spenser on Ireland.

Should we own that we have a very imperfect idea of substance, would it not be hard to charge us with discarding substance out of the world.
Locke.

Justice discards party, friendship, kindred, and is always therefore represented as blind.
Addison, Guardian.

They blame the favourites, and think it nothing extraordinary that the queen should be at an end of her patience, and resolve to discard them. Swift.

I do not conceive why a sunk discarded party, who neither expect nor desire more than a quiet life, should be charged with endeavouring to introduce popery. Swift.

DISCA'RDURE.* n. s. [from discard.] Dismissal.

In what shape does it constitute a plea for the discardure of religion?
Hayter's Rem. on Hume's Dialog. 1780, p. 38.

DISCA'RNATE. adj. [dis and caro, flesh; scarnato, Ital.] Stripped of flesh.

'Tis better to own a judgement, though but with a curta suppellex of coherent notions, than a memory, like a sepulchre, furnished with a load of broken and discarnate bones. Glanville.

To DISCA'SE. v. a. [dis and case.] To strip; to undress.

Fetch me the hat and rapier in my cell,
I will discase me, and myself present.
Shakspeare, Tempest.

What doth better become wisdom than to discern what is worthy the loving? Sidney.

You should be rul'd and led
By some discretion that discerns your state
Better than you yourself. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

3. To distinguish.

To discern such buds as are fit to produce blossoms, from such as will display themselves but in leaves, is no difficult matter. Boyle.

4. To make the difference between.

They follow virtue for reward to-day;
To-morrow vice, if she give better pay:
We are so good, or bad, just at a price;
For nothing else discerns the virtue or vice.
B. Jonson.

To DISCE'RN. v. n.

1. To make distinction.

Great part of the country was abandoned to the spoils of the soldiers, who not troubling themselves to discern between a subject and a rebel, whilst their liberty lasted, made indifferently profit of both. Hayward.

The custom of arguing on any side, even against our persuasions, dims the understanding, and makes it by degrees lose the faculty of discerning between truth and falsehood. Locke.

2. To have judicial cognizance: not in use.

It discerneth of forces, frauds, crimes various of stellionate, and the inchoations towards crimes capital, not actually perpetrated. Bacon.

The matter being suppurated, I opened an inflamed tubercle in the great angle of the left eye, and discharged a well-concocted matter. Wiseman, Surgery.

To DISCHA'RGE. v. n. To dismiss itself; to break up.

The cloud, if it were oily or fatty, would not discharge. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

DISCHA'RGE. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. Vent; explosion; emission.

As the heat of all springs is owing to subterraneous fire, so wherever there are any extraordinary discharges of this fire, there also are the neighbouring springs hotter than ordinary. Woodward.

2. Matter vented.

The hæmorrhage being stopped, the next occurrence is a thin serous discharge. Sharp, Surgery.

3. Disruption; evanescence.

Mark the discharge of the little cloud upon glass or gems, or blades of swords, and you shall see it ever break up first in the skirts, and last in the middle. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

4. Dismission from an office; as, the governour solicited his discharge.

5. Release from an obligation or penalty.

He warns
Us, haply too secure of our discharge
From penalty, because from death releas'd
Some days. Milton, P. L.

6. Absolution from a crime.

The text expresses the sound estate of the conscience, not barely by its not accusing, but by its not condemning us; which word imports properly an acquittance or discharge of a man upon some precedent accusation, and a full trial and cognizance of his cause. South.

7. Ransom; price of ransom.

O, all my hopes defeated
To free him hence! But death, who sets all free,
Hath paid his ransom now and full discharge.
Milton, S. A.

The obligations of hospitality and protection are sacred; nothing can absolve us from the discharge of those duties. L'Estrange.

9. An acquittance from a debt.

10. Exemption; privilege.

There is no discharge in that war, neither shall wickedness deliver those that are given to it. Eccl. viii. 8.

DISCHA'RGER.† n. s. [from discharge.]

1. He that discharges in any manner.

Love, as it is the greatest treasure of our souls, so it is the only security stands bound to God for all our debts; all the other faculties of man seem to be receivers only, and this the discharger of all their accounts. W. Montagu, Devout Ess. iv. § 2.

2. He that fires a gun.

To abate the bombilation of gunpowder a way is promised by Porta, by borax and butter, which he says will make it so go off, as scarcely to be heard by the discharger. Brown.

To DISCHU'RCH.* v. a. [dis and church.] To deprive of the rank of a church.

This can be no ground to dischurch that differing company of Christians, neither are they other from themselves upon this diversity of opinion. Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 402.

To DISCI'DE.* v. a. [Lat. discidium, from discindo.] To divide; to cut in two.

And as her tongue, so was her heart discided,
That never thought one thing, but doubly still was guided. Spenser, F. Q. iv. i. 27.

But head, and tongue, and heart, be quite discided. More, Song of the Soul, i. ii. 27.

DISCI'NCT. adj. [discintus, Lat.] Ungirded; loosely dressed. Dict.

To DISCI'ND. v. a. [discindo, Lat.] To divide; to cut in pieces.

We found several concretions so soft, that we could easily discind them betwixt our fingers. Boyle.

DISCI'PLE† n. s. [Sax. ðiscipul; Fr. disciple; Lat. discipulus.] A scholar; one that professes to receive instructions from another.

He rebuked disciples, who would call for fire from heaven upon whole cities, for the neglect of a few. King Charles.

The commemorating the death of Christ, is the professing ourselves the disciples of the crucified Saviour; and that engageth us to take up his cross and follow him. Hammond.

A young disciple should behave himself so well, as to gain the affection and the ear of his instructor. Watts.

To DISCI'PLE.† v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To train; to bring up.

He did look far
Into the service of the time, and was
Discipl'd of the bravest. Shakspeare.

Go, disciple all nations, baptizing them. Practice of the Orthodox Ch. of Eng. (1709,) p. 60.

2. To punish; to discipline. This word is not in use, Dr. Johnson says; and he cites a passage from Spenser in which the word is not disciple but disple; which was common in elder times. See To DISPLE. Spenser, however, has disciple in this sense; and so has Ben Jonson. And both place the accent on the first syllable of the word; but Spenser on the second also.

Frail youth—
That better were in virtues discipled,
Than with vain poemes weeds to have their fancies fed. Spenser, F. Q. iv. Introd. St. 1.

But for your carnival concupiscence,
Who here is fled for liberty of conscience,
From furious persecution of the marshal,
Her will I disciple. B. Jonson, Fox.

She, bitter penance, with an iron whip,
Was wont him to disciple every day. Spenser.

DISCI'PLELIKE.* adj. [disciple and like.] Becoming a disciple.

The minister whose calling and end is spiritual, ought to be honoured as a father and physician to the soul, (if he be found to be so,) with a sonlike and disciplelike reverence, which is indeed the dearest and most affectionate honour, most to be desired by a wise man. Milton, of Ref. in England, B. 2.

DISCI'PLESHIP.† n. s. [from disciple.] The state or function of a disciple, or follower of a master.

That true and hearty love, which our Saviour would have the livery of our discipleship, the badge of our holy profession. Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 154.

That to which justification is promised, is the giving up of the whole soul intirely unto Christ, undertaking discipleship upon Christ's terms. Hammond, Pract. Catech.

DISCIPLI'NABLE. adj. [disciplinabilis, Lat.] Capable of instruction; capable of improvement by discipline and learning.

DISCIPLI'NABLENESS. n. s. [from disciplinable.] Capacity of instruction; qualification for improvement by education and discipline.

We find in animals, especially some of them, as foxes, dogs, apes, horses, and elephants, not only perception, phantasy, and memory, common to most, if not all animals, but something of sagacity, providence, and disciplinableness. Hale.

DI'SCIPLINANT.* n. s. [from discipline.] One of a religious order so called.

Don Quixotte stood up, and turned himself towards the place from whence he imagined the noise to proceed; and presently he espied, descending from a certain height, many men apparently in white like disciplinants. Shelton, Transl. of D. Quixote.

DISCIPLINA'RIAN. adj. [from discipline.] Pertaining to discipline.

What eagerness in disciplinarian uncertainties, when the love of God and our neighbour, evangelical unquestionables, are neglected! Glanville, Scepsis.

DISCIPLINA'RIAN.† n. s. [disciplina, Lat.]

1. One who rules or teaches with great strictness; one who allows no deviation from stated rules.

He, [king Lewis,] being a strict disciplinarian, would punish their vitious manners. Fuller, Holy War, iv. 12.

He knows well the Pharisee's constitution's too austere to be caught with an ordinary bait, and therefore puts off his title of Beelzebub prince of flies, as seeing that they are not now for his game; but trolls and baits him with a nobler prey, and comes in the person of a Cato or Aristarchus, a severe disciplinarian, a grave censor. Hammond, Serm. xviii.

The bishop affected to incorporate the two most inconsistent characters in all nature, the disciplinarian and the fine gentleman. Warburton to Hurd, Lett. 55.

2. A follower of the presbyterian sect, so called from their perpetual clamour about discipline.

They draw those that dissent into dislike with the state, as puritans, or disciplinarians. Sanderson, Pax Eccl.

DI'SCIPLINARY.† adj. [disciplina, Lat.]

1. Pertaining to discipline.

Designing to fame and glory, may make your lordship in the adventure of your person to be valiant as a private soldier rather than as a general; it may make you in your commandments rather to be gracious than disciplinary. Bacon, Lett. to the E. of Essex.

2. Relating to government.

Those canons in behalf of marriage were only disciplinary, grounded on prudential motives. Bishop Ferne.

3. Relating to a regular course of education.

These are the studies, wherein our noble and gentle youth ought to bestow their time in a disciplinary way. Milton on Education.

DI'SCIPLINE. n. s. [disciplina, Lat.]

1. Education; instruction; the act of cultivating the mind; the act of forming the manners.

He had charge my discipline to frame,
And tutors nouriture to oversee. Spenser.

The cold of the northern parts is that which, without aid of discipline, doth make the bodies hardest, and the courage warmest. Bacon.

They who want that sense of discipline, hearing, are also by consequence deprived of speech. Holder.

It is by the assistance of the eye and the ear especially, which are called the senses of discipline, that our minds are furnished with various parts of knowledge. Watts.

2. Rule of government; order; method of government.

They hold, that from the very apostles' time till this present age, wherein yourselves imagine ye have found out a right pattern of sound discipline, there never was any time safe to be followed. Hooker.

As we are to believe for ever the articles of evangelical doctrine, so the precepts of discipline we are, in like sort, bound for ever to observe. Hooker.

While we do admire
This virtue and this moral discipline,
Let's be no stoicks. Shakspeare.

3. Military regulation.

This opens all your victories in Scotland,
Your discipline in war, wisdom in peace. Shaks.

Let crooked steel invade
The lawless troops which discipline disclaim,
And their superfluous growth with rigour tame.
Dryden.

4. A state of subjection.
The most perfect, who have their passions in the best discipline, are yet obliged to be constantly on their guard. Rogers.

5. Any thing taught; art; science.
Art may be said to overcome and advance nature in these mechanical disciplines, which, in this respect, are much to be preferred. Wilkins.

6. Punishment; chastisement; correction.
A lively cobler kicked and spurred while his wife was carrying him, and had scarce passed a day without giving her the discipline of the strap. Addison, Spectator.

7. External mortification.
The love of God makes a man chaste without the laborious arts of fasting and exterior discipline; he reaches at glory without any other arms but those of love. Bp. Taylor.

To DI'SCIPLINE.† v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To educate; to instruct; to bring up.
We are wise enough to begin when they are very young, and discipline by times those other creatures we would make useful and good for somewhat. Locke.
They were with care prepared and disciplined for confirmation, which they could not arrive at, till they were found upon examination to have made a sufficient progress in the knowledge of Christianity. Addison on the Christian Religion.

2. To regulate; to keep in order.
By reducing our appetites to the measures of nature, and moderately disciplining them with fasting and abstinence, we shall by degrees be so stated against hardships and difficulties, that that which makes effeminate minds to flinch, and startle, will scarce be able to make any impression upon us. Scott's Works, ii. 26.
They look to us, as we should judge of an army of well-disciplined soldiers at a distance.
Derham, Astro-Theology.

3. To punish; to correct; to chastise.
Has he not disciplin'd Aufidius soundly!
Shakspeare, Coriol.

4. To advance by instruction.
The law appear'd imperfect, and but giv'n
With purpose to resign them in full time
Up to a better covenant, disciplin'd
From shadowy types to truth, from flesh to spirit.
Milton, P. L.

To DISCLAIM v. a. [dis and claim.] To disown; to deny any knowledge of; to retract any union with; to abrogate; to renounce.
You cowardly rascal! nature disclaims all share in thee: a taylor made thee. Shaks. K. Lear.
He calls the gods to witness their offence;
Disclaims the war, asserts his innocence.
Dryden, Æneid.
We find our Lord, on all occasions, disclaiming all pretensions to a temporal kingdom. Rogers.
Very few, among those who profess themselves Christians, disclaim all concern for their souls, disown the authority, or renounce the expectations of the gospel. Rogers.

DISCLA'IMER. n. s. [from disclaim.]

1. One that disclaims, disowns, or renounces.

2. [In law.] A plea containing an express denial or refusal. Cowel.

To DISCLO'SE. v. a. [discludo, Lat. dis and close.]

1. To uncover; to produce from a state of latitancy to open view.
In this deep quiet, from what source unknown,
Those seeds of fire their fatal birth disclose;
And first few scattering sparks about were blown,
Big with the flames that to our ruin rose. Dryden.
Then earth and ocean various forms disclose.
Dryden.
The shells being broken, struck off, and gone, the stone included in them is thereby disclosed and set at liberty. Woodward.

2. To hatch; to open.
It is reported by the ancients, that the ostrich layeth her eggs under sand, where the heat of the sun discloseth them. Bacon.

3. To reveal; to tell; to impart what is secret.
There may be a reconciliation, except for upbraiding; or pride, or disclosing of secrets, or a treacherous wound; for from these things every friend will depart. Ecclus.
If I disclose my passion,
Our friendship's at an end; if I conceal it,
The world will call me false. Addison, Cato.

DISCLO'SE.* n. s. [from the verb.] Discovery. This is probably peculiar to Young; and he will hardly be followed.
Glasses, that revelation to the sight,
Have they not led us deep in the disclose
Of fine-spun nature, exquisitely small,
And, though demonstrated, still ill-conceived?
Young, Night Th. 9.

DISCLO'SER. n. s. [from disclose.] One that reveals or discovers.

DISCLO'SURE. n. s. [from disclose.]

1. Discovery; production into view.
The producing of cold is a thing very worthy the inquisition, both for the use and disclosure of causes. Bacon.

2. Act of revealing any thing secret.
After so happy a marriage between the king and her daughter, she was, upon a sudden mutability and disclosure of the king's mind, severely handled. Bacon.

DISCLU'SION. n. s. [disclusus, Lat.] Emission.
Judge what a ridiculous thing it were, that the continued shadow of the earth should be broken by sudden miraculous eruptions and disclusions of light, to prevent the art of the lanthorn-maker. More.

To DISCO'AST.* v. n. [dis and coast.] To wander: to depart from; to quit the coast. I find this word used only by the excellent and learned Barrow.
If it be lawful, in using rhetorical schemes, poetical strains, involutions of sense in allegories, fables, parables, and riddles, to discoast from the plain and simple way of speech, why may not facetiousness, issuing from the same principles, directed to the same ends, serving to like purposes, be likewise used blamelessly?
Barrow, Serm. vol. i. S. 14. Against foolish talking.
They would not be singular and uncouth in discoasting from the common road or fashion of men. Barrow, Works, iii. 344.

DISCOLORA'TION.† n. s. [from discolour.]

1. The act of changing the colour; the act of staining.

2. Change of colour; stain; die.
Pure light without discolouration.
More, Song of the Soul, iii. ii. 36.
In a depravation of the humours from a sound state to what the physicians call by a general name of a cacochymy, spots and discolorations of the skin are signs of weak fibres. Arbuthnot.

To DISCO'LOUR.† v. a. [old Fr. descoulourer, from decoloro, Lat.] To change from the natural hue; to stain.
Many a widow's husband groveling lies,
Coldly embracing the discolour'd earth.
Shakspeare, K. John.
Drink water, either pure, or but discoloured with malt. Temple.
Suspicious and fantastical surmise,
And jealousy, with jaundice in her eyes,
Discolouring all she view'd. Dryden.
He who looks upon the soul through its outward actions, sees it through a deceitful medium, which is apt to discolour and pervert the object.
Addison, Spectator.
Have a care lest some beloved notion, or some darling science, so prevail over your mind as to discolour all your ideas. Watts.

DISCO'LOURED.* adj. [Lat. discolorius.] Having various colours.
Upon his coward brest
A bloody crosse, and on his craven crest
A bunch of hairs discolour'd diversely.
Spenser, F. Q. i. ii. 11.
And deck thy statues in discolour'd flowers.
B. Jonson, Cynth. Revels.

To DISCO'MFIT. v. a. [disconfire, Fr. sconfiggere, Ital. as if from disconfigere, Lat.] To defeat; to conquer; to vanquish; to overpower; to subdue; to beat; to overthrow.
Fight against that monstrous rebel, Cade,
Whom, since, I heard to be discomfited. Shaksp.
Joshua discomfited Amalek and his people with the edge of the sword. Exodus, xvii. 13.
He, fugitive, declin'd superior strength;
Discomfited, pursu'd in the sad chace
Ten thousand ignominious fall. Phillips.
While my gallant countrymen are employed in pursuing rebels, half discomfited through the consciousness of their guilt, I shall improve those victories to the good of my fellow subjects. Addison.

DISCO'MFIT. n. s. [from the verb.] Defeat; rout; overthrow.
Fly you must: incurable discomfit
Reigns in the hearts of all our present party.
Shakspeare.
Dagon must stoop, and shall ere long receive
Such a discomfit, as shall quite despoil him
Of all these boasted trophies. Milton, S. A.

DISCO'MFITURE.† n. s. [Fr. desconfiture.] Defeat; loss of battle; rout; ruin; overthrow.
Sad tidings bring I to you out of France,
Of loss, of slaughter, and discomfiture. Shakspeare.
Behold, every man's sword was against his fellow, and there was a very great discomfiture.
1 Sam.
What a defeat and discomfiture is it to a man, when he comes to use this wealth, to find it all false metal. Gov. Tongue.
He sent his angels to fight for his people; and the discomfiture and slaughter of great hosts, is attributed to their assistance. Atterbury.

DISCO'MFORT.† n. s. [old Fr. déconfort. This is one of our oldest substantives. Wicliffe uses it for desolation. "When ye see the abomynacioun of discoumfort," St. Matt. xxiv. Chaucer, for displeasure.] Uneasiness; sorrow; melancholy; gloom.
This himself did foresee, and therefore armed his church, to the end they might sustain it without discomfort. Hooker.
Discomfort guides my tongue,
And bids me speak of nothing but despair. Shaks.
In an humble submission to God's good pleasure, strive against all the discomforts of thy sufferings. Bp. Hall, The Comforter.
In solitude there is not only discomfort, but weakness also. South.

To DISCO'MFORT.† v. a. [old Fr. déconforter.] To grieve; to sadden; to deject.
Her champion went away discomforted as much as discomfited. Sidney.
His funeral shall not be in our camp,
Lest it discomfort us. Shakspeare, Jul. Cæsar.

Make this good of thyself, and thou shalt not be too much discomforted with the absence of thy bodily eyes. Bp. Hall, The Comforter.

DISCO'MFORTABLE.† adj. [from discomfort.]

1. Melancholy, and refusing comfort.

Discomfortable cousin, know'st thou not,
That when the searching eye of Heav'n is hid
Behind the globe, it lights the lower world? Shaks.

2. Causing sadness.

What! did that help poor Dorus, whose eyes could carry unto him no other news but discomfortable. Sidney.

What a discomfortable thing it is for me to be unsettled still.

Bacon, Lett. Supplement to Cabala, p. 71.

DISCO'MFORTABLENESS.* n. s. [from discomfortable.] State of being discomfortable. An old word, somewhere used by Archbishop Sandys in his sermons.

To DISCOMME'ND. v. a. [dis and commend.] To blame; to censure; to mention with disapprobation.

Absolutely we cannot discommend, we cannot absolutely approve, either willingness to live, or forwardness to die. Hooker.

Now you will all be wits; and he, I pray,
And you, that discommend it, mend the play.
Denham.

Neither do I discommend the lofty style in tragedy, which is naturally pompous and magnificent. Dryden.

DISCOMME'NDABLE.† adj. [from discommend.] Blamable; censurable; deserving blame.

The natives are generally strong, active, and courageous; the male sort from their infancy practise the rude postures of Mars, covering their naked bodies with massy targets, their right hand brandishing a long but small azaguay or lance of ebony barbed with iron, kept bright, and which by exercise they know how to jaculate as well as any people in the universe; discommendable only in their being impoisoned.

Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 22.

Pusillanimity is, according to Aristotle's morality, a vice very discommendable.

Ayliffe's Parergon.

DISCOMME'NDABLENESS. n. s. [from discommendable.] Blamableness; liableness to censure. Dict.

DISCOMMENDA'TION.† n. s. [from discommend.] Blame; reproach; censure.

If then having matched men of latter ages with those of the former in regard of age, strength, and wit, they should not likewise prove matchable in regard of virtue, it were a blemish rather than an ornament, a discommendation than a praise.

Hakewill on Providence, p. 289.

Tully assigns three motions, whereby, without any discommendation, a man might be drawn to become an accuser of others. Ayliffe's Parergon.

DISCOMME'NDER. n. s. [from discommend.] One that discommends: a dispraiser.

To DISCOMMI'SSION.* v. a. [dis and commission.] To deprive of a commission or trust.

I shall take that for proof enough, and proceed to discommission your printer and suppress his press. Abp. Laud, Hist. of his Chanc. p. 142.

To DISCO'MMODATE.* v. a. [Lat. discommodo. This is our old word; the place of which, in modern times, has been usurped by the finical discommode; though Warburton has adopted disaccommodate. We have to accomcodate, and to incommodate; and Dr. Johnson has admitted both into his dictionary. It is to be wondered, that he should have overpassed this.] To molest.

That none electors, princes, alliants, states, of either party, in what manner soever, or under whatsoever pretence, neither by themselves nor any other, shall with arms pertaining to either party, offend or cut off the treaty of peace, nor discommodate, pillage, spoil, attaint, or trouble one another. Sir H. Wotton, Rem. p. 533.

These wars did drain and discommodate the king of Spain. Howell, Lett. i. iii. 15.

To DISCOMMO'DE. v. a. [dis and commode, Fr.] To put to inconvenience; to molest; to incommode.

DISCOMMO'DIOUS.† adj. [from discommode.] Inconvenient; troublesome; unpleasing.

So many thousand soldiers, unfit for any labour or other trade, must either seek service and employment abroad, which may be dangerous, or else employ themselves here at home, which may be discommodious. Spenser, State of Ireland.

The king replied, that he intended to give one [a table] five times bigger than that was there, provided that it might not be discommodious to the sacrificers. Donne, Hist. of the Sept. p. 46.

A marriage happening totally discommodious, distasteful, dishonest, and pernicious to him, without the appearance of his fault.

Milton, Tetrachordon.

DISCOMMO'DITY.† n. s. [from discommode.] Inconvenience; disadvantage; hurt; mischief.

These discommodities do happen by implacable wrath, whereof there be examples innumerable.

Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 101.

We speak now of usury, how the discommodities of it may be best avoided, and the commodities retained: or how in the balance of commodities and discommodities, the qualities of usury, are to be reconciled. Bacon, Ess. of Usury.

So shall he shun the inconvenience of contempt and the discommodity of travel.

Ralegh, Arts of Empire, p. 164.

This seems an unseasonable foresight, and out of order, to defer and put off the most needful constitution of one right discipline, while we stand balancing the discommodities of two corrupt ones.

Milton, of Ref. in Eng.

It is better that a ship should be preserved with some discommodity to the sailors, than that, the sailors being in health, the ship should perish.

Hayward.

To DISCO'MMON. v. a. [dis and common.]

1. To deprive of the right of common.

I see thy pitched stakes do stand
On thy encroached piece of common land,
Whiles thou discommonest thy neighbour's kyne,
And warn'st that none feed on thy field save thine.
Bp. Hall, Sat. v. 4.

2. To deprive of the privileges of a place; a word frequently found in the accounts of proceedings of the university of Oxford.

'Tis hoped the university will not now faile of that protection and favour, we have had from our superiors in former times, so as to vindicate us and our privileges from these great encroachments; or at least, permitt us to make use of our owne lawes and power to restrain them; which, if your grace thinke fitt, would be no hard matter to do, by discommoning, or otherwise impleading, the author of them.

Letter in Warton's Life of Bathurst, p. 111.

To DISCOMPLE'XION.* v. a. [dis and complexion.] To change the hue or colour.

Can
A sorrow enter but upon thy garment,
Or discomplexion thy attire, whilst I
Enjoy a life for thee? Beaum. and Fl. Coronat.

His rich clothes be discomplexioned
With blood. Beaum. and Fl. Coronation,

To DISCOMPO'SE. v. a. [decomposer. Fr.]

1. To disorder; to unsettle.

The debate upon the self-denying ordinance had raised many jealousies, and discomposed the confidence that had formerly been between many of them. Clarendon.

2. To ruffle; to disorder.

Now Betty from her master's bed had flown,
And softly stole to discompose her own. Swift.

3. To disturb the temper; to agitate by perturbation.

No more, dear mother: ill in death it shows,
Your peace of mind by rage to discompose.
Dryden.

4. To offend; to fret; to vex.

Men who possess all the advantages of life, are in a state where there are many accidents to disorder and discompose, but few to please them. Swift.

5. To displace; to discard; not in use.

Though he was a dark prince, and infinitely suspicious, he never put down or discomposed a counsellor or near servant. Bacon.

DISCOMPOSI'TION.* n. s. [from discompose.] Inconsistency; disagreement.

O perplexed discomposition, O riddling distemper, O miserable condition of man!

Donne, Devot. p. 8.

DISCOMPO'SURE.† n. s. [from discompose.]

1. Disorder; perturbation.

Sins which were only evil by inordination, and discomposure of the order of man's end of living happily. Bp. Taylor, Life of Christ, Pref. § 18.

He threw himself upon his bed, lamenting with much passion, and with abundance of tears; and continued in this melancholick discomposure of mind many days. Clarendon.

2. Disagreement of parts.

How exquisite a symmetry, though as yet undiscerned by me, Omniscience doth, and after-ages probably will, discover in the Scripture's method, in spite of those seeming discomposures that now puzzle me. Boyle, Style of H. Script. p. 73.

To DISCO'MPT.* v. a. Fr. descompter.] To pay back again. See To DISCOUNT.

Whacum had neither cross nor pile,
His plunder was not worth the while;
All which the conqueror did discompt,
To pay for curing of his rump. Hudibras, ii. iii.

To DISCONCE'RT. v. a. [dis and concert.]

1. To unsettle the mind; to discompose.

You need not provoke their spirits by outrages: a careless gesture, a word, or a look, is enough to disconcert them. Collier.

2. To break a scheme; to defeat a machination.

DISCONFO'RMITY.† n. s. [dis and conformity.] Want of agreement; inconsistency.

Lies — arise from errour and mistake, or malice and forgery; — they consist in the disagreement and disconformity betwixt the speech and the conception of the mind, or the conceptions of the mind and the things themselves, or the speech and the things. Hakewill on Providence, p. 16.

He there exhorts us to bear with patience and humility those, however they be miscalled, that desire to live purely, in such an use of God's ordinances, as the best guidance of their conscience gives them, and to tolerate them, though in some disconformity to ourselves. Milton, Areopagitica.

DISCONGRU'ITY. n. s. [dis and congruity.] Disagreement; inconsistency.

There is want of capacity in the thing, to sustain such a duration from the intrinsical disconguity of the one to the other. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

To DISCONNE'CT.* v. a. [dis and connect.] To break the ties of any thing.

It is not easy to foresee, what effect would be, of disconnecting with parliament the greatest part of those who hold civil employments, and of such mighty and important bodies as the military and naval establishments.

Burke on the Cause of the Present Discontents.

DISCONNE'CTION.* n. s. [from disconnect.] Disunion.

Nothing was to be left in all the subordinate members, but weakness, disconnection, and confusion. Burke on the Fr. Revolution.

To DISCONSE'NT.* v. n. [dis and consent.] To disagree; to differ.

If therefore the tradition of the church were now grown so ridiculous, and disconsenting from the doctrine of the apostles, even in those points which were of least moment to men's particular ends, how well may we be assured it was much more degenerated in point of episcopacy and precedency? Milton, of Prelat. Episcopacy.

DISCO'NSOLACY.* n. s. [from disconsolate.] The state of being disconsolate.

Penury, baseness, and disconsolacy.

Barrow on the Creed.

My repair shall be to God and his holy ministers in all spiritual doubts and disconsolacies, and from them I shall never be ashamed to receive correction and instruction.

Waterhouse, Apol. for Learn. 1653, p. 148.

DISCO'NSOLATE.† adj. Fr. desconsolé.] Void of comfort; hopeless; sorrowful; melancholy.

See Cassius all disconsolate,
With Pindarus his bondman, on this hill. Shaksp.

If patiently thy bidding they obey,
Dismiss them not disconsolate. Milton, P. L.

The ladies and the knights, no shelter nigh,
Were dropping wet, disconsolate and wan,
And through their thin array receiv'd the rain.

Dryden.

The moon reflects the sunbeams to us, and so, by illuminating the air, takes away in some measure the disconsolate darkness of our winter-nights. Ray.

DISCO'NSOLATELY. adv. [from disconsolate.] In a disconsolate manner; comfortlessly.

DISCO'NSOLATENESS.† n. s. [from disconsolate.] The state of being disconsolate.

In his presence there is life and blessedness; in his absence, nothing but dolour, disconsolateness, despair. Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 98.

Though Thou have suffered some dimness, some clouds of sadness and disconsolateness to shed themselves upon my soul, I humbly bless and thankfully glorify thy holy name. Donne, Devot. p. 361.

DISCONSOLA'TION.* n. s. [dis and consolation.] Want of comfort.

The greater a man's delight hath been in worldly prosperity, the greater will his grief or disconsolation be, when the opposite branch of adversity falls upon him.

Dr. Jackson's Works, (1673,) p. 525.

DISCONTE'NT.† n. s. [dis and content.]

1. Want of content; uneasiness at the present state.

I see your brows full of discontent,
Your hearts of sorrows, and your eyes of tears.

Shakspeare.

To prove the happiness of a mean estate, and the discontents of a rich man.

Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 116.

Not that their pleasures caus'd her discontent,
She sigh'd, not that they stay'd, but that she went.

Pope.

2. One who is discontented.

Fickle changelings, and poor discontents.

Shakspeare, K. Hen. IV. P. I.

DISCONTE'NT. adj. [dis and content. [Uneasy at the present state; dissatisfied.

They were of their own nature circumspect and slow, discountenanced and discontent, and those the earl singled as fittest for his purpose. Hayward.

To DISCONTE'NT. v. a. [from the noun.] To dissatisfy; to make uneasy at the present state.

I know a discontented gentleman,
Whose humble means match not his haughty spirit.

Shakspeare.

The discontented now are only they
Whose crimes before did your just cause betray.

Dryden.

DISCONTE'NTED. participial adj. [from discontent.] Uneasy; cheerless; malevolent.

Let us know
What will tie up your discontented sword? Shaksp.

These are, beyond comparison, the two greatest evils in this world, a diseased body and a discontented mind. Tillotson.

The goddess, with a discontented air,
Seems to reject him, though she grants his pray'r.

Pope.

DISCONTE'NTEDLY.* adv. [from discontented.] In a discontented humour.

Turn not thy back to him discontentedly; but forbear and submit.

Bp. Richardson on the Old Test. (1655,) p. 326.

DISCONTE'NTEDNESS. n. s. [from discontented.] Uneasiness; want of ease; dissatisfaction.

A beautiful bust of Alexander the Great, cast up his face to heaven with a noble air of grief, or discontentedness in his looks. Addison's Travels.

DISCONTE'NTING.* adj. Giving no satisfaction; disgusting.

How unpleasing and discontenting the society of body must needs be between those whose minds cannot be sociable.

Milton, Doct. and Discip. of Divorce.

DISCONTE'NTMENT. n. s. [from discontent.] The state of being discontented; uneasiness.

These are the vices that fill them with general discontentment, as though the bosom of that famous church, wherein they live, were more noisome than any dungeon. Hooker.

The politick and artificial nourishing and entertaining of hopes, and carrying men from hopes to hopes, is one of the best antidotes against the poison of discontentments. Bacon.

DISCONTI'NUANCE. n. s. [from discontinue.]

1. Want of cohesion of parts; want of union of one part with another; disruption.

The stillicides of water, if there be enough to follow, will draw themselves into a small thread, because they will not discontinue; but if there be no remedy, then they cast themselves into round drops, which is the figure that saveth the body most from discontinuance. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

2. Cessation; intermission.

Let us consider, whether our approaches to him are sweet and refreshing, and if we are uneasy under any long discontinuance of our conversation with him. Atterbury.

3. [In the common law.] An interruption or breaking off; as discontinuance of possession, or discontinuance of process. The effect of discontinuance of possession is, that a man may not enter upon his own land or tenement alienated, whatsoever his right be unto it, or by his own authority; but must seek to recover possession by law. The effect of discontinuance of plea is, that the instance may not be taken up again, but by a new writ to begin the suit afresh. Cowel.

DISCONTINUA'TION. n. s. [from discontinue.] Disruption of continuity; breach of union of parts; disruption; separation.

Upon any discontinuation of parts, made either by bubbles or by shaking the glass, the whole mercury falls. Newton.

To DISCONTI'NUE. v. n. [discontinuer, French.]

1. To lose the cohesion of parts; to suffer separation or disruption of substance.

All bodies ductile and tensile, as metals that will be drawn into wires; wool and tow, that will be drawn into yarn, or thread, have in them the appetite of not discontinuing strong, which maketh them follow the force that pulleth them out; and yet so as not to discontinue or forsake their own body. Bacon.

2. To lose an established or prescriptive custom or right.

Thyself shalt discontinue from thine heritage that I gave thee, and I will cause thee to serve thine enemies. Jer.

To DISCONTI'NUE. v. a.

1. To leave off; to cease any practice or habit.

Twenty puny lies I'll tell
That men shall swear I've discontinued school
Above a twelvemonth. Shakspeare.

Examine thy customs of diet, sleep, exercise, apparel, and the like, and try, in any thou shalt judge hurtful, to discontinue it by little and little; but so, as if thou find any inconvenience by the change, thou come back to it again. Bacon.

2. To break off; to interrupt.

There is that property, in all letters, of aptness to be conjoined in syllables and words, through the voluble motions of the organs from one stop or figure to another, that they modify and discriminate the voice, without appearing to discontinue it. Holder, Elem. of Speech.

DISCONTI'NUER.* n. s. [from discontinue.] One who discontinues a rule or custom.

Hearing that the new statutes at Oxford permit none but those who totally reside and study there to take degrees, and admit no computation of terms more than those wherein they were commorant there, so that many discontinuers cannot in so short time proceed as formerly, &c.

Commun. to Abp. Laud, (1639,) Rem. ii. 174.

DISCONTINU'ITY. n. s. [dis and continuity.] Disunity of parts; want of cohesion.

That discontinuity of parts is the principal cause of the opacity of bodies, will appear by considering that opaque substances become transparent by filling their pores with any substance of equal, or almost equal density with their parts. Newton.

DISCONTI'NUOUS.* adj. [A word formed by Milton, having the force of the Lat. diversè and continuus.] Wide; extended; gaping.

Then Satan first knew pain,
And writh'd him to and fro convolv'd; so sore
The griding sword with discontinuous wound

A horrid chasm, disclos'd with orifice
Wide, discontinuous. Philips, Splendid Shilling.

DISCONVE'NIENCE.† n. s. [old Fr. desconvenience.] Incongruity; disagreement; opposition of nature.

Fear arises many times out of natural antipathies of nature, but in these disconveniences of nature deliberation hath no place at all.

Bp. Bramhall, Answ. to Hobbes.

A necessary disconvenience, where any thing is allowed to be cause of itself.

Fotherby, Atheom. p. 213.

DISCONVE'NIENT.* adj. [dis and convenient.] Opposite; incongruous.

Continual drinking is most convenient to the distemper of an hydropick body, though most disconvenient to its present welfare.
Bp. Reynolds on the Passions, ch. 40.

DI'SCORD.† n. s. [descord, old French, discordia, Latin.]

1. Disagreement; opposition; mutual anger; reciprocal oppugnancy.
See what a scourge is laid upon your hate,
That heav'n finds means to kill your joys with love!
And I, for winking at your discords too,
Have lost a brace of kinsmen. Shaks. Rom. & Jul.
He is a false witness that speaketh lies, and that soweth discord among brethren. Proverbs.

2. Difference, or contrariety of qualities; particularly of sounds.
Take but degree away, untune that string,
And hark what discord follows; each thing meets
In meer oppugnancy. Shakspeare, Tr. and Cress.
Discord, like that of music's various parts,
Discord that makes the harmony of hearts;
Discord that only this dispute shall bring,
Who best shall love the duke and serve the king.
Dryden.
All nature is but art unknown to thee;
All chance, direction which thou canst not see;
All discord, harmony not understood;
All partial evil, universal good. Pope.

3. [In musick.] Sounds not of themselves pleasing, but necessary to be mixed with others, Dr. Johnson says. A discord, whether necessary or not, is a combination of disagreeing sounds; not always displeasing; on the contrary, it often encreases, by proper interposition, the effect of harmony.
It is sound alone that doth immediately and incorporeally affect most; this is most manifest in musick, and concords and discords in musick: for all sounds, whether they be sharp or flat, if they be sweet, have a roundness and equality; and if they be harsh, are unequal, for a discord itself is but a harshness of divers sounds meeting. Bacon.
It is the lark that sings so out of tune,
Straining harsh discords and unpleasing sharps.
Shakspeare.
How doth musick amaze us, when of discords she maketh the sweetest harmony. Peacham.

To DI'SCORD.† v. n. [desaccorder, old Fr. discordo, Lat.] To disagree; not to suit with.
Sounds do disturb and alter the one the other; sometimes the one drowning the other, and making it not heard; sometimes the one jarring and discording with the other, and making a confusion. Bacon.
But yet, even in this change of their tune, they kept still a good harmony; an harmony concording with God's severity, though somewhat discording with his mercy. Fotherby, Atheom. p. 330.
A musical ear accustomed to melodious consorts, will be more displeased with jarring or discording sounds, than he which hath the same sense of hearing unpolished by art, or accustomed to ruder noises. Dr. Jackson's Works, (1673,) iii. 491.

DISCO'RDANCE.† } n. s. [from discord.]
DISCO'RDANCY. } Disagreement; opposition; inconsistency.
The intractible genius of the feudal policy, held forth those irregularities of conduct, discordancies of interest, and dissimilarities of situation, that framed rich materials for the minstrel-muse.
Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, ii. 462.

DISCO'RDANT. adj. [discordans, Lat.]

1. Inconsistent; at variance with itself.
Myrrha was joy'd the welcome news to hear,
But clogg'd with guilt, the joy was unsincere;
So various, so discordant is the mind,
That in our will a different will we find. Dryden.

2. Opposite; contrarious.
The discordant attraction of some wandering comets would certainly disorder the revolutions of the planets if they approached too near them.
Cheyne.

3. Incongruous; not conformable.
Hither conscience is to be referred, if by a comparison of things done with the rule there be a consonancy, then follows the sentence of approbation; if discordant from it, the sentence of condemnation. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

DISCO'RDANTLY. adv. [from discordant.]

1. Inconsistently; in disagreement with itself.

2. In disagreement with another.
Two strings of a musical instrument being struck together, making two noises that arrive at the ear at the same time as to sense, yield a sound differing from either of them, and as it were compounded of both; insomuch, that if they be discordantly tuned, though each of them struck apart would yield a pleasing sound, yet being struck together they make a harsh and troublesome noise.
Boyle on Colours.

3. Peevishly; in a contradictious manner.

DISCO'RDFUL.* adj. [discord and full.] Quarrelsome; not peaceable.
But Blandamour, full of vain-glorious spright,
And rather stirred by his discordfull dame,
Upon them gladly would have prov'd his might.
Spenser, F. Q. iv. iv. 3.

To DISCO'VER.† v. a. [decouvrir, Fr. dis and cover.]

1. To shew; to disclose; to bring to light; to make visible.

2. To expose to view.
The cover of the coach was made with such joints, that, as they might, to avoid the weather, pull it up close, so they might put each end down, and remain as discovered and open-sighted as on horseback. Sidney.
Go draw aside the curtains, and discover
The several caskets to this noble prince. Shaksp.
He discovereth deep things out of darkness, and bringeth out to light the shadow of death.
Job, xii. 22.

3. To shew; not to shelter; to expose.
And now will I discover her lewdness. Hosea.
Law can discover sin, but not remove. Milton.

4. To make known; not to disguise; to reveal.
We will pass over unto those men, and we will discover ourselves unto them. Isaiah, xiv. 8.
Eve, who unseen
Yet all had heard, with audible lament
Discover'd from the place of her retire.
Milton, P. L.

5. To ken; to espy.
When we had discovered Cyprus, we left it on the left hand. Acts.

6. To find out; to obtain information.
He shall never, by any alteration in me, discover my knowledge of his mistake. Pope, Letters.

7. To detect; to find though concealed.
Up he starts,
Discover'd and surprized. Milton, P. L.
Man with strength and free will arm'd
Complete, to have discover'd and repuls'd
Whatever wiles of foe or seeming friend.
Milton, P. L.

8. To find things or places not known before.
Some to discover islands far away. Shakspeare.
Another part in squadrons — bend their march —
On bold adventure, to discover wide
That dismal world. Milton, P. L.
So of things. The Germans discovered printing and gunpowder.

9. To exhibit to the view.
Some high-climbing hill,
Which to his eye discovers unaware
The goodly prospect of some foreign land,
First seen, or some renown'd metropolis
With glist'ring spires and battlements adorn'd.
Milton, P. L.
Not light, but rather darkness visible
Serv'd only to discover sights of woe. Milton, P. L.

10. To make any thing cease to be a covering.
The voice of the Lord maketh the hinds to calve, and discovereth the forests. Psalm xxix. 9.
For the greatness of thy iniquity are thy skirts discovered, and thy heels made bare. Jerem. xiii. 22.

DISCO'VERABLE. adj. [from discover.]

1. That which may be found out.
That mineral matter which is so intermixed with the common and terrestrial matter, as not to be discoverable by human industry; or if discoverable, diffused and scattered amongst the crasser matter, can never be separated. Woodward, Nat. Hist.
Revelation may assert two things to be joined, whose connection or agreement is not discoverable by reason. Watts.

2. Apparent; exposed to view.
They were deceived by Satan, and that not in an invisible situation, but in an open and discoverable apparition, that is, in the form of a serpent.
Brown, Vulg. Err.
It is concluded by astronomers, that the atmosphere of the moon hath no clouds nor rains, but a perpetual and uniform serenity; because nothing discoverable in the lunar surface is ever covered and absconded by the interposition of any clouds or mists. Bentley.

DISCO'VERER.† n. s. [from discover.]

1. One that finds any thing not known before; a finder out.
If more be found out, they will not recompence the discoverer's pains, but will be fitter to be cast out. Holder.
Places receive appellations according to the language of the discoverer, from observations made upon the people. Broome.
The Cape of Good Hope was doubled in those early times; and the Portuguese were not the first discoverers of that navigation.
Arbuthnot on Coins.
An old maiden gentlewoman is the greatest discoverer of judgements; she can tell you what sin it was that set such a man's house on fire.
Addison, Spectator.

2. A scout; one who is put to descry the posture or number of an enemy; speculator.
Here stand, my lords, and send discoverers forth,
To know the numbers of our enemies. Shakspeare.
A field of thistles seemed once a battle of pikes unto some discoverers of the duke of Burgundy.
Mountagu, App. to Cæs. p. 320.

DISCO'VERY. n. s. [from discover.]

1. The act of finding any thing hidden.
Of all who since have us'd the open sea,
Than the bold English none more fame have won;
Beyond the year, and out of heav'n's high way,
They make discoveries where they see no sun.
Dryden.

2. The act of revealing or disclosing any secret.
What must I hold a candle to my shame?
They in themselves, good sooth, are too, too light.
Why 'tis an office of discovery, love,
And I should be obscur'd.
Shakspeare, Merch. of Venice.
Things that appeared amiable by the light of this world, appear of a different odious hue in the clear discoveries of the next. South.
It would be necessary to say something of the state to which the war hath reduced us; such a discovery ought to be made as late as possible.
Swift.

To DISCOU'NSEL.† v. a. [desconseiller,

Fr.] To dissuade; to give contrary advice.

But him that Palmer from that vanity,
With temperate advice discounselled. Spenser, F. Q.

Holy Scripture dissuadeth and discounselleth from doing that filthy sin.
Homilies, B. i. Against Adultery.

DI'SCOUNT.† n. s. [dis and count.]

1. The sum refunded in a bargain.

His whole intention was, to buy a certain quantity of copper money from Wood at a large discount, and sell them as well as he could. Swift.

2. A deduction according to the rate of interest, for money advanced beforehand; an allowance made on a bill of exchange, or any other debt, not yet due, in order to receive money for the same.

To DISCOU'NT.† v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To count back; to pay back again.

My father's, mother's, brother's, death I pardon;
My prayers and penance shall discount for these,
And beg of Heaven to charge the bill on me.
Dryden.

The farmers spitefully combin'd,
Force him to take his tithes in kind;
And Parvisol discounts arrears,
By bills for taxes and repairs. Swift.

2. To pay beforehand; deducting, according to the custom of commerce and the law of interest, an equivalent for so doing.

To DISCOU'NTENANCE. v. a. [dis and countenance.]

1. To discourage by cold treatment.

The truly upright judge will always countenance right, and discountenance wrong. Atterbury.

2. To abash; to put to shame.

Wisdom in discourse with her,
Loses discountenanced, and like folly shews.
Milton, P. L.

He came, and with him Eve, more loth, though first
To offend; discountenanc'd both, and discompos'd.
Milton, P. L.

How would one look from his majestick brow,
Seated as on the top of virtue's hill,

DISCOU'NTENANCE. n. s. [dis and countenance.] Cold treatment; unfavourable aspect; unfriendly regard.

He thought a little discountenance upon those persons would suppress that spirit. Clarendon.

All accidental misfortunes, how inevitable soever, were still attended with very apparent discountenance. Clarendon.

In expectation of the hour of judgement, he patiently bears all the difficulties of duty, and the discountenance he meets with from a wicked and prophane world. Rogers.

DISCOU'NTENANCER. n. s. [from discountenance.] One that discourages by cold treatment; one that depresses by unfriendly regard.

Rumours of scandal and murmurs against the king and his government, taxed him for a great taxer of his people, and discountenancer of his nobility. Bacon.

DISCOU'NTER.* n. s. [from discount.] One who advances money upon discount.

Usurers, pedlars, and Jew discounters, at the corners of the streets. Burke, Lett. to a Memb. of the National Assembly.

To DISCOU'RAGE. v. a. [decourager. Fr. dis and courage.]

1. To depress; to deprive of confidence; to deject; to dastardize.

The apostle with great zeal discourages too unreasonable a presumption. Rogers.

2. To deter; to fright from any attempt; with from before the thing.

Wherefore discourage ye the heart of the children of Israel, from going over into the land? Numbers.

3. It is regularly used by Temple, with to before the following word.

You may keep your beauty and your health unless you destroy them yourself, or discourage them to stay with you by using them ill. Temple.

DISCOU'RAGE.* n. s. [dis and courage.] Want of courage, and resolution.

Where the negligent ministers or inferiour governours have not only equal thank or reward, but perchance much more than they which be diligent, or would be, if they might have assistance; there undoubtedly is grievous discourage, and peril of conscience; forasmuch as they omit oftentimes their duties and offices. Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 209.

DISCOU'RAGER. n. s. [from discourage.] One that impresses diffidence and terrour.

Most men in years, as they are generally discouragers of youth, are like old trees, which being past bearing themselves, will suffer no young plants to flourish beneath them. Pope.

DISCOU'RAGEMENT. n. s. [from discourage.]

1. The act of deterring or depressing hope.

2. Determent; that which deters from any thing: with from.

Amongst other impediments of any inventions, it is none of the meanest discouragements, that they are so generally derided by common opinion. Wilkins.

The books read at schools and colleges, are full of incitements to virtue, and discouragements from vice. Swift.

3. The cause of depression or fear: with to, less properly.

To things we should have them learn, the great and only discouragement is, that they are called to them. Locke.

DISCOU'RSE.† n. s. [discours, Fr. discursus, Latin, from discurrere, to run hither and thither; applying, as in the case of desultory, a bodily action to what passes in the mind, and to what is communicated by conversation. Spenser has once used discourse in its literal acceptation of running about, F. Q. vi. viii. 14. But he has not been, and probably never will be followed. Glanville has thus explained the word: "The act of the mind which connects propositions, and deduceth conclusions from them, the schools call discourse; and we shall not miscall it if we name it reason."]

1. The act of the understanding, by which it passes from premises to consequences.

By reason of that original weakness in the instruments, without which the understanding part is not able in this world by discourse to work, the very conceit of painfulness is a bridle to stay us. Hooker.

Sure he that made us with such large discourse,
Looking before and after, gave us not
That capability and godlike reason
To rust in us unus'd. Shakspeare.

2. Conversation; mutual intercourse of language; talk.

He waxeth wiser than himself, more by an hour's discourse, than by a day's meditation. Bacon.

In thy discourse, if thou desire to please,
All such is courteous, useful, new, or witty;
Usefulness comes by labour, wit by ease,
Courtesy grows in court, news in the city. Herbert.

The vanquish'd party with the victors join'd,
Nor wanted sweet discourse, the banquet of the mind. Dryden.

3. Effusion of language; speech.

Topical and superficial arguments, of which there is store to be found on both sides, filling the head with variety of thoughts, and the mouth with copious discourse, serve only to amuse the understanding and entertain company. Locke.

4. A treatise; a dissertation either written or uttered.

The discourse here is about ideas, which, he says, are real things, and seen in God. Locke.

Plutarch, in his discourse upon garrulity, commends the fidelity of the companions of Ulysses. Pope, Odyssey.

To DISCOU'RSE. v. n. [from the noun.]

1. To converse; to talk; to relate.

How wert thou handled, being prisoner?
Discourse, I pr'ythee, on this turret's top. Shaksp.

Of various things discoursing as he pass'd,
Anchises hither bends. Dryden.

2. To treat upon in a solemn or set manner.

The general maxims we are discoursing of are not known to children, idiots, and a great part of mankind. Locke.

3. To reason; to pass from premises to consequences.

And yet the pow'rs of her discoursing thoughts,
From the collection is a diverse thing. Davies.

Brutes do want that quick discoursing pow'r. Davies.

To DISCOU'RSE.† v. a. [from the noun.]

Go with us into the abbey here,
And let us there at large discourse all our fortunes. Shakspeare.

Good Pylades, discourse a robbery or two, to satisfy these gentlemen of thy worth. B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour.

Hard are the ways of truth, and rough to walk,
Smooth on the tongue discours'd, pleasing to the ear. Milton, P. R.

2. To utter.

Give it [the pipe] breath with your mouth, and it will discourse most excellent musick. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

DISCOU'RSER. n. s. [from discourse.]

1. A speaker; an haranguer.

The tract of every thing,
Would by a good discourser lose some life,
Which action's self was tongue to. Shakspeare.

2. A writer on any subject; a dissertator.

Philologers and critical discoursers, who look beyond the obvious exteriors of things, will not be angry at our narrower explorations. Brown.

But it seems to me, that such discoursers do reason upon short views, and a very moderate compass of thought. Swift.

DISCOU'RSING.* n. s. [from discourse.] Mutual intercourse of language.

That change meets so with our fears and weak discoursings, that they, who six hours ago tended upon us either with charitable or ambitious services, cannot stay in the room alone where the body lies stripped of its life and honour. Bp. Taylor, Holy Dying, i. § 2.

DISCOU'RSIVE.† adj. [from discourse.]

1. Passing by intermediate steps from premises to consequences.

The soul
Reason receives, and reason is her being,
Discoursive, or intuitive; discourse
Is oftest yours, the latter is most ours.
Milton, P. L.

2. Containing dialogue; interlocutory.

The epick is every where interlaced with dialogue or discoursive scenes.
Dryden on Dramatick Poesy.

He resolved to unhorse the first discourteous knight he should meet. Motteux, Don Quixote.

DISCOU'RTEOUSLY.† adv. [from discourteous.] Uncivilly; rudely.
His father was a page, and was discourteously used in our court, perhaps by the pages.
Hacket, Life of Abp. Williams, p. 156.

DISCOU'RTESY. n. s. [dis and courtesy.] Incivility; rudeness; act of disrespect.
As if cheerfulness had been tediousness, and good entertainment had been turned to discourtesy, he would ever get himself alone. Sidney.
Be calm in arguing; for fierceness makes
Errour a fault, and truth discourtesy. Herbert.
He made me visits, maundering as if I had done him a discourtesy. Wiseman.

DISCOU'RTSHIP* n. s. [dis and courtship. See COURTSHIP.] Want of respect.
Monsieur, we must not so much betray ourselves to discourtship, as to suffer you to be longer unsaluted. B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels.

DISCOU'S. adj. [from discus, Lat.] Broad; flat; wide. Used by botanists to denote the middle, plain, and flat part of some flowers, such as the flos solis, &c.
Quincy.

DISCRE'DIT. n. s. [decrediter, Fr.] Ignominy; reproach; lower degree of infamy; disgrace; imputation of a fault.
Had I been the finder out of this secret, it would not have relished among my other discredits.
Shakspeare.
Idlers will ever live like rogues, and not fall to work, but be lazy, and then certify over their country to the discredit of a plantation. Bacon.
That they may quit their morals without any discredit to their intellectuals, they fly to several stale, trite, pitiful objections and cavils. South.
'Tis the duty of every Christian to be concerned for the reputation or discredit his life may bring on his profession. Rogers.
Alas, the small discredit of a bribe,
Scarce hurts the lawyer, but undoes the scribe.
Pope.

To DISCRE'DIT. v. a. [decrediter, Fr.]
1. To deprive of credibility; to make not trusted.
He had fram'd to himself many deceiving promises of life, which I have discredited to him, and now is he resolved to die. Shakspeare.
2. To disgrace; to bring reproach upon; to shame; to make less reputable or honourable.
You had left unseen a wonderful piece of work, which not to have been blest withal, would have discredited you. Shakspeare.
He is commended that makes a saving voyage, and least discredits his travels, who returns the same man he went. Wotton.
He like a privileg'd spy, whom nothing can Discredit, libels now 'gainst each great man. Donne.
Reflect how glorious it would be to appear in countenance of discredited duty, and by example of piety revive the declining spirit of religion.
Rogers.
Without care our best actions will lose much of their influence, and our virtues will be often discredited with the appearance of evil. Rogers.
3. To distrust; not to credit; not to hold certain.

DISCRE'DITABLE.* adj. [dis and creditable.] Disgraceful; reproachful.
Here the lank-sided miser, worst of felons,
Who meanly stole, discreditable shift!
From back, and belly too, their proper cheer.
R. Blair, The Grave.

DISCREE'T. adj. [discret, Fr.]
1. Prudent; circumspect; cautious; sober; not rash; not precipitant; not careless; not hardily adventurous.
Honest, discreet, quiet, and godly learned men, will not be withdrawn by you. Whitgifte.
Less fearful than discreet,
You love the fundamental part of state,
More than you doubt the charge of 't. Shaksp.
To elder years to be discreet and grave,
Then to old age maturity she gave. Denham.
It is the discreet man, not the witty, nor the learned, nor the brave, who guides the conversation, and gives measures to society.
Addison, Spectator.
2. Modest; not forward. Not well authorized.
Dear youth, by fortune favour'd, but by Love
Alas! not favour'd less, be still as now
Discreet. Thomson.

DISCREE'TLY. adv. [from discreet.] Prudently; cautiously; circumspectly.
Poets lose half the praise they should have got,
Could it be known what they discreetly blot.
Waller.
The labour of obedience, loyalty, and subjection, is no more but for a man honestly and discreetly to sit still. South.
Profit springs from husks discreetly us'd. Philips.
The dullest brain, if gently stirr'd,
Perhaps may waken to a humming bird;
The most recluse, discreetly open'd, find
Congenial object in the cockle kind. Pope, Dunciad.

DISCREE'TNESS. n. s. [from discreet.] The quality of being discreet; discretion.

DI'SCREPANCE.† n. s. [discrepantia, Latin.] Difference; contrariety; disagreement.
Diversity of education, and discrepancy of those principles wherewith men are at first imbued, and wherein all our after reasonings are founded.
Lord Digby to K. Digby.
The only question which admitted any variety of discrepance among the ancients was, who were the persons to whose souls the Soul of Christ descended. Pearson on the Creed, Art. 5.

DI'SCREPANCY.* n. s. [Lat. discrepantia.] Difference.
There is diversity of judgements, discrepancy of opinion among divines both old and new.
Mountagu, App. to Cæs. p. 147.
What the one is, the other is not; and in such a visible discrepany, that if one were fetched from the remotest parts of the earth the sun displayeth his beames upon, yea from the very Antipodes, he would agree with either better than they do one with another. Howell, Instruct. for Travel, p. 75.

DI'SCREPANT.† adj. [discrepans, Lat.] Different; disagreeing; contrary.
To that intent was speech specially given, wherein he is most discrepaunt from brute beasts.
Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 77.
Master Justice, doth not your worship know this gentleman who is your neighbour's son, and hath absented himself from his father's house, in an habit so undecent and discrepant from his calling, as you may perceive?
Shelton, Tr. of Don. Quix. iv. 17.

To DISCRE'TE. v. a. [discretus, Lat.] To separate; to discontinue.
As for its diaphaneity, it enjoyeth that most eminently; as having its earthly and salinous parts so exactly resolved, that its body is left imporous, and not discreted by atomical terminations. Brown.

DISCRE'TE.† adj. [discretus, Lat.]
1. Distinct; disjoined; not continuous.
Discrete quantity, or different individuals, are measured by number, without any breaking continuity, that is, in things that have continuity, as continued quantity and motion.
Hale, Orig. of Mankind.
2. Disjunctive; as, I resign my life, but not my honour, is a discrete proposition.
The parts are not discrete, or dissentany, for both conclude not putting away, and consequently in such a form the proposition is ridiculous.
Milton, Tetrachordon.
3. Discrete Proportion is when the ratio between two pairs of numbers or quantities is the same; but there is not the same proportion between all the four: thus, 6 : 8 :: 3 : 4. Harris.

DISCRE'TION.† n. s. [from discretio, Lat. Dr. Johnson says. I must add Sir T. Elyot's remark on discretion. "Modesty seemeth to be much like that which men commonly call discretion. Albeit discretio in Latin signifieth separation; wherein it is more like to election. But as it is commonly used, it is not only like to modesty, but is the selfe modesty. For he that forbeareth to speak, although he can do it both wisely and eloquently, because neither in the time, nor in the hearers, he findeth opportunity so that no fruit may succede of his speech; he therefore is vulgarly called a discreet person." Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 78.
1. Prudence; knowledge to govern or direct one's self; skill; wise management.
Nothing then was further thought upon for the manner of governing; but all permitted unto their wisdom and discretion which were to rule. Hooker.
A knife may be taken away from a child, without depriving them of the benefits thereof, which have years and discretion to use it. Hooker.
It is not good that children should know any wickedness: old folks have discretion, and know the world. Shakspeare.
All this was order'd by the good discretion
Of the right reverend cardinal of York.
Shakspeare, Hen. VIII.
The pleasure of commanding our passions is to be preferred before any sensual pleasure; because it is the pleasure of wisdom and discretion. Tillotson.
But care in poetry must still be had,
It asks discretion, ev'n in running mad. Pope.
There is no talent so useful towards rising in the world, or which puts men more out of the reach of fortune, than discretion, a species of lower prudence. Swift.
2. Liberty of acting at pleasure; uncontrolled, and unconditional power; as, he surrenders at discretion; that is, without stipulation.
3. Disjunction; separation. Not now in use.
It is very probable, that to shew their despiciency of the poor Gentiles, and to pride themselves in their prerogative and discretion from them, they [the Jews] affected to have such acts there done.
Mede, Diatr. p. 191.

DISCRE'TIONAL.* adj. [from discretion.] Unlimited. This is the modern word for discretionary.

All this amounts not to any thing of a discretional authority placed in the hands of tutelar angels. Bp. Horsely, Serm. ii. 416.

DISCRE'TIONALLY.* adv. [from discretional.] At pleasure; at choice.

Hour is a rhyme to power; and though it has often been thought necessary to write the latter word with an apostrophe when it is used as a monosyllable, yet if hour may be used discretionally as one or two syllables, power may surely be allowed the same latitude, without any change in its form. Nares, Elem. of Orthoepy, p. 80.

A deacon may have a dispensation for entering into orders before he is twenty-three years of age, and it is discretionary in the bishop to admit him to that order at what time he thinks fit. Ayliffe, Parergon.

The major being a person of consummate experience, was invested with discretionary power. Tatler.

DISCRE'TIVE.† adj. [discretus, Lat.]

1. [In logick.] Discretive propositions are such wherein various, and seemingly opposite judgements are made, whose variety or distinction is noted by the particles but, though, yet, &c. as, travellers may change their climate, but not their temper: Job was patient, though his grief was great. Watts.
2. [In grammar.] Discretive distinctions are such as imply opposition; as, not a man, but a beast.

Because the conjunction here is discretive, "BUT of the tree," one concludeth from thence, that therefore it must needs be in the middle of the garden; though the Hebrew be not sed, but and, &c. Gregory, Notes on Script. p. 80.

3. Separate; distinct. Bullokar.

DISCRE'TIVELY.* adv. [from discretive.] In a manner grammatically distinguishing.

The plural number being used discretively, to note out, and design one of many. Bp. Richardson on the Old Test. p. 237.

DISCRI'MINABLE. adj. [from discriminate.] Distinguishable by outward marks or tokens. Dict.

To DISCRI'MINATE.† v. a. [discrimino, Lat.]

1. To mark with notes of difference; to distinguish by certain tokens from another.

There are three sorts of it differing in fineness from each other, and discriminated by the natives by three peculiar names. Boyle.

The right hand is discriminated from the left by a natural, necessary, and never to be confounded distinction. South.

Although the features of his countenance be no reason of obedience, yet they may serve to discriminate him from any other person, whom she is not to obey. Stilling fleet.

There may be ways of discriminating the voice; as by acuteness and gravity, the several degrees of rising and falling from one tone or note to another. Holder.

2. To select or separate from others; to sever. Bullokar.

You owe little less for what you are not, than for what you are, to that discriminating mercy, to which alone you owe your exemption from miseries. Boyle.

DISCRI'MINATE.* adj. Distinguished by certain tokens from one another.

Oysters and cockles and muscles, which move not, have no discriminate sex. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

DISCRI'MINATELY.* adv. [from discriminate.] Distinctly; minutely.

His conception of an Elegy he has in this Preface very judiciously and discriminately explained. Johnson, Life of Shenstone.

DISCRI'MINATENESS. n. s. [from discriminate.] Distinctness; marked difference. Dict.

DISCRIMINA'TION. n. s. [from discriminatio, Lat.]

1. The state of being distinguished from other persons or things.

There is a reverence to be shewed them on the account of their discrimination from other places, and separation for sacred uses. Stilling fleet.

2. The act of distinguishing one from another; distinction; difference put.

A satire should expose nothing but what is corrigible, and make a due discrimination between those that are, and those who are not the proper objects of it. Addison, Spectator.

By that prudent discrimination made between the offenders of different degrees, he obliges those whom he has distinguished as objects of mercy. Addison, Freeholder.

3. The marks of distinction.

Take heed of abetting any factions, or applying any publick discriminations in matters of religion. King Charles.

Letters arise from the first original discriminations of voice, by way of articulation, whereby the ear is able to judge and observe the differences of vocal sounds. Holder.

DISCRI'MINATIVE. adj. [from discriminate.]

1. That makes the mark of distinction; characteristical.

The only standing test, and discriminative characteristick of any metal or mineral, must be sought for in the constituent matter of it. Woodward.

2. That observes distinction.

Discriminative Providence knew before the nature and course of all things. More, Antid. against Atheism.

DISCRI'MINATIVELY.* adv. [from discriminative.] In an observance of due distinction.

But if the name of God be prophaned by the disesteem and misusage of the things it is called upon, then surely it is sanctified when the same are worthily and discriminatively used, that is, as becometh the relation they have to him. Mede, Diatr. p. 62.

DISCRI'MINOUS. adj. [from discrimen, Latin.] Dangerous; hazardous. Not usual.

Any kind of spitting of blood imports a very discriminous state, unless it happens upon the gaping of a vein opened by a plethory. Harvey on Consumptions.

DISCRU'CIATING.* adj. [Lat. discrutio.] Painful.

To single hearts doubling is discruciating. Brown, Chr. Mor. ii. 20.

DISCU'BITORY. adj. [discubitorius, Lat.] Fitted to the posture of leaning.

After bathing they retired to bed, and refreshed themselves with a repast; and so that custom, by degrees, changed their cubiculary beds into discubitory. Brown, Vulg. Err.

To DISCU'LPATE.* v. a. [dis and culpo, Lat.] To exculpate; to clear from the imputation of a fault.

If a young wench, to disculpate herself, should tell me in a whimpering tone, that the man who deceived her had eyes irradiated with affection, that their language expressed an unalterable constancy in the most tender accents; I would tell her flatly, that she does not know how to read; that through the mist of her own passion, she might imagine to see fine things; but they were no realities.

Letters on Physiognomy, (1751,) p. 225.

My disculpating him from the charge of fear would awaken, in some of you, a suspicion of a less defensible motive for that retreat. Ashton, Fast Serm. (1758.) Serm. p. 144.

DISCU'MBENCY. n. s. [discumbens, Lat.] The act of leaning at meat, after the ancient manner.

The Greeks and Romans used the custom of discumbency at meals, which was upon their left side; for so their right hand was free and ready for all service. Brown, Vulg. Err.

To DISCU'MBER. v. a. [dis and cumber.] To disengage from any troublesome weight; to disengage from impediment.

His limbs discumber'd of the clinging vest,
He binds the sacred cincture round his breast.
Pope, Odyss.

To DISCU'RE.† v. a. [decouvrir, Fr.]

1. To discover; to reveal. A word perhaps peculiar to Spenser, Dr. Johnson says, meaning in the sense of discover; for another author uses the word differently.

I will, if please you it discure, assay
To ease you of that ill. Spenser, F. Q.

2. To free from cure or charge. [dis and cure.]

Some benefices have actual or habitual cure of souls; others have cure habitually, and are discured actually; others, neither actually nor habitually, but utterly discured. Dr. Tooker, Fabrick of the Ch. 1604, p. 35.

DISCU'RRENT.* adj. [dis and current.] Not current; deprived of circulation.

For any other new [editions] to be set out by their [the papists'] adversaries there is no great fear; whose books being discurrent in all catholicks' countries, their want of means requisite to utter an impression would dishearten them from the charge. Sir E. Sandys, State of Religion.

DISCU'RSIST.* n. s. [Latin, discursus.] An arguer; a disputer. See DISCOURSER.

Great discursists were apt to intrigue affairs, dispute the prince's resolution, and stir up the people. L. Addison's West Barbary, (1671,) Pref.

DISCU'RSIVE. adj. [discursif, Fr. from discurro, Lat.]

1. Moving here and there; roving; desultory.

Some noises help sleep; as the blowing of the wind, and the trickling of water: they move a gentle attention, and whatsoever moveth attention, without too much labour, stilleth the natural and discursive motion of the spirits. Bacon.

2. Proceeding by regular gradation from premises to consequences; argumentative. This is sometimes, perhaps not improperly, written discoursive.

There is a sanctity of soul and body, of more efficacy for the receiving of divine truths, than the greatest pretences to discursive demonstration. More, Divine Dialogue.

There hath been much dispute touching the knowledge of brutes, whether they have a kind of discursive faculty, which some call reason. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

DISCU'RSIVELY. adv. [from discursive.] By due gradation of argument.

We have a principle within, whereby we think, and we know we think; whereby we do discursively, and by way of ratiocination, deduce one thing from another. Hale.

DISCU'RSIVENESS. n. s. [from discursive.] Due gradation of arguments.

The exercise of our minds in rational discursiveness about things in quest of truth — how greatly doth it better us! Barrow, Serm. iii. 22.

DISCU'RSORY.† adj. [discursor, Lat.] Argumental; rational.

Here shall your Majestie find — speculation interchanged with experience, positive theology with polemical, textual with discursory.

Bp. Hall's Works, Dedic.

DI'SCUS. n. s. [Latin.] A quoit; a heavy piece of iron thrown in the ancient sports.

From Elatreus' strong arm the discus flies,
And sings with unmatch'd force along the skies.

Pope, Odyss.

To DISCU'SS.† v. a. [discutio, discussum, Lat.]

1. To examine; to ventilate; to clear by disquisition.

We are to discuss only those general exceptions which have been taken. Hooker.

This knotty point should you and I discuss,
Or tell a tale? Pope.

2. To disperse: commonly applied to a humour or swelling, Dr. Johnson says, citing the example only of Wotton. It is applied to other things.

In their convivial garlands, they had respect unto plants preventing drunkenness, or discussing the exhalations from wine.

Sir T. Brown, Miscell. p. 91.

God infuseth a light discussing those fogs, which steam from carnal sense and appetite, so that we may clearly discern divine truths, the will of God, and the way to happiness. Barrow, Serm. iii. 42.

Many arts were used to discuss the beginnings of new affections. Wotton.

3. To break to pieces.

Consider the threefold effect of Jupiter's trisulk, to burn, discuss, and terebrate.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

4. To shake off. Not now in use.

All regard of shame she had discust.

Spenser, F. Q. iii. i. 41.

DISCU'SSER.† n. s. [from discuss.] One that discusses; an examiner.

A discusser of controversies against Bellarmine and other pontificiars.

A. Wood, Ath. Ox. of Dr. Field.

DISCU'SSING.* n. s. [from discuss.] Examination.

His usage was to commit the discussing of causes privately to certain persons learned in the laws.

Ayliffe, Parergon.

DISCU'SSION. n. s. [from discuss.]

1. Disquisition; examination; ventilation of a question.

Truth cannot be found without some labour and intention of the mind, and the thoughts dwelling a considerable time upon the survey and discussion of each particular. South.

Various discussions tear our heated brain:
Opinions often turn; still doubts remain;
And who indulges thought, increases pain. Prior.

2. [In surgery.] Discussion or resolution is nothing else but breathing out the humours by insensible transpiration.

Wiseman, Surgery.

DISCU'SSIVE. adj. [from discuss.] Having the power to discuss or disperse any noxious matter.

DISCU'TIENT. n. s. [discutiens, Lat.] A medicine that has power to repel or drive back the matter of tumours in the blood. It sometimes means the same as carminative. Quincy.

The swellings arising from these require to be treated, in their beginning, with moderate repellents and discutients. Wiseman.

To DISDA'IN. v. a. [dédaigner, Fr.] To scorn; to consider as unworthy of one's character.

There is nothing so great which I will fear to do for you; nor nothing so small, which I will disdain to do for you. Sidney.

They do disdain us much beyond our thoughts,
Which makes me sweat with wrath. Shakspeare.

What safe and nicely I might well delay
By rule of knighthood, I disdain and spurn.

Shakspeare.

Tell him, Cato
Disdains a life which he has power to offer.

Addison.

To DISDA'IN.* v. n.

1. To scorn; to think unworthy.

Adramelech and Asmadai,
Two potent thrones, that to be less than gods

2. To grow impatient or angry.

Ajax, deprived of Achilles's armour, which he hoped from the suffrage of the Greeks, disdains; and, growing impatient of the injury, rageth and runs mad. B. Jonson, Discoveries.

DISDA'IN. n. s. [sdegno, Ital.] Contempt; scorn; contemptuous anger; indignation.

Children being haughty, through disdain and want of nurture, do stain the nobility of their kindred. Ecclus.

But against you, ye Greeks, ye coward train,
Gods! how my soul is mov'd with just disdain!

Pope, Odyss.

DISDA'INFUL. adj. [disdain and full.] Contemptuous; haughtily scornful; indignant.

There will come a time when three words, uttered with charity and meekness, shall receive a far more blessed reward than three thousand volumes, written with disdainful sharpness of wit. Hooker.

The queen is obstinate,
Stubborn to justice, apt t' accuse it,
Disdainful to be tried by't. Shaks.

Seek through this grove;
A sweet Athenian lady is in love
With a disdainful youth: anoint his eyes;
But do it when the next thing he espies
Shall be the lady. Shaks.

But those I can accuse, I can forgive:
By my disdainful silence let them live. Dryden.
The disdainful soul came rushing through the wound. Dryden.

DISDA'INFULLY. adv. [from disdainful.] Contemptuously; with haughty scorn; with indignation.

Either greet him not,
Or else disdainfully, which shall shake him more.

Shakspeare.

It is not to insult and domineer, to look disdainfully, and revile imperiously, that procures esteem from any one. South.

DISDA'INFULNESS. n. s. [from disdainful.] Contempt; contemptuousness; haughty scorn.

Can I forget, when they in prison placing her,
With swelling heart, in spite and due disdainfulness,
She lay for dead, till I help'd with unlacing her?

Sidney.

A proud disdainfulness of other men. Ascham.

DISDAI'NING.* n. s. Scorn: contempt.

Say her disdainings justly must be grac'd
With name of chast;
And that she frowns lest longing should exceed,
And raging breed:
So her disdains can ne'er offend,
Unless self-love take private end.

Donne, Dialogue with Sir H. Wotton.

DISEA'SE.† n. s. [old Fr. desaise; dis and ease.]

1. Distemper; malady; sickness; morbid state.

What's the disease he means?
——'Tis call'd the evil. Shaks. Macbeth.

And Asa in the thirty and ninth year of his reign was diseased in his feet, and his disease was exceeding great; and in his disease he sought not to the Lord, but to the physicians.

2 Chron. xvi. 12.

It is idle to propose remedies before we are assured of the disease, or to be in pain till we are convinced of the danger.

Swift, Proj. for the Advan. of Religion.

Intemperance
In meats and drinks, which in the earth shall bring Diseases dire. Milton, P. L.

Then wasteful forth
Walks the dire power of pestilent disease.

Thomson, Summer.

2. Uneasiness; Not now in use. But see the second sense of To DISEASE.

Shepherds they weren of the best,
And liv'd in lowly leas;
And, sith their souls be now at rest,
Why done we them disease?

Spenser, Shep. Cal. July.

That night they past in great disease,
Till that the morning, bringing early light
To guide men's labours, brought them also ease.

Spenser, F. Q. vi. v. 40.

To DISEA'SE.† v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To afflict with disease; to torment with pain or sickness; to make morbid; to infect.

We are all diseased,
And with our surfeiting and wanton hours
Have brought ourselves into a burning fever.

Shakspeare.

Flatt'rers yet wear silk, drink wine, lie soft,
Hug their diseas'd perfumes, and have forgot
That ever Timon was. Shakspeare.

Let her alone, lady: as she is now, she will but disease our better mirth. Shakspeare.

He was diseased in his feet. 1 Kings, xv. 23.

A lazar-house it seem'd, wherein were laid
Numbers of all diseas'd, all maladies
Of ghastly spasm, or racking torture.

Milton, P. L.

2. To put to pain; to pain; to make uneasy; to disturb. Dr. Johnson cites only Locke as affording an example of the word thus used: but it is also supported by old and good authority.

What art thou that thus diseasest the king, which is now at his rest? Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 157.

That I should disease myself, or my reader, with a punctual examination of it, may seem superfluous. Chillingworth, Rel. of Prot. iv. § 19.

Though great light be insufferable to our eyes, yet the highest degree of darkness does not at all disease them. Locke.

DISEA'SEDNESS. n. s. [from diseased.] Sickness; morbidness; the state of being diseased.

This is a restoration to some former state; not that state of indigency and diseasedness.

Burnet's Theory.

DISEA'SEFUL.* adj. [disease and full.]

1. Abounding with disease; producing disease.

This great hospital, this sick, this diseaseful world. Donne, Devot. (1625,) p. 275.

But us
Diseaseful dainties, riot and excess,
And feverish luxury destroys.

Dr. Warton, Enthusiast, 1740.

2. Troublesome; occasioning uneasiness.

Where the majesty of a king's house draws recourse and access, it is both disgraceful to the king, and diseaseful to the people, if the ways near about be not fair and good.

Bacon, Charge at the Sess. of the Verge.

DISEA'SEMENT.* n. s. [dis and easement.] Trouble; inconvenience.
It is not probable, that men of great means and plentiful estates will endure the travail, diseasements, and adventures, of going thither in person. Bacon, Consid. on the Plantations in Ireland.

DISE'DGED. adj. [dis and edge.] Blunted; obtunded; dulled.
I grieve myself
To think, when thou shalt he disedg'd by her
Whom now thou tir'st on, how thy memory
Will then be pang'd by me. Shaksp. Cymb.

To DISEMBA'RK. v. a. [dis and embark.] To carry to land.
I must unto the road, to disembark
Some necessaries. Shaksp. Two Gent. of Ver.

To DISEMBA'RK. v. n. To land; to go on land.
There disembarking on the green sea side,
We land our cattle, and the spoil divide.
Pope, Odyssey.

To DISEMBA'RRASS.* v. a. [dis and embarrass.] To free from clog and impediment.
One good effect of this, I hope, may be, that you will have disembarrassed yourself of all sort of business that may detain you here, and so be ready to go with us. Bp. Berkeley's Letters, p. 73.

DISEMBA'RRASSMENT. n. s. [from disembarrass.] Freedom from perplexity.

To DISEMBA'Y.* v. a. [dis and embay.] To clear from the bay.
The fair innamorata ——
Put off from land; and now quite disembay'd,
Her cables coiled, and her anchors weigh'd.
Sherburne's Poems, Forsaken Lydia.

To DISEMBI'TTER. v. a. [dis and embitter.] To sweeten; to free from bitterness; to clear from acrimony; an unusual word.
Encourage such innocent amusements as may disembitter, the minds of men, and make them mutually rejoice in the same agreeable satisfactions. Addison, Freeholder.

DISEMBO'DIED.† adj. [dis and embodied.] Divested of the body. See DISBODIED.

To DISEMBO'DY.* To discharge from military incorporation.
If the same [corps] shall be embodied, then, within two months after, it shall be disembodied, and returned to the respective counties.
Militia Act, 2 Geo. III. ch. 20.

To DISEMBO'GUE.† v. a. [desemboucher, old Fr. Skinner.]
1. To pour out at the mouth of a river; to vent.
There is no river so small, but diembogues itself into the sea. Hewyt, Serm. (1658) p. 86.
Rivers
In ample oceans disembogu'd, or lost. Dryden, Ovid.
Rolling down, the steep Timavus raves,
And through nine channels disembogues his waves.
Dryden, Æn.
2. To eject; to cast forth.
If I get in adoors, not the power o' th' country,
Nor all my Aunt's curses shall disembogue me.
Beaum. and Fl. Little Thief.
By these and the like performances, they were grown sufficiently replete, they would immediately depart and disembogue, for the publick good, a plentiful share of their acquirements into their disciples' chaps. Swift, Tale of a Tub.

To DISEMBO'GUE.† v. n. To gain a vent; to flow.
My ships ride in the bay,
Ready to disembogue, tackled, and mann'd,
Even to my wishes.
Beaum. and Fl. Knight of Malta.
By eminences placed up and down the globe, the rivers make innumerable turnings and windings, and at last disembogue in several mouths into the sea. Cheyne.
O'erwhelming turrets threaten e'er they fall;
Volcanoes bellow e'er they disembogue.
Young, Night Th. 3.

DISEMBO'SOMED.* part. adj. [dis and embosom.] Separated from the bosom.
Uninjur'd from our praise can He escape,
Who, disembosom'd from the Father, bows
The heaven of heavens, to kiss the distant earth?
Young, Night Th. 9.

DISEMBO'WELLED. participial adj. [dis and embowel.] Taken from out the bowels.
So her disembowell'd web,
Arachne in a hall or kitchen spreads,
Obvious to vagrant flies. Philips.

To DISEMBRA'NGLE.* v. a. [from dis and brangle, to wrangle. See To BRANGLE.] To free from squabble, litigation, or impediment.
For God's sake disembrangle these matters, that I may once be at ease to mind my other affairs of the college, which are enough to employ ten persons. Bp. Berkeley's Letters, p. 109.

To DISEMBRO'IL. v. a. [debouiller, French.] To disentangle; to free from perplexity; to reduce from confusion.
Then earth from air, and seas from earth were driv'n,
And grosser air sunk from etherial heav'n;
Thus disembroil'd, they take their proper place.
Dryden.
The system of his politicks is disembroiled, and cleared of all those incoherences and independent matters that are woven into this motley piece.
Addison, Whig Examiner.

To DISENA'BLE.† v. a. [dis and enable.] To deprive of power; to disable; to sink into weakness; to weaken.
'Nor have they done any thing of late with more diligence, than to hinder or break the happy assembling of parliaments, however needful to repair the shattered and disjointed frame of the commonwealth; or if they cannot do this, to cross, to disenable, and traduce all parliamentary proceedings. Milton, Reason. of Ch. Government.
Now age has overtaken me; and want, a more insufferable evil, through the change of the times, has wholly disenabled me. Dryden.

To DISENCHA'NT. v. a. [dis and enchant.] To free from the force of an enchantment; to deliver from the power of charms or spells.
Alas! let your own brain disenchant you. Sidney.
Muse, stoop thy disenchanted wing to truth.
Denham.
Haste to thy work; a noble stroke or two
Ends all the charms, and disenchants the grove.
Dryden.

DISENCHA'NTER.* n. s. [from disenchant.] One who frees from the power of enchantment.
Disenchanters of negromancers, disrobers of gypsies, &c. Gayton, Notes on Don Quixote, p. 119.

To DISENCU'MBER. v. a. [dis and encumber.]
1. To discharge from incumbrances; to free from clogs and impediments: to disburthen; to exonerate.
It will need the actual intention, the particular stress and application of the whole soul, to disencumber and set it free, to scour off its rust, and remove those hindrances which would otherwise clog and check the freedom of its operations. Sprat.
The disencumber'd soul
Flew off, and left behind the clouds and starry pole. Dryden.
Dreams look like the amusements of the soul, when she is disencumbered of her machine; her sports and recreations, when she has laid her charge asleep. Spectator.
2. To free from obstruction of any kind.
Dim night had disencumber'd heav'n.
Milton, P. L.
The church of St. Justina, designed by Palladio, is the most handsome, luminous, disencumbered building, in the inside, that I have ever seen.
Addison on Italy.

DISENCU'MBRANCE. n. s. [from the verb.] Freedom from encumbrance and obstruction.
There are many who make a figure below what their fortune or merit entitles them to, out of mere choice, and an elegant desire of ease and disencumbrance. Spectator.

To DISENGA'GE. v. a. [dis and engage.]
1. To separate from any thing with which it is in union.
Some others, being very light, would float up and down a good while, before they could wholly disengage themselves and descend.
Burnet's Theory.
2. To disentangle; to clear from impediments or difficulties.
From civil broils he did us disengage;
Found nobler objects for our martial rage. Waller.
In the next paragraph, I found my author pretty well disengaged from quotations. Atterbury.
3. To withdraw; applied to the affection; to wean; to abstract the mind.
It is requisite that we should acquaint ourselves with God, that we should frequently disengage our hearts from earthly pursuits. Atterbury.
The consideration that should disengage our fondness from worldly things, is, that they are uncertain in their foundation, fading, transient, and corruptible in their nature. Rogers.
4. To free from any powerful detention.
When our mind's eyes are disengag'd and free,
They clearer, farther, and distinctly see. Denham.
5. To release from an obligation.

To DISENGA'GE. v. n. To set one's self free from; to withdraw one's affections from.
Providence gives us notice, by sensible declensions, that we may disengage from the world by degrees. Collier on Thought.

DISENGA'GED.† participial adj. [from disengage.]
1. Disjoined; disentangled.
2. Vacant; at leisure; not fixed down to any particular object of attention.
Every thing, he says, must be in a free and disengaged manner. Spectator, No. 618.
3. Released from obligation.

DISENGA'GEDNESS. n. s. [from disengage.] The quality of being disengaged; vacuity of attention; freedom from any pressing business; disjunction.

DISENGA'GEMENT.† n. s. [from disengage.]
1. Release from any engagement, or obligation.
Those who — apply themselves to God by earnest prayer, feel a disengagement from [evil] impressions, and themselves endued with a power to resist them.
Burnet, Life of Lord Rochester, p. 47.
2. Freedom of attention; vacancy.

To DISENNO'BLE.* v. a. [dis and ennoble. Buck, in his history of Richard the third, uses the verb disnoble.] To deprive of that which ennobles a person.

An unworthy behaviour degrades and disennobles a man in the eye of the world, as much as birth and family aggrandize and exalt him.
Guardian, No. 137.

To DISENRO'LL.* v. a. [dis and enroll.] To erase or remove out of a roll or list.
He will not disenroll
Your name. Donne, Poems, p. 164.

To DISENSLA'VE. v. a. [dis and enslave.] To redeem from slavery; to set free.
By so doing, he shall disenslave and redeem his soul from a captivity to the things he enjoys.
South, Serm. vol. 2. S. 2.
Disenslave him from the bondage of Satan.
More, Myst. of God. p. 244.

To DISENTA'NGLE. v. a. [dis and entangle.
1. To unfold or loose the parts of any thing interwoven with one another.
Though in concretions particles so entangle one another, that they cannot in a short time clear themselves, yet they do incessantly strive to disentangle themselves and get away. Boyle.
2. To set free from impediments; to disembroil; to clear from perplexity or difficulty.
Till they could find some expedient to explicate and disentangle themselves out of this labyrinth, they made no advance towards supplying their armies. Clarendon.
The welfare of their souls requires a better judgment than their own, either to guide them in their duty, or to disentangle them from a temptation. South.
3. To disengage; to separate.
Neither can God himself be otherwise understood by us than as a mind free, and disentangled from all corporeal mixtures. Stilling fleet.

DISENTA'NGLEMENT. n. s. [from disentangle.] The act of clearing from perplexity or difficulty.
In the disentanglement of this distressful tale, we are happy to find, that all his cruelty was tenderness, and his inconstancy the most invariable truth. Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, iii. 160.

To DISENTE'RRE. v. a. [dis and enterrer, French.] To unbury; to take out of the grave.
Though the blindness of some fanaticks have savaged on the bodies of the dead, and have been so injurious unto worms as to disenterre the bodies of the deceased, yet had they therein no design upon the soul. Brown, Vulg. Err.

To DISENTHRA'L. v. a. [dis and enthral.] To set free; to restore to liberty; to rescue from slavery.
But God my soul shall disenthral;
For I upon his name will call. Sandys.
If religion were false, bad men would set the utmost force of their reason on work to discover that falsity, and thereby disenthral themselves. South.

To DISENTHRO'NE.† v. a. [dis and enthrone.] To depose from sovereignty; to dethrone.
The poets feign that the angry Earth, to be revenged of the gods, brought forth the Titans, as after the giants; who, by throwing mountains upon mountains, attempted to scale the heavens, and disinthrone Jupiter.
Sandys, Notes on Christ's Passion, (1640.)
Either to disenthrone the king of heav'n
We war, if war be best; or to regain
Our own right lost. Milton, P. L.

To DISENTI'TLE.* v. a. [dis and entitle.] To deprive of claim or title.
The reason that every ordinary offence does not disentitle a son to the love of his father, as it does the creature to the protection and favour of his Creator, is not from the obliging nature of that relation beyond the other, but from the law and command of God. South, Serm. viii. 137.

To DISENTRA'NCE. v. a. [dis and entrance.] To awaken from a trance, or deep sleep.
Ralpho, by this time disentranc'd,
Upon his bum himself advanc'd. Hudibras.

DISE'RT.* adj. [Lat. disertus.] Eloquent. Not in use.
Mr. A. Wootton, a very learned and disert man, was inhibited to preach.
MS. of 1604, cited by Ward, Gresh. Prof. p. 39.

DISE'RTLY.* adv. [from disert.] Eloquently.
He endeavoured it not directly and desertly, but under a close and borrowed pretext.
Sir G. Buck, Hist. Rich. III.

To DISESPO'USE. v. a. [dis and espouse.] To separate after faith plighted.
Such was the rage
Of Turnus for Lavinia disespous'd. Milton, P. L.

DISESTE'EM.† n. s. [dis and esteem.] Slight regard; a disregard more moderate than contempt.
Though outward things can add nothing to our essential worth; yet when we are judged of by the help of others' outward senses, they much conduce to value or disesteem. Feltham, Res. i. 18.
As it is a particular disesteem of every knowing person alive, and most injurious to the written labours and monuments of the dead, so to me it seems an undervaluing and vilifying of the whole nation. Milton, Areopagitica.
This amongst us, is so little cared for, finds such disesteem and slight observance when it appears; meets with such resolute hardened stubborn hearts, that it is a miracle, if it ever be brought to submit itself to such coarse entertainment.
Hammond, Serm. xvii.
When any one, by miscarriage, falls into disesteem, he will fall under neglect and contempt.
Locke.

To DISESTEE'M.† v. a. [from the noun.] To regard slightly; to consider with a slight degree of contempt.
Common people do sometimes also disesteem the prince for external and light causes, as deformity of person, sickness, or such like.
Ralegh, Arts of Empire, p. 67.
Should Mars see't,
That horrid hurrier of men, or she that betters him, Minerva, never so incens'd they could not disesteem.
Chapman.
It were an injury to gratitude,
To disesteem her favours.
Beaum. and Fl. Laws of Candy.
But if this sacred gift you disesteem,
Then cruel plagues shall fall on Priam's state.
Denham.
I would not be thought to disesteem or dissuade the study of nature. Locke.

DISESTIMA'TION.† n. s. [dis and æstimatio, Lat.] Disrespect; disesteem. Dict.
Three kinds of contempt; disestimation, disappointment, calumny.
Bp. Reynolds on the Passions, ch. 30.

To DISE'XERCISE.* v. a. [dis and exercise.] To deprive of exercise.
It will be primely to the discouragement of all learning, and the stop of truth, not only by disexercising and blunting our abilities, in what we know already, but by hindering and cropping the discovery that might be yet further made, both in religious and civil wisdom. Milton, Areopagitica.

To DISFA'NCY.* v. a. [dis and fancy.] To dislike.
Those are titles that every man will apply as he lists, the one to himself and his adherents, the other to all others that he disfancies. Hammond, Serm. xi.

DISFA'VOUR.* n. s. [dis and favour.]
1. Discountenance; unpropitious regard; unfavourable aspect; unfavourable circumstance.
By the grace of God, I will oppose, to my poor utmost, every the least thing which shall be offered in disfavour to the Established Church.
Abp. Dawes to Bp. Nicholson, (1718.)
A constant course of disfavour from men in authority, would prove a more effectual check to all such miscreants. Bp. Berkeley, Add. to Magistrates.
2. A state of ungraciousness or unacceptableness; a state in which one is not favoured.
While free from sacrilege, he was at peace, as it were, with God and man; but after his sacrilege, he was in disfavour with both. Spelman.
3. Want of beauty. Dict.

To DISFA'VOUR.* v. a. [from the noun.]
1. To discountenance; to withhold or withdraw kindness.
Appius Claudius having lived long an enemy to the multitude, hoping by their aid to continue his authority of the Decemviri in Rome, became their friend, and disfavoured the factions of great men.
Ralegh, Arts of Empire, p. 198.
Might not those of higher rank, and nearer access to her majesty, receive her own commands, and be countenanced or disfavoured according as they obey? Swift.
2. To deform.
Rub these hands
With what may cause an eating leprosy,
E'en to my bones and marrow; any thing,
That may disfavour me, save in my honour.
B. Jonson, Fox.

DISFA'VOURER. n. s. [from disfavour.] Discountenancer; not a favourer.
It was verily thought, that had it not been for four great disfavourers of that voyage, the enterprize had suceeeded. Bacon.

DISFIGURA'TION.† n. s. [from disfigure.]
1. The act of disfiguring.
2. The state of being disfigured.
We shall see the face of the holy ministry restored, without any disfiguration or essential change, by any such mask as might sometimes be upon it.
Bp. Ganden's Hierasptistes, 1653, p. 237.
3. Deformity.

To DISFI'GURE. v. a. [dis and figure.] To change any thing to a worse form; to deform; to mangle.
You are but as a form in wax
By him imprinted, and within his power
To leave the figure, or disfigure it. Shakspeare.
In this the antique and well-noted face
Of plain old form is much disfigured. Shakspeare.
Abject is their punishment,
Disfiguring not God's likeness, but their own,
Or, if his likeness, by themselves defac'd.
Milton, P. L.
Uriel, on the Assyrian mount,
Saw him disfigur'd more than could befall
Spirit of happy sort. Milton, P. L.
A nose flatter, or a mouth wider, could have consisted, as well as the rest of his figure, with such a soul and such parts as made him, disfigured as he was, capable to be a dignitary in the church.
Locke.
Nor would his slaughter'd army now have lain
On Africk's sands, disfigur'd with their wounds,
To gorge the wolves and vultures of Numidia.
Addison, Cato.
His long absence, and travels, which had disfigured him, made him altogether unknown.
Broome on Epick Poetry.

DISFI'GUREMENT. n. s. [from disfigure.] Defacement of beauty; change of a better form to a worse.
The disfigurement that travel or sickness has bestowed upon him, is not thought great by the lady of the isle. Suckling.
And they, so perfect is their misery,
Not once perceive their foul disfigurement.
Milton, Comus.

To DISFO'REST. v. a. [dis and forest.] To reduce land from the privileges of a forest to the state of common land.

To DISFRA'NCHISE.† v. a. [dis and franchise.] To deprive of privileges or immunities. Bullokar, and Cockeram.

They went further; they disfranchised them.
Burke, Vindication of Natural Society.

Any particular member may be disfranchised, or lose his place in the corporation, by acting contrary to the laws of his society, or laws of the land.
Blackstone.

DISFRA'NCHISEMENT. n. s. [from disfranchise.] The act of depriving of privileges. Dict.

To DISFU'RNISH. v. a. [dis and furnish.] To deprive; to unfurnish; to strip.

This report was made by one of the conspiratours, and therewith divers other things agreed: the old hostilitie between the houses of Pompey and Cæsar, the wild and seditious wit of Cinna, with the place and time, where and when, the emperour, should be disfurnished of servants.
Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 104.

My riches are these poor habiliments,
Of which if you should here disfurnish me,
You take the sum and substance that I have.
Shakspeare.

He durst not disfurnish that country either of so great a commander, or of the wonted garrisons.
Knolles, History.

To DISFRI'AR.* v. a. [dis and friar.] To abandon the state of a friar.

That over great severity would cause a great number to disfriar themselves, and fly to Geneva.
Sir E. Sandys, State of Religion.

Many did quickly un-nun and disfriar themselves, whose sides formerly used to go loose.
Fuller, Holy War, p. 238.

To DISGA'RNISH. v. a. [dis and garnish.]

1. To strip of ornaments. Dict.
2. To take guns from a fortress.

To DISGA'RRISON.* v. a. [dis and garrison.] To deprive of a garrison.

Dr. Hewyt, Prayer before Serm. (temp. K. Ch. I.)

To DISGLO'RIFY. v. a. [dis and glorify.] To deprive of glory; to treat with indignity.

So Dagon shall be magnify'd, and God,
Besides whom is no god, compar'd with idols,
Disglorify'd, blasphem'd, and had in scorn.
Milton, S. A.

To DISGA'LLANT.* v. a. [dis and gallant.] To deprive of gallantry.

Sir, let not this discountenance or disgallant you a whit, you must not sink under the first disaster.
B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels.

To DISGO'RGE.† v. a. [degorger, Fr. from gorge, the throat.]

1. To discharge by the mouth; to spew out; to vomit.

So, so, thou common dog, did'st thou disgorge
Thy glutton bosom of the royal Richard?
And now thou wouldst eat thy dead vomit up.
Shakspeare.

God knows how many such fools there be in the world, that solemnly resolve themselves to his service, come to the Font to make, to the Table of the Lord to repeat, these vows; and all their lives after do but busy themselves to wipe off the water of one, vomit up, disgorge the other.
Hammond, Serm. v.

Hence come all the jars between learned men, the invectives and bitter books, the wars of criticks, and the controversies of the schools; all managed with such keenness and virulence, throwing dirt, and disgorging daggers at one another's reputation.
South, Serm. ix. 277.

From the distant shore they loudly laught,
To see his heaving breast disgorge the briny draught.
Dryden.

2. To pour out with violence.

All the embossed sores and headed evils,
That thou with licence of free foot hast caught,
Would't thou disgorge into the general world?
Shakspeare.

The deep-drawing barks do there disgorge
Their warlike fraughtage. Shakspeare.

They move along the banks
Of four infernal rivers, that disgorge
Into the burning lake their baleful streams.
Milton, P. L.

Countries, much annoyed with earthquakes, have volcanoes; and these are constantly all in flames, whenever any earthquake happens; they disgorging that fire which was the cause of the disaster. Derham.

DISGO'RGEMENT.* n. s. [from disgorge.] A vomit.

Neither have these prodigious wretches smothered their damnable conceits in their impure breasts, but have boldly vented them to the world, so as the very presses are openly defiled with the most loathsome disgorgements of their wicked blasphemies. Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 162.

To DISG'OSPEL.* v. n. [dis and To gospel; which Dr. Johnson, under that verb, says he never met with but in Shakspeare. But see To GOSPEL.] To differ from the precepts of the gospel.

They possess huge benefices for lazy performances, great promotions only for the execution of a cruel disgospelling jurisdiction.
Milton, Apology for Smectymnuus.

To DISGRA'CE. n. s. [disgrace, Fr.]

1. State of being out of favour.
2. State of ignominy; dishonour; state of shame.

Like a dull actor now,
I have forgot my part, and I am out
Even to a full disgrace. Shakspeare.

Poetry, howsoever censured, is not fallen from the highest state of honour to the lowest stair of disgrace. Peacham.

3. Act of unkindness. Obsolete.

To such bondage he was for so many courses tied by her whose disgraces to him were graced by her excellence. Sidney.

4. Cause of shame.

And is it not a foul disgrace,
To lose the boltsprit of thy face? Baynard.

And he whose affluence disdain'd a place,
Brib'd by a title, makes it a disgrace. Brown.

To DISGRA'CE. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To bring a reproach upon; to dishonour, as an agent.

We may not so in any one special kind admire her, that we disgrace her in any other; but let all her ways be according unto their place and degree adored. Hooker.

Men's passions will carry them far in misrepresenting an opinion which they have a mind to disgrace. Burnet.

2. To bring to shame, as a cause: as, His ignorance disgraced him.
3. To put out of favour; as, the minister was disgraced.

DISGRA'CEFUL. adj. [disgrace and full.] Shameful; ignominious; reproachful; procuring shame.

Masters must correct their servants with gentleness, prudence, and mercy; not with upbraiding and disgraceful language, but with such only as may express and reprove the fault, and amend the person. Bp. Taylor, Rule of Living Holy.

To retire behind their chariots was as little disgraceful then, as it is now to alight from one's horse in a battle. Pope.

DISGRA'CEFULLY. adv. [from disgraceful.] In disgrace; with indignity; ignominiously.

The senate have cast you forth
Disgracefully, to be the common tale
Of the whole city. B. Jonson, Catilvne.

DISGRA'CEFULNESS. n. s. [from disgraceful.] Ignominy.

DISGRA'CER.† n. s. [from disgrace.] One that exposes to shame; one that causes ignominy.

The Jesuits — affecters of superiority, and disgraceers of all that refuse to depend upon them.
Sir E. Sandys, State of Religion.

I have given good advice to those infamous disgracers of the sex and calling. Swift.

DISGRA'CIOUS. adj. [dis and gracious.] Unpleasing.

I do suspect I have done some offence,
That seems disgracious in the city's eyes. Shaksp.

To DISGRA'DE.* v. a. Our old word for degrade. See To DEGRADE. To disgrade a clerk, a knight, a lord, was formerly, to deprive them of their state and privileges. V. Cowel in V. DISGRADING.

To DI'SGREGATE.* v. a. [dis and grex, gregis, Lat. A serviceable word, as the opposite to congregate; and is indeed in our old lexicography, though unnoticed by Dr. Johnson.] To separate; to disperse.

But truth doth clear, unweave, and simplify,
Search, sever, pierce, open, and disgregate
All ascititious cloggings. More, Song of the Soul, ii. iii. 25.

Black doth congregate, unite, and fortify the sight; the other [white] disgregate, scatter, and enfeeble it, when it fixeth upon any object.
Howell, Let. i. vi. 55.

To DISGUI'SE v. a. [deguiser, Fr. dis and guise.]

1. To conceal by an unusual dress.

How might we disguise him?
—— Alas, I know not: there is no woman's gown big enough for him. Shaks. Mer. W. of Windsor.

Disguis'd he came; but those his children dear
Their parent soon discern'd, through his disguise.
Milton, P. L.

2. To hide by a counterfeit appearance; to cloak by a false shew: as, he disguised his anger.
3. To disfigure; to change the form.

They saw the faces which too well they knew,
Though then disguis'd in death, and smear'd all o'er
With filth obscene, and dropping putrid gore.
Dryden, Æn.

More duteous at her call,
Than at Circean call the herd disguis'd.
Milton, P. L.

Ulysses wakes, not knowing the place where he was; because Minerva made all things appear in a disguised view. Pope.

4. To deform by liquor: a low term.

I have just left the right worshipful and his myrmidons, about a sneaker of five gallons: the whole magistracy was pretty well disguised before I gave them the slip. Spectator.

DISGU'ISE.† n. s. [from the verb.]

1. A dress contrived to conceal the person that wears it.

They generally act in a disguise themselves, and therefore mistake all outward show and appearances for hypocrisy in others. Addison.

Since I in Arcite cannot Arcite find,
The world may search in vain with all their eyes,
But never penetrate through this disguise.
Dryden, Fables.

2. A false appearance; counterfeit show.
Hence guilty joys, distastes, surmises,
False oaths, false tears, deceits, disguises. Pope.

3. Disorder by drink.
You see we've burnt our cheeks; and mine own tongue
Splits what it speaks: the wild disguise hath almost Antickt us. Shakspeare, Ant. and Cleop.

4. A mask, or interlude. See DISGUISING.
[He] that made disguises
For the king's sons, and writ in ballad royal Daintily well. B. Jonson, Fortun. Isles.
O what a mask was there, what a disguise!
Milton, Ode on the Passions.

DISGUI'SEDLY.* adv. [from disguise.] So as to be concealed.
He [bishop Williams] studied schism, and faction, by his own example, and his pen disguisedly.
Dr. Barnard's Life of Heylin, 1683, p. 172.

DISGUI'SEMENT. n. s. [from disguise.] Dress of concealment.
Under that disguisement I should find opportunity to reveal myself to the owner of my heart.
Sidney.
The marquis thought best to dismask his beard, and told him, that he was going covertly to take a secret view of the forwardness of his majesty's fleet: this did somewhat handsomely heal the disguisement. Wotton.

DISGUI'SER. n. s. [from disguise.]

1. One that puts on a disguise.
I hope he is grown more disengaged from his intentness on his own affairs, which is quite the reverse to you, unless you are a very dexterous disguiser. Swift.

2. One that conceals another by a disguise; one that disfigures.
Death's a great disguiser. Shakspeare.

DISGUI'SING.* n. s. [from disguise.]

1. Theatrical pastime; frolick in masks; mummery.
This cristmas [1489] I saw no disguisings, and but right few plays.
Leland's Coll. iii. Append. p. 256.
At such a time
As Christmas, when disguising is o'foot,
To ask of the inventions, and the men,
The wits and the engines that move those orbs!
B. Jonson, Masques.
There were fine and subtle disguisings, masks, and mummeries. Stow, Hist. of Lond. i. 304.
They not only committed to writing the process of the lists, but it was also their business, at magnificent feasts, to describe the number and parade of the dishes, the quality of the guests, the brilliant dresses of the ladies, the courtesy of the knights, the revels, the disguisings, banquets, and every other occurrence most observable in the course of the solemnity. Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, i. 133.

2. The act of giving an appearance of truth to falsehood.
Maugre their calumnies, lies, dreams, and disguisings. Donne, Hist. of the Sept. p. 211.

DISGU'ST n. s. [degout, Fr.]

1. Aversion of the palate from any thing.

2. Ill-humour; malevolence; offence conceived.
The manner of doing is of more consequence than the thing done, and upon that depends the satisfaction or disgust wherewith it is received.
Locke.
Thence dark disgust and hatred, winding wiles,
Coward deceit, and ruffian violence. Thomson.

To DISGU'ST.† v. a. [degouter, Fr. degusto, Latin.]

1. To raise aversion in the stomach; to distaste.
Our sunshine is but yet declining; it may come to set, if we now begin to digust this greatest blessing of religion, which God hath bestowed upon us. Dr. Holdsworth, Serm. at Cambridge, (1642,) p. 37.
There are no such enemies to prince or people, as they who, by any evils, make a breach upon a prince's righteousness. — Seldom do such counsellors go to their graves in peace: sometimes they are given up by princes as a sacrifice to popular fury, to expiate their own guilt; sometimes he disgusts them himself.
Spencer, Righteous Ruler, (1660,) p. 27.
By our own fickleness, and inconstancy, disgusting the deliverance now it is come, which we so earnestly desired before it came.
Tillotson, Serm. xxxii.

2. To strike with dislike; to offend. It is variously constructed with at or with.
If a man were disgusted at marriage, he would never recommend it to his friend. Atterbury.
Those unenlarged souls are disgusted with the wonders which the microscope has discovered.
Watts.

3. To produce aversion: with from.
What disgusts me from having to do with answer-jobbers is, that they have no conscience. Swift.

DISGU'STFUL.† adj. [disgust and full.] Nauseous; that which causes aversion.
We must observe them [silence and solitude] diligently, discreetly, and devoutly; not out of a sullen or melancholy humour, or in a disdainful or disgustful manner.
Spiritual Conquest, (1651,) v. 95.
I have finished the most disgustful task that ever I undertook. Swift.

DISGU'STINGLY.* adv. [from the participle disgusting.] In a manner to disgust.
The road grew mountainous, and more disgustingly bare, except for a mile or two.
Swinburne, Spain, Let. 19.

DISH. n. s. [ðiſc, Sax. dysc, Erse; discus, Lat.]

1. A broad wide vessel, in which food is served up at the table.
Of these he murders one; he boils the flesh,
And lays the mangled morsels in a dish. Dryden.
I saw among the ruins an old heathen altar, with this particularity in it, that it is hollowed like a dish at one end; but it was not this end on which the sacrifice was laid. Addison.

2. A deep hollow vessel for liquid food.
Who would rob a hermit of his weeds,
His few books, or his beads, or maple dish;
Or do his grey hairs any violence? Milton, Comus.
A ladle for our silver dish
Is what I want, is what I wish. Prior.

3. The meat served in a dish: any particular kind of food.
I have here a dish of doves, that I would bestow upon your worship. Shakspeare, Merch. of Ven.
Let's kill him boldly, but not wrathfully;
Let's carve him as a dish fit for the gods,
Not hew him as a carcass fit for hounds.
Shakspeare, J. Cæs.
The contract you pretend with that base wretch,
One bred of alms and foster'd with cold dishes,
With scraps o'th'court; it is no contract, none.
Shakspeare.
'Tis not the meat, but 'tis the appetite
Makes eating a delight;
And if I like one dish
More than another, that a pheasant is. Suckling.
The earth would have been deprived of a most excellent and wholsome fare, and very many delicious dishes that we have the use and benefit of.
Woodward.
Many people would, with reason, prefer the griping of an hungry belly to those dishes which are a feast to others. Locke.

4. A kind of measure among the tinners.
They measure block-tin by the dish, which containeth a gallon. Carew.

To DISH. v. a. [from the noun.] To serve in a dish; to send up to table.
For conspiracy,
I know not how it tastes, though it be dish'd
For me to try. Shakspeare, Wint. Tale.

DISH-CLOUT. n. s. [dish and clout.] The cloth with which the maids rub their dishes.
A dish-clout of Jaquenetta's, he wears next his heart for a favour. Shakspeare, L. Lab. Lost.
Send them up to their masters with a dish-clout pinned at their tails. Swift, Direct. to the Cook.

DISH-WASHER. n. s. [dish and washer.] The name of a bird. Mergus.

DISH-WATER.* n. s. [dish and water.] The water in which dishes are washed.
All my lady's linen sprinkled with suds and dish-water! Beaum. and Fl. Wit without Money.

To DISHABI'LITATE.* v. a. [dis and habilitate.] To disqualify. A word now in common use.

DISHABI'LLE. adj. [deshabillé, Fr.] Undressed; loosely or negligently dressed.
Queens are not to be too negligently dressed or dishabille. Dryden, Dufresnoy.

DISHABI'LLE.† n. s. [We are not indebted to Richardson for the introduction of this substantive, as the solitary example from Clarissa, given by Dr. Johnson, might lead the reader to suppose. In the Guardian it is more fully explained; and when that paper was written, (in 1713,) the substantive was probably just coming into use.] Undress; loose dress.
We have a kind of sketch of dress, if I may so call it, among us, which, as the invention was foreign, is called a dishabille; every thing is thrown on with a loose and careless air; yet a genius discovers itself even through this negligence of dress, just as you may see the masterly hand of a painter in three or four swift strokes of the pencil.
Guardian, No. 149.
A woman who would preserve a lover's respect to her person, will be careful of her appearance before him when in dishabille. Richardson, Clarissa.
The wife at last made her appearance, at once a slattern and a coquette. — She made twenty apologies for being seen in such an odious dishabille.
Goldsmith, Ess. 11.

To DISHA'BIT.† v. a. [This word I have found only in Shakspeare, Dr. Johnson says. It is also used by Carew. And, in modern times, we somestimes use disinhabit for it.] To throw out of place; to drive from their habitation.
But for our approach those sleeping stones,
By the compulsion of their ordinance,
By this time from their fixed beds of lime
Had been dishabited, and wide havock made.
Shakspeare, K Lear.
We must also spare a room in this survey to the poor, of whom few shires can shew more, or own fewer than Cornwall. Ireland prescribeth to be the nursery, which sendeth over yearly, yea and daily, whole ship-loads of these crooked slips; and the dishabited towns afford them rooting.
Carew, Surv. of Cornwall.

DISHARMO'NIOUS.* adj. [from disharmony.] Incongruous.
For though it is true that the animal faculties in angels and men, together with their respective objects, be a part of God's creation; yet their sin proceeded from themselves through an undue and disharmonious connection of those principles, and consists in the abuse of his fatherly indulgence by a wilful immoderation and excess.

Hallywell, Melampr. p. 10.

DISHA'RMONY. n. s. [dis and harmony.] Contrariety to harmony.

To DISHEA'RTEN. v. a. [dis and hearten.] To discourage; to deject; to terrify; to depress.

To dishearten with fearful sentences, as though salvation could hardly be hoped for, is not so consonant with christian charity. Hooker.

Be not disheartened then, nor cloud those looks,
That wont to be more chearful and serene.
Milton, P. L.

Yet neither thus dishearten'd nor dismay'd,
The time prepar'd I waited. Milton, P. L.

It is a consideration that might dishearten those who are engaged against the common adversaries, that they promise themselves as much from the folly of enemies, as from the power of their friends.
Stilling fleet.

Men cannot say, that the greatness of an evil and danger is an encouragement to men to run upon it; and that the greatness of any good and happiness ought in reason to dishearten men from the pursuit of it. Tillotson.

A true christian fervour is more than the alliances of our potent friends, or even the fears of our disheartened enemies. Atterbury.

To DISHE'IR.* v. a. [dis and heir.] To debar from inheritance.

Design'd to hew the imperial cedar down,
Defraud succession, and disheir the crown.
Dryden, Hind and Panther, P. iii.

DISHE'RISON.† n. s. The act of debarring from inheritance. An old word for disheriting. Cowel.

Many a one here is born to a fair estate, and is stripped of it, whether by the just disherison of his offended father, or else by the power or circumvention of an adversary, or by his own misgovernment and unthriftiness. Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 143.

Many mischiefs had in times past happened, and more might happen in times to come, to the disherison of the crown, and great prejudice of the kingdom. Lowth, Life of Wykeham, p. 52.

To DISHE'RIT. v. a. [dis and inherit.] To cut off from hereditary succession; to debar from an inheritance.

He tries to restore to their rightful heritage such good old English words as have been long time out of use, almost disherited. Spenser.

Nor how the Dryads and the woodland train,
Disherited, ran howling o'er the plain.
Dryden, Fables.

DISHE'RITANCE.* n. s. [from disherit.] The state of being cut off from inheritance.

Having chid me almost to the ruin
Of a disheritance, for violating
So continued and so sacred a friendship.
Beaum. and Fl. Fair Maid of the Inn.

To DISHE'VEL. v. a. [descheveler, old Fr.] To spread the hair disorderly; to throw the hair of a woman negligently about her head. It is not often used but in the passive participle.

A gentle lady all alone,
With garments rent and hair dishevelled,
Wringing her hands, and making piteous moan.
Spenser.

After followed great numbers of women weeping, with dishevelled hair, scratching their faces, and tearing themselves, after the manner of the country. Knolles.

A troop of Trojans mix'd with these appear,
And mourning matrons with dishevell'd hair.
Dryden, Æn.

The flames involv'd in smoke
Of incense, from the sacred altar broke,
Caught her dishevell'd hair and rich attire.
Dryden, Æn.

You this morn beheld his ardent eyes,
Saw his arm lock'd in her dishevell'd hair. Smith.

To DISHE'VEL.* v. n. To be spread without order.

Their hair curling, dishevels about their shoulders. Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 300.

DI'SHING. adj. [from dish.] Concave: a cant term among artificers.

For the form of the wheels, some make them more dishing, as they call it, than others; that is, more concave, by setting off the spokes and fellies more outwards. Mortimer.

DISHO'NEST. adj. [dis and honest.]

1. Void of probity; void of faith; faithless; wicked; fradulent.

Justice then was neither blind to discern, nor lame to execute. It was not subject to be imposed upon by a deluded fancy, nor yet to be bribed for a glozing appetite, for an utile or jucundum to turn the balance to a false or dishonest sentence. South.

He lays it down as a principle, that right or wrong, honest and dishonest, are defined only by laws and not by nature. Locke.

2. Unchaste; lewd.

To-morrow will we be married — I do desire it with all my heart; and I hope it is no dishonest desire, to desire to be a woman of the world.
Shakspeare, As you like it.

3. Disgraced; dishonoured.

Dishonest with lopp'd arms the youth appears,
Spoil'd of his nose, and shorten'd of his ears.
Dryden.

4. Disgraceful; ignominious. These two senses are scarcely English, being borrowed from the Latin idiom.

She saw her sons with purple death expire,
Her sacred domes involv'd in rolling fire,
A dreadful series of intestine wars,
Inglorious triumphs and dishonest scars. Pope.

DISHO'NESTLY.† adv. [from dishonest.]

1. Without faith; without probity; faithlessly; wickedly.

I protest he had the chain of me,
Though most dishonestly he doth deny it. Shaksp.

2. Lewdly; wantonly; unchastely.

A wise daughter shall bring an inheritance to her husband; but she that liveth dishonestly is her father's heaviness. Ecc. xxii. 4.

3. In a dishonoured manner.

Marius with no less rancour inflamed, beside a terrible slaughter that he made of noble men leaning to Sylla, also caused Caius Cæsar (who had been both consul and censor, two of the most honourable dignities in the citie of Rome,) to be violently drawen to the sepulture of one Varius, a simple and seditious person, and there to be dishonestly slayne. Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 100. b.

DISHO'NESTY. n. s. [from dishonest.]

1. Want of probity: faithlessness; violation of trust.

Their fortune depends upon their credit, and a stain of open public dishonesty must be to their disadvantage. Swift.

2. Unchastity; incontinence; lewdness.

Mrs. Ford, the honest woman, the modest wife, the virtuous creature, that hath the jealous fool to her husband! I suspect without cause, mistress, do I? Heav'n be my witness you do, if you suspect me of any dishonesty. Shakspeare.

DISHO'NOUR. n. s. [from dis and honour.]

1. Reproach; disgrace; ignominy.

Let not my jealousies be your dishonours,
But mine own safeties. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

He was pleased to own Lazarus even in the dishonours of the grave, and vouchsafed him, in that despicable condition, the glorious title of his friend. Boyle, Seraph. Love.

Take him for your husband and your lord,
'Tis no dishonour to confer your grace
On one descended from a royal race.
Dryden, Fables.

2. Reproach uttered; censure; report of infamy.

So good, that no tongue could ever
Pronounce dishonour of her; by my life
She never knew harm-doing. Shaksp. Hen. VIII.

To DISHO'NOUR.† v. a. [from dis and honour.]

1. To disgrace; to bring shame upon; to blast with infamy.

It is no vicious blot, murther, or foulness,
No unchaste action, or dishonour'd step,
That hath depriv'd me of your grace and favour.
Shakspeare.

This no more dishonours you at all,
Than to take in a town with gentle words,
Which else would put you to your fortune.
Shakspeare, Coriol.

A woman that honoureth her husband shall be judged wise of all; but she that dishonoureth him in her pride, shall be counted ungodly of all.
Eccl. xxvi. 26.

We are not so much to strain ourselves to make those virtues appear in us which we really have not, as to avoid those imperfections which may dishonour us. Dryden, Dufresnoy.

2. To violate chastity.

3. To treat with indignity.

One glimpse of glory to my issue give,
Grac'd for the little time he has to live:
Dishonour'd by the king of men he stands;
His rightful prize is ravish'd from his hands.
Dryden, Iliad.

4. To deprive of ornament.

Last, Winter creeps along with tardy pace,
Sour is his front, and furrow'd is his face,
His scalp, if not dishonour'd quite of hair,
The ragged fleece is thin, and thin is worse than bare. Dryden, Tr. of Ovid, Met. 15.

DISHO'NOURABLE. adj. [from dishonour.]

1. Shameful; reproachful; ignominious.

He did dishonourable find
Those articles which did our state decrease. Daniel.

2. Being in a state of neglect or disesteem.

He that is honoured in poverty, how much more in riches? and he that is dishonourable in riches, how much more in poverty? Ecclus. x. 31.

DISHO'NOURABLY.* adv. [from dishonourable. Ignominiously; neglectedly.

DISHO'NOURER. n. s. [from dishonour.]

1. One that treats another with indignity.

Preaching how meritorious with the gods
It would be, to ensnare an irreligious
Dishonourer of Dagon. Milton, S. A.

2. A violater of chastity.

To DISHO'RN. v. a. [dis and horn.] To strip of horns.

We'll dishorn the spirit,
And mock him home to Windsor. Shakspeare.

DISHU'MOUR. n. s. [dis and humour.] Peevishness; ill humour; uneasy state of mind.

Speaking impatiently to servants, or any thing that betrays inattention or dishumour, are also criminal. Spectator.

DISJE'CTION.* n. s. [Lat. disjectio.] A casting down.

A very striking image of the sudden disjection of Pharaoh's host.
Bp. Horsley's Bib. Criticism, vol. 4. p. 395.

DISIMPRO'VEMENT. n. s. [dis and improvement.] Reduction from a better to a worse state; the contrary to melioration; the contrary to improvement.

The final issue of the matter would be, an utter neglect and disimprovement of the earth. Norris.

I cannot see how this kingdom is at any height of improvement, while four parts in five of the plantations for thirty years past, have been real disimprovements. Swift.

To DISINCA'RCERATE. v. a. [dis and incarcerate.] To set at liberty; to free from prison.

The arsenical bodies being now coagulated, and kindled into flaming atoms, require dry and warm air, to open the earth for to disincarcerate the same venene bodies. Harvey.

DISINCLINA'TION.† n. s. [from disincline.] Want of affection; slight; dislike; ill-will not heightened to aversion.

A gentleman — having a pretty good estate, and a disinclination to books or business. Guardian, No. 131.

Disappointment gave him a disinclination to the fair sex, for whom he does not express all the respect possible. Arbuthnot and Pope.

To DISINCLI'NE. v. a. [dis and incline.] To produce dislike to; to make disaffected; to alienate affection from.

They were careful to keep up the fears and apprehensions in the people of dangers and designs, and to disincline them from any reverence or affection to the queen, whom they begun every day more implacably to hate, and consequently to disoblige. Clarendon.

DISINCLI'NED.* adj. Not averse; not unfavourably disposed.

He valued ancient nobility, and he was not disinclined to augment it with new honours. Burke, Lett. to a Noble Lord.

DISINCORPORA'TION.* n. s. [dis and incorporation.] Deprivation of the rights and privileges of a corporate body.

The bishop of Chichester, in opening the disputation of Henry the Eighth with Lambert, in Westminster Hall, ranked the king's disincorporation of the monks with his rejection of the see of Rome, his abolition of idolatrous adoration, and the introduction of the English Bible, as a matter of an external nature, and in no respect interfering with the essentials of the catholick communion. Warton, Life of Sir T. Pope, p. 41.

DISINGENU'ITY.† n. s. [from disingenuous.] Meanness of artifice; unfairness.

They contract a habit of ill-nature and disingenuity necessary to their affairs, and the temper of those upon whom they are to work. Clarendon.

The remarker citing my words, with extreme disingenuity, leaves out one half of the sentence. Clarke, Evid. of Nat. and Rev. Religion, Pref.

DISINGE'NUOUS. adj. [dis and ingenuous.] Unfair; meanly artful; viciously subtle; sly; cunning; illiberal; unbecoming a gentleman; crafty.

'Tis disingenuous to accuse our age
Of idleness, who all our pow'rs engage
In the same studies, the same course to hold,
Nor think our reason for new arts too old.
Denham.

It was a disingenuous way of proceeding to oppose a judgement of charity concerning their church, to a judgement of reason concerning the nature of actions. Stillingfleet.

There cannot be any thing so disingenuous and misbecoming any rational creature, as not to yield to plain reason and the conviction of clear arguments. Locke.

DISINGE'NUOUSLY.† adv. [from disingenuous.] In a disingenuous manner.

Milton who had a controversy with [bishop] Hall, in a remonstrance called an Apology for Smectymnuus, published in 1641, rather unsuitably and disingenuously goes out of his way to attack these Satires, a juvenile effort of his dignified adversary, and under every consideration alien to the dispute. Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, iv. 50.

DISINGE'NUOUSNESS. n. s. [from disingenuous.] Mean subtlety; unfairness; low craft.

I might press them with the unreasonableness, the disingenuousness of embracing a profession to which their own hearts have an inward reluctance. Government of the Tongue.

DISINHA'BITED.* adj. Deprived of inhabitants. See To DISHABIT.

DISINHE'RISON. n. s. [from dis and inherit.]

1. The act of cutting off from any hereditary succession; the act of disinheriting.

If he stood upon his own title of the house of Lancaster, inherent in his person, he knew it was a title condemned by parliament, and generally prejudged in the common opinion of the realm, that it tended directly to the disinherison of the line of York. Bacon, Hen. VII.

The chief minister of the revenue was obliged to prevent and even oppose such disinherison. Clarendon.

2. The state of being cut off from an heriditary right.

In respect of the effects and evil consequences, the adultery of the woman is worse, as bringing bastardy into a family, and disinherisons or great injuries to the lawful children. Bp. Taylor.

To DISINHE'RIT. v. a. [dis and inherit.] To cut off from an hereditary right; to deprive of an inheritance.

Is it then just with us to disinherit
The unborn nephews, for the father's fault? Davies.

Unmuffle, ye faint stars, and thou, fair moon,—
Stoop thy pale visage through an amber cloud,
And disinherit chaos that reigns here
In double nights of darkness and of shades.
Milton, Comus.

Posterity stands curs'd! fair patrimony,
That I must leave ye, sons! O were I able
To waste it all myself, and leave ye none;
So disinherited, how would ye bless
Me, now your curse! Milton, P. L.

Of how fair a portion Adam disinherited his whole posterity by one single prevarication! South.

To DISINTE'R. v. a. [from dis and inter.] To unbury; to take as out of the grave.

The philosopher, the saint, or the hero, the wise, the good, or the great man, very often lie hid and concealed in a plebeian, which a proper education might have disinterred. Addison.

DISI'NTERESSED. adj. [dis and interesse, French. It is written disinterested by those who derive it immediately from interest, and I think more properly.] Void of regard to private advantage; not biassed by particular views; impartial.

Not that tradition's parts are useless here,
When general, old, disinteress'd, and clear. Dryd.

DIS'INTERESSMENT. n. s. [dis and interessement, Fr.] Disregard to private advantage; disinterest; disinterestedness. This word like charges in the same sentence, is merely Gallick.

He has managed some of the charges of the kingdom with known ability, and laid them down with entire disinteressment. Prior's Postscript.

DISI'NTEREST.† n. s. [dis and interest.]

1. What is contrary to one's wish or prosperity; that which any one is concerned to prevent.

That ye indulge this liberty to yourselves or others, is to cast a stumbling-block before the Children of Israel, and to occasion and encourage many to adhere to the Roman Communino, when they ought to separate from her, that there be no prejudice done to my true Church, nor disinterest to thy Kingdom. More, Expos. of the Seven Churches, p. 73.

They judge it the greatest disinterest to Rome. Glanville.

2. Indifference to profit; superiority to regards of private advantage.

To DISI'NTEREST.* v. a. [from the noun.] To render superiour to private advantage.

A noble courtesy, falling like rain in due season, enslaves a man more than a market-sale among Moors; for it conquers the uncompellable mind, and disinterests man of himself. Feltham, Serm. on St. Luke, xiv. 20.

To DISINTHRO'NE.* See To DISENTHRONE.

DISI'NTERESTED. adj. [from disinterest.]

1. Superiour to regard of private advantage; not influenced by private profit.

As disinterested as you appear to the world, no man is more in the power of that prevailing favourite passion than yourself. Swift.

2. Without any concern in an affair; without fear or hope.

DISI'NTERESTEDLY. adv. [from disinterested.] In a disinterested manner.

DISI'NTESTEDNESS. n. s. [from disinterested.] Contempt of private interest; neglect of personal profit.

These expressions of selfishness and disinterestedness have been used in a very loose and indeterminate manner. Brown.

DISI'NTERESTING.* adj. [from disinterest.] Wanting interest or the power of affecting.

There is such a dull, heavy, succession of long quotations of disinteresting passages, that it makes their method quite nauseous. Warburton, Lett. to Birch.

DISINTE'RMENT.* n. s. [from disinter.] The act of unburying, or removing out of the grave. A narrative of the disinterment of a coffin, hastily supposed to contain the corpse of Milton, was published in 1790.

To DISI'NTRICATE. v. a. [dis and intricate.] To disentangle. Dict.

DISINVALI'DITY.* n. s. [dis and invalidity.] Want of validity.

I do call those some men's doctrines in this point, private opinions; and so well may I do, in respect of the disinvalidity and disproportion of them. Montagu, App. to Cæs. p. 136.

To DISINVI'TE.† v. a. dis and invite.] To retract an invitation. Dict.

The mask was to be put off — I was upon his highness's intimation sent to disinvite them; all which I performed with the French personally, and with the rest by letter. Sir J. Finett, Observ. on For. Ambass. (1656,) p. 143.

To DISINVO'LVE.* v. a. [dis and involve.] To uncover; to disentangle.

And for that second, it is indeed disinvolved of those former difficulties. More, Antid. against Idolatry.

And for Thee,
Creation universal calls around,
To disinvolve the moral world, and give
To nature's renovation brighter charms.
Young, Night Th. 9.

To DISINU'RE.* v. a. [dis and inure.] To deprive of practice, habit, or custom.

Thus much we are hindered and disinured by this course of licensing towards the true knowledge of what we seem to know. Milton, Areopagitica.

To DISJO'IN. v. a. [dejoindre, Fr. dis and join.] To separate; to part from each other; to disunite; to sunder.

Never shall my harp thy praise
Forget, nor from thy father's praise disjoin.
Milton, P. L.

Lest different degree
Disjoin us, and I then too late renounce
Deity for thee, when fate will not permit.
Milton, P. L.

Happier for me, that all our hours assign'd
Together we had liv'd: ev'n not in death disjoin'd.
Dryden.

Never let us lay down our arms against France till we have utterly disjoined her from the Spanish monarchy. Addison.

To DISJO'INT.† v. a. [dis and joint.]

1. To put out of joint.

Be all their ligaments at once unbound,
And their disjointed bones to powder ground.
Sandys, Job, p. 45.

Yet what could swords or poisons, racks or flame,
But mangle and disjoint the brittle frame?
More fatal Henry's words; they murder Emma's frame. Prior.

These dispositions, both of prince and people, had not alone induced him [Robert] to engage in so bold a resolution, with such a breach of his duty and trust, without the practices and instigations of the King of France, who grown jealous of King William's greatness, and envious of his felicity, found no better way of lessening both, than to kindle this fire in his own house, and thereby the most sensibly to disquiet his mind as well as to disjoint his state, and divide his power.
Temple, Introd. of Hist. of Eng. p. 275.

2. To break at junctures; to separate at the part where there is a cement. The word is old in this sense of it.

And as for his coach, seeing it so villainously used and so ill handled as it was, he would not only have it to be unharnissed as I said before, but also unpinned, disjointed, and pulled asunder.
Harmar, Trans. of Beza's Serm. 1587, p. 384.

Mouldering arches, and disjointed columns.
Irene.

3. To break in pieces; to dilaniate.

Rotation must disperse in air,
All things which on the rapid orb appear;
And if no power that motion should controul,
It must disjoint and dissipate the whole.
Blackmore.

Should a barbarous Indian, who had never seen a palace or a ship, view the separate and disjointed parts, he would be able to form but a very lame and dark idea of either of those excellent and useful inventions. Watts.

4. To carve a fowl.

5. To make incoherent; to break the relation between the parts.

The constancy of your wit, was not wont to bring forth such disjointed speeches. Sidney.

But now her grief has wrought her into frenzy,
The images her troubled fancy forms
Are incoherent, wild; her words disjointed. Smith.

To DISJO'INT. v. n. To fall in pieces.

Let both worlds disjoint, and all things suffer,
Ere we will eat our meal in fear. Shaks. Macbeth.

DISJO'INT. participle. [from the verb.] Separated; divided. We now write disjointed.

Young Fortinbras,
Holding a weak supposal of our worth;
Thinks by our late dear brother's death,
Our state to be disjoint and out of frame.
Shakspeare, Hamlet.

DISJO'INTLY.* adv. [from disjoint.] In a divided state.

No one virtue can be without another: St. Ambrose saith, when they are perfect, then are they joined; but, disjointly, no way can they be perfect. Sir M. Sandy's Ess. (1634,) p. 6.

DISJUDICA'TION. n. s. [dijudicatio, Lat.] Judgement; determination: perhaps only mistaken for dijudication.

The disposition of the organ is of great importance in the disjudications we make of colours.
Boyle on Colours.

DISJU'NCT. adj. [disjunctus, Lat.] Disjoined; separate.

DISJU'NCTION. n. s. [from disjunctio, Lat.] Disunion; separation; parting.

You may
Enjoy your mistress now, from whom you see,
There's no disjunction to be made, but by Your ruin. Shakspeare, Wint. Tale.

There is a great analogy between the body natural and politick, in which the ecclesiastical, or spiritual part, justly supplies the part of the soul; and the violent separation of this from the other, does as certainly infer death and dissolution, as the disjunction of the body and the soul in the natural. South.

DISJU'NCTIVE. adj. [disjunctivus, Lat.]

1. Incapable of union.

Such principles, whose atoms are of that disjunctive nature, as not to be united in a sufficient number to make a visible mass. Grew.

2. That which marks separation or opposition; as I love him, or fear him.

There are such words as disjunctive conjunctions. Watts.

3. [In logick.] A disjunctive proposition is when the parts are opposed to one another by disjunctive particles; as, It is either day or night: The weather is either shiny or rainy: Quantity is either length, breadth, or depth. The truth of disjunctives depends on the necessary and immediate opposition of the parts, therefore only the last of these examples is true; but the two first are not strictly true, because twilight is a medium between day and night; and dry cloudy weather is a medium between shining and raining.
Watts, Logick.

A disjunctive sylogism is when the major proposition is disjunctive; as, The earth moves in a circle, or an ellipsis; but it does not move in a circle, therefore it moves in an ellipsis.
Watts, Logick.

DISJU'NCTIVE.* n. s. [from the adjective.] A disjunctive conjunction.

Of these disjunctives some are simple, some adversative; simple, as when we say, Either it is day, or it is night; adversative, as when we say, It is not day, but it is night. Harris, Hermes, ii. 2.

DISJU'NCTIVELY. adv. [from disjunctive.] Distinctly; separately.

What he observes of the numbers disjunctively and apart, reason suggests to be applicable to the whole body united. Causes of the Decay of Piety.

DISK. n. s. [discus, Lat.]

1. The face of the sun, or any planet, as it appears to the eye.

The disk of Phœbus, when he climbs on high,
Appears at first but as a bloodshot eye. Dryden.

It is to be considered, that the rays, which are equally refrangible, do fall upon a circle answering to the sun's disk. Newton.

Mercury's disk
Can scarce be caught by philosophic eye,
Lost in the near effulgence. Thomson.

2. A broad piece of iron thrown in the ancient sports; a quoit.

The crystal of the eye, which in a fish is a ball, in any land animal is a disk or bowl; being hereby fitted for the clearer sight of the object. Grew.

In areas vary'd with mosaic art,
Some whirl the disk, and some the jav'lin dart.
Pope.

DISKI'NDNESS. n. s. [dis and kindness.]

1. Want of kindness; want of affection; want of benevolence.

2. Ill turn; injury; act of malignity; detriment.

This discourse is so far from doing any diskindness to the cause, that it does it a real service.
Woodward.

DISLI'KE. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. Disinclination; absence of affection; the contrary to fondness.

He then them took, and tempering goodly well
Their contrary dislikes with loved means,
Did place them all in order, and compel
To keep themselves within their sundry reigns,
Together link'd with adamantine chains. Spenser.

Your dislikes to whom I would be pleasing,
Do cloud my joys with danger and with sorrow.
Shakspeare.

God's grace, that principle of his new birth, gives him continual dislike to sin.
Hammond, Pract. Catechism.

Our likings or dislikes are founded rather upon humour and fancy than upon reason. L'Estrange.

Sorrow would have been as silent as thoughts, as severe as philosophy. It would have rested in inward senses, tacit dislikes. South.

The jealous man is not angry if you dislike another; but if you find those faults which are in his own character, you discover not only your dislike of another, but of himself. Addison.

2. Discord; dissension; disagreement. This sense is not now in use.

This said Aletes, and a murmur rose
That shew'd dislike among the Christian peers.
Fairfax.

To DI'SLIKE. v. a. [dis and like.] To disapprove; to regard without affection; to regard with ill-will or disgust.

What most he should dislike, seems pleasant to him;
What like, offensive. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

Ye, dislike, and so undo
The players, and disgrace the poet too. Denham.

Whosoever dislikes the digressions, or grows weary of them, may throw them away. Temple.

DISLI'KEFUL. adj. [dislike and full.] Disaffected; malign: not in use.

I think it best, by an union of manners, and conformity of minds, to bring them to be one people, and to put away the dislikeful conceit of the one and the other. Spenser, on Ireland.

To DISLI'KEN. v. a. [dis and like.] To make unlike. Unusual.

Muffle your face,
Dismantle you; and, as you can, disliken
The truth of your own seeming.
Shakspeare, Wint. Tale.

DISLI'KENESS.† n. s. [dis and likeness.] Dissimilitude; not resemblance; unlikeness.

There is much difference: there is a great dislikeness between these things. Wodroephe, Fr. and Eng. Gram. (1623), p. 492.

That which is not designed to represent any thing but itself, can never be capable of a wrong representation, nor mislead us from the true apprehension of any thing by its dislikeness to it; and such, excepting those of substances, are all our own complex ideas. Locke.

DISLI'KER.† n. s. [from dislike.] A disapprover; one that is not pleased.

But whom in wrath she then wounds, she pities, as being an affectionate lover of universal mankind, though an unreconcileable disliker of their vices. More, Conj. Cabb. p. 244.

There is a point, which whoever can touch, will never fail of pleasing a majority, so great that the dislikers will be forced to fall in with the herd. Swift.

To DISLI'MB. v. a. [dis and limb.] To dilaniate; to tear limb from limb. Dict.

To DISLI'MN. v. a. [dis and limn.] To unpaint; to strike out of a picture.

That which is now a horse, even with a thought,
The rack dislimns, and makes it indistinct
As water is in water. Shaksp. Ant. and Cleop.

To DI'SLOCATE. v. a. [dis and locus, Lat.]

1. To put out of the proper place.

After some time the strata on all sides of the globe were dislocated, and their situation varied, being elevated in some places, and depressed in others. Woodward.

2. To put out of joint; to disjoint.

Were't my fitness
To let these hands obey my boiling blood,
They're apt enough to dislocate and tear
Thy flesh and bones. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

DISLOCA'TION.† n. s. [from dislocate.]

1. The act of shifting the places of things.

Either causing a harsh superfluity of like terminations, or else forcing a dislocation of the words too much poetical, and obscure.
Instructions of Oratory, (Ox. 1682,) p. 52.

2. The state of being displaced.

The posture of rocks, often leaning or prostrate, shews that they had some dislocation from their natural site. Burnet.

3. A luxation; a violent pressure of a bone out of the socket, or correspondent part; a joint put out.

It might go awry either within or without the upper, as often as it is forcibly pulled to it, and so cause a dislocation, or a strain. Grew, Museum.

To DISLO'DGE.† v. a. [dis and lodge.]

1. To remove from a place.

You may see — rivers changed, seas dislodged, earth opening, towns swallowed up, and many other such hideous events. Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 71.

The shell-fish which are resident in the depths live and die there, and are never dislodged or removed by storms, nor cast upon the shores; which the littorales usually are. Woodward.

2. To remove from an habitation.

Saint Paul also knoweth not which of the two he should choose, namely, either to be dislodged out of this body, which he especially desired; or to remain in it.
Harmar, Tr. of Beza's Serm. (1586,) p. 239.

These senses lost, behold a new defeat,
The soul dislodging from another seat.
Dryden, Juv.

3. To drive an enemy from a station.

My sword can perfect what it has begun,
And from your walls dislodge that haughty son.
Dryden.

4. To remove an army to other quarters.

The ladies have prevail'd,
The Volscians are dislodg'd, and Marcus gone.
Shakspeare.

To DISLO'DGE.† v. n. To go away to another place.

All this being done while two armies in the field stood gazing on, the one in reverence of such nobleness quietly gave back and dislodged; the other, spite of the unruliness, and doubted fidelity in some regiments, was either persuaded or compelled to disband and retire home.
Milton, Apology for Smectymnuus.

Though there is no violence used to drive out an inhabitant, yet bad accommodations will make him dislodge. South, Serm. ix. 157.

Soon as midnight brought on the dusky hour,
Friendliest to sleep, and silence, he resolv'd
With all his legions to dislodge. Milton, P. L.

DISLO'YAL. adj. [desloyal, Fr.; dis and loyal.]

1. Not true to allegiance; faithless; false to a sovereign; disobedient.

Foul distrust and breach
Disloyal on the part of man; revolt
And disobedience. Milton, P. L.

2. Dishonest; perfidious. Obsolete.

Such things, in a false disloyal knave,
Are tricks of custom; but, in a man that's just,
They're cold delations working from the heart,
That passion cannot rule. Shakspeare, Othello.

3. Not true to the marriage-bed.

The lady is disloyal.
—— Disloyal! The word is too good to paint out her wickedness. Shakspeare.
Disloyal town!
Speak, didst not thou
Forsake thy faith, and break thy nuptial vow?
Dryden.

4. False in love; not constant. The three latter senses are now obsolete.

DISLO'YALLY. adv. [from disloyal.] Not faithfully; treacherously; disobediently.

DISLO'YALTY. n. s. [from disloyal.]

1. Want of fidelity to the sovereign.

Let the truth of that religion I profess be represented to judgement, not in the disguises of levity, schism, heresy, novelty and disloyalty. King Charles.

2. Want of fidelity in love. A sense now obsolete.

There shall appear such seeming truths of Hero's disloyalty, that jealousy shall be called assurance. Shakspeare.

DI'SMAL.† adj. [dies malus, Latin, an evil day. Or, according to Serenius, from the Goth. Dys, a revengeful goddess, and mal or mel, a set time; whence dismal, q. d. dysas mel, a day of vengeance.] Sorrowful; dire; horrid; melancholy; uncomfortable; unhappy; dark.

The thane of Cawder gan a dismal conflict. Shakspeare.

He hears
On all sides from innumerable tongues
A dismal universal hiss. Milton, P. L.
Nor yet in horrid shade or dismal den,
Nor nocent yet; but on the grassy herb,
Fearless, unfear'd he slept. Milton, P. L.
The dismal situation waste and wild,
A dungeon horrible! Milton, P. L.
Such a variety of dismal accidents must have broken the spirits of any man. Clarendon.
On the one hand set the most glittering temptations to discord, and on the other view the dismal effects of it. Decay of Piety.
Dreadful gleams,
Dismal screams. Pope.

DI'SMALLY. adv. [from dismal.] Horribly; sorrowfully; uncomfortably.

DI'SMALNESS. n. s. [from dismal.] Horrour; sorrow.

To DISMA'NTLE.† v. a. [dis and mantle.]

1. To deprive of a dress; to strip; to denude.

He that makes his prince despised and undervalued, and beats him out of his subjects' hearts, may easily strip him of his other garrisons, having already dispossessed him of his strongest, by dismantling him of his honour, and seizing his reputation. South.

2. To loose; to throw off a dress; to throw open.

This is most strange!
That she, who ev'n but now was your best object,
Dearest and best, should in this trice of time
Commit a thing so monstrous, to dismantle
So many folds of favour. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

3. To strip a town of its outworks.

In the fulness of time a conspicuous and most remarkable providence appeared for the rescue of mankind; and the meek Lamb of God came down to break in pieces the kingdom of darkness, to dismantle all the strong holds, to reduce revolted man to his former fealty and allegiance, and to take into his hands the government of the whole world. Halliwell, Melampro. p. 34.

4. To break down any thing external.

His eye balls, rooted out, are thrown to ground;
His nose dismantled, in his mouth is found;
His jaws, cheeks, front, one undistinguish'd wound. Dryden.

DISMA'NTLING.* n. s. [from dismantle.] The act of stripping a town of its bulwarks.

To DISMA'SK.† v. a. [dis and mask.] To divest of a mask; to uncover from concealment.

Fair ladies mask'd, are roses in the bud;
Or angels veil'd in clouds: are roses blown,
Dismask'd, their damask sweet commixture shewn.
Shakspeare.

Counterfeiting at length will be dismasked; and hypocrisy appear in the true comportment.
Montagu, App. to Cæs. p. 308.

The marquess thought best to dismask his beard; and told him, that he was going covertly. Wotton.

To DISMA'Y.† v. a. [desmayar, Spanish; esmayer, old Fr. dasmadur, Su. Goth. astonished.] To terrify; to discourage; to affright; to depress; to deject.

Their mighty strokes their haberjeons dismay'd. Spenser.

Enemies would not be so troublesome to the western coasts, nor that country itself would be so often dismayed with alarms as they have of late years been. Ralegh, Essays.

He will not fail thee; fear not, neither be dismayed. Deut. xxxi. 8.

Nothing can make him remiss in the practice of his duty, no prospect of interest can allure him, no fear of danger dismay him. Atterbury.

DISMA'Y. n. s. [desmayo, Spanish.] Fall of courage; terrour felt; desertion of mind; fear impressed.

All sate mute,
Pondering the danger with deep thoughts; and each
In other's countenance read his own dismay.
Milton, P. L.

This then not minded in dismay, yet now
Assures me that the bitterness of death
Is past. Milton, P. L.

DISMA'YEDNESS. n. s. [from dismay.] Dejection of courage; dispiritedness.

The valiantest feels inward dismayedness, and yet the fearfullest is ashamed fully to shew it. Sidney.

DI'SME.† n. s. [French.] A tenth; the tenth part; tithe.

And thus the wars they beginne,
Whereof the holy church is taxed,
That in the point, as it is axed,
The disme go'th to the battaile.
Gower, Conf. Am. Prol.

Since the first sword was drawn about this question,
Ev'ry tithe soul 'mongst many thousand dismes,
Hath been as dear as Helen.
Shakspeare, Troil. and Cress.

The pope began to exercise his new rapines by a compliance with king Edward, in granting him two years' disme from the clergy.
Ayliffe's Parergon.

To DISME'MBER. v. a. [dis and member. To divide member from member; to dilacerate; to cut in pieces.

I am with both, each army hath a hand;
And in their rage, I having hold of both,
They whirl asunder, and dismember me. Shaks.

O, that we then could come by Cæsar's spirit,
And not dismember Cæsar! But, alas!
Cæsar must bleed for it. Shakspeare.

A state can never arrive to its period in a more deplorable crisis, than when some prince lies hovering, like a vulture, to devour, or dismember its dying carcass. Swift.

Fowls obscene dismember'd his remains,
And dogs had torn him on the naked plains.
Pope, Odyssey.

Those who contemplate only the fragments or pieces of science, dispersed in short unconnected discourses, can never survey an entire body of truth, but must always view it as deformed and dismembered. Watts.

DISME'MBERMENT.* n. s. [from dismember.] Division.

Without entering into speculations about her dismemberment whilst she is adding great nations to her empire, is it then quite so certain, that the dissipation of France into such a cluster of petty republicks would be so very favourable to the true balance of power in Europe, as this author imagines it would be? Burke on a Regicide Peace.

DISME'TTLED.* adj. [dis and mettled. A good word, as the opposite to mettled; but hitherto wholly unnoticed.] Without spirit or fire; without exertion.

Thy vigorous brain relieves from lazy rust,
Di-guis'd in characters, but more in rust,
Gray customs, which our dead dismettled sloth
Gave up, to surfeit the undaring north.
Llewellyn, Verses, pref. to Gregory's Posthum. 1650.

To DISMI'SS. v. a. [dismissus, Lat.]

DISNA'TURED.† adj. [old Fr. desnaturé.] Unnatural; wanting natural tenderness; devoid of natural affection. Unusual.

If she must teem,
Create her child of spleen, that it may live,
And be a thwart disnatur'd torment to her.
Shakspeare, K. Lear.

DISOBE'DIENCE.† n. s. [dis and obedience. This word is rarely used in the plural number. No example of the word, given by Dr. Johnson, shews it in that number. Bishop Hall has employed it: "Oppressions, sacrileges, disobediences." Rem. p. 78.]

1. Violation of lawful command or prohibition; breach of duty due to superiours.

Th' offence is holy that she hath committed,
And this deceit loses the name of craft,
Of disobedience, or unduteous title. Shakspeare.

Of man's first disobedience, and the fruit
Of that forbidden tree, sing heav'nly muse.
Milton, P. L.

Murder, adultery, or disobedience to parents, have a general notion antecedently to laws.
Stilling fleet.

This is not disobedience, but rebellion; 'tis disclaiming the sovereignty of Christ, and renouncing all allegiance to his authority. Rogers.

Incompliance.

If planetary orbs the sun obey,
Why should the moon disown his sovereign sway;
Why in a whirling eddy of her own
Around the globe terrestrial should she run?
This disobedience of the moon will prove
The sun's bright orb does not the planets move.
Blackmore.

DISOBE'DIENT. adj. [dis and obedient.] Not observant of lawful authority; guilty of the breach of lawful commands or prohibition.

The man of God was disobedient unto the word of the Lord. 1 Kings, xiii. 26.

Nor willing to forsake this pleasant land. Denham.

DISOBLIGA'TION. n. s. [dis and obligation.] Offence; cause of disgust.

If he receded from what he had promised, it would be such a disobligation to the prince that he would never forget it. Clarendon.

There can be no malice, and consequently no crime or disobligation. L'Estrange.

DISO'BLIGATORY.* adj. [dis and obligatory.] Releasing obligation.

You much mistake in alleging, that the two houses of parliament, especially as they are now constituted, can have this disobligatory power.
K. Charles, Lett. to Henderson, p. 20.

To DISOBLI'GE.† v. a. [dis and oblige.]

1. To offend; to disgust; to give offence to. A term by which offence is tenderly expressed.

Ashley had been removed from that charge, and was thereby so much disobliged that he quitted the king's party. Clarendon.

Those, though in highest place, who slight and disoblige their friends, shall infallibly come to know the value of them, by having none, when they shall most need them. South.

It is in the power of more particular persons in this kingdom, than in any other, to distress the government, when they are disobliged.
Addison, Freeholder.

My plan has given offence to some gentlemen, whom it would not be very safe to disoblige.
Addison, Guardian.

We love and esteem our clergy, and are apt to lay some weight upon their opinion, and would not willingly disoblige them.
Swift on the Sacramental Test.

If a woman suffers her lover to see she is loth to disoblige him, let her beware of an encroacher.
Richardson, Clarissa.

2. To release from an obligation. See DISOBLIGATORY. Dr. Johnson has overpassed this meaning, which appears to have been very common.

And if even infidelity have not power to disoblige the wife or husband, much less, heresy.
Bp. Hall, Cases of Conscience.

No unkindness of a brother can wholly rescind that relation, or disoblige us from the duties annexed thereto. Barrow, Serm. vol. i. S. 30.

His majesty was graciously pleased to sign me some papers, to disoblige me in a promise I had made to Sir Guy Palmes.
Sir J. Bowring's Secret Transactions of K. Ch. I. in Lord Halifax's Miscell. (1703,) p. 123.

DISOBLI'GER.* n. s. [from disoblige.] One who offends another.

There is no precept of Christianity, wherein the speculation and practice are more distant from one another, than this of loving our enemies, and benefiting our disobligers.
W. Montagu, Dev. Ess. xv. § 5.

DISOBLI'GING. participial adj. [from disoblige.] Disgusting; unpleasing; offensive.

Peremptoriness can befit no form of understanding: it renders wise men disobliging and troublesome, and fools ridiculous and contemptible. Government of the Tongue.

DISOBLI'GINGLY. adv. [from disobliging.] In a disgusting or offensive manner; without attention to please.

DISOBLI'GINGNESS. n. s. [from disobliging.] Offensiveness; readiness to disgust.

This had been a predication of disparates as they call it. Abp. Usher, Answer to the Jesuit Malone, p. 39.

DISPA'RITY. n. s. [from dispar, Latin.]

1. Inequality; difference in degree either of rank or excellence.

Between Elihu and the rest of Job's familiars, the greatest disparity was but in years. Hooker.

Among unequals, what society
Can sort, what harmony or true delight?
Which must be mutual, in proportion due,
Giv'n and receiv'd; but in disparity,
The one intense, the other still remiss,
Cannot well suit with either, but soon prove Tedious alike. Milton, P. L.

There was as great a disparity between the practical dictates of the understanding then and now, as there is between empire and advice, counsel and command. South.

Men ought not to associate and join themselves together in the same office, under a disparity of condition. Ayliffe's Parergon.

Some members must preside, and others obey; and a disparity in the outward condition, is necessary to keep several orders in mutual dependence on each other. Rogers.

DISPA'TCHER.* See DESPATCHER.

To DISPA'UPER.* v. a. [dis and pauper.] To deprive of the claim of a pauper.

If a party has a current income, though no permanent property, he must be dispaupered. Dr. Phillimore's Reports, vol. i. p. 185.

To DISPE'L. v. a. [dispello, Latin.] To drive by scattering; to dissipate.

If the night
Have gathered aught of evil, or conceal'd,
Disperse it, as now light dispels the dark. Milton, P. L.

When the spirit brings light into our minds, it dispels darkness: we see it, as we do that of the sun at noon, and need not the twilight of reason to shew it. Locke.

DISPE'NCE.† n. s. [despence, Fr.] Expence; cost; charge; profusion.

It was a vault ybuilt for great dispence,
With many ranges rear'd along the wall,
And one great chimney, whose long funnel thence
The smoke forth threw. Spenser, F. Q.

Whatever in this worldly state
Is sweet and pleasing unto living sense ——
Was poured forth with plentiful dispence. Spenser, F. Q.

At Court, and in his general deportment, of an affable respect and tractable clearness; in his dispence of a magnificent liberal hand. Sir G. Buck, Hist. of Rich. III.

To DISPE'ND.† v. a. [old French, despendre; Lat. dispendo.] To spend; to consume; to expend.

Every parson, vicar, clerk, or beneficed man within this deanery, having yearly to dispend, in benefices and other promotions of the church, an hundred pound; shall give competent exhibition to one scholar. Injunctions by K. Edw. VI. 1547.

Or some bold baron able to dispend
His fifty pounds a year. Beaum. and Fl. Two Noble Gent.

This second profit of laying them out, to make them eternally profitable unto us, by charitable dispending them; this we owe alone to godliness. Hales, Rem. p. 210.

DISPENDER.* n. s. [from dispend.] Our old word for dispenser. One that distributes. Obsolete.

So a man guess us as mynystris of Christ, and dispenderis of the mynysteries of God. Wicliffe, 1 Cor. iv. 1.

DISPE'NSABLE.* adj. [from dispense.] Capable of being dispensed with.

I conceive that [as to] speculative and dispensable truths a man not only may, but ought rather to propound them sceptically to the world. More, Conj. Cabb. Pref. sign. A. 7.

In dispensable and speculative notions, it is not tanti, nor always so advisable, to engage so far as to disquiet men, or to excite their passion. Worthington to Hartlib, (1661,) Ep. 21.

He that can remit nothing, nor recede, nor sacrifice the prosecution of a small dispensable right to the preservation of peace, understands not the full dimensions and latitude of this great duty. South, Serm. vi. 171.

The question then is, whether the church's benefit may not in some cases make the canons against non residence as dispensable, as those against translations. Stilling fleet, Charge to the Clergy, 1690.

DISPE'NSABLENESS.* n. s. [from dispensable.] Capability of being dispensed with.

To thee the lov'd dispens'ry I resign. Garth.

DISPENSA'TION. n. s. [from dispensatio, Latin.]

1. Distribution; the act of dealing out any thing.

This perpetual circulation is constantly promoted, by a dispensation of water promiscuously and indifferently to all parts of the earth. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

2. The dealing of God with his creatures; method of providence; distribution of good and evil.

God delights in the ministries of his own choice, and the methods of grace, in the economy of heav'n, and the dispensations of eternal happiness. Bp. Taylor, Worthy Communicant.

Neither are God's methods or intentions different in his dispensations to each private man. Rogers.

Do thou, my soul, the destin'd period wait,
When God shall solve the dark decrees of fate;
His now unequal dispensations clear,
And make all wise and beautiful appear. Tickel.

3. An exemption from some law; a permission to do something forbidden; an allowance to omit something commanded.

A dispensation was obtained to enable Dr Barrow to marry. Ward.

DISPE'NSATIVE.* adj. [from dispensation.] Granting dispensation.

Let the kingdom of Scotland witness for the space of so many years before his coming hither, whether either flattery or fear, (no not upon that enterprise of the 17th November, which would have put the patience of any prince in Europe to his proof,) could draw from the king the least inclination to this dispensative indifference, that was only believed because it was eagerly desired. Proceedings against Garnet, &c. 1606, sign. M. 2. b.

DISPE'NSATIVELY.* adv. [from dispensative.] By dispensation.

I can now hold my place canonically, which I held before but dispensatively. Sir H. Wotton, Lett. to the King.

DISPENSA'TOR. n. s. [Latin.] One employed in dealing out any thing; a distributer.

As her majesty hath made them dispensators of her favour towards her people, so it behoveth them to shew themselves equal distributers of the same. Bacon.

DISPE'NSATORY. n. s. [from dispense.] A book in which the composition of medicines is described and directed; in the Greek a Pharmacopoeia.

The description of the ointment is found in the chymical dispensatory. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

A whole dispensatory was little enough to meet with, and suffice to all their wants. Hammond.

Our materia medica is large enough; and to look into our dispensatories, one would think no disease incurable. Baker.

DISPE'NSATORY.* adj. [from dispensation.] Having the power of granting dispensation.

The dispenser [is] the Son of man; the author of his dispensatory power, God the Father. Bp. Rainbow, Serm. (1635,) p. 8.

To DISPE'NSE.† v. a. [despenser, Fr. dispensare, Lat. from penso, to weigh; thence comes pensum, the quantity of wool that was weighed out to the maids to spin; whence it means a task in general; and to dispense, is to distribute these tasks to every one. Richardson's Notes on Milton, P. L. B. xi. 766.]

1. To deal out; to distribute.

Those now, that were dispens'd,
The burden of many ages, on me light
At once, by my foreknowledge. Milton.

Those to whom Christ has committed the dispensing of his gospel. Decay of Piety.

At length the muses stand restor'd again,
While you dispense the laws and guide the state. Dryden.

To them but earth-born life they did dispense,
To us, for mutual aid, celestial sense. Tate's Juvenal.

2. To make up a medicine.

3. To DISPENSE with. To excuse; to grant dispensation for; to allow: before things.

To save a brother's life.
Nature dispenses with the deed. Shakspeare.

How few kingdoms are there, wherein, by dispensing with oaths, absolving subjects from allegiance, and cursing, or threatening to curse, as long as their curses were regarded, the popes have not wrought innumerable mischief? Ralegh.

Rules of words may be dispensed with. Watts.

4. To DISPENSE with: before persons. To set free from an obligation. This construction seems ungrammatical.

I could not dispense with myself from making a voyage to Caprea. Addison on Italy.

5. To DISPENSE with. To obtain a dispensation from; to come to agreement with. This structure is irregular, unless it be here supposed to mean, as it may, to discount; to pay an equivalent.

Hast thou not sworn allegiance unto me?
Canst thou dispense with heav'n for such an oath? Shakspeare.

DISPE'NSE.† n. s. [from the verb.] Dispensation; exemption: not in use, Dr. Johnson says; citing the example from Paradise Lost. This is a word, it may be added, which Milton repeatedly uses in his prose-writings.

Then reliques, beads,
Indulgences, dispenses, pardons, bulls,
The sport of winds. Milton, P. L.

DISPE'NSER.† n. s. [from dispense.]

1. One that dispenses; one that deals out any thing; a distributer.

They are not Peter's commissaries, but Christ's embassadours, ministers, and dispensers. Fulke against Allen, (1580,) p. 112.

The ministers of that household are the dispensers of that faith. Sprat.

Those who stand before earthly princes, who are the dispensers of their favours, and conveyors of their will to others, challenge high honours. Atterbury.

2. One that frames excuses.

Under pain of those censures which are appointed for the reformation of such dalliers and dispensers with their own consciences and oaths. Constitutions and Canons Ecclesiastical.

To DISPE'OPLE. v. a. [dis and people.] To depopulate; to empty of people.

The Irish, banished into the mountains, where they lived only upon white meats, seeing their lands so dispeopled and weakened, came down into the plains. Spenser.

Conflagrations, and great droughts, do not merely dispeople, but destroy. Bacon.

Lest his heart exalt him in the harm
Already done, to have dispeopled heav'n. Milton, P. L.

Kings, furious and severe,
Who claim'd the skies, dispeopled air and floods,
The lonely lords of empty wilds and woods. Pope.

DISPE'OPLER. n. s. [from dispeople.] A depopulator; a waster.

Nor drain I ponds, the golden carp to take;
Nor trowle for pikes, dispeoplers of the lake. Gay.

And I scattered them among the heathen, and they were dispersed through the countries. Ezek. xxxvi. 19.

2. To dissipate.

Soldiers, disperse yourselves. Shakspeare.

If the night
Have gather'd aught of evil, or conceal'd,
Disperse it, as now light dispels the dark. Milton, P. L.

3. To deal about; to distribute.

Being a king that loved wealth, he could not endure to have trade sick, nor any obstruction to continue in the gate vein which disperseth that blood. Bacon.

DISPE'RSEDLY. adv. [from dispersed.] In a dispersed manner; separately.

The exquisite wits of some few, peradventure, are able, dispersedly here and there, to find now a word, and then a sentence, which may be more probably suspected, than easily cleared of errour. Hooker.

Those minerals are either found in grains dispersedly intermixed with the corpuscles of earth or sand, or else amassed into balls or nodules. Woodward.

DISPE'RSEDNESS. n. s. [from disperse.] The state of being dispersed; dispersion.

DISPE'RSENESS.† n. s. [from disperse.] Thinness; scatteredness.

The torrid parts of Africk are by Piso resembled to a libbard's skin, the distance of whose spots represent the disperseness of habitations or towns in Africk. Brerewood on Languages.

DISPE'RSER.† n. s. [from disperse.] A scatterer; a spreader.

I will mortify my outward senses, the windows by which death steals into my soul, the hinderers of my heart's tranquillity, the destroyers of true devotion, the dispersers of inward recollection. Spiritual Conquest, (1651,) P. ii. p. 59.

Those who are pleased with defamatory libels, so far as to approve the authors and dispersers of them, are as guilty as if they had composed them. Spectator.

DISPE'RSION.† n. s. [from dispersio, Lat.]

1. The act of scattering or spreading.

The tragedy of Absyrtus, and the dispersion of his members by Medea. Brown, Vulg. Err.

2. The state of being scattered.

Noah began from thence his dispersion. Ralegh.

After so many dispersions, and so many divisions, two or three of us may yet be gathered together. Pope.

DISPE'RSIVE.* adj. [from disperse.] Having the power to disperse.

Oil
Dispersive of Norwegian tar, renown'd
By virtuous Berkeley. Dyer.

To DISPI'RIT. v. a. [dis and spirit.]

1. To discourage; to deject; to depress; to damp; to terrify; to intimidate; to fright; to strike with fear.

Certain it is, that the poor man appeared so dispirited, that he spoke but few words after he came upon the scaffold. Clarendon.

The providence of God strikes not in with them, but dashes, and even dispirits, all their endeavours, and makes their designs heartless and ineffectual. South.

Steady to my principles, and not dispirited with my afflictions, I have overcome all difficulties. Dryden.

Amidst all the honours that are paid him, he feels nothing in himself but a poor, weak, dispirited mortal, yielding to the laws of corruption. Rogers.

2. To exhaust the spirits; to oppress the constitution of the body.

He has dispirited himself by a debauch, and drank away his good humour. Collier.

DISPI'RITEDNESS.† n. s. [from dispirit.] Want of vigour; want of vivacity. Dict.

It is supposed that matter is from their stupefaction or dispiritedness. Cabilistical Dialogue, (1682,) p. 7.

Spurring so hot with rage dispiteous. Spenser, F. Q.

DISPI'TEOUSLY.* adv. Maliciously; without pity. See DESPITEOUSLY.

Lord Hastings when he feared least,
Dispiteously was murder'd and opprest.
Mir. for Mag. p. 438.

To DISPLA'CE.† v. a. [dis and place.]

1. To put out of place; to place in another situation: as the chessmen are displaced.

A late writer of our own, in his microcosm, hath made bold to displace it, [Nineveh,] affirming that it was built upon Euphrates. Gregory's Posthuma, (1650,) p. 191.

Hereby no part is any way distorted or displaced, out of his true and natural situation, upon his meridian. Ibid. p. 304.

2. To put out of any state, condition, office, trust, or dignity.

To displace any who are in, upon displeasure, is by all means to be avoided, unless there be a manifest cause for it. Bacon.

Abdal, who commands
The city, is the prince's friend, and therefore Must be displac'd, and thou shalt strait succeed him. Denham.

A religion established by God himself, should not be displaced by any thing, under a demonstration of that divine power that first introduced it. South.

One then may be displac'd, and one may reign;
And want of merit render birthright vain. Dryd.

3. To disorder.

You have displac'd the mirth, broke the good meeting,
With most admir'd disorder. Shakspeare.

DISPLA'CENCY.† n. s. [displicentia, Lat.]

1. Incivility; disobligation.

2. Disgust; any thing unpleasing.

A displacency at the good of others, because they enjoy it, though not unworthy of it, is an absurd depravity, striking fast unto corrupted nature, and often too hard for humility and charity, the great suppressors of envy. Brown, Chr. Mor. i. 13.

Vice is often at civil wars with itself; and the vehement inclination to one, ingenders a displacency to another. Decay of Christian Piety.

The displacencies that he receives, by the consequences of his excess, far outweigh all that is grateful in it. Decay of Christian Piety.

To DISPLA'NT. v. a. [old Fr. desplanter; dis and plant.]

1. To remove a plant.

I did not think, a look,
Or a poor word or two, could have displanted
Such a fix'd constancy. Beaum. and Fl. Tamer Tamed.

2. To drive a people from the place in which they have fixed their residence.

All those countries, which, lying near unto any mountains, or Irish desarts, had been planted with English, were shortly displanted and lost. Spenser.

I may justly account new plantations to be the children of former kingdoms: I like a plantation in a pure soil; that is, where people are not displanted. Bacon.

Curse on those French pirates, that displanted us,
That flung us from the happiness we found there!
Beaum. and Fl. Sea-Voyage.

Three of these kings, saith Daniel, should the Antichristian horn depress and displant, to advance himself. Mede, Apost. of the Lat. Times, p. 83.

DISPLANTA'TION. n. s. [from dis and plantatio.]

1. The removal of a plant.

2. The ejection of a people.

The Edenites were garrisoned to resist the Assyrians, whose displantation Senacherib vaunted of. Ralegh.

DISPLA'NTING.* n. s. [from displant.] Removal; ejection.

As this soil was thus rich before the entrance of this people, so since the displanting of them from thence, and the Saracens possessing it, it hath not altogether lost its ancient fruitfulness. Hakewill on Providence, p. 140.

Even out of that will I cause these of Cyprus to mutiny; whose qualification shall come into no true taste again, but by the displanting of Cassio. Shakspeare, Othello.

To DISPLA'Y.* v. a. [dis and plat.] To untwist; to uncurl.

If any thing lie out of order, if every thing fall not even into their rings or curls, which of these would not rather choose that the state, whereof he is a member, should be in combustion, than his hair should be displatted! Hakewill on Providence, p. 422.

To DISPLA'Y.* v. a. [desployer, Fr.]

1. To spread wide.

The northern wind his wings did broad display,
At his command, and reared him up light.
Spenser, F. Q.

There he him found all carelessly display'd,
In secret shadow from the sunny ray,
On a sweet bed of lillies softly laid. Spenser, F. Q.

2. To exhibit to the sight or mind.

You speak not like yourself, who ever yet
Have stood to charity, and display'd th' effects
Of disposition gentle. Shakspeare.

Thou heav'n's alternate beauty can'st display,
The blush of morning, and the milky way. Dryd.

The works of nature, and the words of revelation display truth to mankind in characters so visible, that those, who are not quite blind, may read. Locke.

The storm the dark Lycæan groves display'd,
And first to light expos'd the sacred shade.
Pope, Statius.

Say, how this instrument of love began;
And in immortal strains display the fan. Gay.

3. To carve; to cut up.

He carves, displays, and cuts up to a wonder. Spectator.

4. To talk without restraint.

The very fellow which of late
Display'd so saucily against your highness. Shaks.

5. To set ostentatiously to view.

They are all couched in a pit, with obscured lights; which, at the very instant of our meeting, they will at once display to the night. Shakspeare.

6. To open; to unlock.

Her left [hand holds] a curious bunch of keys,
With which heav'ns gate she locketh and displays.
B. Jonson, Masques.

DISPLA'Y. n. s. [from the verb.] An exhibition of any thing to view.

Our ennobled understandings take the wings of the morning to visit the world above us, and have a glorious display of the highest form of created excellencies. Glanville.

We can with the greatest coldness behold the stupendous displays of omnipotence, and be in transports at the puny essays of human skill. Spectator.

DISPLA'YER.* n. s. [from display.] That which sets to view.

Nothing that has sense but is better for this displayer, [charity.] Feltham, Res. i. 86.

To DI'SPLE.* v. a. [from disciple.] To discipline; to chastise. Obsolete.

Bitter penaunce, with an yron whip,
Was wont him once to disple every day.
Spenser, F. Q. i. 1. 27.

It is only the merry friar in Chaucer can disple them. Milton, Of Ref. in England, B. 1.

DISPLEA'SANCE.† n. s. [old Fr. deplaisance.] Anger; discontent. Obsolete.

Cordell said, she lov'd him as behov'd;
Whose simple answer wanting colours fair
To paint it forth, him to displeasance mov'd.
Spenser, F. Q.

DISPLEA'SANT.† n. s. adj. [from displease.] Unpleasing; offensive; unpleasant.

Nothing may be to him more displeasant or painful, than to be neglected in his pain-taking. Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 171. b.

To some I know this method will seem displeasant, which had rather have good discipline delivered plainly in way of precepts. Spenser, Letter to Ralegh.

Thus the projector here is overthrown;
But I have now a project of mine own.
If it may pass, that no man would invite
The poet from us, to sup forth to-night,
If the play please. If it displeasant be,
We do presume that no man will, nor we.
B. Jonson, Epilogue.

What to one is a most grateful odour, to another is noxious and displeasant; and it were a misery to some to lie stretched on a bed of roses. Glanville, Scepsis.

DISPLEASA'NTLY.* adv. [from displeasant.] In an unpleasing manner.

Whereunto the said emperour displeasauntly answering, said in this manner. Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 148.

2. With at.

Wilt thou be displeased at us for ever? Psalm lxxxv. 5.

3. To make sad.

Soon as the unwelcome news
From earth arriv'd at Heaven-gate, displeas'd
All were who heard; dim sadness did not spare
That time celestial visages, yet mix'd
With pity, violated not their bliss. Milton, P. L.

To DISPLEA'SE. v. n. To disgust; to raise aversion.

Foul sights do rather displease, in that they excite the memory of foul things, than in the immediate objects; and therefore, in pictures, those foul sights do not much offend. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Your extreme fondness was perhaps as displeasing to God before, as now your extreme affliction. Temple.

Sweet and stinking commonly serve our turn for these ideas which, in effect, is little more than to call them pleasing or displeasing; though the smell of a rose and violet, both sweet, are certainly very distinct ideas. Locke.

DISPLEA'SEDNESS.* n. s. [from displeased.] Pain received; uneasiness.

We must be advised not to enter into any sharp or froward displeasedness upon the occasions of our defects and frequent lapses.
W. Mountague, Dev. Ess. P. II.

What a sad damp is there upon the heart! what a confusion and displeasedness covers the whole soul! South, Serm. viii. 150.

DISPLEA'SINGNESS. n. s. [from displeasing.] Offensiveness; quality of offending.

It is a mistake to think that men cannot change the displeasingness or indifferency, that is in actions, into pleasure and desire, if they will do but what is in their power. Locke.

DISPLEA'SURE. n. s. [from displease.]

1. Uneasiness; pain received.

When good is proposed, its absence carries displeasure or pain with it. Locke.

2. Offence; pain given.

Now shall I be more blameless than the Philistines, though I do them a displeasure. Judges, xv. 3.

3. Anger; indignation.

True repentance may be wrought in the hearts of such as fear God, and yet incur his displeasure, the deserved effect whereof is eternal death. Hooker.

He should beware that he did not provoke Soliman's heavy displeasure against him. Knolles.

Undoubtedly he will relent, and turn
From his displeasure. Milton, P. L.

Though the reciprocalness of the injury ought to allay the displeasure at it, yet men so much more consider what they suffer than what they do. Decay of Piety.

On me alone thy just displeasure lay;
But take thy judgements from this mourning land. Dryden.

Y' have shewn how much you my content design;
Yet, ah! would heav'n's displeasure pass like mine? Dryden.

Nothing is in itself so pernicious to communities of learned men as the displeasure of their prince. Addison, Freeholder.

4. State of disgrace; state of being discountenanced; disfavour.

He went into Poland, being in displeasure with the pope for over much familiarity. Peacham on Musick.

To DISPOSSE'SS. v. a. [dis and possess.]

1. To put out of possession; to deprive; to disseize.

The blow from saddle forced him to fly;
Else might it needs down to his manly breast
Have cleft his head in twain, and life thence dispossest. Spenser, F. Q.

Thou shalt hold the opinion of Pythagorus, ere I will allow of thy wits; and fear to kill a woodcock, lest thou dispossess the soul of thy grandame. Shakspeare, Tw. Night.

Let us sit upon the ground, and tell
How some have been dispos'd, some slain in war,
Some haunted by the ghosts they dispossess'd.
Shakspeare, Rich. II.

I will chuse
Mine heir from forth the beggars of the world,
And dispossess her all. Shakspeare, Timon.

In thee I hope; thy succours I invoke,
To win the crown whence I am dispossess'd;
For like renown awaiteth on the stroke,
To cast the haughty down, or raise th' oppress'd.
Fairfax.

The children went to Gilead, and took it, and dispossessed the Amorite which was in it. Numb. xxxii. 39.

This inaccessible high strength, the seat
Of deity supreme, us dispossess'd,
He trusted to have seiz'd. Milton, P. L.

By aught that I can speak in his dispraise,
She shall not long continue love to him. Shaksp.

To me reproach
Rather belongs, distrust, and all dispraise. Milton, P. L.

Nothing is here for tears, nothing to wail
Or knock the breasts; no weakness; no contempt,
Dispraise or blame. Milton, S. A.

I need not raise
Trophies to thee from other men's dispraise. Denham.

Looks fright not men: the general has seen Moors
With as bad faces; no dispraise to Bertran's. Dryden.

If any writer shall do this paper so much honour as to inscribe the title of it to others, the whole praise or dispraise of such a performance will belong to some other author. Addison.

My faults will not be hid, and it is no dispraise to me that they will not: the clearness of one's mind is never better proved than in discovering its own faults. Pope.

To DISPRAI'SE. v. a. [from the noun.] To blame; to censure; to condemn.

In praising Anthony, I have disprais'd Cæsar. Shakspeare.

No abuse, Ned, in the world; honest Ned, none: I dispraised him before the wicked, that the wicked might not fall in love with him; in which doing, I have done the part of a careful friend. Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

The criticks, while they like my wares, may dispraise my writing. Spectator.

DISPRAI'SER. n. s. [from dispraise.] A censurer; one who blames. Dict.

DISPRAI'SIBLE. adj. [from dispraise.] Unworthy of commendation. Dict.

DISPRAI'SINGLY. adv. [from dispraise.] With blame; with censure.

When I have spoke of you dispraisingly,
Hath ta'en your part. Shaksp. Othello.

To DISPREA'D.† v. a. [dis and spread.] To spread different ways. In this word, and a few others, dis has the same force as in Latin composition, and means different ways; in different directions. This word is poetical, Dr. Johnson says; but it is not confined to poetry; and I therefore add a prose example.

As morning sun her beams dispreaden clear,
And in her face fair truth and mercy doth appear. Spenser, F. Q.

Over him art, striving to compare
With nature, did an arbour green dispread,
Framed of wanton ivy flowing fair,
Through which the fragrant eglantine did spread
His prickling arms, entail'd with roses red. Spenser, F. Q.

The Church had certainly dispread itself into all these quarters of the world by that time. More, Expos. of the Seven Churches, (1669,) p. 166.

Above, below, around, with art dispread,
The sure inclosure folds the genial bed. Pope, Odyss.

To DISPREA'D.* v. n. To extend or expand itself.

Half in a blush of clust'ring roses lost,
Dew-dropping Coolness to the shade retires,
There on the verdant turf or flow'ry bed
By gelid founts and careless rills to muse;
While tyrant heat, dispreading through the sky,
With rapid sway his burning influence darts
On man, and beast, and herb, and tepid stream. Thomson, Summer.

DISPREA'DER. n. s. [from dispread.] A publisher; a divulger.

If learned men be the first receivers out of books, and dispreaders both of vice and errour, how shall the licensers themselves be confided in? Milton, Areopagitica.

To DISPRI'VILEGE.* v. a. [dis and privilege.] To deprive of a privilege.

His arms, which he had vow'd to disprofess,
She gather'd up. Spenser, F. Q. iii. xi. 20.

DISPRO'FIT.† n. s. [old Fr. Langued. dial. desproufite; dis and profit.] Loss; damage; detriment. Dict.

Whereas he sought profit, he fell into double disprofit, that neither with good men he could avoid secret shame, nor yet with evil men the note of dissimulation. Fox's Acts and Mon. of Abp. Cranmer.

DISPROO'F. n. s. [dis and proof.] Confutation; conviction of errour or falsehood.

His remark contains the grounds of his doctrine, and offers at somewhat towards the disproof of mine. Atterbury.

I need not offer any thing farther in support of one, or in disproof of the other. Rogers.

To DISPRO'PERTY.† v. a. [dis and property.] To dispossess of any property.

He would
Have made them mules, silenc'd their pleaders, and Dispropertied their freedoms. Shaksp. Coriol.

DISPROPO'RTION. n. s. dis and proportion.] Unsuitableness in form or quantity of one thing, or one part of the same thing, to another; want of symmetry; disparity.

Not to affect many proposed matches
Of her own clime, complexion, and degree,
Whereto we see in all things nature tends:
Foh! one may smell, in such, a will most rank,
Foul disproportion, thoughts unnatural. Shaksp. Othello.

Reasoning, I oft admire,
How nature, wise and frugal, could commit
Such disproportions; with superfluous hand
So many nobler bodies to create,
Greater, so many fold to this one use. Milton, P. L.

Perhaps from greatness, state, and pride,
Thus surprized, she may fall:
Sleep does disproportion hide,
And, death resembling, equals all. Waller.

For their strength,
The disproportion is so great, we cannot but Expect a fatal consequence. Denham, Sophy.

What, did the liquid to th' assembly call,
To give their aid to form the pondrous ball?
First, tell us, why did any come? next, why
In such a disproportion to the dry. Blackmore, Creation.

That we are designed for a more exalted happiness, than can be derived from the things of this life, we may infer from their vast disproportion to the desires and capacities of our soul. Rogers.

To DISPROPO'RTION. v. a. [from the noun.] To mismatch; to join things unsuitable in quantity or form; to join unfitly.

There sits deformity to mock my body,
To shape my legs of an unequal size,
To disproportion me in every part. Shakspeare.

Distance and men's fears have so enlarged the truth, and so disproportioned every thing, that we have made the little troop of discontents a gallant army, and already measured by the evening shadow. Suckling.

Musick craveth your acquaintance: many are of such disproportioned spirits, that they avoid her company Peacham.

We on earth with undiscording voice,
May rightly answer that melodious noise;
As once we did, till disproportion'd sin
Jarr'd against nature's chime. Milton, Ode.

DISPROPO'RTIONABLE. adj. [from disproportion. [Unsuitable in form or quantity; not duly regulated in regard to something else.

Doubts and fears are the sharpest passions: through these false opticks all that you see is like the evening shadows, disproportionable to the truth, and strangely longer than the true substance. Suckling.

Had the obliquity been greater, the earth had not been able to endure the disproportionable differences of season. Brown.

We are apt to set too great a value on temporal blessings, and have too low and disproportionable esteem of spiritual. Bp. Smalridge.

There is no wine of so strong a body as to bear such a disproportionable quantity of water as sixty parts. Broome.

DISPROPO'RTIONABLENESS. n. s. [from disproportionable.] Unsuitableness to something else.

DISPROPO'RTIONABLY. adv. [from disproportion.] Unsuitably; not symmetrically.

We have no reason to think much to sacrifice to God our dearest interests in this world, if we consider how disproportionably great the reward of our sufferings shall be in another. Tillotson.

DISPROPO'RTIONAL.† adj. [from disproportion.] Disproportionable; unsymmetrical; unsuitable in quantity or form to something else.

It is very disproportional to the understanding of childhood. Locke.

And Warwick shall disprove it. Shakspeare.

The traitor's odious name
I first return, and then disprove thy claim.
Dryden, Fables.

It is easier to affirm than to disprove. Holder.

That false supposition I advanced in order to disprove it, and by that means to prove the truth of my doctrine. Atterbury.

We see the same assertions produced again, without notice of what hath been said to disprove them. Swift.

2. To convict a practice of errour.

They behold those things disproved, disannulled, and rejected, which use had made in a manner natural. Hooker.

If God did not forbid all indifferent ceremonies, then our conformity with the church of Rome in some such is not hitherto as yet disproved, although papists were unto us as heathens were unto Israel. Hooker.

3. To disapprove; to disallow.

Some things are good; yet in so mean a degree of goodness, that men are only not disproved, nor disallowed of God for them. Hooker.

DISPRO'VER.† n. s. [from disprove.]

1. One that disproves or confutes.

We may observe what a weak disprover he is of pre-existence.
Annot. on Lux Orient. &c. 1682, p. 68.

2. One that blames; a censurer, if the following passage be not ill printed for disapprover.

The single example that our annals have yielded — of two extremes, within so short a time, by most of the same commenders and disprovers, would require no slight memorial.
Wotton, Rem. p. 324.

To DISPU'NGE.* v. a.

1. To expunge; to raise out. [Lat. dispungo.]

Thou then that hast dispung'd my score,
And dying wast the death of Death,
Be to me now, on Thee I call,
My life, my strength, my joy, my all!
Sir H. Wotton, Hymn in Time of Sickness.

2. To discharge, as a saturated sponge, when squeezed. [dis and sponge.] The later editors of Shakspeare correctly print it disponge.

O sovereign mistress of true melancholy,
The poisonous damp of night dispunge upon me.
Shakspeare, Ant. and Cleop.

DISPU'NISHABLE. adj. [dis and punishable.] Without penal restraint.

No leases of any part of the said lands shall ever be made, other than leases for years not exceeding thirty-one, in possession, and not in reversion or remainder, and not dispunishable of waste.
Swift's Last Will.

To DISPU'RSE. v. a. [dis and purse.] To pay; to disburse. It is not certain that the following passage should not be written disburse.

Many a pound of my own proper store,
Because I would not tax the needy commons,
Have I dispursed to the garrisons,
And never ask'd for restitution. Shaksp. Hen. VI.

To DISPURVE'Y.* v. a. [old Fr. dispourvoir.] To deprive; to unprovide.

Dispurveyed of friends; lacking friends.
Barret.

DISPURVE'YANCE.* n. s. [dis and purveyance.] Want of provisions.

No fort so fensible, no walls so strong,
But that continual battery will rive,
Or daily siege, through dispurvayaunce long
And lack of rescues, will to parley drive.
Spenser, F. Q. iii. x. 10.

DISPU'TABLE.† adj. [from dispute.]

1. Liable to contest; controvertible; containing something which may be alleged on opposite sides.

If they are not in themselves disputable, why are they so much disputed? South.

DI'SPUTANT.† n. s. [from dispute; disputans, Latin.] A controvertist; an arguer; a reasoner.

Then Elihu his speech directs to those,
Who in a ring the disputants inclose.
Sandys, Job, p. 49.

Notwithstanding these learned disputants, it was to the unscholastick statesman that the world owed their peace, defence, and liberties. Locke.

Our disputants put me in mind of the skuttle-fish, that when he is unable to extricate himself, blackens all the water about him till he becomes invisible. Spectator.

DI'SPUTANT. adj. Disputing; engaged in controversy. Not in use.

Thou there wast found
Among the gravest rabbies, disputant
On points and questions fitting Moses' chair.
Milton, P. R.

DISPUTA'TION. n. s. [from disputatio, Lat.]

1. The skill of controversy; argumentation.

Consider what the learning of disputation is, and how they are employed for the advantage of themselves or others, whose business is only the vain ostentation of sounds. Locke.

2. Controversy; argumental contest.

Well do I find, by the wise knitting together of your answer, that any disputation I can use is as much too weak as I unworthy. Sidney.

Till some admirable or unusual accident happens, as it hath in some, to work the beginning of a better alteration in the mind, disputation about the knowledge of God commonly prevaileth little. Hooker.

DISPUTA'TIOUS. adj. [from dispute.] Inclined to dispute; cavilling.

A man must be of a very disputatious temper, that enters into state controversies with any of the fair sex. Addison.

DISPU'TATIVE.† adj. [from dispute.] Disposed to debate; argumentative.

Their disputative and scrupulous zeal.
Bp. Taylor, Artif. Handsom. p. 59.

I have always looked upon this disputative religiousness as no better than a new-fashioned knight-errantry, which puts men continually upon quest of adventures, and makes monsters of every windmill that comes in their way.
Goodman, Winter's Ev. Conf. P. i.

Perhaps this practice might not so easily be perverted as to raise a cavilling, disputative, and sceptical temper in the minds of youth.
Watts, Improvem. of the Mind.

To DISPU'TE. v. n. [disputo, Lat.] To contend by argument; to altercate; to debate; to argue; to controvert.

If attempts of the pen have often proved unfit, those of the sword are more so, and fighting is a worse expedient than disputing. Decay of Piety.

The atheist can pretend no obligation of conscience, why he should dispute against religion.
Tillotson.

Did not Paul and Barnabas dispute with vehemence about a very little point of conveniency?
Atterbury.

To DISPU'TE. v. a.

1. To contend for, whether by words or action.

Things were disputed before they came to be determined: men afterwards were not to dispute any longer, but to obey. Hooker.

So dispute the prize,
As if you fought before Cydaria's eyes.
Dryden, Ind. Emp.

One says the kingdom is his own: a Saxon drinks the quart, and swears he'll dispute that with him. Tatler.

2. To question; to reason about.

Now I am sent, and am not to dispute
My prince's orders, but to execute.
Dryden, Ind. Emp.

3. To discuss; to think on: a sense not in use.

Dispute it like a man.
—— I shall do so:
But I must also feel it as a man. Shaksp. Macbeth.

DISPU'TE. n. s. [from the verb.] Contest; controversy; argumental contention.

The question being about a fact, it is begging it, to bring as a proof an hypothesis which is the very thing in dispute. Locke.

The earth is now placed so conveniently, that plants thrive and flourish in it, and animals live: this is matter of fact, and beyond all dispute.
Bentley.

DISPU'TELESS. adj. [from dispute.] Undisputed; uncontrovertible. Dict.

DISPU'TER. n. s. [from dispute.] A controvertist; one given to argument and opposition.

These conclusions have generally obtained, and have been acknowledged even by disputers themselves, till with labour they had stifled their convictions. Rogers.

DISPU'TING.* n. s. [from dispute.] Disputation; altercation.

Do all things without murmurings and disputings. Phil. ii. 14.

Perverse disputings of men of corrupt minds.
1 Tim. vi. 5.

DISQUALIFICA'TION. n. s. [from disqualify.] That which disqualifies; that which makes unfit.

It is recorded as a sufficient disqualification of a wife, that, speaking of her husband, she said, God forgive him. Spectator.

To DISQUA'LIFY. v. a. [dis and qualify.]

1. To make unfit; to disable by some natural or legal impediment.

Such persons as shall confer benefices on unworthy and disqualified persons, after a notice or correction given, shall for that turn be deprived of the power of presenting unto such benefices.
Ayliffe, Parergon.

2. It has commonly for before the objective noun.

I know no employment for which piety disqualifies. Swift.

My common illness utterly disqualifies me for all conversation; I mean my deafness. Swift.

3. To deprive a right or claim by some positive restriction; to disable; to except from any grant. Swift has from.

The church of England is the only body of Christians which disqualifies those, who are employed to preach its doctrine, from sharing in the civil power, farther than as senators.

Swift on the Sacramental Test.

To DISQUA'NTITY. v. a. [dis and quantity.] To lessen; to diminish. Not used.

Be entreated of fifty to disquantity your train;
And the remainders that shall still depend,
To be such men as may besort your age. Shaksp.

DISQUI'ET. n. s. [dis and quiet.] Uneasiness; restlessness; want of tranquillity; vexation; disturbance; anxiety.

He that, upon a true principle, lives without any disquiet of thought, may be said to be happy. L'Estrange.

If we give way to our passions, we do but gratify ourselves for the present, in order to our future disquiet. Tillotson.

I had rather live in Ireland than under the frequent disquiets of hearing you are out of order. Swift.

DISQUI'ET. adj. Unquiet; uneasy; restless.

I pray you, husband, be not so disquiet;
The meat was well if you were so content. Shaksp.

To DISQUI'ET. v. a. [from the noun.] To disturb; to make uneasy; to harass; to vex; to fret; to deprive of tranquillity.

The proud Roman him disquieted. Spenser, F. Q.

Why art thou so vexed, O my soul? And why art thou so disquieted within me? Psal. xlii. 5.

By anger and impatience the mind is disquieted, and is not able easily to compose itself to prayer. Bp. Duppa.

Thou, happy creature, art secure
From all the torments we endure;
Despair, ambition, jealousy,
Lost friends, nor love disquiets thee. Roscommon.

DISQUI'ETER.† n. s. [from disquiet.] A disturber; a harasser.

Weapons of all the villainy in the world, the disquieters of the honour and peace of Christendom; — our passions and appetites. Hammond, Serm. i.

DISQUI'ETFUL.* adj. [from disquiet.] Producing uneasiness or vexation.

Love and pity of ourselves should persuade us to forbear reviling, as disquietful, incommodious, and mischievous to us. Barrow, Serm. vol. i. S. 15.

DISQUI'ETING.* n. s. [from disquiet.] Vexation; disturbance.

There reigned in all men, without exception, blood, manslaughter, theft, and dissimulation; corruption, unfaithfulness, tumults, perjury; disquieting of good men; forgetfulness of good turns. Wisdom, xiv. 25, 26.

DISQUI'ETLY. adv. [from disquiet.] Without rest; anxiously; uneasily; without calmness.

Treachery, and all ruinous disorders, follow us disquietly to our graves. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

He rested disquietly that night; but in the morning I found him calm. Wiseman.

DISQUI'ETNESS. n. s. [from disquiet.] Uneasiness; restlessness; anxiety; disturbance.

All otherwise, said he, I riches rede,
And deem them root of all disquietness.
Spenser, F. Q.

Arius won to himself, both followers and great defenders; whereupon much disquietness ensued. Hooker.

DISQUI'ETOUS.* adj. [from disquiet.] Causing disquiet.

Charging those, to whom she speaketh, that no manner of way they be troublesome or disquietous to her spouse.

Expos. of Solomon's Song, (1585,) p. 44.

Concerning therefore this wayward subject against prelaty, the touching whereof is so distasteful and disquietous to a number of men. Milton, Reason of Ch. Govern.

DISQUI'ETUDE. n. s. [from disquiet.] Uneasiness; anxiety; disturbance; want of tranquillity.

Little happiness attends a great character, and to a multitude of disquietudes the desire of it subjects an ambitious mind. Addison, Spectator.

'Tis the best preservative from all those temporal fears and disquietudes, which corrupt the enjoyment, and embitter the lives of men. Rogers.

DISQUISI'TION. n. s. [disquisitio, Latin.] Examination; disputative enquiry.

God hath reserved many things to his own resolution, whose determinations we cannot hope from flesh; but with reverence must suspend unto that great day, whose justice shall either condemn our curiosity, or resolve our disquisitions. Brown.

'Tis indeed the proper place for this disquisition concerning the antediluvian earth. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

The royal society had a good effect, as it turned many of the greatest geniuses of that age to the disquisitions of natural knowledge. Addison, Spectator.

The nature of animal diet may be discovered by taste, and other sensible qualities, and some general rules, without particular disquisition upon every kind. Arbuthnot.

To DISRA'NK.† v. a. [dis and rank, old Fr. desreng.]

1. To degrade from his rank. Dict.

2. To put out of the rank; to throw into confusion. This sense is not noticed by Dr. Johnson.

Out of thy part already; foil'd the scene;
Disrank'd the lines; disarm'd the action!
Decker, Satiro-Mastix.

So cranes, in winter, Strymon's cold forsake,
To drink warm Nile; and in their first flight make,
As chance directs, of letters various forms;
When their spread wings are by the violent storms
Of strong south-winds assailed, by and by
In a confused globe all mingled fly;
The letter's lost in their disranked wings.
May's Lucan, B. 5.

DISREGA'RD.† n. s. [dis and regard.] Slight notice; neglect; contempt.

The disregard of melodious air was a necessary consequence of this affectation of harmonical science. Mason on Church Musick, p. 99.

To DISREGA'RD. v. a. [from the noun.] To slight; to neglect; to contemn.

Since we are to do good to the poor, to strangers, to enemies, those whom nature is too apt to make us despise, disregard, or hate, then undoubtedly we are to do good to all. Sprat.

Those fasts which God hath disregarded hitherto, he may regard for the time to come. Smalridge.

Studious of good, man disregarded fame,
And useful knowledge was his eldest aim.
Blackmore.

DISREGA'RDER.* n. s. [from disregard.] One who slights or contemns a thing.

It [Scripture] has, among the wits, as well celebrators and admirers, as disregarders.
Boyle, Style of H. Script. p. 174.

DISREGA'RDFUL. adj. [disregard and full.] Negligent; contemptuous.

DISREGA'RDFULLY. adj. [from disregardful.] Negligently; contemptuously.

DISRE'LISH.† n. s. [dis and relish.]

1. Bad taste; nauseousness.

Oft they assay'd,
Hunger and thirst constraining; drugg'd as oft
With hatefullest disrelish, writh'd their jaws
With soot and cinders fill'd. Milton, P. L.

2. Dislike of the palate; squeamishness.

We may not hope to partake of Christ without sensible disrelishes of nature, without outward afflictions, without a true contrition of spirit. Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 188.

Bread or tobacco may be neglected, where they are shewn not to be useful to health, because of an indifferency or disrelish to them. Locke.

The satiety and disrelish attending sensual enjoyments, the relish for things of a more pure and spiritual kind, the restless motion of the mind from one terrene object or pursuit to another, and often a flight or endeavour above them all towards something unknown and perfective of its nature, are so many signs and tokens of this better state, which in the stile of the Gospel is termed Life Eternal.

Bp. Berkeley, Serm. before the Soc. for Prop. Gospel.

To DISRE'LISH.† v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To make nauseous; to infect with an unpleasant taste.

Fruits of taste to please
True appetite, and not disrelish thirst
Of nectarous draughts between, from milky stream.
Milton, P. L.

The same anxiety and solicitude that embittered the pursuit, disrelishes the fruition itself. Rogers.

2. To want a taste of; to dislike.

I ask again, as before in the animadversions, how long is it since he hath disrelished libels?
Milton, Apology for Smectym.

The world is become too busy for me: every body is so concerned for the publick, that all private enjoyments are lost, or disrelished. Pope.

DISRE'PUTABLE.* adj. [from disrepute.] Not creditable.

Why should you think that conduct disreputable in priests, which you probably consider as laudable in yourself?

Bp. Watson, Apol. for the Bible, 6th ed. p. 66.

DISREPUTA'TION. n. s. [dis and reputation.]

1. Disgrace; dishonour.

I will tell you what was the course in the happy days of queen Elizabeth, whom it is no disreputation to follow. Bacon.

2. Loss of reputation; ignominy.

The king fearing lest that the bad success might discourage his people, and bring disreputation to himself, forbad any report to be made. Hayward.

Gluttony is not of so great disreputation amongst men as drunkenness.

Bp. Taylor, Rule of Living Holy.

DISREPU'TE. n. s. [dis and repute.] Ill character; dishonour; want of reputation.

How studiously did they cast a slur upon the king's person, and bring his governing principles under a disrepute. South.

To DISREPU'TE.* v. a. [from the noun.] To bring into disgrace or dishonour; to disregard.

I think you disrepute them, as all of your fathers do. Montagu, Appeal to Cæsar, (1625,) p. 183.

The Virgin was betrothed, lest honourable marriage might be disreputed.

Bp. Taylor, Life of Christ, i. § 1.

Is it not infinitely better to be unjustly defamed by men, than to be disreputed by God, exposed to most disgraceful condemnation at his bar, and thrown into that state of everlasting ignominy?

Barrow, Serm. vol. iii. S. 34.

DISRESPE'CT. n. s. [dis and respect.]

Incivility; want of reverence; irreverence; an act approaching to rudeness.

Any disrespect to acts of state, or to the persons of statesmen, was in no time more penal. Clarendon.

Aristotle writ a methodical discourse concerning these arts, chusing a certain benefit before the hazard that might accrue from the vain disrespects of ignorant persons. Wilkins.

What is more usual to warriors than impatience of bearing the least affront or disrespect? Pope.

To DISRESPE'CT.* v. a. [from the noun.] To shew disrespect to.

It is true, I could have given him a latter place; but in that I should have disgraced the suiter, and disrespected the commander. Sir H. Wotton, Letters, Rem. p. 557.

DISRESPE'CTFUL. adj. [disrespect and full.] Irreverent; uncivil.

DISRESPE'CTFULLY. adj. [from disrespectful.] Irreverently; uncivilly.

We cannot believe our posterity will think so disrespectfully of their great grandmothers, as that they made themselves monstrous to appear amiable. Addison, Spect.

To DISRO'BE. v. a. [dis and robe.] To undress; to uncover; to strip.

Thus when they had the witch disrobed quite,
And all her filthy feature open shown,
They let her go at will, and wander ways unknown. Spenser, F. Q.

Kill the villain straight,
Disrobe him of the matchless monument,
Thy father's triumph o'er the savages. Shakspeare, K. John.

These two great peers were disrobed of their glory, the one by judgement, the author by violence. Wotton.

Who will be prevailed with to disrobe himself at once of all his old opinions, and pretences to knowledge and learning, and turn himself out stark naked in quest afresh of new notions? Locke.

DISRO'BER.* n. s. [from disrobe.] One who strips off a garment.

Disrobers of gypsies. Gayton, Notes on D. Quixote.

DISRU'PTION.† n. s. [disruptio, Latin.]

1. The act of breaking asunder.

These iron chains are no sooner fast than broken: there was more than an human power in this disruption. Bp. Hall, Contempl. B. 3.

This secures them from disruption, which they would be in danger of, upon a sudden stretch or contortion. Ray.

2. Breach; rent; dilaceration.

The agent which effected this disruption, and dislocation of the strata, was seated within the earth. Woodward.

If raging winds invade the atmosphere,
Their force its curious texture cannot tear,
Nor make disruption in the threads of air. Blackmore.

DISSATISFA'CTION. n. s. [dis and satisfaction.] The state of being dissatisfied; discontent; want of something to complete the wish.

He that changes his condition, out of impatience and dissatisfaction, when he has tried a new one, wishes for his old again. L'Estrange.

The ambitious man has little happiness, but is subject to much uneasiness and dissatisfaction. Addison, Spect.

In vain we try to remedy the defects of our acquisition, by varying the object: the same dissatisfaction pursues us through the circle of created goods. Rogers.

DISSATISFA'CTORINESS. n. s. [from dissatisfactory.] Inability to give content.

DISSATISFA'CTORY. adj. [from dissatisfy.] Unable to give content.

To DISSA'TISFY. v. a. [dis and satisfy.]

1. To discontent; to displease.

The advantages of life will not hold out to the length of desire; and, since they are not big enough to satisfy, they should not be big enough to dissatisfy. Collier.

2. To fail to please; to offend by the want of something requisite.

I still retain some of my notions, after your lordship's having appeared dissatisfied with them. Locke.

To DISSEA'T.* v. a. [dis and seat.] To put out of a seat.

This push
Will cheer me ever, or disseat me now. Shakspeare, Macb.

[He] seeks all foul means
Of boisterous and rough jadery, to disseat
His lord, that kept it bravely. Beaum. and Fl. Two Noble Kinsmen.

To DISSE'CT. v. a. [disseco, Lat.]

1. To cut in pieces. It is used chiefly of anatomical enquiries, made by separation of the parts of animal bodies.

No mask, no trick, no favour, no reserve;
Dissect your mind, examine every nerve. Roscommon.

Following life in creatures we dissect,
We lose it in the moment we detect. Pope.

2. To divide and examine minutely.

This paragraph, that has not one ingenuous word throughout, I have dissected for a sample. Atterbury.

DISSE'CTIBLE.* adj. [from dissect.] That may be dissected.

Keill has reckoned up in the human body four hundred and forty-six muscles dissectible. Paley, Nat. Theol. ch. 9.

DISSE'CTION. n. s. [dissectio, Lat.]

1. The act of separating the parts of animal bodies; anatomy.

She cut her up; but, upon the dissection, found her just like other hens. L'Estrange.

I shall enter upon the dissection of a coquet's heart, and communicate that curious piece of anatomy. Addison.

2. Nice examination.

Such strict enquiries into nature, so true and so perfect a dissection of human kind, is the work of extraordinary diligence. Granville.

DISSE'CTOR.* n. s. [from dissect. Sometimes written dissecter.] One who dissect or cuts asunder; an anatomist.

They had these several persons belonging to and employed in embalming, each performing a distinct and separate office, viz. a designer or painter, a dissector or anatomist, a pollinctor or apothecary, an embalmer or surgeon, and a physician or priest. Greenhill, Art of Embalming, p. 177.

To DISSE'IZE. v. a. [dissaiser, French.] To dispossess; to deprive. It is commonly used of a legal act.

He so disseized of his griping gross,
The knight his thrillant spear again assay'd,
In his brass-plated body to emboss. Spenser, F. Q.

If a prince should give a man, besides his ancient patrimony, which his family had been disseized of, an additional estate, never before in the possession of his ancestors, he could not be said to re-establish lineal succession. Locke.

DISSE'ISIN.† n. s. [from disseisir, French.] An unlawful dispossessing a man of his land, tenement, or other immoveable or incorporeal right. Cowel.

In case of disseisin, the law hath been, that the disseisor could not re-enter without action, unless he had, as it were, made a present and continual claim. Selden on Drayton's Polyolb. s. 17.

He [was] fined before the justices itinerant at Dunstable a 100*l.* a piece for thirty forcible entries and disseisins made by him upon divers men. Stephens, Add. to Spelman's Hist. of Sacrilege.

DISSE'IZOR.† n. s. [from disseize.] He that dispossesses another.

In case of disseisin, the law hath been, that the disseisor could not re-enter without action, unless he had, as it were, made a present and continual claim. Selden on Drayton's Polyolb. s. 17.

To consider themselves as novel disseizors, usurpers, and intruders. Burke, Lett. to R. Burke, Esq.

DISSE'MBLANCE.* n. s. [old Fr. dissemblance.] Want of resemblance; dissimilitude.

Nor can there be a greater dissemblance between one wise man and another. Osborne, Adv. to a Son, 1658.

To DISSE'MBLE.† v. a. [dissimulo, Latin; semblance, dissemblance, and dissembler, old Fr.]

1. To hide under false appearance; to conceal; to pretend that not to be which really is.

She answered, that her soul was God's; and touching her faith, as she could not change, so she would not dissemble it. Hayward.

2. To pretend that to be which is not. This is not the true signification.

Your son Lucentio
Doth love my daughter, and she loveth him,
Or both dissemble deeply their affections. Shaksp.

He soon dissembled a sleep; and she, pleased that his thoughts were composed, fell into a real one. Tatler, No. 172.

In vain, on the dissembl'd mother's tongue,
Had cunning art and sly persuasion hung;
And real care in vain, and native love
In the true parent's panting breast had strove. Prior.

To DISSE'MBLE.† v. n.

1. To play the hypocrite; to use false professions; to wheedle.

Ye dissembled in your hearts when ye sent me unto the Lord your God, saying, Pray for us. Jer. xlii. 20.

I would dissemble with my nature, where
My fortunes, and my friends, at stake, requir'd
I should do so in honour. Shakspeare, Coriol.

2. Shakspeare uses it for fraudulent, unperforming, Dr. Johnson says. But it rather means, in the passage which he has cited, to make unlike others; the opposite to the verb resemble, and not allied to the Latin dissimulare; as Mr. Douce also has noticed. So dissemblable, old Fr. unlike, Cotgrave. See also DISSEMBLANCE. If this be admitted, the verb in the example must be transferred to the active.

I, that am curtail'd of this fair proportion,
Cheated of feature by dissembling nature,
Deform'd, unfinish'd. Shakspeare, Rich. III.

DISSE'MBLER.† n. s. [from dissemble.]

1. An hypocrite; a man who conceals his true disposition.

Thou dost wrong me, thou dissembler, thou. Shakspeare.

The French king, in the business of peace, was the greater dissembler of the two. Bacon, Hen. VII.

Such an one, whose virtue forbiddeth him to be base and a dissembler, shall evermore hang under the wheel. Raleigh.

The queen, with rage inflam'd,
Thus greets him, Thou dissembler, would'st thou fly
Out of my arms by stealth? Denham.

Men will trust no farther than they judge a person for sincerity fit to be trusted: a discovered dissembler can achieve nothing great and considerable. South.

2. One who pretends that not to be, which really is.

For ought I know, all husbands are like me;
And every one I talk with of his wife,
Is but a well dissembler of his woes,
As I am. Beaum. and Fl. Maid's Tragedy.

3. One who feigns what he does not feel or think.

A deep dissembler, not of his affections only, but of religion. Milton, Eiconoclastes.

DISSE'MBLING.* n. s. [from dissemble.] Dissimulation; fallacious appearance.

They are not upright, or sincere, as to their very being; but by such disguises, and dissemblings, make themselves a real and visible (though a silent) lie. Bp. Taylor, Artif. Handsom. p. 149.

Thy function too will varnish o'er our arts,
And sanctify dissembling.
Rowe, Ambitious Stepmother.

DISSE'MBLINGLY.† adv. [from dissemble.] With dissimulation; hypocritically.

St. Peter was dissemblingly divided between scandal and conscience from off the Jews and his judgement, in point of eating meats and conversing with the Gentiles, till God better informed him. Bp. Taylor, Artif. Handsom. p. 113.

They might all have been either dissemblingly spoken, or falsely reported of the equity of the barbarous king. Knolles.

To DISSE'MINATE. v. a. [dissemino, Lat.] To scatter as seed; to sow; to spread every way.

Ill uses are made of it many times in stirring up seditions, rebellions, in disseminating of heresies, and infusing of prejudices. Hammond, Fundamentals.

There is a nearly uniform and constant fire or heat disseminated throughout the body of the earth. Woodward.

The Jews are indeed disseminated through all the trading parts of the world. Addison, Spect.

By firmness of mind, and freedom of speech, the gospel was disseminated at first, and must still be maintained. Atterbury.

DISSEMINA'TION.† n. s. [disseminatio, Lat.] The act of scattering like seed; the act of sowing or spreading.

Though now at the greatest distance from the beginning of errour, yet we are almost lost in its dissemination, whose ways are boundless, and confess no circumscription. Brown.

The Gospel is of universal dissemination.
Bp. Taylor, Life of Christ, i. § 4.

Those eight persons saved in the Ark, descending from the Gordiæan mountains, and multiplying to a large collection in the Plain of Sinaar, made their first division at that place: and that dispersion, or rather dissemination, hath peopled all other parts of the world, either never before inhabited, or dispeopled by the Flood.
Pearson on the Creed, Art. 1.

DISSE'MINATOR. n. s. [disseminator, Lat.] He that scatters; a scatterer; a sower; a spreader.

Men, vehemently thirsting after a name in the world, hope to acquire it by being the disseminators of novel doctrines. Decay of Piety.

DISSE'NSION. n. s. [dissensio, Lat.] Disagreement; strife; discord; contention; difference; quarrel; breach of union.

Friends now, fast sworn,
Whose hours, whose bed, whose meal, whose exercise,
Are still together; who twine, as 'twere, in love,
Unseparable, shall within this hour,
On a dissension of a doit, break out
To bitterest enmity. Shakspeare, Coriol.

Now join your hands, and with your hands your hearts,
That no dissension hinder government. Shakspeare.

He appeased the dissension then arising about religion. Knolles.

Grown
In wealth and multitude, factious they grow;
But first among the priests dissension springs.
Milton, P. L.

Debates, dissensions, uproars are thy joy;
Provok'd without offence, and practis'd to destroy.
Dryden.

DISSE'NSIOUS. adj. [from dissension.] Disposed to discord; quarrelsome; factious; contentious.

Either in religion they have a dissensious head, or in the commonwealth a factious head.
Ascham, Schoolmaster.

Who are they that complain unto the king
That I am stern? They love his grace but lightly,
That fill his ears with such dissensious rumours.
Shakspeare.

You dissensious rogues,
That rubbing the poor itch of your opinion,
Make yourselves scabs? Shakspeare, Coriol.

To DISSE'NT. v. n. [dissentio, Lat.]

1. To disagree in opinion; to think in a contrary manner.

What cruelty of heathens has not been matched by the inhumanity of dissenting Christians?
Decay of Piety.

There are many opinions in which multitudes of men dissent from us, who are as good and wise as ourselves. Addison.

2. To differ; to be of a contrary nature.

We see a general agreement in the secret opinion of men, that every man ought to embrace the religion which is true, and to shun, as hurtful, whatever dissenteth from it, but that most which doth farthest dissent. Hooker.

3. To differ from the established church.

How will dissenting brethren relish?
What will malignants say? Hudibras.

DISSE'NT. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. Disagreement; difference of opinion; declaration of difference of opinion.

In propositions, where though the proofs in view are of most moment, yet there are grounds to suspect that there is proof as considerable to be produced on the contrary side; there suspense or dissent are voluntary actions. Locke.

What could be the reason of this general dissent from the notion of the resurrection, seeing that almost all of them did believe the immortality of the soul? Bentley, Serm.

2. Contrariety of nature; opposite quality. Not in use.

The dissents of the menstrual or strong waters may hinder the incorporation, as well as the dissent of the metals. Therefore where the menstrua are the same, and yet the incorporation followeth not, the dissent is in the metals. Bacon.

DISSENTA'NEOUS.† adj. [from dissent.] Disagreeable; inconsistent; contrary.

They do not only disapprove it as dissentaneous to the Christian religion, but likewise as a matter undecent, and savouring too much of the flesh and sensuality of concupiscence.
Ricaut, State of the Greek Church, p. 306.

The capacities of the Jews were very low and gross, — being dissentaneous and repugnant to the common humour and genius of mankind.
Barrow, Serm. vol. ii. S. 15.

DI'SSENTANY.* adj. [from dissent.] Dissentaneous; inconsistent.

The parts are not discrete, or dissentany, for both conclude not putting away, and consequently in such a form the proposition is ridiculous.
Milton, Tetrachordon.

DISSE'NTER.† n. s. [from dissent.]

1. One that disagrees, or declares his disagreement from an opinion.

'Twill be needless for me to treat as a casuist, to convince the dissenters from this doctrine.
W. Mountague, Dev. Ess. P. ii. (1654,) p. 104.

They will admit of matter of fact, and agree with dissenters in that; but differ only in assigning of reasons. Locke.

2. One who, for whatever reasons, refuses the communion of the English church. The word is supposed to have been assumed by the Presbyterians soon after the Restoration.

They had been used but as tools to prevent the dissenters from uniting with the Church of England, whenever the common danger should come to threaten both. Welwood's Memoirs, p. 196.

The independents gradually, after the Restoration, mingled with the mass of Presbyterians, and now lie undistinguished in the herd of dissenters.
Swift on the Presbyt. Plea of Merit.

DISSE'NTING.* n. s. [from dissent.] Declaration of difference of opinion.

I shall never think myself conscientiously tied to go as oft against my conscience as I should consent to such new proposals, which my reason, in justice, honour, and religion, bids me deny. — And if my dissentings at any time were, as some have suspected and uncharitably avowed, out of errour, opinion, activeness, weakness, or wilfulness; — yet can no man think it other than the badge and method of slavery, by savage rudeness, and importunate obtrusions of violence, to have the mist of his errour and passion dispelled.
K. Charles, Eicon Basil. ch. 6.

DISSE'NTIOUS.* See DISSENSIOUS.

To DISSE'RT.* v. n. [Lat. disserto.] To discourse; to dispute on matters.
Cockeram.

Could I however repeat you the words of a venerable sage, (for I can call him no other,) whom once I heard disserting on the topick of religion, and whom still I hear, whenever I think on him; you might accept perhaps my religious theories as candidly, as you have my moral.
Harris, Dialogue concerning Happiness.

DISSERTA'TION. n. s. [dissertatio, Lat.] A discourse; a disquisition; a treatise.

Plutarch, in his dissertation upon the poets, quotes an instance of Homer's judgement in closing a ludicrous scene with decency and instruction.
Broome on the Odyssey.

DI'SSERTATOR.* n. s. [Lat. disserto.] One who discourses or debates upon a subject.

Our dissertator learnedly argues, if these books lay untouched and unstirred, they must have mouldered away.
Boyle on Bentley's Phalaris, p. 114.

To DISSE'RVE.† v. a. [old Fr. desservir.] To do injury to; to mischief; to damage; to hurt; to harm.

Having never done the king the least service, he took the first opportunity to disserve him, and engaged against him from the beginning of the rebellion. Clarendon.

Desires of things of this world, by their tendency, promote or disserve our interests in another.
Rogers.

DISSE'RVICE.† n. s. [old Fr. desservice.] Injury; mischief; ill turn.

We shall rather perform good offices unto truth, than any disservice unto relaters who have well deserved. Brown.

Great sicknesses make a sensible alteration, but smaller indispositions do a proportionable disservice. Collier.

DISSE'RVICEABLE. adj. [from disservice.] Injurious; mischievous; hurtful.

DISSE'RVICEABLY.* adv. [from disserviceable.] So as to be injurious.

I did nothing disserviceably to your majesty, or the duke.

Hacket's Life of Abp. Williams, P. II. p. 17.

DISSE'RVICEABLENESS. n. s. [from disserviceable.] Injury; harm; hurt; mischief; damage.

All action being for some end, and not the end itself, its aptness to be commanded or forbidden must be founded upon its serviceableness or disserviceableness to some end. Norris.

To DISSE'TTLE.† v. a. [dis and settle.] To unsettle; to unfix.

Under whose government [that of a carnal mind] he was resolved to be, and not be dissettled by the inlets of any higher light.

More, Expos. of Sev. Churches, Pref.

To DISSE'VER.† v. a. [dis and sever. In this word the particle dis makes no change in the signification, and therefore the word, though supported by great authorities, ought to be ejected from our language, Dr. Johnson says. Our word, in fact, is the old French desseverer.] To part in two; to break; to divide; to sunder; to separate; to disunite.

Shortly had the storm so dissevered the company, which the day before had tarried together, that most of them never met again, but were swallowed up. Sidney.

All downright rains dissever the violence of outrageous winds, and level the mountainous billows. Ralegh.

Dissever your united strengths,
And part your mingled colours once again. Shaksp.
